THE PREFACE.

OW confit and how unworthy a choise I haue made of my selfe, to vndertake a worke of this mixtured mine owne reason, though exceeding weak, hath sufficiently resolved mee. For had it bene begotten then with my first dawne of day, when the light of common knowledge began to open it selfe to my yonger yeares, and before any wound receiued, either from Fortune or Time: I might yet well haue doubted, that the darknesse of Age and Death would haue couered ouer both. I long before the performance. For, beginning with the Creation, I haue proceeded with the History of the World: and lastly purposed (some few sallies excepted) to confine my Discourse, with this our renowned Iland of Great Brittain. I confesse that it had better sortd with my disability, the better part of whose times are run out in other traiailes, to haue set together (as I could) the vniointed and scattered fram of our English affaires, than of the Vniuersall: in whom, had there bin no other defect (who am all defect) than the time of the day, it were enough, the day of a tempestuous life, drawne on to the very evening ere I began. But those diuine, and soule-piercing wounds, which are euer aking while vncured: with the desire to satisfie those few friends, which I haue tryed by the fire of Aduersity, the former enforcing, the latter perswading, haue caused mee to make my thoughts legible, and my selfe the subiect of every opinion, wise or weak.

To the World I present them, to which I am nothing indebted: neither haue others that were, (Fortune changing) sped much better in any age. For Prosperity and Aduersity haue euermore tyed and vntyed vulgar affections. And as we see it in experience, That dogs doe alwaies bark at those they know not, and that it is their nature to accompany one another in those clamours: so it is with the inconsiderate multitude; who, wanting that vertue which we call Honesty in all men, and that speciall gift of GOD which we call Charity in Christian men; condemne without hearing, and wound without offence, giuen: led therevnto by vncertaine report only; which his Maiesty truly acknowledgeth for the Author of all ties.

Blame no man (saith Siracides) before thou haue enquired the matter: vnderstand first, and then reforme righteously. Rumor, yes sine reffe, sine iudice, maligne; fallax; Rumor is without witnesse, without iudge, malicious and deceiueable. This vanity of vulgar opinion it was, that gaue Saint Augustine Argument to affirme, That he feared the praise of good men, and detested that of the euill. And herein no man hath giuen a better rule, than this of Seneca: Conscientie satisfacimus: nihil in famam laboremus, sequatur vel non, dum bene sciamus. Let tis satisfie our owne consciences, and not trouble our selues with fame: bee it neuer so ill, it is to be despised so we deserve well.

For my selfe, if I haue in any thing serued my Country, and prized it before my private: the generall acceptation can yeeld me no other profit at this time than dash a little sunshine day to a Sea-man after shipwrack, & the contrary no other harm, than an outrageous tempest after the Port attained. I know that I lost the loue of many for my fidelity towards Her, whom I must still honour in the dust, though further than the defence of her excellent person, I neuer persecuted any man. Of those that did it, and by what deuice they did it, He that is the Supream Iudge of all the world, hath taken the accompt: so as for this kinde of suffering, I must say with Seneca, Mala opinio, bene parsa, delectat.

As for other men, if there be any that haue made themselves Fathers of that fame, which hath been begotten for them: I can neither enuy at such their purchased glory, nor much lament mine owne mishap in that kind, but content my selfe to say with Virgil, Sic vos non vobis, in many particulars. To labour other satisfaction, were an effect of phrenzy, not of hope: seeing it is not Truth, but Opinion, that can traueile the World without a pass-port. For were it otherwise, and were there not as many interall formes of the minde, as there are externall figures of men; there were then some possibility to perswade by the mouth of one Advocate, euen Equity alone.

But such is the multiplying & extensive vertue of dead Earth, & of that breathing life which God hath cast vpon slime & dust, as that among those that were, of whom we read and heare, & among those that are, whom we see & conuerse with, euery one hath received a severall picture of face, & euery one a diuers picture of mind: euery one a forme apart, euery one a fancy & cogitation differing: there being nothing wherein Nature so much triumpheth as in dissimilitude. From whence it cometh that there is found so great diuersity of opinions, so strong a contrariety of inclinations, so many natural & vnnatural, wise, foolish, manly, & childish affections and passions in mortall men. For it is not the visible fashion and shape of plants, and of reasonable Creatures, that makes the difference of working in the one, and of condition in the other; but the forme interall.

And though it hath pleased God to reserve the Art of reading mens thoughts to himselfe: yet, as the fruit tels the name of the Tree, so do the outward works of men (so far as their cogitations are acted) giue vs wherof to ghesse at the rest. Nay, it were not hard to expresse the one by the other, very neere the life: did not craft in many, feare in the most, and the worlds loue in all, teach euery capacity, according to the compassse it hath, to qualifie and maske ouer their inward deformities for a time. Though it be also true, Nemo potest diu personam ferre fictam: cito in naturam tuam residunt, quibus veritas non subest. No man can long continue masked in a counterfeit behauiour: the things that are forced for pretences hauing no ground of truth, cannot long dissemble their own natures. Neither can any man (saith Plutarch) so change himselfe, but that his heart may bee sometimes seene at his tongues end.

In this great discord and dissimilitude of reasonable Creatures, if we direct our selues to the Multitude; Omnis honestæ rei malus iudex est vulgus: The common people are cuill Iudges of honest things, and whose Wisedome (saith Ecclesiastes) is to be despised; if to the better sort; euery vnderstanding hath a peculiar iudgement, by which it both censurcth other men, & valucth it selfe. And therefore vnto me it will not seeme strange, though I finde these my worthlesse papers torne with Rats: seeing the fleshfull Censurers of all ages haue not spared to teaze the Reuerend Fathers of the Church, with Ambition, the seuerest men to themselves, with Hypocrisie, the greatest louers of Iustice, with Popularity, and those of the truest valour and fortitude, with vaine-glory. But of these natures which lie in wait to finde fault, and to turne good into euill, seeing Salomon complained long since: & that the very age of the world renders it euery day after other more malicious; I must leaue the professors to their easie waies of reprehension, than which there is nothing of more facility.

To me it belongs in the first part of this Preface, following the common & approved custome of those, who haue left the memories of time past to after ages, to giue, as neare as I can, the same right to History which they haue done. Yet seeing therein I should but borrow other mens words, I will not trouble the Reader with the repetition. True it is that among many other benefits, for which it hath bin honoured; in this one it triumpheth ouer all humane knowledge, That it hath giuen vs life in our vnderstanding, since the world it selfe had life & beginning, euen to this day: yea, it hath triumphed ouer time, which besides it nothing but eternity hath triumphed ouer: for it hath carried our knowledge ouer the vast and denouring space of many thousands of yeares, & giuen so faire & piercing eyes to our minde; that wee plainly behold liuing now (as if we had liued then) that great world, Magni Dei sapiens opus, the wise work (saith Hermes) of a great GOD, as it was then, when but new to it selfe. By it (I say) it is, that we liue in the very time when it was created: we behold how it was gouerned; how it was couered with waters, and againe re-peopled: How Kings and Kingdomes haue flourished and fallen, and for what vertue and piety God made prosperous; and for what vice and deformity he made wretched, both the one and the other. And it is not the least debt which we owe vnto History, that it hath made vs acquainted with our dead Ancestors; and, out of the depth and darknesse of the earth, deliuered vs their memory and fame. In a word, wee may gather out of History a policy no lesse wise than eternall; by the comparison and application of other mens fore-passed miseries with our owne, like errors & ill seruings. But it is neither of Examples the most liuely instruction; nor the words of the wisest men, nor the terror of future torments, that hath yet so wrought in our blind and stupified mindes; as to make vs remember, That the infinite eye and wisdome of God doth pierce through all our pretences; as to make vs remember, That the iustice of God doth require none other accuser, than our owne consciences: which neither the false beauty of our apparent actions, nor all the formality, which (to pacifie the opinions of men) we put on; can in any, or the least kind, couer from his knowledge. And so much did that heathen wisdome confesse, no way as yet qualified by the knowledge of a true God. If any (saith Euripides) shauing in his life committed wickednesse, thinke hee can hide it from the euermourning gods, he thinkes not well.

To repeat GODS iudgements in particular, vpon those of all degrees, which haue plaied with his mercies, would require a volume apart: for the Sea of examples hath no bottom. The marks, set on priuate men, are with their bodies cast into the earth; and their fortunes, written onely in the memories of those that liued with them: so as they who succeed, and haue not seene the fall of others, do not feare their owne faultes: GODS Iudgements vpon the greater & greater faultes haue bene left to posterity: firstly by those happy hands which the Holy Ghost hath giued, and secondly, by their vertue, who haue gathered the acts and ends of men, wisely and remarkable in the world. Nowe poynt farre off, and so I speake of the conversion of Angells into Devils; for Ambition: Or of the greatest and most glorious Kings, who haue gaue the grasse of the earth with beasts for pride and inuicitude towards GOD: Or of that wise working of Pharaoh, when he slew the Infantes of Israel, ere they had recovered their Cradles: Or of the policy of Ahab, in covering the murder of Naboth by a tryall of the Elders; according to the Law, with many thousands of the like: what were it other, than to make an hopelesse proofe, that farre-off examples would not be left to the same farre-off respects, as heretofore? For who hath not obserued, what labour, practice, perill, bloodshed, and cruelty, the Kings and Princes of the world haue condergone, exercised, taken on, them, and committed, to make themselves and their issues masters of the world? And yet hath Babylon, Persia, Egypt, Syria, Macedon, Carthage, Rome, & the rest, no fruit, no flower, grasse, nor leaf, springing vpon the face of the earth, of those seeds: No, their very roots & ruines do hardly remaine. Omnia quæ manu hominum facta sunt, vel manu hominum euertuntur, vel stando & durando deficient: All that the hand of man can make, is eyther ouerturned by the hand of man, or at length by standing and continuing consumed. The reasons of whose ruines, are diuersly giuen by those that ground their opinions on second causes. All Kingdomes & States haue fallen (say the Politicians) by outward & forraigne force, or by inward negligence & dissension, or by a third cause arising from both. Others obserue, That the greatest haue sunk downe vnder their own weight, of which little hath a touch: eo crevit; vt magnitudine laboret sua: Others, That the diuine providence (which Cratippus obiected to Pompey) hath set downe the date and period of euery Estate; before their first foundation and erection. But herof I will giue my selfe a day ouer to resolve.

For seeing the first bookes of the following story, haue vnderaken the discourse of the first Kings and Kingdomes: and that it is impossible for the short life of a Preface, to trauaile after, and ouertake farre-off Antiquity, and to iudge of it; I will, for the present, examine what profit hath been gathered by our own Kings, & their Neighbour Princes: who hauing beheld, both in diuine & humane letters, the successe of infidelity, iniustice, and cruelty; haue (notwithstanding) planted after the same patterne.

True it is, that the iudgements of all men are not agreeable; nor (which is more strange) the affection of any one man stirred, wth a like with examples of like nature: But euery one is touched most, with that which most neerely seemeth to touch his owne priuate; Or otherwise best futeeth with his apprehension. But the iudgements of GOD are for euer conchangeable; neither is hee wearied by the long processe of time, and won to giue his blessing in one age, to that which he hath cursed in another. Wherefore those that are wise, or whose wisdom if it bee not great, yet is true and well grounded, will be able to discerne the bitter fruites of irreligious policy, as well among those examples that are found in ages removed farre from the present, as in those of latter times. And that it may no lesse appear appeare by euident proofe, than by assertion, That ill doing hath, alwaies bene attended with ill successe, I will here, by way of Preface, run ouer some examples, which the worke ensuing hath not reached.

Among our Kings of the Norman race, we haue no sooner passed ouer the euilence of the Norman Conquest, than we encounter with a singular and most remarkable example of Gods iustice, vpon the children of Henry the first. For that King, when both by force, craft and cruelty, he had dispossessed, ouerreacht, and lastly made blinde and destroyed his elder Brother: Robert Duke of Normandy, to make his owne sonnes Lords of this Land: GOD cast them all, Male and Female, Nephewes, and Nieces (Maud excepted) into the bottome of the Sea, with aboue a hundred and fifty others that attended them; whereof a great many were Noble, and of the King dearly beloved.

To passe ouer the rest, till we come to Edvard the Second, it is certaine, that after the murder of that King, the issue of blood then made, though it had some times of stay and stopping, did againe breake out, and that so often and in such abundance, as all our Princes of the Masculine race (very few excepted) dyed of the same disease. And although the yongue yeares of Edvard the Third, made his knowledge of that horrible fact no more than suspicious: yet in that he afterwards caused his owne Vncle the Earle of Kent to die for no other offence than the desire of his Brothers redemption, whom the Earle as then supposed to be liuing; the King making that to be treason in his Vncle, which was indeede treason in himself, (had his Vncles intelligence been true) this I say made it manifest, that he was not ignorant of what had past, nor greatly desirous to haue had it otherwise, though he caused Mortimer to die for the same.

This cruelty the secret and vnsearchable iudgement of GOD reuenged on the Grand-child of Edvard the Third: and so it fell out, euen to the last of that line, that in the second or third descent they were all buried vnder the ruines of those buildings, of which the Mortar had bene tempered with innocent blood. For Richard the Second, who saw, both his Treasurers, his Chancellor, and his Steward, with diuers others of his Counsaillours, some of them slaughtered by the people, others in his absence executed by his enemies; yet hee alwaies tooke himselfe for ouer-wise, to be taught by examples: The Earles of Huntingdon and Kent, Montagu & Spencer, who thought themselves as great Politicians in those daies as others haue done in these: hoping to please the King, and to secure themselves, by the Murder of Gloucester, died soone after, with many other their adherents, by the like violent hands; and farre more shamefully than did that Duke. And as for the King himselfe (who in regard of many deedes, unworthy of his Greatnesse, cannot be excused, as the disauowing himselfe by breach of Faith, Charters, Pardons and Patents:) Hee was in the prime of his youth deposed, and murdered by his Cosen Germane and vassall, Henry of Lancaster, afterwards Henry the Fourth.

This King, whose Title was weak, & his obtaining the Crowne traiterous: who brake faith with the Lords at his landing, protesting to intend onely the recovery of his proper inheritance, brake faith with Richard himselfe; and brake faith with all the Kingdom in Parliament, to whom hee swore that the deposed King should liue. After that he had enioyed this Realme some few yeares, and in that time had bene set vpon on all sides by his Subiects, and neuer free from conspiracies & rebellions he saw (of sortes immortall fee & discern any things after the bodies death) his Grand-tilde Henry the sixt, & his Son the Prince, suddenly & without mercy, murdered; the possession of the Crowne (for which hee had caused so much blood to be poured out) transferred from his race, & by the Issues of his enemies worn & enuied enemies, whom by his own practice he supposed that he had left no lesse power-lesse, than the succession of the Kingdom questionlesse, by entailing the same upon his own Issues by Parliament. And out of doubt, humane reason could haue iudged no otherwise, but that these cautious prouisions of the father, seconded by the valour & signall victories of his son Henry the sixt, had buried the hopes of every Competitor, vnder the despaire of all reconquest and recovery. I say, that humane reason might so haue iudged: were not this passage of Calaubon also true; Dies, hora, momentum, euertendis dominationibus sufficit, quæ adamantinis credebantur radicibus esse fundata; A day, an houre, a moment, is enough to ouerturne the things, that seemed to haue benee founded and rooted in Adamant.

Now for Henry the sixt, vpon whom the great storm of his Grand-fathers grievous faults fell, as it formerly had done vpon Richard the Grand-tilde of Edward: although he was generally esteemed for a gentle & innocent Prince, yet as he refused the daughter of Armaignac, of the House of Nauarre, the greatest of the Princes of France, to whom he was affianced (by which match hee might haue defended his inheritance in France) & married the daughter of Aniou, (by which he lost all that he had in France) so in condescending to the unworthy death of his Vncle of Gloucester, the maine and strong Pillar of the house of Lancaster, He drew on himselfe & this kingdom the greatest ioynt-losse & dishonour, that euer it sustained since the Norman conquest. Of whom it may truly be said (by a Counsellor of his own spake of Henry the third of France, Quil estoit vne fort geüile Prince; mais son reigne est aduenu en vne fort mauuois temps: That hee was a very gentle Prince; but his reigne happened in a verie vnfortunate season.

It is true that Buckingham & Suffolke were the practisers and contriuers of the Dukes death: Buckingham & Suffolke, because the Duke gaue instructions to their authority, which otherwise vnder the Queene had been absolute, the Queene in respect of her personall wound, ipretæque iniuria formæ, because Gloucester dissuaded her marriage. But the fruit was answerable to the seed; the success to the Counsaile. For after the cutting downe of Gloucester, Yorke grew up so fast, as he dared to dispute his right both by arguments & armes, in which quarrell, Suffolke and Buckingham, with the greatest number of their adherents, were dissolved. And although for his breach of Oath by Sacrament, it pleased God to strike downe Yorke: yet his son the Earle of March, following the plaine path which his Father had troden out, despoiled Henry the Father, and Edward the son, both of their liues and Kingdome. And what was the end now of that politique Lady the Queene, other than this, That shee liued to behold the wretched ends of all her partakers: that shee liued to looke on, while her Husband the King & her only son the Prince, were bewen in sunder; while the Crowne was set on his head that did it? Shee liued to see her selfe dispoiled of her Estate, and of her moueables: and lastly, her father, by rendering up to the Crowne of France the Earledome of Prouence and other places, for the payment of fifty thousand crownes for her Ransome, to become come a sharke Beggar. And this was the end of that subtilty, which Siracides calleth fine but vnrighteous: for other fruit hath it neuer yeelded since the world was.

And now it came to Edward the fourths turn (though after many difficulties) to triumph: For all the plants of Lancaster were rooted vpon one Earle of Richmond, excepted: whom also he had once bought of the Duke of Brittain, but could not hold him. And yet was not this of Edward such a Plantation, as could any way promise iust stability. For this Edward the King (to omit more than many of his other cruelties) beheld and allowed the slaughter which Gloucester, Dorset, Hastings, and others, made of Edward the Prince in his owne presence: of which tragickall Actors, there was not one that escaped the iudgement of GOD in the same kinde. And He, which (besides the execution of his brother Clarence, for none other offence than he himselfe had formed in his own imagination) instructed Gloucester to kill Henry the sixt, his Predecessor; taught him also by the same Art to kill his owne sons and successors, Edward and Richard. For those Kings which haue sold the blood of others at a low rate, haue but made the market for their owne enemies, to buy of theirs at the same price.

To Edward the fourth succeeded Richard the Third, the greatest Master in mischief of all that fore-went him: who although, for the necessity of his Tragedy, he had more parts to play, and more to performe in his owne person, than all the rest; yet he so well fitted every affection that plaid with him, as if each of them had but acted his owne interest. For he wrought so cunningly vpon the affections of Hastings and Buckingham, enemies to the Queene and to all her kindred, as he easily allured them to condescend, that Riuers and Grey, the Kings Maternal Vncle and halfe brother, should (for the first) be severed from him: secondly, hee wrought their consent to haue them imprisoned: and lastly (for the auoiding of future inconuenience) to haue their heads severed from their bodies. And hauing now brought those his chiefe instruments to exercise that common precept, which the Deuill hath written on every post, namely, To depresse those whom they had grieved, and to destroy those whom they had deprest; Hee urged that argument so far and so forcibly, as nothing but the death of the yongue king himselfe, & of his brother, could fashion the conclusion. For hee caused it to be hammered into Buckinghams head, That, whensoever the King or his Brother, should haue able yeeres to exercise their power; they would take a most seuerer reuenge of that curlesse wrong, offered to their Vncle and Brother, Riuers and Grey.

But this was not his manner of reasoning with Hastings, whose fidelity to his Masters Sonnes was without suspect: and yet the Diuell, who neuer dissuades by impossibility, taught him to try him. And so he did. But when he found by Catesby who founded him, that he was not fordable, He first resolved to kill him sitting in counsell: wherein hauing failed with his sword; Hee set the Hangman vpon him, with a weapon of more weight. And because nothing else could moue his appetite, He caused his head to be stricken off, before hee ate his dinner. A greater iudgement of God, than this vpon Hastings I haue neuer obserued in any storie. For the selfe same day that the Earle Riuers, Grey, and others, were (with-out triall of Law, or offence giuen) by Hastings aduice executed at Pomfret. I say Hastings himselfe in the same day, & (as I take it) in the same houre; in the same law-lesse manner, had his head stricken off in the Tower of London.

But

The Preface.

But Buckingham lived a while longer; and with an eloquent oration perswaded the Londoners to elect Richard for their king. And having received the Earldome of Hereford for reward, besides the high hope of marrying his daughter to the Kings only sonne; after many grievous vexations of mind, and unfortunate attempts, being in the end betrayed and delivered up by his trustiest servant; Hee had his head severed from his body at Salisbury, without the trouble of any of his Peers. And what successe had Richard himself after all these mischiefs & murders, policies, and counter-policies to Christian religion; after such time as with a most mercilesse hand he had pressed out the breath of his Nephews and Naturall Lords, other than the prosperity of so short a life, as it tooke end ere himselfe could well looke over and discerne it; & the great out-cry of innocent blood, obtained at G. O. D. S hands the effusion of his; who became a spectacle of shame & dishonour, both to his friends and enemies.

This cruell King, Henry the 7. cut off, & was therein (no doubt) the immediate instrument of Gods iustice. A politick Prince he was if ever there were any, who by the engine of his wisdom, beate downe & overturned as many strong oppositions both before & after he wore the Crowne, as ever King of England did: I say by his wisdom, because as he ever left the reins of his affectiō in the hands of his profit, so he alwaies weighed his undertakings by his abilities, leaving nothing more to hazard than so much as cannot be denied it in all humane actions. He had well observed the proceedings of Loys the 11. whom he followed in all that was royall or royall-like, but he was far more iust, & begun not their processes whom he hated or feared by the execution, as Loys did.

He could neuer endure any mediation in rewarding his servants, & therein exceeding wise; for whatsoever himselfe gave, he himselfe received back the thanks & the love, knowing it well that the affectiōs of men (purchased by nothing so readily as by benefites) were trains that better became great kings, than great subiects. On the contrary, in whatsoever he grieved his subiects, he wisely put it off on those, that he found fit ministers for such actions. Howsoever the taking off of Stanlies head, who set the Crown on his, & the death of the yongue Earle of Warwick, son to George D. of Clarence, shews, as the successe also did, that he held somewhat of the errors of his Ancesters; for his possession in the first line ended in his grand-children, as that of Edward the Third and Henry the Fourth had done.

Now for King Henry the eight: if all the pictures and patternes of a mercilesse Prince were lost in the World, they might all againe be painted to the life, out of the story of this King. For how many servants did he aduance in haste (but for what vertue no man could suspect) and with the change of his fancy ruined againe; no man knowing for what offence? To how many others of more desert gave he abundant flowers from whence to gather bony, and in the end of Haruest burne them in the Hue? How many wines did he cut off, & cast off, as his fancy & affection chaged? How many Princes of the blood (whereof some of them for age could hardly crawl towards the blocke) with a world of others of all degrees (of whom our common Chronicles haue kept the account) did hee execute? yea, in his very death-bed, and when hee was at the point to haue given his account to G. O. D. for the abundance of blood already spilt; He imprisoned the Duke of Norfolk the Father, & executed the Earle of Surrey the son, the one, whose desertings he knew not how to value, having neuer omitted any thing that concerned his own homour, & the kings service, the other neuer having committed any thing worthy of his least displeasure: the one exceeding valiant and aduised, the other no lesse valiant than learned, & of excellent hope. But besides the sorrowes which he heaped upon the Fatherlesse & Widowes at home, and besides the ruaine encirpises abroad, wherein it is thought that he consumed more treasure, than all our victorious Kings did in their severall Conquests: what causelesse and cruell wars did he make upon his own Nephew King Iames the first? What Lawes & Wills did he devise to establish this Kingdome in his owne issues? using his sharpest weapons to cut off, and true downe those branches; which sprang from the same root that himselfe did. And in the end (notwithstanding these his so many irreligious prouisions) it pleased God to take away all his owne, without increase; though for themselves in their severall kinde, all Princes of eminent vertue. For these words of Samuel to Agag King of the Amalikites, haue beene verified upon many others: As thy sword hath made other women childlesse, so shall thy mother be childlesse among other women. And that blood which the same King Henry affirmed, that the cold aire of Scotland had frozen upon the North, God hath diffused by the sunshine of his graces from whence His Maiesty now living, & long to live, is descended. Of whom I may say it truly; That if all the malice of the world were infused into one eie: yet could it not discerne in his life, even to this day, any one of those fule spots, by which the consciences of all the forenamed Princes (in effect) haue bin defiled; nor any droppe of that innocent blood on the sword of his iustice, with which the most that fore-went him, haue stained both their hands and fame. And for this Crowne of England; it may truly be aowned: That he hath received it euen from the hand of God, and hath staied the time of putting it on, howsoever he were provoked to hasten it: That he neuer tooke reuenge of any man, that sought to put him beside it: That he refused the assistance of Her enemies, that wore it long, with as great glory as euer Prince did: That his Maiesty entred not by a breach, nor by blood; but by the Ordinary gate, which his owne right set open, and into which, by a generall love and obedience, He was received. And howsoever His Maiesties preceding title to this Kingdome, was perferred by many Princes (witness the Treaty at Cambray in the yeare, 1559) yet he neuer pleased to dispute it, during the life of that renowned Lady his Predecessor; no, notwithstanding the iniury of not being declared Heire, in all the time of Her long raigne.

Neither ought we to forget or neglect our thankfulness to G. O. D. for the uniting of the Northern parts of Brittain to the South, to wit, of Scotland to England, which though they were separated but by small brookes and bankes, yet by reason of the long continued warre, and the cruelties exercised upon each other, in the affection of the Nations, they were infinitely severed. This I say is not the least of Gods blessings; which His Maiesty hath brought with him vnto this Land: No, put all our petty grievances together, & heap them vp to their height, they will appear but as a Mole-hill compared with the Mountaine of this concord. And if all the Historians since, then haue acknowledged the uniting of the Red-Rose, and the White, for the greatest happinesse; (Christian Religion excepted) that euer this Kingdome received from G. O. D. certainly the peace betwene the two Lions of gold and gules, and the making them one, doth by many degrees exceed the former; for by it, besides the sparing of our british blood, heretofore and during the difference, so often & abundantly shed; the state of England is more assured, the Kingdome more enabled inabled to recouer her ancient honour and rights, and by it made more inuincible, than by all our former alliances, practices, policies & conquests. It is true that here-of we do not yet finde the effect. But had the Duke of Parma in the year 1588, ioyned the army which he commanded, with that of Spaine, and landed it on the south coast; & had his Maiesty at the same time declared himselfe against vs in the north: it is easie to diuine what had become of the liberty of England, certainly we would then without murmur haue brought this vniion a farre greater praise than it hath since cost vs. It is true, that there was neuer any Comon weale or Kingdome in the world, wherein no man had cause to lament. Kings liue in the world & not aboute it. They are not infinit to examine euery mans cause, or to relieue euery mans wants, And yet in the latter, (though in this his owne preiudice) His Maiestic hath had more compassion of other mens necessities, than of his own Coffers. Of whom it may be said as of Salomon, Dedit Deus Salomoni latitudinem cordis: Which if other men do not vnderstand with Pineda, to be meant by Liberality, but by Latitudo of knowledge; yet may it be better spoken of His Maiesty, than of anie King that euer England had; who as well in diuine, as humane vnderstanding, hath exceeded all that fore-went him, by many degrees.

in Gal. 1. K. 4.

I could say much more of the Kings Maiesty, without flatterie: did I not feare the imputation of presumption, & withall suspect, that it might befall these papers of mine, (though the losse were little) as it did the Pictures of Queen Elizabeth, made by vnskilfull and common Painters, which by her owne commandement were knockt in peeces and cast into the fire. For ill Artists, in setting out the beautie of the externall, and weake writers, in describing the vertues of the internall; doe often leaue to posterity, of well formed faces a deformed memory; and of the most Perfect and Princely mindes, a most defective representation. It may suffice, and there needs no other discourse; if the honest Reader but compare the cruell & turbulent passages of our former Kings, and of other their Neighbour-Princes (of whom for that purpose I haue inserted this brieue discourse) with His Maiesties temperate, reuengesse, and liberal disposition: I say, that if the honest Reader weigh them iustly, and with an euen hand: and withall but bestow euery deformed child on his true Parent; He shall find, that there is no man that hath so iust cause to complaine, as the King himselfe hath. Now as we haue told the successe of the trumperies and cruelties of our owne Kings, and other great personages: so we finde, that G O D is euery where the same G O D. And as it pleased him to punish the vsurpation, & vnnatural cruelty of Henry the first, & of our third Edward, in their Children for many generations: so dealt He with the sons of Loyes Debonaire, the son of Charles the great, or Charlemaine. For after such time as Debonaire of France, had torne out the eies of Bernard his Nephew, the son of Pepin the eldest sonne of Charlemaine, & heire of the Empire, & then caused him to die in prison, as did our Henry to Robert his eldest brother: there followed nothing but murders vpon murders, poisoning, imprisonments, & ciuill war; till the whole race of that famous Emperour was extinguished. And though Debonaire, after he had rid himselfe of his Nephew by a violent death, & of then bastard brothers by a ciuill death (hauing inclosed them with sure guard, at the daies of their liues, within a Monastery) held himselfe secure from all opposition: Yet God raised vp against him (which he suspected not) his own sons, to vex him, to inuade him, to take him prisoner, & to depose him; his owne sons, with whom (to satisfie their ambition) he

he had shared his estate, and giuen them Crownes to weare; and Kingdomes to gouerne, during his owne life. Iea his eldest son Lothaire (for he had sowe three by his first wife, & one by his second; to wit, Lothaire, Pepin, Loys, and Charles) made it the cause of his depofition. That he had vsed violence towards his brothers and kinsmen; and that he had suffered his Nephew (whom he might haue deliuered) to be slaine, eo quod, saith the Text, fratribus, & propinquis violentiam intulerit, et nepotem, suum, quem ipse liberare poterat, interfici permisit: Because he used violence to his Brothers and Kinsmen, & suffered his Nephew to be slaine whom he might haue deliuered.

Yet did he that which few Kings doe; namely repent him of his cruelty. For, among many other things, which he performed in the Generall Assembly of the States, it follows: Post hæc autem palam se errasse confessus, & imitatus Imperatoris Theodosii exemplum, penitentiam spontaneam suscepit, tam de his, quam quæ in Bernardum proprium nepotem gesserat. After this hee did openly confesse himselfe to haue erred, and following the example of the Emperour Theodosius, hee vnderwent voluntary penance, as well for his other offences, as for that which he had done against Bernard his owne Nephew.

Posq. ibidem.

This he did; and it was praise-worthy. But the blood that is vniuently spilt; is not againe gathered vp from the ground by repentance. These Medicines, ministred to the dead, haue but dead rewards.

This King, as I haue said, had sowe Sonnes. To Lothaire his eldest he gaue the Kingdome of Italy; as Charlemaine, his father, had done to Pepin the father of Bernard, who was to succeed him in the Empire. To Pepin the second son he gaue the Kingdome of Aquitaine: to Loys, the Kingdome of Bauier: and to Charles, whom he had by a second wife called Iudith, the remainder of the Kingdome of France. But this second wife, being a Mother-in-law to the rest, periwaded Debonaire to cast his son Pepin out of Aquitaine; therby to greaten Charles, which, after the death of his sonne Pepin, he prosecuted to effect against his Grand-child bearing the same name. In the meane while, being inuaded by his son Loys of Bauier, he dies for griefe.

Debonaire dead, Loys of Bauier, & Charles afterwards called the bald, & their Nephew Pepin of Aquitaine, ioine in league against the Emperour Lothaire their eldest brother. They fight neere to Auxerre the most bloody battaile that euer was stroken in France: in which, the marueilous losse of Nobility, & men of war, gaue courage to the Saracens to inuade Italy; to the Hunnes to fall vpon Almaine; & the Danes to enter vpon Normandy. Charles the bald by treason seizeth vpon his Nephew Pepin, kills him in a Cloyster: Carloman rebells against his Father Charles the bald, the Father burns out the eies of his Son Carloman; Bauier inuades the Emperour Lothaire his brother, Lothaire quits the Empire; Hee is assailed and wounded to the heart by his owne conscience, for his rebellion against his Father, and for his other cruelties, and dies in a Monastery. Charles the bald, the Vncle oppresseth his Nephewes the Sonnes of Lothaire, hee vsurpeth the Empire to the preiudice of Loys of Bauier his elder Brother; Bauiers armies and his Sonne Carloman are beaten, hee dies of griefe, & the vsurper Charles is poisoned by Zedechias a Iew his Physitian; his Son Loys le Beque dies of the same drinke. Beque had Charles the simple and and two Bastards, Loys and Carloman; they rebell against their Brother, but the eldest breakes his Neck, the younger is slain by a wild Bore; the son of Bauiero had the same ill destiny, and brake his Neck by a fall out of a Window in sporting with his companions. Charles the grosse becomes Lord of all that the sonnes of Debonaire held in Germanie; where with not contented, he inuades Charles the simple: but being forsaken of his Nobility, of his wife, and of his vnderstanding, he dies a distracted beggar. Charles the simple is held in Wardship by Eudes Maior of the Pallace, then by Robert the Brother of Eudes; and lastly, being taken by the Earle of Vermandois, hee is forced to dye in the prison of Peron. Loys the sonne of Charles the simple breakes his Neck in chasing a Wolfe, and of the two sonnes of this Loys, the one dies of poyson, the other dies in the prison of Orleans, after whom Hugh Capet, of another race, and a stranger to the French, makes himselfe King.

These miserable ends had the issues of Debonaire, who after he had once appalled iniustice with authority, his sonnes and successors tooke up the fashion, and wore that Garment so long without other provision, as when the same was torne from their shoulders, every man despised them as miserable & naked beggars. The wretched success^r they had, (saith a learned French-man) shewes, que en ceste mort il y a voit plus du fait des hommes que de Dieu, ou de la iustice: that in the death of that Prince, to wit, of Bernard the son of Pepin, the true heire of Charlemaine, men had more meddling than either God, or Iustice had.

But to come neerer home; it is certaine that Francis the first, one of the worthiest Kings (except for that fact) that euer the French-men had, did neuer enioy himselfe, after he had commended the destruction of the Protestants of Mirandol & Cabrières, to the Parliament of Prouence, which poore people were thereupon burnt and murdered; men, women, and children. It is true that the said King Francis repented himselfe of the fact, and gaue charge to Henry his sonne, to doe iustice vpon the Murderers, threatening his sonne with GODS iudgements, if he neglected it. But this vnreasonable care of his, GOD was not pleased to accept for payment. For after Henry himselfe was slaine in sport by Montgomeiry, wee all may remember what became of his foure sonnes, Francis, Charles, Henry, and Hercules. Of which although three of them became Kings, and were married to beautifull and vertuous Ladies: yet were they, one after another, cast out of the world, without stock or seed. And notwithstanding their subtilty, and breach of faith, with all their Massacres vpon those of the religion, and great effusion of blood, the Crowne was set on his head, whom they all laboured to dissolue; the Protestants remaine more in number than euer they were, and hold to this day more strong cities than euer they had.

Let vs now see if God be not the same God in Spaine, as in England & France. Towards whom wee will looke no further backe than to Don Pedro of Castile: in respect of which Prince, all the Tyrants of Sicily, our Richard the third, and the great Euan Vasilowick of Moscouia, were but petty ones: this Castilian, of all Christian and Heathen Kings, hauing bene the most mercilesse. For, besides those of his own Bloud and Nobility, which he caused to be slaine in his owne Court & Chamber, as Sancho Ruis, the great Master of Calatraua, Ruis Gonfales, Alphonso Tello, and Don Iohn of Arragon, whom hee cut in peeces and cast into the streets, denying him Christian buriall: I say, besides these, and the slaughter of Gomes Manriques, Diego Peres, Alphonso Gomes, and the great Commander of Castile; He made away the two Infantes of Arragon his Cousin-germans, his brother Don Frederick, Don Iohn de la Cerda, Albuquerques, Nugnes de Guzmán, Cornet, Cabrita, Tenorio, Mendes de Toledo, Gutierrez his great Treasurers, & all his Kinred; & a world of others. Neither did he spare his two youngest brothers, innocent Princes: whom after he had kept in close prison from their Cradles, till one of them had liued sixteene yeares, and the other foureteen; he murdered them there. Nay, he shared not his Mother, nor his wife the Lady Blanch of Bourbon. Lastly, as he caused the Archbishop of Toledo, & the Dean to be killed of purpose to enioy their treasures: so did he put to death Mahomet Abén Alhamar King of Barbary, with 37. of his Nobility, that came vnto him for succour, with a great summe of money, to reuise (by his fauour) some companies of souldiers to returne withall. ^{Hist. of Spai. c.} Then, he would needes assist the Flangman with his owne hand in the execution of the old King; in so much as Pope Viban declared him an enemy both to God and Man. But what was his end? Having bene formerly beaten out of his Kingdome, and re-established by the valour of the English Nation, led by the famous Duke of Lancaster: He was stabbed to death by his younger Brother the Earle of Astramara, who dispossessed all his Children of their inheritance, which, but for the Fathers iniustice and cruelty, had neuer bene in danger of any such thing.

If we can parallel any man with this King, it must be Duke Iohn of Burgoigne, who, after his traiterous murder of the Duke of Orleans, caused the Constable of Armagnac, the Chancellor of France, the Bishops of Cōstance, Bayeux, Eureux, Senlis, Saintes, and other religious and reuerend Church-men, the Earle of gran Pré, Hector of Chartres, and (in effect) all the officers of iustice, of the Chamber of Accompts, Treasury, and Request, (with sixteene hundred others to accompany them) to be suddenly and violently slaine. Hereby, while he hoped to gouerne, and to haue mastered France: He was soone after stricken with an axe in the face, in the presence of the Dauphin; and, without any leisure to repent his misdeeds, presently slaine. These were the Louers of other mens miseries: and misery ^{French inuent. in anno 1418.} found them out.

Now for the Kings of Spaine, which liued both with Henry the seventh, Henry the eight, Queene Mary, and Queene Elizabeth; Ferdinand of Arragon was the first: and the first that laid the foundation of the present Austrian greatness. For this King did not content himselfe to hold Arragon by the usurpation of his Ancestor, & to fasten thereunto the Kingdome of Castile and Leon, which Isabel his wife held by strong band, and his assistance, from her owne Neece the Daughter of the last Henry: but most cruelly and craftily, without all colour or pretence of right, Hee also cast his owne Neece out of the Kingdome of Nauarre, and, contrary to faith, and the promise that he made to restore it, fortified the best places; and so wasted the rest, as there was no means left for any army to inuade it. This King, I say, that betrayed also Ferdinand and Frederick Kings of Naples, Princes of his owne bloud, and by double alliance tyed vnto him: sold them to the French: and with the same Army, sent for their succour vnder Gonfaluo, cast them out; and shared their Kingdome with the French, whom afterwards he most shamefully betrayed.

This wise and politique King, who sold Heauen and his owne Honour, to make his his sonne the Prince of Spaine, the greatest Monarch of the world: saw him die in the flower of his yeares, and his wife great with childe; with her vntimely birth, as once & together buried. His eldest daughter married vnto Don Alphoso Prince of Portugall, behead her first husband & brake his necke in her presence; and being with childe by her second, died with it. A iust iudgement of God vpon the race of Iohn, father to Alphonso, now wholly extinguished: who had not onely left many disconsolate Mothers in Portugall, by the slaughter of their children; but had formerly slaine with his owne hand, the sonne and onely comfort of his Aunt the Lady Beatrix, Dutchesse of Viseo. The second Daughter of Ferdinand, married to the Arch-Duke Philip, turned foole, and died mad and deprined. His third daughter, bestowed on King Henry the eight, He saw cast off by the King: the mother of many troubles in England; & the mother of a daughter, that in her unhappy zeale shed a world of innocent blood, lost Calice to the French; and died heart-broken without increase. To conclude: all those Kingdomes of Ferdinand haue masters of a new name; and, by a strange family are governed and posselt.

Charles the fift, son to the Arch-Duke Philip, in whose vain enterprises vpon the French, vpon the Almans, & other Princes and States, so many multitudes of Christian souldiers, and renowned Captaines, were consumed: who gaue the while a most perillous entrance to the Turkes, and suffered Rhodes the Key of Christendom, to be taken; was in conclusion chased out of France, and in a sort out of Germany, and left to the French, Mentz, Toule, and Verdun, places belonging to the Empire, stole away from Insburg; and scaled the Alpes by torch-light, pursued by Duke Maurice; hauing hoped to swallow vp all those dominions where-in hee concocted nothing saue his owne disgraces. And hauing, after the slaughter of so many Millions of men, no one foote of ground in cyther: Hee crept into a Cloyster, and made himselfe a Pensioner of an hundred thousand Duckets by the yeare to his sonne Philip, from whom he very slowly received his meane and ordinary maintenance.

His Son againe King Philip the second, not satisfied to hold Holland and Zealand, wrested by his ancestors from Iaqueline their lawfull Princeesse & to possesse in peace many other Prouinces of the Netherlands: perswaded by that mischieuous Cardinall of Granuile, and other Romish Tyrants; not onely forgot the most remarkable seruices, done to his Father the Emperour, by the Nobilitie of those countries; not onely forgot the Present made him vpon his entry, of forty millions of Florens, called the Nouale aide; nor onely forgot that hee had twice most solemnly iurorne to the Generall States, to maintaine and preferre their ancient rights, priuiledges, and customes, which they had enioyed vnder their thirtie and fife Earles before him; Conditionall Princes of those Prouinces: but beginning first to constraîne them, and enthrall them by the Spanish Inquisition, and then to impouerish them by many new deuised and intolerable impositions; he lastly, by strong hand and maine force, attempted to make himselfe not onely an absolute Monarch ouer them, like vnto the Kings and Soueraignes of England and France, but Turke-like, so tread vnder his feet all their Nationall and fundamentall Lawes, Priuiledges, and ancient Rights. To effect which, after he had easily obtained from the Pope a Dispensation of his former Oathes (which Dispensation was the true cause of the war & bloodshed since then;) & after he had tried what he could performe, by diuiding of their owne Nobility, vnder the government of his base sister, Margaret of Austria, & the Cardinall Granuile, He employed that most merciles Spaniard Don Ferdinand Aluarez of Toledo, Duke of Alua; followed with a powerfull army of strange Nations: by whom hee first slaughtered that renowned Captaine the Earle of Egmont, Prince of Gaucere: & Philip Montmorency Earle of Horn: made away Montigue, & the Marquis of Bergues, & cut off in those sixe yeares (that Alua governed) of Gentlemen & others, eightene thousand & sixe hundred, by the hands of the Hangman besides all his other barbarous murders & massacres. By whose ministry when he could not yet bring his affaires to their wished ends, hauing it in his hope to worke that by subtilty, which he had failed to performe by force: He sent for Gouernour his bastard brother Don Iohn of Austria; a Prince of great hope, & very gracious to those people. But he, vsing the same Papall aduantage that his predecessors had done, made no scruple to take Oath vpon the Holy Euangelists, to obserue the treaty made with the Generall States; & to discharge the Low Countries of all Spaniards, & other strangers, therein garrisoned: Towards whose Pay & Pasport, the Netherlands strained themselves to make payment of 600. thousand pounds, Which monies receiued, He suddenly surprised the Citadells of Antwerp & Ne-mures: not doubting (being unsuspected by the States) to haue posselt himselfe of all the maistring places of those Prouinces. For whatsoeuer he ouerly pretended, Hee held in secret a contrary counsell with the Secretary Escouedo, Rodus, Barlemont, & others, Ministers of the Spanish tyranny; formerly practised, & now againe intended. But let vs now see the effect & end of this perury, & of all other the Dukes cruelties. First, for himselfe; after he had murdered so many of the Nobility, executed (as aforesaid) eighteen thousand six hundred in sixe yeares; & most cruelly slaine Man, Woman, and Childe, in Mecklin, Zutphen, Naerden and other places; and after he had consumed sixe and thirti millions of treasure in sixe yeares: notwithstanding his Spanish want, That he would suffocate the Hollanders in their owne butter-barrells, and milk-tubbes: Hee departed the country no otherwise accompanied, than with the curse & detestation of the whole Nation; leaving his Masters affaires in a tenfold worse estate, than hee found them at his first arrinall. For Don Iohn, whose haughty conceit of himselfe overcame the greatest difficulties; though his iudgement were ouer-weake to mannage the least: what wonders did his fearefull breach of faith bring forth other than the King his brother: iealousie and distrust; with the vntimely death that seized him, euen in the flower of his youth? And for Escouedo his sharpe-witted Secretarie; who in his owne imagination had conquered for his Master both England & the Netherlands, being sent into Spaine vpon some new proiect, Hee was: at the first arrinall, & before any access to the King, by certaine Russians appointed by Anthony Peres (though by better warrant than his) rudely murdered in his own lodging. Lastly, if we consider the King of Spaines carriage, his counsaile & successe in this businesse; there is nothing left to the memory of man more remarkable. For he hath paid aboute an hundred Millions, & the lines of aboute foure hundred thousand Christians for the losse of all those countries; which, for beauty, gaue place to none; & for reuennue, did equall his West Indies: for the losse of a nation which most willingly obeyed him; & who at this day, after forty yeares warre, are in debt of all his forces become a free Estate, & far more rich and powerfull, than they were, when he first began to impouerish and oppresse them.

The Preface:

Oh by what plots, by what forswearings, betrayings, oppressions, imprisonments, tortures, poisonings, and vnder what reasons of State, and politique subtilty, haue these forenamed Kings, both strangers, and of our owne Nation; pulled the vengeance of GOD vpon themselves, vpon theirs, and vpon their prudent ministers! and in the end haue brought those things to passe for their enemies, and seene an effect so directly contrary to all their owne counsailes and cruelties, as the one could neuer haue hoped for themselves, and the other neuer haue succeeded; if vsuch opposition had euer been made. GOD hath said it and performed it euer: Perdam sapientiam sapientum, I will destroy the wisdom of the wise.

But what of all this? and to what end doe we lay before the eyes of the liuing, the fall and fortunes of the dead: seeing the world is the same that it hath bin; or the children of the present time, will still obey their parents? It is in the present time, that all the wits of the world are exercised. To hold the times wee haue, wee hold all things lawfull: and either we hope to hold them for euer; or at least wee hope, that there is nothing after them to be hoped for. For as wee are content to forget our owne experience, and to counterfeite the ignorance of our owne knowledge, in all things that concerne our selues; or perswade our selues, that GOD hath giuen vs letters patents to pursue all our irreligious affections, with a non obstante: so we neither looke behind vs what hath been, nor before vs what shall be. It is true, that the quantity which we haue, is of the body: wee are by it ioyned to the earth: we are compounded of earth, and we inhabit it. The Heauens are high, farre off, and vnsearchable: we haue sense and feeling of corporall things; and of euerall grace, but by reuelation. No maruaile then that our thoughts are also earthy: and it is lesse to be wondred at, that the words of worthlesse men cannot cleanse them: seeing their doctrine and instruction, whose vnderstanding the Holy Ghost vouchsafed to inhabit, haue not performed it. For as the Prophet Esay cryed out long agoe, Lord, who hath beleueed our reports? And out of doubt, as Esay complained then for himselfe and others: so are they lesse beleueed, euery day after other. For although Religion, and the truth thereof, be in euery mans mouth, yea, in the discourse of euery woman, who for the greatest number are but Idols of vanity: what is it other than an vniuersall dissimulation? We profess that we know GOD: but by workes we deny him. For Beatitudo doth not consist in the knowledge of diuine things, but in a diuine life: for the Diuells know them better than men. Beatitudo non est diuinorum cognitio, sed vita diuina. And certainly there is nothing more to be admired, and more to bee lamented, than the priuate contention, the passionate dispute, the personall hatred, and the perpetuall war, massacres, and murders, for Religion among Christians: the discourse whereof hath so occupied the World, as it hath well nere driuen the practice thereof out of the World. Who would not soone resolute, that tooke knowledge but of the religious disputations among men, and not of their liues which dispute, that there were no other thing in their desires, than the purchase of Heauen; and that the World it selfe were but vsed as it ought, and as an lme or place, wherein to repose our selues in passing on towards our celestiaall habitation? when on the contrary, besides the discourse and outward profession, the soule hath nothing but hypocrisie. We are all (in effect) become Comedians in religion: and while wee act in gesture and voyce, diuine vertues, in all the course of our liues we renounce our Persons, and the parts wee play. For Charity, Iustice, and Truth, haue but their being in termes, like the Philosophy Materia prima.

Neither is it that wisdom, which Salomon desireth to be the Schoole-Mistresse of the knowledge of God; that hath valuation in the world: it is enough that we giue it our good word: but the same which is altogether exercised in the service of the World, as the gathering of riches chiefly, by which we purchase and obtaine honour, with the many respects which attend it. These indeed be the markes, which (when we haue bent our consciences to the highest) we all shooote at. For the obtaining whereof it is true, that the care is our owne; the care our owne in this life, the perill our owne in the future: and yet when we haue gathered the greatest Abundance; we our selues enioy no more thereof, than so much as belongeth to be maintained. For the rest, He that had the greatest wisdom, and the greatest ability that euer man had, hath told vs that this is the use: When goods increase (saith Salomon) they also increase that eate them; and what good cometh to the Owners, but the beholding thereof with their eyes? As for those that deuoure the rest, and follow vs in faire weather: they againe forsake vs in the first tempest of misfortune, and steere away before the Sea and Winde; leauing vs to the malice of our destinies. Of these, among a thousand examples, I will take but one out of Master Danner, and vse his owne words: Whilest the Emperour Charles the first, after the resignation of his Estates, staied at Vloshing for winde, to carry him his last iourney into Spaine; Hee conferred on a time with Seldius, his brother Ferdinands Embassadour, till the deepe of the night. And when Seldius should depart: the Emperour calling for some of his seruants, and no body answering him (for those that attended vpon him, were some gone to their lodgings, and all the rest asleepe) the Emperour tooke vp the candle himselfe, and went before Seldius to light him downe the staires; & so did, notwithstanding all the resistance that Seldius could make. And when He was come to the staires foote, Hee said thus vnto him: Seldius, remember this of Charles the Emperour, when he shall be dead and gone, That Him, whom thou hast knowne in thy time eniured with so many mighty Armies, and Guards of souldiers, thou hast also seene alone, abandoned, and forsaken, yea euen of his owne domestickall seruants, &c. I acknowledge this change of Fortune to proceed from the mighty hand of GOD, which I will by no meanes goe about to withstand.

But you will say that there are some things else, and of greater regard than the former. The first is the reuerend respect that is held of great men, and the Honour done vnto them by all sorts of people. And it is true indeed: provided, that an inward loue for their iustice and piety, accompany the outward worship giuen to their places and power; without which what is the applause of the Multitude, but as the out-cry of an Heard of Animals, who without the knowledge of any true cause, please themselves with the noyse they make? For seeing it is a thing exceeding rare, to distinguish Vertue and Fortune: the most impious (if prosperous) haue euer been applauded; the most vertuous (if vnprosperous) haue euer been despised. For as Fortunes man rides the Horse, so Fortune herselfe rides the Man. Who, when he is descended and on foote: the Man taken from his Beast, and Fortune from the Man; a base groome beates the one, and a bitter contempt spurnes at the other, with equall liberty.

The Preface.

The second, is the greatning of our posterity, and the contemplation of their glory whom we leaue behinde vs. Certainly, of those which conceiue that their soules departed take any comfort therein, it may be truly said of them, which Lactantius spake of certaine Heathen Philosophers, quod sapientes sunt in re stulta. For when our spirits immortal shall be once separate from our mortall bodies, & disposed by GOD: there remaineth in them no other ioy of their posterity which succeed, than there doth of pride in that stone, which sleepeeth in the Wall of a Kings Palace; nor any other sorrow for their pouerty, than there doth of shame in that, which beareth vpon a Beggars cottage. Nesciunt mortui, etiam sancti, quid agunt viui, etiam eorum filij, quia animæ mortuorum rebus viuientium non interlunt: The dead, though holy, know nothing of the liuing, no, not of their owne children: for the soules of those departed, are not conuerlant with their affaires that remaine. And if wee doubt of Saint Augustine, wee cannot of Iob; who tells vs, That wee know not if our sonnes shall bee honourable: neither shall we vnderstand concerning them, whether they shall bee of low degree. Which Ecclesiastes also confirmeth: Man walketh in a shadow, and disquieteth himselfe in vaine: hee heapeth vp riches, and cannot tell who shall gather them. The liuing (saith hee) know that they shall die, but the dead know nothing at all: for who can shew vnto man, what shall be after him vnder the Sun? Hee therefore accompteth it among the rest of worldly vanities, to labour and trauaile in the world; not knowing after death, whether a soole or a wise man should enioy the fruits thereof: which made me (saith he) endeavour euē to abhorre mine owne labour. And what can other men hope, whose blessed or sorrowfull estates after death God hath reserved? mans knowledge lying but in his hope, seeing the Prophet Elay confesseth of the elect, That Abraham is ignorant of vs, and Israel knowes vs not. But hereof we are assured, that the long and darke night of death, (of whose following day wee shall neuer behold the dawne, till his returne that hath triumphed ouer it) shall couer vs ouer till the world be no more. After which, and when we shall againe receiue Organs glorified and incorruptible, the seats of Angelicall affections: in so great admiration shall the soules of the blessed be exercised, as they cannot admit the mixture of any second or lesse ioy; nor any returne of forgone & mortall affection towards friends, kindred, or children. Of whom whether we shall retain any particular knowledge, or in any sort distinguish them: no man can assure vs; & the wisest men doubt. But on the contrary; If a diuine life retain any of those faculties, which the soule exercised in a mortall body; wee shall not at that time so diuide the ioyes of Heauen, as to cast any part thereof on the memory of their felicities which remaine in the World. No, be their estates greater than euer the World gaue, we shall (by the difference knowne vnto vs) euē detest their consideration. And what soeuer comfort shall remaine of all forepast, the same will consist in the charity, which we exercised liuing: and in that Piety, Iustice, and firme Faith, for which it pleased the infinite mercy of God to accept of vs, and receiue vs. Shall we therefore value honour and riches at nothing? and neglect them, as vnnessearie & vaine? Certainly no. For that infinite wisdom of God, which hath distinguished his Angells by degrees: which hath giuen greater and lesse light & beauty, to Heauenly bodies: which hath made differences betwene beasts and birds: crea-

ed the Eagle and the Flye, the Cedar and the Shrub; and among stones, giuen the fairest tincture to the Ruby, and the quickest light to the Diamond; hath also ordained Kings, Dukes or Leaders of the people, Magistrates, Iudges, and other degrees among men. And as honour is left to posterity, for a marke and ensigne of the vertue and vnderstanding of their Ancestors: so, seeing Siracides prestereth Death before Beggary: and that titles, without proportionable estates, fall vnder the miserable succour of other mens pity; I accompt it foolishnesse to condemne such a care: Provided, that worldly goods be well gotten, and that we raise not our owne buildings out of other mens ruines. For, as Plato doth first preferre the perfection of bodily health; secondly, the forme and beauty; and thirdly, Diuities nulla fraude quæritas: so Jeremy cries, Woe vnto them that erect their houses by vnrighteousnesse, and their chambers without equity: and Esay the same, Woe to those that spoile and were not spoiled. And it was out of the true wisdom of Salomon, that he commandeth vs, not to drinke the wine of violence, not to lie in wait for bloud, and not to swallow them vp aliue, whose riches we couet: for such are the wayes (saith hee) of euery one that is greedy of gaine.

And if we could afford our selues but so much leisure as to consider, That hee which hath most in the world, hath, in respect of the world, nothing in it: and that he which hath the longest time lent him to liue in it, hath yet no proportion at all therein, setting it either by that which is past, when we were not, or by that time which is to come, in which we shall abide for euer: I say, if both to wit, our proportion in the world, and our time in the world, differ not much from that which is nothing, it is not out of any excellency of vnderstanding, that we so much prize the one, which hath (in effect) no being: and so much neglect the other, which hath no ending: coueting those mortall things of the world, as if our soules were therein immortal, and neglecting those things which are immortal, as if our selues after the world were but mortall.

But let euery man value his owne wisdom, as he pleaseth. Let the Rich man thinke all sooles, that cannot equall his abundance; the Reuenger esteeme all negligent, that haue not trodden down their opposites; the Politician, all grosse that cannot merchandize their faith: yet when we once come in sight of the Port of death, to which all windes driue vs, & when by letting fall that fatall Anchor, which can neuer be weighed againe, the Navigation of this life takes end. Then it is, I say, that our own cogitations (those sad & seuer cogitations, formerly beaten from vs by our Health and Felicity) returne againe, and pay vs to the vitermost for all the pleasing passages of our liues past. It is then that we cry out to God for mercy; then, when our selues can no longer exercise cruelty toothers: and it is onely then, that we are stricken through the soule with this terrible sentence, That God will not be mockt. For if according to S. Peter, The righteous scarcely be saued: and that God spared not his Angels: where shall those appeare, who, hauing serued their appetites all their liues, presume to think, that the seuer Commandements of the All-powerfull God were giuen but in sport; and that the short breath, which we draw when death presseth vs, if we can but fashion it to the sound of Mercy (without any kind of satisfaction or amends) is sufficient? O quam multi, saith a reuerend Father, cum hac spe ad æternos labores & bella descendunt! I confesse that it is a great comfort to our friends, to haue it said, that we ended well for we all desire (as Balaam did) to die the death of the righteous. But what shall we call a disesteeming, an appoying, or (indeed) a mocking of God; if those men doe not appoye him, disesteeme him, and mocke him, that thinke it enough for God, to aske him forgiveness at leisure, with the remainder and last drawing of a malicious breath? For what doe they otherwise, that die this kinde of wel-dying, but say vnto God as followeth: We beseech thee, O God, that all the falshoods, forswearings, and treacheries of our liues past, may be pleasing vnto thee; that thou wilt for our sakes (that haue had no leisure to doe any thing for thine) change thy nature (though impossible) and forget to be a iust God; that thou wilt loue iniures and oppressions, call ambition wisdom, and charity foolishnesse. For I shall preiudice my sonne (which I am resolu'd not to doe) if I make restitution; and confesse my selfe to haue beene vniust, (which I am too proud to do) if I deliuer the oppressed. Certainely, these wise worldlings haue either found out a new God, or made One: and in all likelihood such a Leaden One, as Lewis the eleuenth ware in his Cappe; which when he had caused any that be feared, or hated, to be killed, he would take it from his head and kisse it: beseeching it to pardon him this one euill act more, and it should be the last, which (as at other times) he did, when by the practice of a Cardinall and a falsified Sacrament, he caused the Earle of Armagnac to be stabbed to death; mockeries indeed fit to be vsed towards a Leaden, but not towards the euermourning God. But of this composition are all deuout lovers of the World, that they feare all that is durelesse and ridiculous: they feare the plots and practices of their opposites, and their very whisperings: they feare the opinions of men which beate but capon shadows: they flitter and forsake the prosperous and vnprosperous, be they friends or Kings: yea they dine vnder water like Duckes, at euery pebble stone, that's but throwne towards them by a powerfull hand: and on the contrary, they shew an obstinate and Giantlike valour, against the terrible iudgements of the All-powerfull God: yea they shew themselves gods against God, and slaues towards men, towards men whose bodies and consciences are alike rotten.

Now for the rest: If we truly examine the difference of both conditions, to wit, of the rich and mighty, whom we call fortunate, and of the poore & oppressed, whom we account wretches: we shall find the happinesse of the one, and the miserable estate of the other, so tied by God to the very instant, and both so subiect to enterchange (witness the sudden downefall of the greatest Princes, and the speedy vprising of the meaneest persons) as the one hath nothing so certaine, whereof to boast; nor the other so vncertaine, whereof to bewaile it selfe. For there is no man so assured of his honour, of his riches, health, or life; but that he may be deprived of eyther or all, the very next houre or day to come. Quid vespere vehar, incertum est, What the euening will bring with it, it is vncertaine. And yet ye cannot tell (saith S. Iames) what shall be to morrow. To day he is set vp, and to morrow he shall not be found: for hee is turned into dust, and his purpose perisheth. And although the aire which compasseth aduersity, be very obscure: yet therein we better discern God, than in that shining light which enuioueth worldly glory; through which, for the cleernesse thereof, there is no vanity which escapeth our sight. And let aduersity seem what it will, to happy men ridiculous, who make themselves merry at other mens misfortunes; and to those vnder the crosse, grievous: yet this is true, That for all that is past, to the very instant, the portions remaining are equall to either. For be it that wee

haue liued many yeares, and (according to Salomon) in them all wee haue reioyced, or be it that we haue measured the same length of dayes, and therein haue euermore sorrowed: yet looking backe from our present being; wee finde both the one and the other, to wit, the ioy and the woe, sayled one of sight; and death, which doth pursue vs & hold vs in chace, from our infancy, hath gathered it. Quicquid erat is retro est mors tenet: What deuener of our age is past, death holds it. So as who shoulder hee bee, no whom Fortune hath beene a seruant, and the Time a friend: let him but take the accompt of his memory (for wee haue no other keeper of our pleasures past) and truly examine what it hath reserved by, other of beauty and youth, or fore-gone delights; what it hath saved, that it might last of his dearest affections, or of whatener else the amorous Spring time gaue his thoughts of contentment, then vnvaluable; and hee shall finde that all the we which his elder yeares haue, can draw no other vapour out of these dissolutions; than heauy secret, and sad sighes. He shall finde nothing remaining, but those sorrowes, which grow vp after our fast-springing youth; ouertake it, when it is at a stand; and ouer-top it vterly, when it begins to wither: in so much as looking back from the very instant time, & from our now being, the poore, diseased, & emper-tue creature, hath as little sense of all his former miseries and paines, as hee, that is most blest in common opinion, hath of his fore-passed pleasures and delights. For what soeuer is cast behinde vs, is iust nothing: and what is to come, deceitfull hope hath it: Omnia quæ euentura sunt, in incerto latent. Onely those few blacke Swannes I must except: who hauing had the grace to value worldly vanities at no more than their owne price; doe, by retaining the comfortable memory of a well-led life, behold death without dread, and the grave without feare; and embrace both, as necessary guides to endlesse glory.

For my selfe, this is my consolation, and all that I can offer to others, that the sorrowes of this life are but of two sorts: whereof the one hath respect to GOD; the other, to the World. In the first we complaine to GOD against our selues, for our offences against him; and confesse, Et tu iustus es in omnibus quæ venterunt super nos, And thou O Lord art iust in all that hath befallen vs. In the second wee complaine, to our selues against GOD: as if hee had done vs wrong, either in not giuing vs worldly goods and honours, answering our appetites: or for taking them againe from vs hauing had them; forgetting that humble & iust acknowledgment of lob, the Lord hath giuen, & the Lord hath taken. To the first of which Saint Paul hath promised blessednesse; to the second, death: And out of doubt he is either a foole, or vngratefull to GOD, or both, that doth not acknowledge, how much soeuer his estate be, that the same is yet far greater, than that which God oweth him: or doth not acknowledge, how sharpe soeuer his afflictions be, that the same are yet far lesse, than those which are due vnto him. And if an Heathen wise man call the aduersities of the world but tributa viuendi, the tributes of liuing: a wise Christian man ought to know them, & beare them; but as the tributes of offending. He ought to beare them manlike, & resolutely, & not as those whining souldiers do, qui gementes sequuntur imperatorem.

For seeing God, who is the Author of all our tragedies, hath written out for vs, & appointed vs all the parts we are to play: and hath not, in their distribution, been partiall to the most mighty Princes of the world; That gaue vnto Darius the part of the greatest Emperour, and the part of the most miserable beggar, a beg-

a beggar begging water of an Enemy, to quench the great drought of death; That appointed Balaam to play the Grand Signior of the Turks in the morning, & in the same day, the Foodstole of Tamerlane (both which parts Valerian had also playd, being taken by Sapores:) that made Bellisarius play the most victorious Captaine, & lastly the part of a blinde beggar, of which examples many thousands may be produced: why should other men, who are but as the least wormes, complain of wrongs? Certainly there is no other account to be made of this ridiculous world, than to resolve, That the change of fortune on the great Theater, is but as the change of garments on the lesse. For when on the one and the other, every man weares but his own skin; the Players are all alike. Now if any man out of weaknes prize the passages of this world otherwise (for saith Petrarch, Magni ingenii est reuocare mentem a sensibus) it is by reason of that unhappy fantasie of ours, which forgeth in the braines of Man all the miseries (the corporall excepted) whereunto he is subiect. Therein it is, that Misfortune & Adversity work all that they worke. For seeing Death, in the end of the Play, takes from all, whatsoeuer Fortune or Force takes from any one: it were a foolish madnesse in the shipwracke of worldly things, where all sinks but the Sorrow, to saue it. That were, as Seneca saith, Fortunæ succumbere, quod tristius est omni fato, To fall vnder Fortune, of all other the most miserable destinie.

But it is now time to sound a retrait; and to desire to be excused of this long pursuit: and withall, that the good intent, which hath moued mee to draw the picture of time past (which we call History) in so large a Table, may also be accepted in place of a better reason.

The examples of diuine providence, euery where found (the first diuine Histories being nothing else but a continuation of such examples) haue perswaded me to fetch my beginning from the beginning of all things; to wit, Creation. For though these two glorious actions of the Almighty be so neere, and (as it were) linked together, that the one necessarily implieth the other: (Creation inferring Providence (for what father forsaketh the child that he hath begotten?) and Providence presupposing Creation: Yet many of those that haue seemed to excell in worldly wisdom, haue gone about to disioyne this coherence; the Epicure denying both Creation and Providence, but granting that the world had a Beginning; the Aristotelian granting Providence, but denying both the Creation and the Beginning.

Now although this doctrine of Faith, touching the Creation in time (for by faith we vnderstand, that the world was made by the word of God) be too weighty a worke for Aristotles rotten ground to beare vpon, vpon which he hath (notwithstanding) founded the Defences and Fortresses of all his Verball Doctrine: Yet that the necessity of infinite power, and the worlds beginning, and the impossibility of the contrary euen in the iudgement of Naturall reason, wherein he beleeued, had not better informed him, it is greatly to be marvailed at. And it is no lesse strange, that those men which are desirous of knowledge (seeing Aristotle hath failed in this maine point; and taught little other than termes in the rest) haue so retrenched their mindes from the following and overtaking of truth, and so absolutely subiected themselves to the law of those Philosophicall principles; as all contrary kinde of teaching, in the search of causes, they haue condemned either for phantasticall, or curious. But doth it follow, that the positions of Heathen Philosophers, are vndoubted grounds and principles in-

indeed; because so called? Or that idle diction, doth make them to be such? Certainly no. But this is true, That where naturall reason hath built any thing so strong against itselfe, as the same reason can hardly assaile it, much lesse batter it downe: the same inuenerie question of Nature, and finite power, may be approved for a fundamentall law of humane knowledge. For saith Charron in his booke of Wisdom, Tout proposition humaine a autant d'autorité quel'autre, si la raison n'en fait la différence; Euery humane proposition hath equall authority, it reason make not the difference, the rest being but the fables of principles. Whereof how shall the vpright and vnpartiall iudgement of man, giue a sentence, where opposition and examination are not admitted to giue in euidence? And to this purpose it was well said of Lactantius, Sapientiam tibi adimunt, qui sine ulla iudicio inuenta maiorum probant, & ab aliis pecudum more ducuntur. They neglect their owne wisdom, who without any iudgement approve the inuocation of those that fore-went them; & suffer themselves after the manner of Beasts, to be led by them. By the aduantage of which sloth and dulnesse, ignorance is now become so powerfull a Tyrant: as it hath set true Philosophy, Physick, and Diuinity in a Pillory; and written ouer the first, Contra negantem Principia; ouer the second, Virtus specifica; and ouer the third, Ecclesia Romana.

But for my selfe, I shall neuer be perswaded, that God hath shut vp all light of Learning within the lanthorne of Aristotles braines: or that it was euer said vnto him, as vnto Eldras, Accendam in Corde tuo. Lucernam intellectus: that God hath giuen inuention but to the Heathen, and that they onely inuaded Nature, and found the strength and bottom thereof; the same Nature hauing consumed all her store, and left nothing of price to after-ages. That these and these be the causes of these and these effects; Time hath taught vs; and not reason: and so hath experience without Art. The Cheese-wife knoweth it as well as the Philosopher, that soure Rennet doth coagulate her milke into a curd. But if wee aske a reason of this cause, why the sowrenesse doth it? whereby it doth it? and the manner how? I thinke that there is nothing to be found in vulgar Philosophy; to satisfie this and many other like vulgar questions. But man to couer his ignorance in the least things, who cannot giue a true reason for the Grasse vnder his feet, why it should be greene rather than red, or of any other colour; that could neuer yet discover the way and reason of Natures working, in those which are farre lesse noble creatures than himselfe; who is farre more Noble than the Heauens themselves: Man (saith Salomon) that can hardly discern the things that are vpon the Earth, and with great labour finde out the things that are before vs; that hath so short a time in the world, as he no sooner begins to learne, than to die; that hath in his memory but borrowed knowledge; in his vnderstanding, nothing truly; that is ignorant of the Essence of his owne soule, and which the wisest of the Naturalists (if Aristotle be he) could neuer so much as define, but by the Action & Effect, telling vs what it worke (which all men know as well as he) but not what it is, which neither he, nor any else, doth know, but GOD that created it; (For though I were perfect, yet I know not my soule, saith Iob.) Man, I say, that is but an Idiot in the next cause of his owne life, and in the cause of all actions of his life: will (notwithstanding) examine the Art of GOD in creating the World; of GOD, who (saith Iob) is so excellent as wee know him not; and and examine the beginning of the worke, which had end before: Mankind had a beginning of being. He will vnto the Gods power to make a world, without matter to make it of. He will rather giue the moethes of the Aire for a cause, cast the work on necessity or chance; bestow the honour thereof on Nature; make two powers, the one to be the Author of the Matter, the other of the Forme; and lastly, for want of a worke-man, haue it Eternall; which latter opinion Aristotle so make himselfe the Author of a new Doctrine, brought into the World: and his Sectatours haue maintained it; parati ac coniuuati, quos sequuntur, Philosophorum animis inuictis opinionibus tueri: Hermes, who liued at once with, or soone after Moses, Zoroaster, Musæus, Orpheus, Linus, Anaximenes, Anaxagoras, Empedocles, Melissus, Pherecydes, Thales, Cleanthes, Pythagoras, Plato, and many others (whose opinions are exquisitely gathered by Streuchius Eugubinus) found in the necessity of inuincible reason, One eternall and infinite Being, to be the Parent of the vniuersall. Horum omnium sententia quamuis sit incerta, eodem tamen spectat, vt Prouidentiam vnā esse contentiant: siue enim Natura, siue Æther, siue Ratio, siue mens, siue fatalis necessitas, siue diuina Lex, idem esse quod a nobis dicitur Deus: All these mens opinions (saith Lactantius) though vncertain, come to this; That they agree vpon one Prouidence, whether the same be Nature, or light, or Reason, or vnderstanding, or destinie, or diuine ordinance, that it is the same which we call GOD. Certainly, as all the Riũers in the world, though they haue diuers risings, and diuers runnings; though they sometimes hide themselves for a while vnder ground, & seeme to be lost in Sea-like Lakes; doe at last finde, & fall into the great Ocean: so after all the searches that humane capacitie hath, & after all Philosophicall contemplation and curiosity; in the necessity of this infinite power, all the reason of man ends and dissolues it selfe.

As for others, and first touching those which conceiue the matter of the World to haue bene eternall, and that God did not create the World, ex nihilo, but ex materia præexistente: the Supposition is so weak, as is hardly worth the answering. For (saith Eusebius) Mihi videntur qui hoc dicunt, fortunam quoque Deo annectere, They seeme vnto me, which affirme this, to giue part of the work to God, & part to Fortune: inasmuch as if God had not found this first matter by chance, He had neither bene Author, nor Father, nor Creator, nor Lord of the Vniuersall. For were the Matter or Chaos eternall: it then followes, That either this supposed Matter did fit it selfe to God, or God accommodate himselfe to the matter. For the first; it is impossible, that things without sense could proportion themselves to the Work-mans will. For the second; it were horrible to conceiue of God, That as an Artificer he applied himselfe, according to the proportion of matter which he lighted vpon.

But let it be supposed, That this matter hath bin made by any Power, not Omnipotent, and infinitely wise: I would gladly learne how it came to passe, that the same was proportionable to his intention, that was Omnipotent & infinitely wise; & no more, nor no lesse, than serued to receiue the forme of the Vniuersall. For had it wanted any thing of what was sufficient, then must it be granted, That God created out of nothing so much of new matter, as serued to finish the work of the World: Or had there bin more of this matter, than sufficed, then God did dissolue & annihilate what soeuer remained and was superfluous. And this must necessarily sonable soule confesse; That it is the same worke of God alone, to create any thing out of nothing. And by the same art and power, and by none other, can those things, or any part of that eternall matter, be againe changed into Nothing; by which those things, that once were nothing, obtained a beginning of being.

Again, to say that this matter was the cause of it selfe; this, of all other, were the greatest idiotisme. For, if it were the cause of it selfe at any time; then there was also a time when it selfe was not: at which time of not being, it is easie enough to conceiue, that it could neither procure it selfe, nor anything else. For to be, and not to be, at once, is impossible. Nihil autem seipsum præcedit, neq; seipsum componit corpus: There is nothing that doth precede it selfe, neither doe bodies compound themselves.

For the rest; Those that saue this matter to be eternall, must of necessity confesse; that Infinite cannot bee separate from Eternity. And then had infinite matter left no place for infinite forme, but that the first matter was finite, the forme which it receiued proues it. For conclusion of this part, who soeuer will make choice, rather to beleue in eternall deformity, or in eternall dead matter, than in eternall light and eternall life: let eternall death be his reward. For it is a madness of that kind, as wanteth tearmes to expresse it. For what reason of men (whom the curse of presumption hath not stupified) hath doubted, That infinite power (of which we can comprehend but a kind of shadow, quia comprehensio est intra terminos, qui infinito repugnant) hath any thing wanting in it selfe, either for matter or form; yea for as many worlds (if such had bene Gods will) as the Sea hath sands? For where the power is without limitation, the work hath no other limitation, than the workmans will. Yea Reason it selfe findes it more easie for infinite power, to deliuer from it selfe a finite world, without the helpe of matter prepared; than for a finite man; a foole and dust, to change the forme of matter made to his hands. They are Dionysius his words, Deus in vna existentia omnia præhabet: and againe, Esse omnium est ipsa Diuinitas, omne quod videt, & quod non videt; to wit, causaliter, or in better tearmes, non tanquam forma, sed tanquam causa vniuersalis. Neither hath the world vniuersall closed vp all of GOD: For the most part of his workes (saith Siracides) are hid. Neither can the depth of his wisdom bee opened, by the glorious worke of the world: which neuer brought to knowledge, all it can; for then were his infinite power bounded, and made finite. And hereof it comes; That wee seldome entitle GOD the all-creating, or the all-willing; but the Almighty, that is, infinitely able.

But now for those, who from that ground, That out of nothing nothing is made, inferre the Worlds eternity; and yet not so saluage therein, as those are, which giue an eternall being to dead matter: It is true, if the word (nothing) be taken in the affirmative; and the making, imposed vpon Naturall Agents and finite power; That out of nothing, nothing is made. But seeing their great Doctor Aristotle himselfe confesse, quod omnes antiqui decreuerant quasi quoddam regum principium, ipsumque infinitum. That all the Ancient decree a kind of beginning, and the same to be infinite: and a little after, more largely and plainly, Principium eius est nullum, sed ipsum omnium cernitur esse principium, ac omnia completi ac regere: it is strange that this Philosopher, with his followers, should rather make choice out of falsehood, to conclude falsly; than out of truth, to resolve truly. For if we compare the world vniuersall, & all the immeasurable Orbes of Heauen, and those marueilous bodies of the Sun, Moone, and Stars, with ipsum Infinitum: it may truly be said of them all, which himself affirms of his imaginary Materia prima, That they are neither quid, quale, nor quantum; and therefore to bring finite (which hath no proportion with infinite) out of infinite (qui destruit omnem proportionē) is no wonder in Gods power. And therefore Anaximander, Melissus, & Empedocles, call the world vniuersall, but particulam Vniuersitatis and infinitatis, a parcell of that which is the vniuersality and the infinity it self; & Plato, but a shadow of God. But the other, to proue the worlds eternity, vrgeth this Maxime, That, A sufficient & effectual cause being granted, an answerable effect therof is also granted: inferring that God being for euer a sufficient & effectual cause of the world, the effect of the cause should also haue bin for euer, to wit, the world vniuersall. But what a strange mockery is this in so great a Master, to confesse a sufficient & effectual cause of the world, (to wit, an almighty God) in his Antecedent; & the same God to be a God restrained in his conclusion, to make God free in power, & bound in wil; able to effect, vnable to determine; able to make all things, and yet vnable to make choice of the time when? For this were impiously to resolue of God, as of natural necessity; which hath neither choice, nor will, nor vnderstanding; which cannot but worke matter being present: as fire, to burne things combustible. Again he thus disputeth, That euery Agent which can work, and doth not work: if it afterward worke, it is either thereto moued by it self, or by somewhat else: and so it passeth from power to Act. But God (saith he) is immouable, and is neither moued by himselfe, nor by any other: but being alwaies the same, doth alwaies worke. Whence he concludeth, If the world were caused by God, that he was for euer the cause thereof: and therefore eternall. The answer to this is verie easie, For that Gods performing in due time that, which he euer determined at length to performe, doth not argue any alteration or change, but rather constancy in him. For the same action of his will, which made the world for euer, did also with-hold the effect to the time ordained. To this answer, in it self sufficient: others adde further, that the Patterne or Image of the World may be said to be eternall: which the Platonicks call, spiritualem mundum; and doe in this sort distinguish the Idea and Creation in time. Spiritalis ille mundus, mundi huius exemplar, primumque Dei opus, vita equali est Architecto, fuit semper cum illo, eritque semper. Mundus autem corporalis, quod secundum opus est Dei, decedit iam ab opifice ex parte vna, quia non fuit semper: retinet alteram, quia fit semper futurus: That representatiue, or the intentionall world (say they) the sampler of this visible world, the first worke of GOD, was equally ancient with the Architect; for it was for euer with him, and euer shall bee. This materiall world, the second worke or creature of GOD, doth differ from the worker in this, That it was not from euerlasting, and in this it doth agree, that it shall be for euer to come. The first point, That it was not for euer, all Christians confesse: The other they vnderstand no otherwise, than that after the consumation of this world, there shalbe a new Heauen and a new Earth, without any new creation of matter. But of these things we need not here stand to argue: though such opinions be not unworthy the propounding, in this consideration, of an eternall and vchangeable cause, producing a changeable and temporall effect. Touching which point Proclus the Platonist disputeth, That

The Preface.

That the compounded essence of the World (and because compounded, therefore dissoluble) is continued, & knit to the Divine Being, by an individual & inseparable power, flowing from Divine unity; & thus the Worlds naturall appetite of God sheweth, that the same proceedeth from a good and vnderstanding diuine; and that this vertue, by which the World is continued & knit together, must be infinite, that it may infinitely and euerlastingly continue and preserve the same. Which infinite Vertue, the finite World (saith he) is not capable of, but receiveth it from the diuine infinite according to the temporall Nature it hath, successively euery moment by little & little: euen as the whole Materiall World is not altogether: but the abolished parts are departed by small degrees, and the parts yet to come, do by the same small degrees succeed, as the shadow of a tree in a River seemeth to haue continued the same a long time in the water, but it is perpetually renewed, in the continuall ebbing and flowing thereof.

But to returne to them, which denying that euer the World had any beginning, withall deny that euer it shall haue any end, & to this purpose affirme, That it was neuer heard, neuer read, neuer seene, no not by any reason perceived, that the Heauens haue euer suffered corruption; or that they appeare any way the older by continuance; or in any sort otherwise than they were; which had they been subject to finall corruption, some change would haue been discerned in so long a time. To this it is answered, That the little change as yet perceived, doth rather proue their newnesse, and that they haue not continued so long; than that they wil continue for euer as they are. And if coniecturall arguments may receiue answer by coniectures: it then seemeth that some alteration may be found. For either Aristotle, Plinie, Strabo, Beda, Aquinas, and others, were grossely mistaken: or else those parts of the world, lying within the burnt Zone, were not in elder times habitable, by reason of the Suns heate, neither were the Seas, vnder the Equinoctiall, navigable. But wee know by experience, that those Regions, so situate, are filled with people, and exceeding temperate; and the Sea, ouer which we Nauigate, passable enough. We read also many Histories of deluges: and how that in the time of Phaeton, diuers places in the world were burnt vvp, by the Sunnes violent heate.

But in a Word, this obseruation is exceeding feeble. For we know it for certain, That stone-walls, of matter moldring and friable, haue stood two, or three thousand yeares: that many things haue bene digged vvp out of the earth, of that depth, as supposed to haue bene buried by the generall flood; without any alteration either of substance or figure: yea it is beleued, and it is very probable, that the gold which is daily found in Mines, and Rocks, vnder ground, was created together with the Earth.

And if bodies elementary, and compounded, the eldest times haue not inuaded and corrupted: what great alteration should wee looke for in Celestiall and quincessentiall bodies? And yet we haue reason to thinke, that the Sunne, by whose help all Creatures are generate, doth not in these latter Ages assist Nature, as heretofore. We haue neither Giants, such as the eldest world had: nor mighty men, such as the elder world had; but all things in generall are reputed of lesse vertue which from the Heauens receiue vertue. Whence, if the nature of a Preface, would permit a larger discourse, we might easily fetch store of proue; as that this world shall at length haue end, as that once it had beginning.

And I see no good answer that can bee made to this obiection: If the World were eternall; why not all things in the World eternall? If there were no first, no cause, no Father, no Creator, no incomprehensible, wise dome, but that every Nature had beene alike eternall; and Man more rationall than every other Nature: Why had not the eternall reason of Man, provided for his eternall being in the World? For if all were equal, why not equal conditions to all? Why should heavenly bodies live for ever; and the bodies of Men rot and die?

Again, who was it that appointed the Earth to keepe the center, and gave Order that it should hang in the Aire: that the Sunne should trauaile betwene the Tropicks, and neuer exceed those bounds, nor faile to performe that Progresse once in euery yeare: the Moone to line by borrowed light: the first Stars (according to common opinion) to bee fastned like Nails in a Cart-wheele; and the Planets to wander at their pleasure? Or if none of these had power ouer other: was it out of Charity and Love, that the Sunne by his perpetuall trauaile within those two Circles, hath visited, giuen light vnto, and relieved all parts of the Earth, and the Creatures therein, by turnes and times? Out of doubt, if the Sunne haue of his owne accord kept this course in all eternity: He may iustly bee called eternall Charity, and everlasting Love. The same may be said of all the Stars: who being all of them most large and cleare fountaines of vertue and operation, may also bee called eternall vertues: the Earth may be called eternall patience; the Moone, an eternall borrower and beggar; and Man of all other the most miserable eternally mortall. And what were this, but to beleene againe in the old Play of the gods? Yea in more gods by Millions, than euer Hesiodus dreamt of. But in steed of this mad folly, we see it well enough with our feeble & mortall eyes: and the eyes of our reason discern it better; That the Sun, Moone, Stars, & the Earth, are limited, bounded, and constrained: themselves they haue not constrained, nor could. Omne determinatum causam habet aliquam efficientem, quæ illud determinauerit, Euery thing bounded hath some efficient cause, by which it is bounded.

Now for Nature; As by the ambiguity of this name, the schoole of Aristotle hath both commended many errors vnto vs, and sought also thereby to obscure the glory of the high Moderator of all things, shining in the Creation, and in the gouerning of the World: so if the best definition be taken out of the second of Aristotles phisicks, or primo de Cælo, or out of the first of his Metaphisicks; I say that the best is but nominall, and seruing onely to difference the beginning of Naturall motion from Artificiall: which yet the Academicks open better, when they call it A Seminary strength, infused into matter by the Soule of the World: who giue the first place to Prouidence, the second to Fate, and but the third to Nature. Prouidentia (by which they vnderstand GOD) dux & caput; Fatum, medium ex prouidentia prodiens; Natura postremum. But be it what he will, or be it any of these (God excepted) or participating of all: yet that it hath choice or vnderstanding (both which are necessarily in the cause of all things) no man hath a yowed. For this is vnanswerable of Lactantius, Is autem facit aliquid, qui aut voluntatem faciendi habet, aut scientiam, He onely can be said to be the doer of a thing, that hath either will or knowledge in the doing it.

But the will and science of Nature, are in these words truly exprest by Ficinus: Potest vbiq; Natura, vel per diuersa media, vel ex diuersis materiis, diuersa facere: sublata vero mediis materiisq; diuersitate, vel vnicū, vel simplicium liminum operatur, neque potest quando adest materia non operari; It is the power of Nature by diversity of means, or out of diversity of matter, to produce diuers things: but taking away the diversity of means, and the diversity of matter, it then workes but one or the like worke; neither can it be any worke, matter being present. Now if Nature made choice of diversity of matter, to worke all these variable workes of Heauen and Earth, it had then both vnderstanding and will; it had counsaile to beginne, reason to dispose; vertue and knowledge to finish, and power to gouerne: without which all things had been but one and the same: all of the matter of Heauen; or all of the matter of Earth. And if we graunt Nature this will, and this vnderstanding, this counsaile, reason, and power: Cui Natura potius quam Deus nominetur? Why should we then call such a cause rather Nature, than God? God of whom all men haue notion, and giue the first and highest place to Diuine power: Omnes homines notionem deorum habent, omneq; summum locum diuino cuidam numini assignant. And this I say in short; that it is a true effect of true reason in man (were there no authority more binding than reason) to acknowledge and adore the first and most sublime power. Vera Philosophia, est ascensus ab his quæ fluunt, & oriuntur, & occidunt, ad ea quæ vere sunt, & semper eadem: True Philosophy is an ascending from the things which flow, and arise, and fall, to the things that are for euer the same.

For the rest; I do also account it not the meanest, but an impiety monstrous, to confound God and Nature: be it but in tearmes. For it is God, that only disposeth of all things according to his own will, & maketh of one Earth, Vessels of honor & dishonor. It is Nature that can dispose of nothing, but according to the will of the matter wherein it worketh. It is God that comandeth all: It is Nature that is obedient to all. It is God, that doth good vnto all, knowing and louing the good he doth: It is Nature, that secondarily doth also good, but is neither knoweth nor loueth the good it doth. It is God, that hath all things in himself: Nature, nothing in it self. It is God, which is the Father, and hath begotten all things: It is Nature, which is begotten by all things, in which it liueth and laboureth; for by it selfe it existeth not. For shall we say, that it is out of affection to the Earth, that heauie things fall towards it? Shall we call it Reason, which doth conduct euery Riuer into the salt Sea? Shall we tearme it knowledge in fire, that makes it to consume combustible matters? If it be Affection, Reason, and Knowledge in these: by the same Affection, Reason, and Knowledge it is, that Nature worketh. And therefore seeing all things worke as they do, (call it by Forme, or Nature, or by what you please) yet because they worke by an impulsion, which they cannot resist; or by a faculty, infused by the supreme power: we are neither to wonder at, nor to worship, the faculty that worketh, nor the Creature wherein it worketh. But herein lies the wonder: and to him is the worship due, who hath created such a Nature in things, & such a faculty, as neither knowing it selfe, the matter wherein it worketh, nor the vertue and power which it hath, do yet worke all things to their last and uttermost perfection. And therefore euery reasonable man, taking to himselfe for a ground that which is granted by all Antiquity, and by all men truly learned that euer the world had; to wit; That there is a power infinite, and eternall (which also necessity doth prouo- vnto vs, without the helpe of Faith, and Reason; without the force of Authority) all things do as easily follow which haue bin deliuered by diuine letters, as the de vera sapientia.*

I Isaac de desin.

This much I say it is, that Reason it selfe hath taught vs: and this is the beginning of knowledge. Sapiencia præcedit, Religio sequitur: quia prius est Deum scire, consequens colere; Sapience goes before, Religion follows: because it is first to know God, and then to worship him. This Sapience Plato calleth absoluti boni scientiam, The science of the absolute good: and another Scientiam rerum primarum, sempiternarum, perpetuarum. For Faith (saith Ildore) is not extorted by violence; but by reason and examples perswaded: fides nequaquam vi extorquetur, sed ratione & exemplis suadetur. I confesse it, That to enquire further, as of the essence of God, of his power, of his Art, & by what meane He created the world: Or of his secret iudgement, & the causes is not an effect of Reason: Sed cum ratione infaniam, but they grow mad with reason, that inquire after it: For as it is no shame nor dishonour (saith a French Author) de faire arret au buë qu'on nasceu surpasser, For a man to rest himself there, where he finds it impossible to passe on further: so whatsoeuer is beyond, and out of the reach of true reason; it acknowledgeth it to be so, as understanding it self not to be infinite, but according to the Name and Nature it hath, to be a Teacher, that best knowes the end of his own Art. For seeing both Reason & Necessity teach vs (Reason, which is pars diuini spiritus in corpus humanum meriti) that the world was made by a power infinite; and yet how it was made, it cannot teach vs: and seeing the same Reason and Necessity make vs know, that the same infinite power is euery where in the world; and yet how euery where, it cannot informe vs: our beleue hereof is not weakened, but greatly strengthened, by our ignorance, because it is the same Reason that tels vs, That such a Nature cannot be said to be God, that can be in all conceived by man.

Quod est infinitum & non secundum naturam terminatum non constituit a scientia, dicitur postea.

I haue been already ouer-long, to make any large discourse either of the parts of the following Story, or in mine owne excuse: especially in the excuse of this or that passage; seeing the whole is exceeding weak and defective. Among the grossest, the vsutable diuision of the bookes, I could not know how to excuse, had I not bene directed to enlarge the building after the foundation was laid, and the first part finished. All men know that there is no great Art in the diuiding euently of those things, which are subiect to number and measure. For the rest, it sutes well enough with a great many Bookes of this Age, which speake too much, and yet say little: Ipse nobis furto subducimur. We are stolen away from our selues, setting a high price on all that is our owne. But hereof, though a late good Writer make complaint, yet shall it not lay hold on mee, because I beleue as hee doth; that who so thinks himselfe the wisest man, is but a poore and miserable ignorant. Those that are the best men of war, against all the vanities and fooleries of the World, do alwaies keepe the strongest guards against themselves, to defend them from themselves, from selfe loue, selfe estimation, and selfe opinion.

Generally concerning the order of the worke, I haue onely taken counsaile from the Argument. For of the Assyrians, which after the down-fall of Babel take vp the first part, and were the first great Kings of the World, there came little to the view of posterity: some few enterprises, greater in fame than faith, of Ninus and Semiramis excepted.

It was the story of the Hebrewes, of all before the Olimpiads, that ouercame the consuming disease of time; and preserved it selfe from the very cradle and beginning ginning to this day: and yet not so entire, but that the large discourses thereof (to which in many Scriptures we are referred) are no where found. The Fragments of other Stories, with the actions of those Kings and Princes which shot up here & there in the same time, I am driuen to relate by way of digression: of which wee may say with Virgil:

Apparent rari nantes in gurgite vasto;

They appeare here and there floating in the great gulf of time.

To the same first Ages doe belong the report of many Inventions therein found, and from them deriued to vs; though most of the Authors Names haue perished in so long a Navigation. For those Ages had their Lawes; they had diuersity of Government; they had Kingly rule; Nobility, Policy in war; Navigation, and all, or the most of needfull Trades. To speak therefore of these (seeing in a generall History we should haue left a great deale of Nakednesse, by their omission) it cannot properly be called a digression. True it is, that I haue made also many others: which if they shall be laid to my charge, I must cast the fault into the great heape of humane error. For seeing we digresse in all the waies of our lines: yea, seeing the life of man is nothing else but digression; I may the better be excused, in writing their lines & actions. I am not altogether ignorant in the Lawes of History, and of the Kinds.

The same hath been taught by many, but by no man better, and with greater breuity, than by that excellent learned Gentleman Sir Francis Bacon. Christian Lawes are also taught vs by the Prophets and Apostles; and euery day preacht vnto vs. But wee still make large digressions: yea, the teachers themselves doe not (in all) keepe the path which they point out to others.

For the rest, after such time as the Persians had wrested the Empire from the Chaldeans, and had raised a great Monarchy, producing Actions of more importance than were elsewhere to be found: it was agreeable to the Order of Story, to attend this Empire; whilst it so flourished, that the affaires of the nations adioyning had reference thereunto. The like obseruance was to be vsed towards the fortunes of Greece, when they againe began to get ground vpon the Persians, as also towards the affairs of Rome, when the Romans grew more mighty than the Greeks.

As for the Medes, the Macedonians, the Sicilians, the Carthaginians, and other Nations who resisted the beginnings of the former Empires, and afterwards became but parts of their composition and enlargement: it seemed best to remember what was known of them from their seuerall beginnings, in such times and places as they in their flourishing estates opposed those Monarchies, which in the end swallowed them vp. And herein I haue followed the best Geographers: who seldome giue names to those small brookes, whereof many, joyned together, make great Riuiers; till such time as they become vniued, and run in maine streame to the Ocean Sea. If the Praise be weak, & the Style not euery-where like it self; the first shews their legitimation and true Parent; the second will excuse it self vpon the Variety of Matter. For Virgil, who wrote his Eclogues, gracili auena, vsed stronger pipes, when he founded the wars of Æneas. It may also be laid to my charge, that I vse diuers Hebrew words in my first booke, and elsewhere: in which language others may thinke, and I my selfe acknowledge it, that I am altogether ignorant: but it is true, that some of them I find in Montanus, others in latine Character in S. Senensis; and of the rest I haue borrowed the interpretation of some of my friends. But say I had bin beholding to neither, yet were it not to be wondered at, hauing had

For I protest before the Maiesty of God, That I malice no man under the Sunne. Impossible I know it to please all: seeing few or none are so pleased with themselves, or so assured of themselves, by reason of their subjection to their private passions, but that they seem diuers persons in one & the same day. Seneca hath said it, and so do I: Vnu mihi pro populo erat: and to the same effect Epicurus, Hoc ego not multis sed tibi, or (as it hath since lamentably fallen out) I may borrow the resolution of an ancient Philosopher, Satis est vnus, Satis est nullus. For it was for the seruice of that inestimable Prince Henry, the successiue hope, and one of the greatest of the Christian World, that I undertooke this Worke. It pleased him to peruse some part thereof, and to pardon what was amisse. It is now left to the world without a Master: from which all that is presented, hath received both blows and thanks, Eadem probamus, eadem reprehendimus: hic excus est omnis iudicii, in quo lis secundum plures datur. But these discourses are idle. I know that as the charitable will iudge charitably, so against those, qui gloriantur in malitia, my present aduersity hath disarmed me. I am on the Ground already; & therefore haue not far to fall: and for rising againe, as in the Natural priuation there is no reason to haue, so it is seldome seene in the priuation politike. I do therefore forbear to stile my Readers Gentle, Courteous, and Friendly, thereby to beget their good opinions, or to promise a second and third volume (which I also intend) if the first receive grace and good acceptance. For that which is already done may be thought enough, and too much: and it is certaine, let us claw the Reader with neuer so many courteous phrases, yet shall we euermore be thought fooles, that write foolishly. For conclusion, all the hope I haue lies in this; That I haue already found more vngentle and vncourteous Readers of my Lotte towards them, and well deserving of them, than euer I shall doe againe. For had it been otherwise, I should lawfully haue had this leisure, to haue made my selfe a foole in print.

magnitude whereof, (all which Flee imbraceeth, fil-leth, and sustayneth) we behold the Image of that glorie, which cannot be measured, and withall that one, and yet vniuersall Nature, which cannot be defined. In the glocifuill prouision for all that liue, his manifold goodnesse: and lastly, in creating and making existent the World vniuersall, by the absolute Arte of his owne Word, his Power and Almightinesse; which Power, Light, Vertue, Wisedome, and Goodnesse, being all but attributes of one simple Essence, and one God, we in all admire, and in part discern ther repugnant, intermixt, nor confounded. By these potent effects, we approach to the GREGORY, Omnis homo eo ipso quod rationalis constitutus est, est inspiratio, illius qui se condidit, Deum esse colligere debet: Every man, in that he is reasonable, out of the same reason may know, that he which made him, is God. This God all men behold (saith Iob,) which is according to the Fathers, Dominationem illius conficere in creaturis, To discern him in his providence by his Creatures. ding, grounded on these places of S. John, and S. Paul, I see have not heard his voice at any time, neither have yet seen his shape. And againe, Whom neuer man saw, nor can see.

And this, I am sure, agreeth with the nature of Gods simplicitie, of which S. Augustine, ipsa enim natura, vel substantia, vel quolibet aliquo nomine appellandum est, id ipsum quod Deus est, corporaliter videri non potest; That nature, or that substance, or by whatsoever name that is to be called which is God, whatsoever that be, the same cannot be corporally perceived. And of this opinion were Origen, Cyril, Chrysostome, Gregory Nazianzenus, Hierome, Augustine, Gregory the great, Eusebius, Alcinus, Dionysius Areopagita, Aquinas, and all others of authority. But by his owne Word, and by this visible World, is God perceived of men, which is also the vnderstood language of the Almighty, vouchsafed to all his Creatures, whose Hieroglyphicall Characters, are the vnumbrd Starres, the Sunne and Moone, written on these large Volumes of the Firmament: written also on the Earth and the Seas, by the letters of all those living Creatures, and Plants, which inhabit and reside therein. Therefore said that learned Cysanus, Atundus vniversus nihil aliud est, quam Deus explicatus; The World vniuersall, is nothing else but God exprest. And the inuisible things of God (saith S. Paul) are scene by creation of the World, being considered in his Creatures. Of all which, there was no other cause preceding, then his owne Will, no other matter then his owne Power, no other workman then his owne Word, no other consideration then his owne infinite Goodnesse. The example and pattered of these his Creatures, as he beheld the same in all eternitie in the abundance of his owne loue, so was it at length in the most wise order, by his vnchanged Will moued, by his high Wisedome disposed, and by his almighty Power perfected, and made visible. And therefore (saith Mirandula) we ought to loue God, Ex fide, & ex effectibus, (that is) both perswaded by his Word, and by the effects of the Worlds creation: Neque enim qui causa caret, ex causa & origine sciri, cognoscique potest, sed vel ex rerum, que facte sunt, quod sunt & gubernantur observatione & collatione, vel ex ipsius Dei verbo: For he of whom there is no higher cause, cannot be knowne by any knowledge of cause or beginning, (saith Mentanus) but either by the observing and conferring of things, which he hath, or doth create and gouerne, or else by the Word of God himselfe.

¶ II.

That the wisest of the Heathen, whose authority is not to be despised, have acknowledged the world to haue beene created by God.

His worke and creation of the World, did most of the ancient and learned Philosophers acknowledge, though by diuers termes, and in a different manner exprest, I meane all those who are entitied by S. AUGUSTINE, Summi Philosophi, Philosophers of highest iudgement and vnderstanding. Mercurius Trismegistus calleth God, Principium vniuersorum; The original of the vniuersall: to whom hee giueth also the attributes of Mens, Natura, Alcus, Necessitas, Finis, & Renouatio. And wherein hee truly, with S. Paul, calleth vpon God all power; confessing also, that the world was made by Gods almighty Word, and not by hands: Verbo, non manibus fabricatus est mundus. Zoroaster (whom Heraclitus followed in opinion) tooke the word Fire, to expresse God by (as in Deuteronomy, and in Saint Paul it is used) Omnia ex vno igne genita sunt; All things (saith he) are caused, or produced out of one fire.

So did Orpheus plainly teach, that the world had beginning in time, from the Will of the most High God; whose remarkable words are thus conuerted: Cum abscondisset omnia Iupiter summus, deinde in lumen gratum emisit, ex sacro corde operans cogitata & mirabilia: Of which I conceiue this sense; When great Iupiter had hiddden all things in himselfe, working out of the loue of his sacred heart, he sent thence, or brought forth into gratefull light, the admirable works which he had fore-thought.

Pindarus the Poet, and one of the wisest, acknowledged also one God, the most High, to be the Father and Creator of all things; Plus Deus, Pater, Creator summus. PLATO calleth God the cause and original, the nature and reason of the vniuersall; Totius rerum natura, causa, & origo Deus. But hereof more at large hereafter.

Now, although the curiositie of some men haue found it superfluous, to remember the opinions of Philosophers, in matters of Diuinitie: (it being true, that the Scripture hath hath not want of any forraine testimony) yet as the Fathers, with others excellently learned, are my examples herein; so Saint Paul himselfe did not despise, but thought it lawfull, and profitable, to remember whatsoever hee found agreeable to the Word of God, among the Heathen, that he might thereby take from them all escape, by way of ignorance, God rendering vengeance to them that know him not: as in his Epistle to Titus, he citeth Epimenides against the Cretians, and to the Corinthians, Meneander, and in the fouenteenth of the Acts, Aratus, &c. for Truth (saith S. Ambrose) by whomsoever vttered, is of the holy Ghost; Veritas à quocunque dicatur, à Spiritu sancto est: and lastly, let those kind of men learne this rule; Que sacris seruiunt, prophana non sunt; Nothing is prophane that serueth to the vse of holy things.

¶ III.

Of the meaning of In Principio, Genes 1. 1.

His visible World of which Moses writeth, God created in the beginning, or first of all: in which (saith Tertullian) things began to be. This word Beginning (in which the Hebrewes seeke some hidden mylerie, and which in the Iewes Argumentum is conuerted by the word Sapientia) cannot be referred to succession of time, nor to order, as some men haue conceiued, both which are subsequnt: but only to Creation then. For before that Beginning, there was neither primary matter to be informed, nor forme to informe, nor any being, but the Eternall. Nature was not, nor the next Parent of Time begotten, Time properly and naturally taken; for if God had but disposed of Matter already in being, then as the word Beginning could not be referred to all things, so must it follow, that the institution of Matter proceeded from a greater Power, then that of God. And by what name shall we then call such an One (saith Lactantius) as exceedeth God in potency: for it is an act of more excellency to make, then to dispose of things made? whereupon it may be concluded, that Matter could not be before this Beginning: except we sune a double Creation, or allow of two Powers, and both infinite, the impossibilitie whereof scorneth defence. Nam impossibile plura esse infinita: quoniam alterum esset in altero finitum; There cannot bee more infinites then one; for one of them would limit the other.

¶ IIII.

Of the meaning of the words Heauen and Earth: Genes 2. 1.

He vniuersall matter of the world (which Moses comprehendeth vnder the names of Heauen and Earth) is by diuers diuersly vnderstood: for there are that conceiue, that by those words, was meant the first matter, as the Peripatetikes vnderstand it, to which, S. Augustine and Isidore seeme to adhere. Fecisti mundum (saith S. Augustine) de materia informi, quam fecisti de nulla re, pene nullam rem: (that is) Thou hast made the world of a matter without forme; which matter thou madest of nothing, and being made, it was little other then nothing.

But this potentiall and imaginarie materia prima, cannot exist without forme. Peter Lombard, the Schoole-men, Beda, Tyrannus, Comestor, Tostatus and others, affirme, that it pleased God first of all to create the Empyrean Heauen: which at the succeeding instant (saith Beda and Strabo) he filled with Angels. This Empyrean Heauen Stenochius Engubinus calleth Diuine claritie, and vncreated: an error, for which he is sharply charged by Peterius, though (as I conceiue) he rather styled in the subsequnt, when he made it to be a place, and the seat of Angels, and iust Soules, then in the former affirmation: for of the first, That God liueth in eternall Light, it is written; My soule, praise thou the Lord, that covereth himselfe with light: and in the Reuelation; And the Citie hath no neede of Sunne, neither of the Moone to shine in it: for the glory of God did light it. And herein also Iohn Mercer vpon Genesis, differeth not in opinion from Engubinus: for as by Heauen created in the beginning, was not meant the inuisible or supercelestiall; so in his judgement, because it was in all Eternitie, the glorious seat of God himselfe, it was not necessary to be created; Quem mundum supercilestem meo iudicio creati (saith Mercer) non erat necessesse.

But as Moses forbare to speake of Angels, and of things inuisible, and incorporate, for the weaknesse of their capacities, whom he then cared to informe of those things, which were more manifest, (to wit) that God did not only by a strong hand deliuer them from the bondage of Egypt, according to his promise made to their forefathers: but also that he created, and was the sole cause of this aspectable, and perceivable Vniuersall; so on the other side I dare not thinke, that any supercelestiall Heauen, or whatsoever else (not himselfe) was increate & eternal: and as for the place of God before the world created, the finite wisdom of mortall men hath no perception of it, neither can it limit the seate of infinite power, no more then infinite power it selfe can be limited: for his place is in himselfe, whom no magnitude else can contain: How great is the house of God (saith Baruch) how large is the place of his possession: it is great, and hath no end, it is high and unmeasurable. 10

But leauing multiplicitie of opinion, it is more probable & allowed, that by the words Heauen and Earth, was meant the solid matter and substance, aswell of all the Heauens, and Orbes supernall, as of the Globe of the Earth and Waters, which couered it ouer, (to wit) that very matter of all things, materia, Chaos, possibilis, sine posse fieri. Which matter (saith Caluin) was so called, quod totius mundi semen fuerit, Because it was the seed of the Vniuersall: an opinion of ancient Philosophers long before.

¶ V.

That the substance of the waters, as mixt in the body of the earth, is by Moses understood in the word Earth: and that the Earth, by the attributes of enformed and voided, is described as the Chaos of the ancient Heathen.

Moses first nameth Heauen and Earth (putting waters but in the third place) as comprehending waters in the word Earth; but afterwards hee nameth them apart, when God by his Spirit began to distinguish the confused Masse, and (as Basil saith) preparare naturam aque ad subordinatam vitalem; to prepare the nature of water to a vitall fruitfulness.

For vnder the word Heauen, was the matter of all heauenly bodies, and natures exprest: and by the name of Earth and Waters, all was meant, whatsoever is vnder the Moone, and subiect to alteration. Corrupt seedes bring forth corrupt plants; to which the pure 30 heauens are not subiect, though subiect to perishing. They shall perish (saith Dauid) and the heauens shall vanish away like smoke, saith Esay. Neither were the waters the matter of Earth: for it is written, Let the waters vnder the heauens be gathered into one place, and let the drie land appeare: which proueth that the drie land was mixt and couered with the waters, and not yet distinguished; but no way, that the waters were the matter or seede of the Earth, much lesse of the Vniuersall. In initio Domini terram fundasti, Thou O Lord, in the beginning hast founded the Earth: and againe, The Earth was couered with the Deepe (meaning with waters) as with a garment, saith Dauid. And if by naturall arguments it may be proued, that water by condensation may become earth, the same reason teacheth vs also, that earth rarified may become water: water, aire: fire, fire; and so on the contrarie. Deus ignis substantiam per aerem in aquam conuertit, God turneth the substance of 40 fire, by aire, into water. For the Heauens and the Earth remained in the same state, in which they were created, as touching their substance, though there was afterwards added multiplicitie of perfection, in respect of beautie and ornament. Calum vero & terra in statu creationis remanserunt, quantum ad substantiam, licet multiplex perfectio decoris & ornatus eis postmodum superaddita est. And the word which the Hebrewes call Maim, is not to be understood according to the Latine translation simply, and as specifically water; but the same more properly signifieth liquor. For (according to Montanus) Est autem Maim liquor geminus, & hoc nomen propter verborum penuriam, Latina lingua plurali numero a quo fit. For Maim (saith he) is a double liquor, (that is, of diuers natures) and this name 50 or word the Latines wanting a voice to expresse it, call it in the Plurall, Aquas, Waters.

This Masse, or indigested matter, or Chaos created in the beginning, was without forme, that is, without the proper forme, which it afterwards acquired, when the Spirit of God had separated the Earth, and digested it from the waters: And the earth was void: that is, not producing any creatures, or adorned with any plants, fruits, or flowers. But after the Spirit of God had moued vpon the waters, and wrought this indigested matter into that forme, which it now retaineth, then did the earth bud forth the herbe, which seedeth 11 seede, and the fruitfull tree according to his kind, and God saw that it was good; which attribute was not giuen to the Earth, while it was confused; nor to the Heauens, before they had motion, and adornement. God saw that it was good; that is, made perfect: for perfection is that, to which nothing is wanting. Et perfecti Dei perfecta sunt opera, The works of the perfect God, are perfect.

From this lump of imperfect Matter had the ancient Poets their invention of Demogorgon: Hesiodus and Anaxagoras the knowledge of that Chaos, of which Ovid:

*Ante Mare, & Terram, & (quod tegit omnia) Calum, Præus erat toto nature vultus in orbem,
Quem dixere Chaos, rudis indigestaq; moles.*

*Ouid. M. Met.

10 Before the Sea and Land was made, and Heauen, that all doth hide,
In all the World one only face of Nature did abide:
Which Chaos hight, a huge rude heape.

¶ VI.

How it is to be understood that the Spirit of God moued vpon the Waters, and that this is not to be searched curiously.

After the Creation of Heauen and Earth, then void and without forme, the Spirit of God moued vpon the Waters. The Sacred interpreters vnder the word superferebatur, moued vpon or ouer: incubabat, or soncabat (saith Hierome) out of Basil; and Basil out of a Syrian Doctor; Equidem non meam tibi, sed viri cuiusdam Syri sententiam recensebo (saith Basil): which words incubare or sonere importing warmth, hatching, or quickning, haue a speciall likenesse. Verbum translatum est ab animalis pullitiei sine incubantibus, quamvis spirituali, & plane inenarrabili, non autem corporali modo; The word is taken of birds hatching their young, not corporally, but in a spirituall and vnexpressible manner.

Some of the Hebrewes conuert it to this effect, Spiritus Dei volabat; The Spirit of God did fluster: the Chaldean Paraphrast in this sense, Ventus a conspectu Dei sufflabat: or as other vnderstand the Chaldean, Elabat, pellebat, remouebat: The wind from the face of God did blow vnder, driue, or remoue, or did blow vpon, according to the 147. Psalm, 30 He caused his wind to blow, and the waters increafe, but there was yet no wind nor exhalation. Arius Montanus in these words, Et Spiritus Elohim Merachet, id est, efficaciter motant, conuolens, ac agitant super facies gemini liquoris; The Spirit of God effectually and often moving, keeping warm, and cherishing, quickning and stirring vpon the face of this double liquor. For he maketh foure originals, whercof three are agents, and the last passive and materiall, to wit, Causa, which is the diuine goodnesse: totus, which is, flat, sine cit, Let it be, or it shall be. Quæ vox verbo Dei prima preluia fuit: Which voice (saith he) was the first that was uttered by the word of God. The third, Spiritus Elohim, the Spirit of God, id est, 40 via quadam diuina, agilis ac presens, per omnia pertingens, omnia complens, that is, A certayne diuine power, or strength enery where, a liue and extending, and stretching through all, filling and finishing all things. The fourth he calleth Atam, id est, materies ad omnem rem conficiendam habilis; Matter apt to become enery thing. For my selfe I am resolu'd (Cùm Deus sit superrationale omni ratione, Seeing God is in all reason above reason) that although the effects which follow his wonderfull wayes of working, may in a measure be perceived by mans vnderstanding, yet the manner & first operation of his diuine power, cannot be conceiued by any mind, or spirit, compassed with a mortall body. Animals homo quæ Dei sunt non percipit: For my thoughts (saith the Lord in Esay) are not your thoughts, neither are your wayes my wayes. And as the world hath not knowne God himselfe: so are his wayes (according to S. Pavi) past finding out. O righteous Father, the world hath not knowne thee, saith Christ. And therefore, whether that motion, vitalitie 50 and operation, were by incubation or how else, the manner is onely knowne to God, Quomodo in omnibus sit reclus vel per essentiam, vel per potentiam, intellectus noster non capit; For, how God (saith S. Augustine, speaking of his Vbiquitie) is in all things, either by essence, presence, or power, our vnderstanding cannot comprehend. Nihil inter Deum hominemq; distaret, si consilia, & dispositiones illius maiestatis eterne, cognatio assequeretur humana: There would be no difference betwene God and Man, if mans vnderstanding could con-

of the Vniuersall, is a labour and search like vnto his, who not contented with a knowne and safe Foord, will presume to passe over the greatest Riuer in all parts, where he is ignorant of their depths: for so doth the one lose his life, and the other his vnderstanding. We behold the Sunne, and enioy his light, as long as we looke towards it, but tenderly, and circumspectly: we warme our selues safely, while we stand neare the fire; but if we seeke to out-face the one, to enter into the other, we forthwith become blind or burnt.

But to encheue curiositie: this is true, that the English word (moued) is most proper and significant: for of motion proceedeth all production, and all whatsoever is effected. And this omnipotent Spirit of God, which may indeed be truly called, Principium motus, and with MIRANDULA, Vis causæ efficientis, The force of the efficient cause, S. Augustine sometimes taketh for the holy Ghost; sometime for a wind or breath, Sub nomine Spiritus, under the name of a Spirit, which is sometimes so taken: or for virtualis creatura, For a created virtuality: Tertullian and Theodoret call it also a breath or wind: Mercurius nameth it, Spiritum semper intelligibilem, A pure or thin intelligible Spirit: ANAXAGORAS, Mentem: TOSTATVS, Voluntatem & mentem Dei; The will and minde of God; which mens, Plato in Timæo, maketh Animam mundi, The soule of the world. and in his first Booke de Republica, he calleth it The Law of Heauen; in his Epistles, The Leader of things to come, and the presence of things past. But as Cyprian wrote of the Incarnation of Christ our Saviour, Atens deficit, vox silet, & non nec tantum, sed etiam Angelorum; My minde sayleth, my voice is silent, and not mine only, but even the voice of Angels: so may all men 20
elfe say in the vnderstanding, and vterance of the wayes and works of the Creation; for to him (saith Nazianzenus) there is not one substance by which he is, and another, by which he can, Sed substantiale illi est, quicquid eius est, & quicquid est; Whatsoeuer attribute of him there is, and whatsoeuer he is, it is the very same substance that himselfe is.

But the Spirit of God which moued vpon the waters, cannot be taken for a breath or wind, nor for any other creature, separate from the infinite actiue power of God, which then formed and distinguished, and which now sustayneth, and giueth continuance to the Vniuersall. For the Spirit of the Lord filleth all the world; and the same is it which 30 maintaineth all things, saith SALOMON. If thou send forth thy Spirit (saith DAVID) they are created: And GREGORY, Deus suo presentia esse, dat omnibus rebus esse, ita quod, si se rebus subtraheret, sicut de nihilo facta sunt omnia, sic in nihilum deluerent vniuersa; God giueth being to all things, by being present with all things, so as if he should withdraw himselfe from them, then as of nothing the world was made, it would againe fall away and vanish into nothing. And this working of Gods Spirit in all things, Virgil hath exprest excellently:

Virg. Aeneid.
lib. 3. 714.

*Principio Calum ac Terras, camposq; liquentes,

The Heauen, the Earth, and all the liquid Mayne,
The Moones bright Globe, and Starres Titanian,

A Mind, which through each part insus'd doth passe,
Fashions, and works, and wholly doth transpierce
All this great Body of the Vniuersall.

lib. 3. 16. v. 13.

Gen. 1. 5.

And this was the same Spirit, which moued in the Vniuersall, and thereby both distinguished and adorned it. His Spirit hath garnished the Heauens, saith Iob. So then the Spirit of God moued vpon the waters, and created in their spiritualitie, and naturall motion; motion brought forth heate; and heate rarification, and subtiltie of parts. By this Spirit (which gaue heate and motion, and thereby, operation, to euery nature, while it moued vpon the waters, which were in one indigested lump, and Chaos, disposed to all formes alike) was begotten Aire: an element superior, as lighter then the waters, through whose vast, open, subtile, diaphanicke, or transparent body, the light afterwards created might easily transpierce: Light, for the excellency thereof, being the first creature which God called good, whose creation immediately followed. This Spirit Chrysostome calleth a vitall Operation, Aquis à Deo insinuat, ex qua aqua non solum motio- nem, sed & vim procreandi animalia habuerint. He calleth it, A vitall Operation giuen by God vnto the waters, whereby the waters had not only motion, but also power to procreate or bring forth liuing Creatures.

Of the light created, as the materiall substance of the Sunne: and of the nature of it, and diffi- cultie of knowledge of it: and of the excellency and vse of it: and of motion, and heate annexed vnto it.

Her waters were afterwards congregated, and called the Sea: and this Light afterwards (in the fourth day) gathered and vnited, and called the Sunne, the Or- gan, and instrument of created light. For this first and dispersed light did not (as I conceiue) distinguish the night from the day, but with a reference to the Sunnes crea- tion, and the vniting of the dispersed light therein. This is proued by these words, Let there be lights in the Firmament, to separate the day from the night: which lights in the firmament of Heauen were also made for signes, and for seasons, and for dayes, and for 50 yeares, implying a motion instantly to follow, by which, dayes and yeares are distinguished; after which succeeded Time, or together with which, that Time (which was the measure of motion) began. For that space of the first three dayes which preceded the Sunnes creation, or formall perfection, when as yet there was not any motion to be measured, and the day named in the sixth Verse, was but such a space, as afterwards by the Sunnes motion made a ciuill or naturall day. And as Waters were the matter of Aire, of the firmament, and of the lower and vpper waters; and of the Seas, and Creatures there- 20 in: Earth, the matter of Beasts, Plants, Minerals, and Mans body: so may Light (for expresse sake) be called the Chaos, or materiall substance of the Sunne, & other lights of heauen: Howbeit, neither the Sunne, nor any thing sensible, is that Light it selfe, Quæ causa est lucidorum, Which is the cause that things are lightsome (though it make it selfe & all things else visible) but a body most illightned, which illuminateth the Moone, by whom the neighbouring Region (which the Greeks call Aether, the place of the sup- posed Element of fire) is actiued and qualified, and by it all bodies liuing in this our aire. For this light Auicenna calleth vehiculum & fomentum omnium celestium virtu- tum, & impressionum: The conductor, and preseruer or nourisher of all celestiall vertues and impressions, nothing descending of heauenly influences, but by the medium, or means 30 of light. Aristotle calleth light, a qualitie, inherent, or cleauing to a Diaphanous body, Lumen est qualitas inherens Diaphano: but this may be better aouched of the heate, which it transporeth and bringeth with it, or conducteth: which heate (saith the Plato- nicks) Abeunt lumine resides in subiecto, The light being departed, doth reside in the subiect, as warmth in the aire, though the same be deprived of light. This light Plotinus and all the Academikes make incorporall, and so doth MONTANVS, Cui nec duritia resistit, nec spatium; Which neither hardnesse resisteth, nor space leaueth.

gine materialitie to light it selfe, but improperly: for it passeth at an instant, from the 40
Heauen to the Earth, nor is it resisted by any hardnesse, because it pierceth through the solid body of glasse, or other Cristalline matter; and whereas it is withstood by vncleane, and vnpure earthy substances, lesse hard, and more easie to inuade then the former, the same is, Quod obfasculum natura terreum atq; sordidum, non capit candidum luminis puritas- sem; Because an obfacle, by nature earthy and foule, doth not receive the pure cleannesse of light: alluding to that most diuine Light, which onely shineth on those minds, which are purged from all worldly drosse, and humane vncleannesse.

Plotin.

But of this created light, there is no agreement in opinion; neither doe I maruaile it at, for it cannot be found either in the Fathers, Philosophers, or Schoole-men, or other an- cient or later Writers, that any of them vnderstood either it or themselves therein: all 50 men (to cast off ignorance) haue disputed hereof, but there is no man that hath beene taught thereby. Thomas Aquinas (not inferior to any in wit) as hee hath shewed little strength of argument in refuting the opinions of Beda, Hugo, Lombard, Ivanus, and o- thers: so is his owne iudgement herein, as weak as any mans; and most of the Schoole- men were rather curious in the nature of termes, and more subtile in distinguishing vpon the parts of doctrine already laid downe, then discoverers of any thing hidden, either in Philosophie or Diuinitie: of whom it may be truly said, Nihil sapientie odiosius acumi- ne nimio. Nothing is more odious to true wisdom, then too acute sharpnesse. Neither hath the length of time, and the search of many learned men, (which the same time hath brought brought forth and deuoured) resolved vs, whether this light be substantiall, corporall, or incorporall: Corporall they say it cannot bee, because then it could neither pierce the aire, nor those hard, solid, and Diaphanous bodies, which it doth, and yet every day we see the aire lightened: incorporall it cannot bee, because it sometime affecteth the sight of the eye with offence, and therefore by most of the Fathers so esteemed: others say, (as Patricius) that it cannot be matter, because no forme so excellent as it selfe to informe it: neither can it be any accident, which is not separable without the destruction of the subject: for light being taken from the Sunne, the Sunne is no more the Sunne in existence. Secondly, if light were proceeding from matter and forme, then either, or both must be one of these, lucide or bright, darke or opaque, Diaphanous or transparent; but darknesse cannot be parent of light; and things Diaphanous (being neither light, nor darknesse, but capable of either) cannot be the cause of either, and therefore must the matter, or forme, or both, be lucide and shining. Lucide and shining obtrayte their substance of the light; and therefore, if we deriue this being of light from a former, then would the progresse goe on infinitely, and against nature; and therefore he concludeth, that light in the Sunne hath in being primarily, and immediately of it selfe, and is therefore the Sunnes forme, and the forme of all lucide and shining bodies: but what is taught hereby, let others iudge.

But in my vnderstanding, Lumen, (which may be Englished by the word Shine) is an intentional Species of that, which may be Englished by Light, and so, this shining which proceedeth from the Sunne, or other lights of Heauen, or from any other light, is an Image, or intentional Species thereof, and an intentional Specie may be vnderstood by the example of a red, or Greene colour, occasioned by the shining of the Sun through red or Greene glasse: for then we perceive the same colour cast vpon any thing opposite; which rednesse or other colour, we call the intentionall Species of the colour in that glasse. And againe, as this light, touching his simple nature, is no way yet vnderstood: so it is disputed, whether this light first created, bee the same which the Sunne inholdeth and casteth forth, or whether it had continuance any longer then till the Sunnes creation.

But by the most wise and ynchanged order, which God obserued in the worke of the World, I gather, that the Light in the first day created, was the substance of the Sunne: for Cicero repeateth twice the many parts of the vniuersall; first, as they were created in matter; secondly, as they were adorned with forme: first, naming the Heauens, the Earth, the Waters, all confused; and afterward, the Waters congregated, the Earth made drie Land, and the Heauen, distinguished from both, and beautified. And therefore the Earth, as it was earth, before it was vncoered, and before it was called Arida, or drie Land; and the Waters were waters, before they were congregated, and called the Sea, though neither of them perfect, or enriched with their veruall formes: so the Sunne, although it had not his forme perfect, his circle, beuities, and bounded magnitude, till the fourth day, yet was the substance thereof in the first day (vnder the name of Light) created; and this Light formerly dispersed, was in the same fourth day vnited, and set in the Firmament of Heauen: for to Light created in the first day, God gaue no proper place or fixation; and therefore the effects named by Anticipation, (which was, to separate day from night) were precisely performed, after this Light was congregated, and had obtained life and motion. Neither did the wisdome of God finde cause why it should moue (by which motion, dayes and nights are distinguished) till then: because there was not yet any Creature produced, to which, by mouing, the Sunne might giue light, heate, and operation.

But after the Earth (distinguished from Waters) began to bud forth the bud of the herbe, &c. God caused the Sunne to moue, and (by interchange of time) to visite euery part of the inferior world; by his heate to stirre vp the fire of generation, and to giue aduice to the seeds of all natures: For, as a King, which commandeth some goodly building to be erected, doth accommodate the same to that vse and end, to which it was ordained; so it pleased God (Earth procreans) to command the Light to be; which by his all-powerfull Word he approued, and approuing it, disposed thereof, to the vse and comfort of his future Creatures.

But in that it pleased God to a ke of Ton, By what way is the light parted, and where is the way, where light dwelleth: we thereby know, that the nature thereof filleth not vnder mans vnderstanding; and therefore let it suffice, that by Gods grace we enjoy the effects fects thereof. For this light is of the treasure of God (Euth ES DRAS.) And those which inhabit the Heauens, doe onely know the Essence thereof. Nihil ignotum in celo, nihil notum in terra: Nothing unknowne in Heauen, nothing perfectly knowne on earth. Res vera sunt in terra. mundo inuisibili, in mundo visibili umbra rerum: Things themselves are in the inuisible world, in the world visible, but their shadowes. Surely, if this Light be not spirituall, yet it approacheth nearest vnto spiritualitie; and if it haue any corporallitie, then of all other the most subtile and pure; for howsoeuer, it is of all things scene, the most beautifull, and of the swiftest motion, of all other the most necessary and beneficiall. For it ministreth to men, and other creatures, all celestiall influences; it dissipateth those sad thoughts and sorrowes, which the darknesse both begetteth and maintayneth; it discovereth vnto vs the glorious works of God, and carryeth vp with an Angelicall swiftnesse, our eyes vnto Heauen, that by the sight thereof, our minds being informed of his visible maruailes, may continually trauaile to surmount those percieued Heauens, and to finde out their omnipotent Cause and Creator. Cognitio non quiescit in rebus creatis; Our knowledge doth not quiet it selfe in things created. Et ipsa lux facit, ut cetera mundi membra digna sint laudibus, cum suam bonitatem & decorem omnibus communicet; It is the Light (saith Saint AMBROSE) that maketh the other parts of the world so worthy of praise, seeing that it selfe communicateth its goodnesse and beauty vnto all: of which Ouid out of Orpheus:

*Ille ego sum, qui longum metior annum,
Omnia qui video, per quem videt omnia mundus, Atundi oculus.*

Ouid. Met. l. 1.

The World discernes it selfe, while I the World behold,
By me the longest yeares, and other times are told,
I the worlds eye.

Lastly, if we may behold in any creature, any one sparke of that eternall fire, or any far-off dawning of Gods glorious brightnesse, the same in the beautie, motion, and vertue of this Light, may be perceiued. Therefore was God called Lux ipsa, and the Light, by Hermes named Lux sancta, and Christ our Sauiour said to be that Light, which lighteth euery man that cometh into the world. Yet in respect of Gods incomprehensible sublimitie, and puritie, this is also true, that God is neither a minde, nor a Spirit of the nature of other spirits; nor a light, such as can be discerned. Deus profecto non mens est, at verò ut sit mens causa est; nec spiritus, sed causa qua spiritus extat; nec lumen, sed causa qua lumen existit. God (saith HERMES in Poemandro) certainly is not a minde, but the cause that the minde hath his being; nor spirit, but the cause by which euery spirit is; nor light, but the cause by which the light existeth.

So then the Masse and Chaos being first created, void, darke, and imformed, was by the operative Spirit of God, pierced and quickned, and the Waters hauing now receiued Spirit and motion, resolved their thinner parts into Aire, which God lightened: the Earth also by being contiguous, and mixt with waters (participating the same diuine vertue) brought forth the bud of the herbe that feedeth feede, &c. and for a meane and organ, by which this operative vertue might be continued, God appointed the Light to be vnited, and gaue it also motion and heate, which heate caused a continuance of those severall species, which the Earth (being made fruitfull by the Spirit) produced, and with motion begate the time and times succeeding.

§. VIII.

Of the Firmament, and of the waters above the Firmament: and whether there be any Crystalline Heauen, or any Primum mobile.

After that the Spirit of God had moued vpon the waters, and light was created, God said, Let there be a Firmament in the midst of the waters, and let it separate the waters from the waters: that is, those waters which by rarification and euaporation were ascended, and those of the Earth and Sea.

But these waters separate about this extension, which the Latine Translation calleth firmamentum, or expansum (for so Estabius, Pagninus, and Ianinus turne it) are not the Crystalline Heauens, created in the imaginations of men; which opinion Nasilius Magnus calleth a childish supposition, making in the same place many learned arguments against against this fancy. For the waters about the Firmament, are the waters in the Aire above vs, where the Aire is more solid and condense, which God separated from the neather waters by a Firmament, that is, by an extended distance and vast space: the words Raquia, which Montanus writeth Rakingh, and Shanayim, being indifferently taken for the Heauen and for Aire, and more properly for the Aire and Aether, then for the Heauens, as the best Hebricians vnderstand them, Quo suprema ac tenuia ab infimis crassius distincta, interseclat, distant, for that whereby the supreme and thin bodies were placed in distance, being seuered and cut off from low and grosse matters: and the waters about the Firmament, exprest in the word Mayim, are in that tongue taken properly for the waters about the Aire, or in the vppermost Region of the same.

And that the word Heauen is vsed for the Aire, the Scriptures euerywhere witnesse, as in the blessing; of Ioseph, and in the 104. Psalme. * By these Springs shall the fowle of the Heauen dwell; and * upon Sedm and Gomorrah it rayned brimstone and fire out of the Heauen; and in Isaacs blessing to Isaac, God graunte thee therefore of the dew of Heauen; and in Deuteronomie the 11. But the land whither you goe to possesse it, is a land, that drinketh water vnto the rayne of Heauen; and in Ion, Who hath ingendered the frosts of Heauen; and in S. MATTHEW, Behold the Fowles of Heauen, for they sow not. So as in all the Scriptures of the old Testament throughout, is the word Heauen very often vsed for aire, and taken also hyperbolically for any great height, as, Let vs build vs a Tower, whose top may reach to Heauen, &c. And in this very place Basil toucheth, that this appellation of Heauen for the Firmament, is but by way of similitude: his owne words be these; Et vocauit Deus firmamentum celum. Hec appellatio alij quidem proprie accommodatur, huius autem nunc ad similitudinem; And God called the firmament Heauen: This appellation (saith Basil) is properly applied to another (that is, to the Starry Heauen) but to this, (that is, to the Firmament diuiding the waters) it is imposed by similitude: and if there were no other proof, that by the Firmament was meant the Ayre, and not the Heauen, the words of Moses in the eighth Verse, conferred with the same word Firmament in the twentieth Verse, makes it manifest: for in the eighth Verse it is written, that God called the Firmament, which diuided waters from waters, Heauen; and in the 20. Verse he calleth the Firmament of Heauen, Ayre, in these words: And let the Fowle flye upon the earth in the open firmament of Heauen. And what vse there should be of this ycie, or crystalline, or waterie Heauen, I conceiue not, except it be to moderate and temper the heate, which the Primum mobile would otherwise gather and increase: though in verie truth, in stead of this helpe, it would adde an vnmeasurable greatnesse of circle, whereby the swiftnesse of that first Moueable would exceede all possibilitie of belife. Sed nemo tenetur ad impossibilia; nec noman ought to be held to impossibilitie; and saith it selfe (which surmounteth the height of all humane reason) hath for a forcible Conductor, the Word of Truth, which also may be called lumen omnis rationis & intellectus; the light of all reason and vnderstanding. Now that this supposed first Moueable, turneth it selfe so many hundred thousand miles in an instant (seeing the Scriptures teach it not) let those that can beleue mens imaginations, apprehend it, for I cannot. But of these many Heauens, let the Reader that desireth satisfaction, search Oronius, and of this waterie Heauen, Basilus Augustinus in his Hexameron. fol. 40. 41. &c. and Atanb. Beroaldus, his second Booke, and sixt Chapter. For my selfe, I am perswaded, that the waters, called, The waters about the Heauens, are but the cloudes and waters ingendered in the vppermost Ayre.

§. I X.

A conclusion repeating the summe of the workes in the Creation, which are reduced to three heads: The creation of matter, The forming of it, The finishing of it.

TO conclude, it may be gathered out of the first Chapter of Genesis, that this was the order of the most wise God in the beginning, and when there was no other nature, or being, but Gods incomprehensible eternitie. First, hee created the matter of all things: and in the first three dayes he distinguished and gaue to euery nature his proper forme; the forme of leuitie to that which ascended, to that which descended, the forme of grauitie: for he separated light from darkenesse, diuided waters from waters, and gathered the waters vnder the Firmament into one place. In the last three three daies, God adorned, beautified, and replenished the World: he set in the Firmament of Heauen, the Sunne, Moone, and Starres; filled the Earth with Beasts, the Aire with Fowle, and the Sea with Filh, giuing to all that haue life, a power generatiue, thereby to continue their Species and kindes; to Creatures vegetatiue and growing, their feedes in themselves; for he created all things, that they might haue their being: and the generations of the world are preserved.

That Nature is no Principium per se; nor forme the giuer of being: and of our ignorance, how second causes should haue any proportion with their effects.

NATURE for this working power, which we call Nature, the beginning of motion and rest, according to Aristotle, the same is nothing else, but the strength and facultie, which God hath infused into euery creature, hauing no other sense-voluntie, then a Clocke, after it is wound vp by a mans hand, hath. These therefore that attribute vnto this facultie, any first or sole power, haue therein no other vnderstanding, then such a one hath, who looking into the Sterne of a Ship, and finding it guided by the Helme and Rudder, doth ascribe some absolute vertue to the peece of wood, without all consideration of the hand that guides it, or of the iudgement, which also directeth and commandeth that hand; forgetting in this and in all else, that by the vertue of the first act, all Agents worke whatsoever they worke: Virtute primi actus agunt agentia omnia quicquid agunt: for as the minde of man seeth by the Organ of the eye, heareth by the eares, and maketh choyce by the will: and therefore we attribute sight to the eye, and hearing to the eares, &c. and yet it is the minde onely, that giueth abilitie, life, and motion to all these his instrumments and Organs; so God worketh by Angels, by the Sunne, by the Starres, by Nature, or infused properties, and by men, as by seuerall Organs, seuerall effects; all second causes whatsoever, being but instrumments, conduits, and pipes, which carrie and disperse what they haue receyued from the head and fountaine of the Vniuersall. For as it is Gods infinite power, and euerywhere-prefence (compassing, embracing, and piercing all things) that giueth to the Sunne power to draw vp vapours, to vapours to be made cloudes, cloudes to containe raine, and raine to fall: so all second and instrumentall causes, together with Nature it selfe, without that operative facultie which God gaue them, would become altogether silent, vertuelesse, and dead: of which excellentie ORPHEVS; Per te virescunt omnia, All things by thee spring forth in youthfull Greene. I enforce not these things, thereby to annihilate those variable vertues which God hath giuen to his creatures, animate and inanimate, to heauenly and earthly bodies, &c. for all his workes in their vertues prayse him: but of the manner how God worketh in them, or they in or with each other, which the Heathen Philosophers, and those that follow them, haue taken on them to teach: I say, there is not any one among them, nor any one among vs, that could euer yet conceiue it, or expresse it, euer enrich his owne vnderstanding with any certaine truth, or euer edifie others (not foolish by selfe-flatterie) therein. For (saith Lactantius, speaking of the wisdom of the Philosophers) Si facultas inuenienda veritatis huius studio subiaceret, aliquando esset inuenta; cum vero tot temporibus, tot ingenij in eius inquisitione contritis, non sit comprehensa, apparet nullam ibi esse sapientiam; If in this studie (saith he) were meanes to find out the truth, it had ere this bene found out: but seeing it is not yet comprehended, after that so much time, and so many wits haue bene worne out in the inquirie of it, it appeareth, that there is no wisdom there to be had. Nam si de vnae precisa scientia haberetur, omnium rerum scientia necessario haberetur: If the precise knowledge of any one thing were to be had, it should necessarily follow, that the knowledge of all things were to be had. And as the Philosophers were ignorant in Nature, and the wayes of her working: so were they more curious, then knowing, in their first matter and Physicall forme. For if their first matter had any being, it were not then the first matter: for, as it is the first matter, it hath only a power of being, which it altogether leaueth, when it doth subsist. And seeing it is neither a substance perfect, nor a substance inchoate, or in the way of perfection, how any other substance should thence take confection, it hath not bene taught, neyther are these formes (saith a learned Author) any thing, si ex ea exprimatur potentia, que nihil est. Againe, how this first matter should be subaction (formam, and passiv, which is understood to precede the forme, it is hard to conceive: for to make forme which is the cause, to be subsequent to the thing caused (to wit, to the first matter) is contrarie to all reason, diuine and humane: onely it may be said, that originally there is no other difference betwene matter and forme, then betwene heate and fire, of which the one cannot subsist without the other, but in a kinde of rationall consideration. Leaving therefore these Riddles to their Louers, who by certaine scholasticall distinctions wrest and peruert the truth of all things, and by which Aristotle hath laboured to proue a false eternitie of the World, I thinke it farre safer to ascribe with Saint AUGUSTINE, That all species and kindes are from God, from whom, whatsoever is naturall proceedeth, of what kinde or estimation soeuer, from whence are the seeds of all formes, and the formes of all seedes and their motions; A quo est omnis species, à quo est quicquid naturaliter est, cuiuscumq; generis est, cuiuscumq; estimationis est, à quo sunt forma formarum, forme seminum, motus seminum atq; formarum. And thus much Averro is forced to confesse. For all formes (saith hee) are in primo motore; which is also the opinion of Aristotle in the twelfth of his Metaph. and of Albertus vpon Dionysius.

of Fate; and that the Starres haue great influence: and that their operations may diuersly be preuented or furthered.

And, as of Nature, such is the dispute and contention concerning Fate or Destinie, of which the opinions of those learned men that haue written thereof, may be safely receiued, had they not thereunto annexed and fastened an inevitable necessitie, and made it more generall, and vniuersally powerfull then it is, by giuing it Dominion ouer the minde of man, and ouer his will; of which Ouid and Iuuenal:

*Ratio fatum vincere nulla valet.
Scelus regna dabunt, captiui Fata triumphos.
Gainst Fate no counsell can preuaile.
Kingdomes to Slaues by Destinie,
To Captiues triumphs giuen be.*

An error of the Chaldeans, and after them of the Stoicks, the Pharisees, Priscillianists, the Bardisaniasts, and others, as Basil, Augustine, and Thomas haue obscured: but that Fate is an obedience of second causes to the first, was well conceiued of Hermes, and Apuleius the Platonist. Plotinus out of the Astronomers calleth it a disposition from the acts of celestiaall Orbes, vnchangeably working in inferior bodies, the same being also true enough, in respect of all those things, which a rationall minde doth not order nor direct. Ptolonie, Seneca, Democritus, Epicurus, Chrysippus, Empedocles, and the Stoicks, some of them more largely, others more strictly, ascribe to Fate a binding and inevitable necessitie; and that it is the same which is spoken and determined by God (quod deus quousq; nostrum fatum est Deus) and the definite lot of all liuing. And certainly it cannot be doubted, but the Starres are instruments of farre greater vse, then to giue an obscure light, and for men to gaze on after Sunne-set: it being manifest, that the diuersitie of seasons, the Winters, and Summers, more hote and colde, are not so vncertained by the Sunne and Moone alone, who alway keepe one and the same course, but that the Starres haue also their working therein.

And if we cannot denie, but that God hath giuen vertues to Springs and Fountaines, to colde earth, to plants and stones, Minerals, and to the excrementall parts of the basest liuing creatures, why should we robbe the beautifull Starres of their working powers? for seeing they are many in number, and of eminent beautie and magnitude, wee may not thinke, that in the treasure of his wisdome, who is infinite, there can be wanting (euen for euerie Starre) a peculiar vertue and operation; as euery herbe, plant, fruit, and flower adorning the face of the Earth, hath the like. For as these were not created to beautifie the earth alone, and to couer & shadow her dustie face, but otherwise for the vse of man and beast, to feed them and cure them; so were not those vncountable glorious bodies set in the Firmament, to no other end, then to adorne it, but for instruments, and Organs of his diuine providence, so farre as it hath pleased his iust will to determine. Origen vpon this place of Genesis, Let there be light in the Firmament, &c. Gen. 1.5. affirmeth, that the Starres are not causes (meaning per chance binding causes) but are as open Bookes, wherein are contained and set downe all things whatsoever to come; and not to be read by the eyes of humane wisdome: which latter part I beleue well, and this saying of Syracides withall: That there are hid yet greater things then these be, and we haue seene but a few of his works. And though, for the capacite of men, wee know somewhat, yet in the true and vitermost vertues of herbes and plants, which our felus sow and set, and which grow vnder our feet, wee are in effect ignorant; much more in the powers and working of celestiaall bodies. for hardly (saith SALOMON) can we discern the things that are vpon the Earth, and with great labour finde we out those things that are before vs: who can then inuigilate the things that are in Heauen? Multum est de rebus celestibus aliquid cognoscere: It is much to know a litle of heavenly things. But in this question of Fate, the middle course is to be followed, that as with the Heathen wee doe not binde God to his creatures, in this supposed necessitie of destinie, so on the contrarie, wee doe not robbe those beautifull creatures of their powers and offices. For had any of these second causes depoyled God of his prerogatiue, or had God himselfe constrained the minde and will of man to impious acts by any celestiaall enforcements, then sure the impious excuse of some were iustifiable; of whom Saint AUGUSTINE; Impia perversitate in malis factu rectissime reprehendendis ingerunt accusandum potius auctoris syderum, quam commissorem scelerum. Where we reprehend them of euill deeds, they againe with wicked perversnesse urge, that rather the Author and Creatour of the Starres, then the doer of the euill is to be accused.

But that the Starres and other celestiaall bodies incline the will by mediation of the sensitiue appetite, which is also stirred by the constitution and complexion, it cannot be doubted. Corpora caelestia (saith DAMASCENE) constituunt in nobis habitus, complexionem, & dispositiones. The heavenly bodies (saith hee) make in vs habits, complexions, and dispositions: for the bodie (though Galen inforce it further) hath vndoubtedly a kinde of drawing after it the affections of the minde, especially bodies strong in humour, and weake in vertues; for those of cholericke complexion are subiect to anger, and the furious effects thereof; by which they suffer themselves to bee transported, where the minde hath not reason to remember, that passions ought to be her Vassals, not her Masters. And that they wholly direct the reasonlesse mind I am resolu'd: For of all those which were created mortall, as birds, beasts, and the like, are left to their naturall appetites, ouer all which, celestiaall bodies (as instruments and Executioners of Gods providence) haue absolute dominion. What we should iudge of men, who litle differ from beasts, I cannot tell: for as hee that contendeth against those enforcements, may easily master or resist them: so whosoever shall neglect the remedies by vertue and pietie prepared, putteth himselfe altogether vnder the power of his sensuall appetite; Vincitur fatum si resistas, vincis si contempseris: Fate will be ouercome, if thou resist it, if thou neglect, it conquereth.

But that either the Starres or the Sunne haue any power ouer the mindes of men immediately, it is absurd to thinke, other then as aforesaid, as the same by the bodies temper may be effected. Lumen solum ad generationem sensibilium corporum confert, & ad vitam ipsam mouet, & nutrit, & auget, & perficit: The light of the Sunne (saith Saint AUGUSTINE) helpeth the generation of sensible bodies, moueth them to life, and nourisheth, augmenteth, and perfecteth them: yet still as a Minister, not as a Master: Bonus quidem est Sol, in ministerio, non imperio; The Sunne is good to serue, not to sway (saith S. Ambrose.) And Saint AUGUSTINE: Deus regit inferiora corpora per superiora; God ruleth the bodies below by those above, but hee auoucheth not, that superior bodies haue rule ouer so mens mindes, which are incorporeall.

But howsoeuer we are by the Starres inclined at our birth, yet there are many things both in Nature and Art, that encounter the same, and weaken their operation: and Aristotle himselfe confesseth, that the Heauens doe not alwaies worke their effects in inferior bodies, no more then the signes of raine and winde doe alwaies come to passe. And it is diuers times seene, that paternall vertue and vice hath his counter-working to these inclinations. Est in tuencia patrum virtus; in the young offspring the Fathers vertues, and so the contrarie, patrum vitia: and herein also there is often found an enterechange; the Sonnes of vertuous men, by an ill constellation become inclinable to vice, and of vicious men, to vertue.

A worthie sonne is borne of a wicked father.

But there is nothing (after Gods reserved power) that so much setteth this art of influence out of square and rule, as education doth: for there are none in the World so wickedly inclined, but that a religious instruction and bringing vp may fashion anew and reforme them; nor any so well disposed, whom (the reines being let loose) the continuall fellowship and familiaritie, and the examples of dissolute men may not corrupt and deforme. Vessels will euer retain a fauour of their first liquor: it being equally difficult eyther to cleanse the minde once corrupted, or to extinguish the sweet fauour of vertue first receiued, when the minde was yet tender, open, and easily seasoned; but where a fauourable constellation (allowing that the Starres incline the will) and a vertuous education doe happily arriue, or the contrarie in both, thereby it is that men are found so exceeding vertuous or vicious, Heauen and Earth (as it were) running together, and agreeing in one: for as the seedes of vertue may by the art and husbandrie of Christian counsaile produce better and more beautifull fruit, then the strength of selfe-nature and kind could haue yeilded them; so the plants apt to grow wilde, and to change themselves into weedes, by beeing set in a soyle sutable, and like themselves, are made more vsuaurie and filled with poison. It was therefore truly affirmed, Sapiens adiuvabit opus astrorum, quemadmodum agricola terra naturam; A wise man assisteth the worke of the Starres, as the Husbandman helpeth the nature of the soyle. And Ptolomie himselfe confesseth thus much, Sapientia & omnia sapientia medici dominabuntur astris, A wiseman, and the ominous art of a wise Physician shall prevaile against the Starres. Lastly, we ought all to know, that God created the Starres, as he did the rest of the Vniuersal, whose influences may be called his reserved and vnwritten Lawes. But let vs consider how they bind: euen as the Lawes of men doe; for although the Kings and Princes of the World haue by their Lawes decreed, that a Thiefe and a Murderer shall suffer death; and though their Ordinances are daily by Iudges and Magistrates (the Starres of Kings) executed accordingly, yet these Lawes doe not deprive Kings of their naturall or religious compassion, or binde them without prerogative, to such a seuer execution, as that there should be nothing left of libertie to Iudgement, power, or conscience: the Law in his owne nature, being no other then a deafe Tyrant. But seeing that it is otherwise, and that Princes (who ought to imitate God in all they can) doe sometimes for causes to themselves knowe, and by mediation, pardon offences both against others and themselves, it were then impious to take that power and libertie from God himselfe, which his Substitutes enjoy; God being mercie, goodnesse, and charitie it selfe. Otherwise that example of Prayer by our Sauour taught; And lei vs not be led into temptation, but deliuer vs from euill, had bene no other but an expence of words and time; but that God (which onely knoweth the operation of his owne creatures truly) hath assured vs, that there is no inclination or temptation so forcible, which our humble Prayers and desires may not make frustrate, and breake asunder: for were it (as the Sticks conceiue) that Fate or Destinie, though depending vpon eternall power, yet being once ordered and disposed, had such a connexion and immutable dependencie, that God himselfe should in a kind haue shut vp himselfe therein: How miserable then were the condition of men (saith S. AVGVSTINE) left altogether without hope! And if this strength of the Starres were so transferred, as that God had quitted vnto them all dominion ouer his creatures; be hee Pagan or Christian that so beleecuech, the onely true God of the one, and the imaginarie gods of the other would thereby be deposed of all worship, reuerence, or respect.

And certainly, God which hath promised vs the reward of well-doing, which Christ himselfe claimed at the hands of the Father, (thou hast finished the worke which thou gauest mee to doe;) and the same God, who hath threatened vnto vs the sorrow and torment of offences; could not contrary to his mercifull nature be so vnjust, as to bind vs incurably to the Destinies or influences of the Starres, or subiect our soules to any imposed necessity. But it was well said of Plinius, that the Starres were significant, but not efficient, giuing them yet something lesse then their due: and therefore as I do not consent with them; who would make those glorious creatures of God vertlesse: so I thinke that wee derogate from his eternall and absolute power and providence, to ascribe to them them the same dominion ouer our immortall soules, which they haue ouer all bodily substances, and perishable natures: for the soules of men, louing and fearing God, receive influence from that diuine light it selfe, whereof the Sunnes claritie, and that of the Starres is by Plato called but a shadow. Lumen est umbra Dei, & Deus est lumen luminis; Light is the shadow of Gods brightnesse, who is the light of light: But to end this question, because this Destinie, together with Providence, Prescience, and Predetermination are often confounded, I thinke it not impertinent to touch the difference in a word or two, for euery man hath not obserued it, thoughall learned men haue.

§. XII.

Of Prescience.

Prescience, or fore-knowledge (which the Greekes call Prognosis, the Latines Præcognitio, or prescientia) considered in order and nature (if we may speake of God after the manner of men) goeth before Providence: for God fore-knew all things, before he had created them, or before they had being to be cared for; and Prescience is no other then an infallible fore-knowledge. For whatsoever our selues fore-know, except the same be to succcede accordingly, it cannot be true that we fore-know it. But this Prescience of God (as it is Prescience onely) is not the cause of any thing futurely succceeding: neyther doth Gods foreknowledge impose any necessitie, or binde. For in that we fore-know that the Sunne will rise, and set; that all men borne in the World shall dye againe; that after Winter, the Spring shall come; after the Spring Summer and Haruest, and that according to the seuerall seedes that we sow, we shall reape seuerall sorts of graine, yet is not our fore-knowledge the cause of this, or any of these: neyther doth the knowledge in vs binde or constrain the Sunne to rise and set, or men to dye; for the causes (as men perswade themselves) are otherwise manifest and knowne to all. The eye of man (saith BERTIUS) beholdeth those things subiect to sense, as they are; the eye seeth that such a beast is an horse, it seeth men, trees, and houses, &c. but our seeing of them (as they are) is not the cause of their so being, for such they be in their owne nature. And againe out of the same Authour; Diuina providentia rebus generis ydis non imponit necessitatem, quia si omnia euenirent ex necessitate, premia bonorum, & pena malorum periret; Diuine Providence (saith he) imposeth no necessity vpon things that are so exist, for if all came to passe of necessity, there should neither be reward of good, nor punishment of euil.

§. XIII.

Of Providence.

Now Providence (which the Greekes call Prœnoia) is an intellectuall knowledge, both fore-seeing, caring for, and ordering all things, and doth not onely behold all past, all present, and all to come, but is the cause of their so being, which Providence (simply taken) is not: and therefore Providence by the Philosophers (saith S. AUGUSTINE) is diuided into Memorie, Knowledge, and Care: Memorie of the past, Knowledge of the present, and Care of the future: and wee our selues account such a man for provident, as, remembring things past, and obseruing things present, can by iudgement, and comparing the one with the other, provide for the future, and times succceeding. That such a thing there is as Providence, the Scriptures euery-where teach vs, Moses in many places, the Prophets in their Predictions: Christ himselfe and his Apostles assure vs hercof; and, besides the Scriptures, Hermes, Orpheus, Euripides, Pythagoras, Plato, Plotinus, and (in effect) all learned men acknowledge the Providence of God: yea the Turkes themselves are so confident therein, as they refuse not to accompany and visit each other, in the most pestilent diseases, nor shun any perill whatsoever, though death therein doe manifestly present it selfe.

The places of Scripture proouing providence, are so many, both in generall and particular, as I shall need to repeat but a few of them in this place. Sing vnto God (saith DAVID) which conereth the Heauens with cloudes, and prepareth raine for the earth, and maketh the grasse to grow vpon the Mountaines, which giueh to beasts their food, and feedeth the yong Raven that cries: All these will vpon thee, that thou mayest giue them food in due season. And thou shalt drinke of the Riuer Cheareth (saith God to ELIAH) and I haue commanded the Ravens to feed thee there. Behold, the Fowles of the Ayre, they see not, nor scape, and yet your heavenly Father feedeth them: Againe, Are not two Sparrowes sold for a farthing? and one of them shall not fall on the ground without your Father: yea all the haire of your head are numbered: And S. PETER, Cast all your care on him, for he careth for you:

And his iudgements are written, saith DAVID.

God therefore, who is euerie-where present, who filleth the Heavens and the Earth, whose eyes are upon the righteous, and his countenance against them that doe euill, was therefore by Orpheus called, oculus infinitus, an infinite eye, beholding all things, and cannot therefore be esteemed as an idle looker on, as if he had transferred his power to any other: for it is contrary to his owne Word: Gloriam meam alteri non dabo: I will not give my glorie to another. No man commandeth in the Kings presence, but by the Kings direction; but God is euerie-where present, and King of Kings. The example of Gods vniuersall Prouidence is scene in his creatures. The Father prouideth for his children:
beasts and birds and all liuing for their young ones. If prouidence bee found in second Fathers, much more in the first and Vniuersall: and if there be a naturall louing care in men, and beasts, much more in God, who hath formed this nature, and whose Diuine loue was the beginning, and is the bond of the Vniuersall: Amor diuinus re-rum omnium est principium, & vinculum vniuersi (saith PLATO.) Amor Dei est nodus perpetuus, mundi copula, partiumq; eius immobile sustentaculum, ac vniuersae machine funda-mentum; The loue of God is the perpetuall knot, and linke or chayne of the world, and the immouable pillar of euery part thereof, and the Basis and foundation of the vniuersall. God therefore who could only be the cause of all, can only prouide for all, and sustaine all; so as to absolute power; to euerie-where presence; to perfect goodnesse; to pure and diuine loue; this attribute transcendent habily of Prouidence is only proper and belonging.

Now for Preadefination; we can difference it no otherwise, from Prouidence and Prescience, then in this, that Prescience only fore-seeth: Prouidence fore-seeth & careth for, and hath respect to all creatures, euen from the brightest Angels of Heauen, to the vnworthiest Wormes of the Earth, and Preadefination (as it is vsed specially by Diuines) is onely of men, and yet not of all to men belonging, but of their saluation properly, in the common vse of Diuines, or perdition, as some haue vsed it. Yet Peter Lombard, Thomas, Bernensis Theologus, and others, take the word Preadefination more strictly, and for a preparation to felicitie: diuers of the Fathers take it more largely sometimes: among whom S. Augustine speaking of two Citities, and two Societies, vseth these words, Quarum est vna, qua predestinata est in aeternū regnare cum Deo, altera aeternum supplicium subire cum Diabolo; Whereof one is it, which is predestinated to reigne for euer with God, but the other is to vndergoe euilasting torments with the Deuill: for according to Nonius MARCELLVS, deistinare est preparare; and of the same opinion are many Protestant writers, as Calvin, Beza, Buchanan, Dancus, and such like: and as for the manifold questions hereof arising, I leave them to the Diuines; and why it hath pleased God to create some vessels of honour, and some of dishonour,
I will answer with Gregorie, who saith, Qui in factis Dei rationem non videt, infirmitatem suam considerans, cur non videat, rationem videt; He that seeth no reason in the actions of God, by consideration of his owne infirmity perceyueeth the reason of his blindness. And again with S. AVASTINE, Oculia esse causa potest, iniusta esse non potest; Hidden the cause of his Preadefination may be, vnjust it cannot be.

The

The art, or artificiall Organ of God: and CYSANVS, Diuini praecepti instrumentum; The instrument of the diuine precept: we may then with better reason reiect that kinde of Idolatrie, or God of fooles, called Fortune, or Chance: a Goddelle, the most reuerend-ed, and the most reuiled of all other, but not ancient; for Homer maketh her the Daughter of Oceanus, as Pausanias witnesseth in his Assestiacks. The Greekes call her tychē, signifying a relatiue being, or betiding, so as before Homers time this great Ladie was scarce heard of; and Hesiodus, who hath taught the birth and beginning of all these counterfiet gods, hath not a word of Fortune: yet afterward she grew to great and omnipotent, as from Kings and Kingdomes, to Beggars and Cottages, she ordered all things, refitting the wisdom of the wisest, by making the Possessor thereof miserable:
valuing the folly of the most foolish by making their successe prosperous, inasmuch as the actions of men were fad to be but the sports of Fortune, and the variable accidents happening in mens liues, but her pastimes: of which *PALLADIVS, Vita hominum Indus fortune est; The life of man is the play of Fortune: and because it often falleth out, that enterprises guided by ill counsells haue equal successe to those by the best iudgement conducted, therefore had Fortune the same external figure with Sapience: wherof Athenaeus:

Longissimè à Sapientia Fors distat, Sed multa perfitit tamen similitudo.

From Wisdome Fortune differs farre,
And yet in workes most like they are.

But I will forbear to be curious in that, which (as it is commonly vnderstood) is nothing else but a power imaginarie, to which the successe of humane actions and endenours were for their varietie ascribed; for when a manifest cause could not be giuen, then was it attributed to fortune, as if there were no cause of those things, of which most men are ignorant, contrary to this true ground of PLATO: Nihil est ortum sub sole, cuius causa legitimam non precesserit, Nothing euer came to passe vnder the Sunne, of which there was not a iust preceding cause. But Aquinas hath herein answered in one distinition, whatsoever may be objected; for many things there are (saith he) which happen, inspicis the intention of the inferior, but not besides the intention of the superior; Prae-ter intentionem inferioris, sed non praeter intentionem superioris, (to wit, the ordinance of God); and therefore (saith MELANCTON) Quod Fortuna fortunam, nos Deum appellamus; Whom the Poets call Fortune, we know to be God; and that this is true, the Scripture in many places teacheth vs, as in the Law of Murder. He that smiteth a man, and he die, shall die the death; and if a man hath not laid waite, but God hath offered him into his hands, then I will appoint thee a place whither he shall flee. Now, where the Scripture hath these words, God hath offered him into his hands, we say, if he hurt him by Chance: and in Deuteronomie the nineteenth, where the slipping of an Axe from the helue, whereby another is slaine, was the worke of God himselfe, we in our phrase attribute this accident to Chance or Fortune: and in the Proverbs the sixteenth, The lot is cast into the lap, but the whole disposition thereof is of the Lord: so as that which seemeth most casual and subiect to Fortune, is yet disposed by the ordinance of God, as at all things else; and hereof the wisest sort, and the best learned of the Philosophers were not ignorant, as Cicero witnesseth for them, gathering the opinion of Aristotle and his Sectators, with those of Plato, and the Academicks to this effect, That the same power which they called animam mundi; The soule of the World, was no other then that incomprehensible wisdome, which we expresse by the name of God, governing euerie being as well in heauen as in earth; to which wisdome and power they sometime gaue the title of Ne-cessitie or Fate, because it bindeth by ineuitable ordinance: sometime, the stile of Fortune, because of many effects there appeare vnto vs no certain causes. To this effect speaketh S. Augustine in his questions vpon Genesis the first Booke: the same hath Seneca in his fourth of Benefits; which was also the doctrine of the Stoicks, of which Sect he was:
For whatsoever (saith he) thou callest God, be it Nature, Fate, or Fortune, all are but one and the same, differenced by diuers termes, according as he vseth, and exerciseth his power diuersly.

But it may be objected, that if Fortune and Chance were not sometimes the causes of good and euill in men, but an idle voice, whereby we expresse successe, how comes it then, that so many worthie and wise men depend vpon so many vnworthy and enspie-tie-headed fooles; that riches and honor are giuen to externall men, and without kernell: and so many learned, and valiant men weare out their liues in poore and dejected estates. In a word, there is no other inferior, or apparent cause, beside the partialitie of mans affection, but the falshioning and not falshioning of our selues according to the nature of the time wherein we liue: for whosoeuer is most able, and best sufficient to discourse, and hath withall an honest and open heart and louing truth; if Princes, or those that gouerne, endure no other discourte then their owne flatteries, then I say such an one, whose vertue and courage forbiddeth him to be base and a dissembler, shall euermore hang vnder the wheele; which kinde of deseruing well and receiving ill, we all waies fully charge Fortune withall. For whosoeuer shall tell any great Man or Magistrate, that he is not iust; the Generall of an Armie, that he is not valiant, and great Ladies that they are not faire; shall neuer be made a Counsellor, a Captaine, or a Courtier. Neither is it sufficient to be wife with a wife Prince, valiant with a valiant, and iust with him that is iust, for such a one hath no estate in his prosperitie; but he must also change with the successor, if he be of contrarie qualities; faile with the tyde of the time, and alter forme and condition, as the Estate or the Estates Master changeth: Otherwise how were it possible, that the most base men, and separate from all imitable qualities, could so often attaine to honour and riches, but by such an obseruant slauish course? These men hauing nothing else to value themselves by, but a counterfeit kinde of wondering at other men, and by making them beleeue that all their vices are vertues, and all their dustie actions crystalline, haue yet in all ages prospered equally with the most vertuous, 20

For according to MENANDER, Omnis insipiens arrogantia & plausibus capitur; Euerie foole is wonne with his owne pride, and others flattering applause: so as whosoeuer will liue altogether out of himselfe, and studie other mens humours, and obscure them, shall neuer be vnfortunate; and on the contrarie; that man which prizeth truth and vertue (except the season wherein he liueth be of all these, and of all sorts of goodnesse fruitfull) shall neuer prosper by the possession or profession thereof. It is alwaies token of a worldly wise man, not to warre or contend in vaine against the nature of times wherein he liueth: for such a one is often the authour of his owne miserie; but best it were to follow the aduice, which the Pope gaue the Bishops of that age, out of Ouid, while the Arian Heretic raged:

Dum furor in cursu est, currentis cede furori.

While furie gallops on the way,
Let no man furies gallop stay.

And if Cicero (then whom that world began nota man of more reputed iudgement) had followed the counsaile of his brother QUINTUS, Potuisset (saith PETRARCH) in lectulo suo mori, potuisset integro caduere sepeliri; He might then haue dyed the death of nature, and bene with an vntorne and vndisseuered bodie buried; for as Petrarch in the same place noteth: Quid stultius quam desperantem (praesertim de effectu) libris perpetuis implicari; What more foolish then for him that despaires, especially of the effect, to be intangled with endlesse contentions? Whosoeuer therefore will set before him MACHIAVELLS two markes to shooote at (to wit) riches, and glorie, must set on and take off a back of yron to a weak wooden bow, that it may fit both the strong and the feeble: for as he, that first deuicd to adde sayles to rowing vessels, did eyther so proportion them, as being fastened aloft, and towards the head of his Mast, he might abide all windes and stormes, or else he sometime or other perished by his owne inuention: so that man which prizeth vertue for it selfe, and cannot endure to hoise and strike his sayles, as the diuers natures of calmes and stormes require, must cut his sayles and his cloth, of meane length and bredth, and content himselfe with a slow and sure nauigation, (to wit) a meane and free estate. But of this dispute of Fortune, and the rest, or of whosoeuer 50

Lords or Gods, imaginarie powers, or causes, the wit (or rather foolishnesse) of man hath found out: let vs resolute with S. Paul, who hath taught vs, that there is but one God, the Father, of whom are all things, and we in him; and one Lord, Iesus Christ, by whom are all things, and we by him; there are diuersities of operations, but God is the same which worketh all in all.

Of mans estate in his first Creation, and of Gods rest.

§. I.

Of the Image of God, according to which man was first created.

IHE creation of all other creatures being finished, the heauens adorned, and the earth replenished, God said, Let vs make man in our owne Image, according to our likeness. Gen. 1. 26.

Man is the last and most admirable of Gods workes to vs knowne, ingenium miraculum homo, Man is the greatest wonder (saith PLATO out of MERCURIUS) Nature ardentissima artificium, The artificial worke of the most ardent of fire-like nature (as saith Zoroaster) though the fame be meant, not for any excellencie external, but in respect of his internal forme, both in the nature, qualities, and other attributes thereof: in nature, because it hath an essence immortall, and spiritual; in qualities, because the fame was by God created holy and righteous in truth; in other attributes, because Man was made Lord of the world, and of the creatures therein.

Met. l. 1. 76.

Of this Image and similitude of God, there is much dispute among the Fathers, Schoole-men, and late Writers: Some of the Fathers conceiue, that man was made after the Image of God, in respect chiefly of Empire and Dominion, as S. Chrysostome, 30 Ambrose, and some others: which S. Ambrose denieth to the woman in these words, Visicus Deus vnus, ab eo foret homo vnus, & quomodo ex Deo vno omnia, ita ex vno homine omne genus esset super faciem totius terre: Vnus igitur vnus fecit, qui vnitate eius haberet imaginem; T hat as God is one, one man might be made by him, and that in what manner all things are of one God, likewise of one man the whole kinde should be vpon the face of the whole earth: Therefore he being one, made one, that should haue the Image of his vnitie. But whereas it is gathered out of the following words of the same Verse, that man was after the Image of God in respect of rule and power, it is written Dominamini in the plural number, and let them rule ouer the fish in the Sea, &c. and therefore cannot the woman be excluded. Others conceiue, that man is said to be after the image of God in respect of his immortall soule onely, because as God is inuisible, so the soule of man is inuisible; as God is immortall and incorpall, so is the soule of man immortall and incorpall; and as there is but one God which governeth the world, so but one soule which governeth the bodie of man; and as God is wholly in euery part of the world, so is the soule of man wholly in euery part of the bodie: Animus est tota in toto, & tota in qualibet parte; The soule is wholly in the whole bodie, and wholly in euery part thereof, according to Aristotle; though Chalcidius, and other learned men denie that doctrine; which that it is otherwise then potentially true, all the Aristotelians in the world shall neuer proue. These and the like arguments doe the Iezus make (saith Tostatus) and these resemblances, betweene the infinite God, and the finite Man.

35 The Schoole-men resemble the Minde or Soule of Man to God, in this respect especially; because that as in the Minde there are three distinct powers, or faculties (to wit) Memorie, Vnderstanding, and Will; and yet all these, being of reall differences, are but one minde: so in God there are three distinct persons, the Father, Sonne, and holy Ghost, and yet but one God. They also make the Image and Similitude diuers; and againe, they distinguish betweene imaginem Dei, and ad imaginem Dei, and spinneth into small threds, with subtil distinctions, many times the plainenesse and sinceritie of the Scriptures: their wits being like that strong water, that catcheth thorow and dissolueth the purest gold. Victorinus also maketh the Image of God to be substantiall, but not the the similitude: sed in substantia nomen qualitatis declaratum; A word declaring quality in the substance. Out of which words; and that which followeth; it is infer'd, that as the image and similitude doe greatly differ: so the finfull soule doth not therefore leave to be the image of God, but it hath not his similitude, except it be holy and righteous. S. Augustine also against Adrianus the Manichee affirmeth, that by time, the perfection of this image is lost in man, and in his Retractions maintaineth the same opinion, and also affirmeth that the Similitude is more largely taken, then the Image.

But howsoever the Schoole-men and others distinguish, or whatsoeuer the Fathers conceiue, sure I am that S. Paul maketh the same sense of the image, which Victorinus doth of the similitude, who saith: As we haue borne the image of the earthly, so shall we 10 bear the image of the heavenly; and it cannot be gathered out of the Scriptures, that the words image and similitude were vsed but in one sense, and in this place the better to expresse each other; whatsoeuer Lombard hath said to the contrary. For God knowes, what a multitude of meanings the wit of man imagineth to himselfe in the Scriptures, which neither Moses, the Prophets, or Apostles, euer conceiued. Now as S. Paul vseth the word (image) for both: so S. James vseth the word (similitude) for both in these words: I herewith blesse we God enen the Father, and therewith curse we Men, which are 15 made after the similitude of God: Howsoever therefore S. Augustine seemeth, out of a kind of elegance in writing, to make some difference, as where he writeth, Consequenter imaginem in eternitate, similitudinem in moribus inueniri; We confesse that this image is found in eternitie, but his similitude in manners; that is, in the spiritual dispositions and qualities of the minde; yet thus he elsewhere speaketh plainly: Quasi uero possit esse imago aliqua in qua similitudo non sit: si enim omnino similis non est, procul dubio nec imago est; 20 As if (saith he) there could be any image, where the similitude is not: no, out of doubt, where there is no likeness, there is no image. The verie words of the Text make this most manifest, as, Let vs make man in our image, according to our likeness: which is, Let vs make man in our image, that he may be like vs; and in the next Verse following, God himselfe maketh it plaine, for there he vseth the word (image) onely, as thus: God created the man in his image, in the image of God created he him. And to take away all dispute or ambiguity, in the first Verse of the fifth Chapter, the word (similitude) is vsed againe by it selfe, as, In the day that God created Adam, in the likeness of God made he him. 30 And this similitude S. Paul Colos. the third, calleth the image. Put on (saith he) the new man, which is renewed in knowledge after the image of him, that created him. And in Synacides it is written, He made them according to his image. Now if we may beleue S. Paul before Peter Lombard and other Schoole-men, then it is as manifest as wordes can make it, that the image and similitude is but the same, for S. Paul vseth both the wordes directly in one sense. For they turned the glorie of the incorruptible God, to be similitude of the image of a corruptible man.

Zanchius laboureth to proue, that man was formed after the image of God, both in bodie and minde: Nulla pars in homine que non fuerit huiusce imaginis particeps, No 40 part in a man (saith he) which was not partaking Gods image: for God said, Let vs make man according to our owne image. But the soule alone is not man, but the tripartite or whole man compounded of bodie and soule. The bodie of man (saith he) is the image of the world, and called therefore Microcosmus; but the Idea and exemplar of the world was first in God, so that man, according to his bodie must needs be the image of God. Against this opinion of this learned man, his owne obiection seemeth to me sufficient, where he allegeth, that it may be said, that Moses spake by the figure Synecdoche, as when a man is called a mortall man, yet is not the whole man mortall, but the bodie onely: so when God said, Let vs make man after our image, he meant the soule of man, and not the bodie of earth and dust: Maledictus qui deitatem ad hominis lineamenta refert (saith S. AUGUSTINE,) Cursed is he that referreth the Deitie of God to the lineaments of mans bodie. Dense enim non est humane forme particeps, neque corpus huma- 50 na diuine (saith PHILO.) God is not partaker of humane forme, nor humane body of the forme diuine. The Hebrew word for image, is Tselem, which signifieth a shadow or obscure resemblance: In imagine pertransit homo; Man passeth away in a shadow: Let vs then know and consider, that God, who is eternall and infinite, hath not any bodily shape or composition, for it is both against his Nature and his Word; an error of the Anthropomorphite, against the verie essence and Maiestie of God.

Surely

Surely Cicero, who was but a Heathen, had yet a more diuine vnderstanding then these grosse Heretikes: Ad similitudinem Dei proprius accedat humana uirtus, quam figura; et he uirtute which is in man (saith he) came neerer the similitude of God, then the figure. For God is a spirituall substance, inuisible, and most simple; God is a iust God: God is Mercifull: God is Charitie it selfe, and (in a word) Goodnesse it selfe, and none else simply good. And thus much it hath pleased God himselfe to teach vs, and to make vs know of himselfe. What then can be the shadow of such a substance, the image of such a nature, or wherein can man be said to resemble his vnexceivable power and perfectnesse? certainly, not in dominion alone: for the Deuill is said to be the Prince of this 10 World, and the Kingdome of Christ was not thereof, who was the true and perfect image of his Father; neither, because man hath an immortall soule, and therein the faculties of Memory, Vnderstanding, and Will, for the Deuils are also immortall, and participate those faculties, being called Demonies, because scientes of Knowledge, and subtilitie; neither because we are reasonable creatures, by which we are distinguished from beasts: for who haue rebelled against God? who haue made Gods of the vilest beasts, of Serpents, of Cats, of Owles, yea, euen of shamefull parts, of lusts and pleasures, but reasonable men? Yet doe I not condemne the opinion of S. Chrysostome and Ambrose, as touching dominion, but that, in respect thereof, man was in some sort after the image of God, if we take Dominion, such as it ought to be, that is, accompanied with Iustice and Pietie: for God did not onely make man a Ruler and Governour ouer the Fishes of the Sea, the Fowles of Heauen (or of the aire) and ouer the Beasts of the Field; but God gaue vnto man a dominion ouer men, he appointed Kings to gouerne them, and Iudges, to iudge them in equitie. Neither doe I exclude Reason, as it is the abilitie of Vnderstanding. For I doe not conceiue, that Irenaeus did therefore call man, the image of God, because he was animal rationale onely; but that he understood it better, with SYBILLA: Imago mea est homo, rectam rationem habens: Man, that is endued 20 with right reason, is said to resemble God, (that is) by right reason to know and confesse God his Creatour, and the same God to serue, loue, and obey: and therefore said Saint Augustine (who hercin came neerer the Truth) Fecit Deus hominem ad imaginem et similitudinem suam in mente, God made man, in respect of the intellect, after his owne image and similitude; and REYNERIVS; Homo, quod habet mentem factus est ad imaginem Dei, Man was made after the Image of God, in minde, or in that he had a minde.

§. II.

Of the intellectuall minde of man, in which there is much of the Image of God: and that this Image is much deformed by Sinne.

BUT Mens is not taken here for anima physica, according to Aristotle, which is 40 forma, vel natura hominis: The forme or nature of man; but this facultie or gift of God, called Mens, is taken for prima vis anime, the principall strength of the minde, or soule, cuius actus est perpetua ueritatis contemplatio; whose act, exercise, or office, is the perpetuall contemplation of truths; and therefore it is also called intellectus diuinus, intellectus contemplatiuus, & anima contemplatiua, A diuine vnderstanding, and 50 an intellect or minde contemplatiue. Est autem mens nostra (saith CYRILLVS) vis comprehendendi, & totum virtuale ex omnibus comprehendendi uirtutibus compositum: Our intellectuall minde (saith he) is a power of comprehending, euen the whole, that is in this kinde powerfull, compounded of all the powers of comprehension: vnto which Mercurius attributeth so much (if his meaning accompany his words) that hee esteemeth it to be the very essence of God (which was also the error of the Manichees, and others) and no otherwise separate from God (saith he) then the light from the Sunne: for this Mens or vnderstanding (saith MERCURIUS) est Deus in hominibus: Is God in men, or rather (and S. Epiph. 55 et of the same essence or nature with the diuine light, but a body illighted, and an illumination created; sois this Mens or vnderstanding in men, not of the essence of Gods infinite vnderstanding, but a power and facultie of our foules the purety; or the lumen anime rationalis, by the true and eternall light illighted. And this Mens others call animam animam, The soule of the soule, or with S. Augustine, the eye of the soule, or receptacle of Sapience and diuine knowledge, que amor & sapientie tanquam ducit sequitur, Which followeth

after the loue of sapience as her guide (saith Philo) between which and reason, between which and the mind, called anima, between which & that power which the Latines call animus, there is this difference. Reason is that facultie by which we iudge and discourse; Anima, by which we liue. Hereof it is said, Anima corpus animat, id est, viuificat; or the soule is that which doth animate the body, that is, giue it life: for death is the separation of body and soule; and the same strength (saith Philo) which God the great Director hath in the World, the same hath this Anima, or mind, or soule in man. Animus is that, by which we will and make election; and to this Basil agreeeth, which calleth this Mens, or diuine vnderstanding, perficacem anima partem, the perceiving part of the mind, or the light by which the Soule discerneth: dormientium mens, non anima, sopit, & in furiosis mens exstinguitur, anima manet. In mens that sleepe it is this (mens) or vnderstanding, and not the mind or soule, which resteth, during which time it is but habitual in wise men, & in mad men this (mens) is extinguished, and not the soule: for mad men doe liue, though distracted.

Therefore this word being often vsed for the Soule giuing life, is attributed abusiuely to mad men, when we say that they are of a distracted minde, in stead of a broken vnderstanding, which word (mind) we vse also for opinion, as, I am of this minde, or that mind: and sometimes for mens conditions or vertues, as, he is of an honest minde, or a man of a iust minde: sometimes for affection, as, I do this for my mindes sake; and Aristotle sometimes vseth this word (Mens) for the phantasie, which is the strength of the imagination: sometimes for the knowledge of principles, which we haue without discourse: oftentimes for Spirits, Angels and Intelligences: but as it is vsed in the proper signification, including both the vnderstanding agent and possible, it is described to bee a pure, simple, substantiall act, not depending vpon matter, but hauing relation to that which is intelligible, as to his first object: or more at large thus; a part or particle of the Soule, whereby it doth vnderstand, not depending vpon matter, nor needing any organ, free from passion coming from without, and apt to bee diseuered, as, eternall from that which is mortall. Hereof excellently MERCURIUS: Anima est imago mentis, mens imago Dei, Deus menti preest, mens anima, anima corpori; The Soule (meaning that which giueh life) is the Image of this vnderstanding, or Mens, and this (Mens) or vnderstanding is the Image of God. God is President or Ruler ouer this vnderstanding, this vnderstanding ouer the Soule, and this Soule ouer the bodie. This diuision and distinction of the Platonikes and Peripatetikes, I leaue to the Reader to iudge of. That, Mens humana hath no need of any organ, Marcellus Ficinus in his ninth Booke of the Soules immortality laboureth to proue. Zanchinus doth not differ from Ficinus in words, for (saith he) *Ad facultatem intelligentem exercendam non eget Mens organo, tanquam medio, per quod intelligat, quamquam eget obiecto in quod intueatur, & ex quo intellectum concipiat: hoc autem obiectum sunt phantasmata, seu rerum a sensibus perceptarum simulachra ad phantasmam prolata: To exercise the facultie of vnderstanding, the mind of man (saith he) needeth no instrument, as a meane, by which it may vnderstand: but it needeth an object, whercon to looke, and whence to conceive the act of vnderstanding. This object are the phantasmes, or the resemblances of things received from the sense & carryed to the phantasie. But in effect his conclusion seemeth to carry a contrary sense, when he maketh the Phantasie, in representing the object to the vnderstanding, to be a corporall Organum; neither can it be vnderstood to be an Organ of any things, but of the vnderstanding. And he addeth that the resemblance of things in mans imaginatio, are to his vnderstanding & mind, as colours are to the sight: whence it so followeth, that the imagination or phantasie it self is to the facultie of vnderstanding, as the eye is to the facultie of seeing; & as this is an Organum, so that. Of this question, How the minde in all her actions maketh vse of the bodie, & hath communion with the body, I referre the Reader to a most graue & learned Discourse in the last Reply of M. D. Bislon, late Bishop of Winchester, vnto Henry Jacob. Howsoeuer the Truth be determined, we must conclude, that it is neither in respect of reason alone, by which we discourse, nor in respect of the minde it self by which we see life, nor in respect of our soules simply, by which we are immortall, that wee are made after the Image of God. But most safely may we resemble our selues to God in mentis, and in respect of that pure facultie which is neuer separate from the contemplation and loue of God. Yet this is not all. For Saint Bernard maketh a true difference between the nature and faculties of the Minde or Soule, and between the infusion of qualities, endowments and gifts of grace, wherewith it is adorned and enriched, which,* being added to the nature, essence, and faculties, maketh it altogether to bee after the Image of God, whose words are these: Non propterda image Dei est, quia in memini, id est, scilicet intelligit & diligit (which also was the opinion of Saint AUGUSTINE) sed quia potest meminisse, intelligere ac diligere eum a quo factus est, (that is) The minde (or animus) was not therefore the Image of God, because it remembereth, vnderstandeth, and loveth it selfe, but because it can remember, vnderstand, and loue God, who created it. And the Image may be deformed and made vnprofitable; heare BASIL: Homo ad imaginem & similitudinem Dei factus est, peccatum vero imaginis huius pulchritudinem deformavit: & inutilem reddidit, dum animam corruptis concupiscentiis affectibus immergit. Man was made after the Image and similitude of God, but sinne hath deformed the beautie of this Image, and made it vnprofitable by drawing our minds into corrupt concupiscentie.

It is not therefore (as aforesaid) by reason of Immortality, nor in Reason, nor in Dominion, nor in any one of these by it selfe, nor in all these ioyned, by any of which, or by all which we resemble, or may be called the shadow of God, though by reason and vnderstanding, with the other faculties of the Soule, wee keepe capable of this print; but chiefly, in respect of the habit of Original righteousnesse, most perfectly infused by God into the minde and Soule of man in his first Creation: For it is not by nature, nor by her liberality, that we were printed with the seale of Gods Image (though Reason may be said to be of her gift, which ioyned to the soule is a part of the Essentiall Constitution of our proper Species) but from the bountifull grace of the Lord of all goodnesse, who breathed life into Earth, and contriued within the Trunke of Dust and Clay, the inimitable habilitie of his owne Pietie, and Righteousnesse.

So long therefore (for that resemblance which Dominion hath) doe those that are powerfull retain the Image of God, as according to his Commandements they exercise the Office or Magistracie to which they are called; and sincerely walke in the wayes of God, which in the Scriptures is called, walking with God; and all other men so long retain this Image, as they feare, loue and serue God truly, that is, for the loue of God alone, and doe not bruite and deface his Seale by the weight of manifold and voluntary offences, and obdurate finnes. For the vnjust minde cannot be after the Image of God, seeing God is Iustice it selfe; The bloud-thirstie hath it not; for God is Chastitie, and Mercie it selfe: Falshood, cunning practice, and ambition, are properties of Satan; and therefore cannot dwell in one soule, together with God; and to be blotted, there is no likelihood betweene pure light and blacke darknesse, betweene beautie and deformity, or betweene righteousnesse and reprobation. And though Nature, according to common vnderstanding, haue made vs capable by the power of reason, and apt enough to receive this Image of Gods goodnesse which the sensuall soules of beasts cannot perceiue; yet were that aptitude naturall more inclinable to follow and imbrace the false and durelesse pleasures of this Stage-play World, then to become the shadow of God by walking after him, had not the exceeding workmanhippe of Gods Wife, dome, and the liberality of his Mercy, formed eyes to our soules, as to our bodies, which, piercing through the impurity of our flesh, behold the highest Heavens, and thence bring Knowledge and Object to the Minde and Soule, to contemplate the euer-during Glorie, and termelesse joy, prepared for those, which retain the Image and similitude of their Creator, preserving undefiled and vrent the garment of the new man, which, after the Image of God, is created in Righteousnes and Holinesse, as saith S. Paul. Now, whereas it is thought by some of the Fathers, as by Saint Augustine, with whom Saint Ambrose ioyneth, that, by sinne, the perfection of the Image is lost, and not the Image it selfe; both opinions by this distinction may be well reconciled (to wit) that the Image of God, in man, may be taken two wayes; for either it is considered, according to naturall gifts, and consisteth therein: namely to haue a reasonable and vnderstanding nature, &c. and in this sense, the Image of God is more lost by sinne; then the very reasonable or vnderstanding nature, &c. is lost, (or sinne doth not abolish and take away these naturall gifts): or, the Image of God is considered, according to supernaturall gifts, namely, of Diuine Grace and heavenly Glorie, which is indeed the perfection and accomplishment of the naturall Image; and this manner of similitude and Image of God is wholly blotted out and destroyed by sinne.

Of our base and fraile bodies: and that the care thereof should yeeld to the immortall Soule.

Arian Martide
nat. f. 156.

THE externall man God formed out of the dust of the Earth, or according to the signification of the word, Adam of Adamash, of red Earth, or, ex limo terra, out of the slime of the Earth, or a mixed matter of Earth and Water. Non ex qualibet humo, sed ex ghaphar adamash (id est) ex pinguisima & mollissima: Not that God made an Image or Statue of Clay, but out of Clay, Earth or dust God formed and made flesh, blood, and bone, with all parts of man.

Gen. 12. 3. 7.
Job 4. 2. 7.

That man was formed of Earth and Dust, did Akraham acknowledge, when in humble feare he called vnto God, to saue Sedome: Let not my Lord now be angry, if I speake, for that am but dust and ashes: And in these Houses of Clay, whose foundation is in the dust, doe our soules inhabit, according to Job. And though our owne eyes doe euery where behold the sudden and resistlesse assaults of Death, and Nature assureth vs by neuer-failing Experience, and Reason by insillible demonstration, that our times vpon the Earth haue neither certaintie nor durabilitie, that our Bodies are but the Anduiles of paine and diseases, and our Minds the Huiues of vnumbrable cares, sorrowes and passions: and that (when we are most glorified) we are but those painted posits, against which Enuie and Fortune direct their darts; yet such is the true unhappinesse of our condition, and the darke ignorance which couereth the eyes of our vnderstanding, that wee only prize, to pamper, and exalt this Vassall and Slaue of death, and forget altogether (or only remember at our cast-away Iesure) the imprisoned immortall Soule, which can neither dye with the Reprobate, nor perish with the mortall parts of virtuous men: seeing Gods Iustice in the one, and his goodnesse in the other is exercised for euermore, as the euer-living subiects of his reward and punishment. But when is it that wee examine this great account? Neuer while we haue one vanitie left vs to spend: we plead for Titles, till our breath faile vs; digge for Riches whiles our strength enableth vs; exercise malice, while we can reuenge; and then, when Time hath beaten from vs both youth, pleasure, and health, and that Nature it selfe hateth the house of old age, we remember with Job, that we must goe the way from whence we shall not returne, and that our bed is made ready for vs in the darke; And then I say, looking ouer-late into the bottome of our conscience (which Pleasure and Ambition had locked vp from vs all our liues,) we behold therein the fearefull Images of our actions past, and withall this terrible Inscription: That God will bring euery worke into iudgement, that man hath done vnder the Sunne.

Ecc. 12. 14.

But what examples haue euer moued vs? what perswasions reformed vs? or what threatnings made vs afraid? we behold other mens Tragedies plaied before vs, we heare what is promised and threatned: but the Worlds bright glorie hath put out the eyes of our minds; and these betraying lights, (with which wee only see) doe neither looke vp towards our selfe ioyes, nor downe towards endlesse sorrowes, till wee neither know, nor can looke for any thing else, at the Worlds hands. Of which excellently Atarum Rictor:

*Nil hostes, nil dira fames, nil deniq; morbi
Egerunt, suumq; qui nunc sumus, usq; periculis
Tentati, nihilo meliores reddimur unquam,
Sub vitij nullo culpam sine manentes.*

Diseases, Famine, Enemies, in vs no change haue wrought,
What erst we were, we are; still in the same share caught:
No time can our corrupted manners mend,
In Vice we dwell, in Sinne that hath no end.

But let vs not flatter our immortall Soules herein: for to neglect God all our liues, and know that wee neglect him, to offend God voluntarily, and know that wee offend him, casting our hopes on the Peace, which wee trust to make at parting, is no other then a rebellious presumption; and (that which is the worst of all) euen a contemptuous laughing to scorne, and deriding of God, his Lawes and Precepts. Frustra sperant, qui sic de misericordia Dei sibi blandiuntur; They hope in vaine, saith BERNARD, which in this sort flatter themselves with Gods mercie.

S. TITLE

Of the Spirit of Life, which God breathed into man in his Creation.

IN this frame and carcase God breathed the breath of life; and the man was a liuing Soule: (that is) God gaue a body of Earth and of corruptible matter, a Soule spiritual and incorruptible; not that God had any such bodily instruments as men vse, but God breathed the Spirit of Life and Immortalitie into man, as wee breatheth his grace daily into such as loue and feare him. *The Spirit of God (saith E. L. I. H. V. in I. O. B.) hath made mee, and the breath of the Almighty hath giuen me Life: In qua sententia (saith RABANVS) vitanda est paupertas sensus carnalis, ne forte putemus Deum, vel manibus corporeis de limo formasse corpus hominis, vel faucibus aut labijs suis inspirasse in faciem formati, ut viuere possit & spiraculum vita habere: Nam & Prophetæ noui, & Manu sua fecerunt me, &c. Tropica hac locutione magis quam propria, (id est) iuxta consuetudinem, quasolent homines operari, loquutus est: in which sentence (saith hee) the beggarinesse of carnall sense is to bee avoided, lest perhaps wee should thinke, either that God with bodily hands made mans body of slime, or breathed with iawes or lips upon his face being formed; that he might liue, and haue the Spirit of Life: for the Prophet also when he saith; Thy hand hath made mee, speake this Tropically, rather than properly (that is) according to the custome which men vse in working. Quantum est periculi his, qui Scripturæ sensu corporeo legunt? In what danger are they that read the Scriptures in a carnall sense? By this breath was infused into man both life and soule; and therefore this (Soule) the Philosophers call Animam, que uiuificat corpus, & animat, which doth animate, and giue life to the body. The inspiration of the Almighty giueth vnderstanding, saith I. O. B.; and this spirit, which God breathed into man, which is the reasonable soule of man, returneth againe to God that gaue it, as the body returneth vnto the Earth, out of which it was taken, according to Ecclesiastes: And dust shall returne to the Earth, out of which it was taken, and the spirit shall returne to God that gaue it. Neither is this word (Spirit) usually otherwise taken in the Scriptures, than for the soule; as when Stephen cried vnto God: Domine, suscipe spiritum meum; Lord Iesus receiue my spirit: and in S. I. O. N., And Iesus bowed his head, and gaue up the Ghost, or Spirit, (which was) that his life and soule left his body dead. And that the immortall soule of man differeth from the foules of beasts, the manner of creation maketh it manifest: for it is written, Let the waters bring forth in abundance euery creeping thing, and let the Earth bring forth the liuing thing, according to his kinde, the beast of the Earth, &c. But of Man it is written, Let vs make man in our owne Image, &c. and further, that the Lord breathed in his face the breath of life. Wherefore, as from the Water and Earth were those creatures brought forth, and thence received life: so shall they againe be dissolved into the same first matter, whence they were taken: but the life of breath cuerlasting, which God breathed into man, shall according to Ecclesiastes, *returne againe to God that gaue it.

S. V.

That man is (as it were) a little World: with a digression touching our mortality.

MAN, thus compounded and formed by God, was an abstract or modell, or briefe Storie of the Vniuersall: in whom God concluded the Creation, and vvorke of the World, and vvhom hee made the last and most excellent of his Creatures, being internally endued vwith a diuine vnderstanding, by which hee might contemplate and serue his Creatour, after whose image hee was formed, and endued vwith the powers and faculties of Reason and other abilities, that thereby also he might gouerne and rule the World, and all other Gods creatures therein. And vvhenceas God created three sorts of liuing natures, (to wit) Angelicall, Rationall, and Brutall; giuing to Angels an intellectuall, and to Beasts a sensuall nature, hee vouchsafed vnto Man, both the intellectuall of Angels, the sensitiue of Beasts, and the proper rationall belonging vnto man: and therefore (saith GREGORY NAZIANZEN) Homo est vtriusq; naturæ vinculum, Man is the bond and chaine which tyeth together both natures: and because in the little frame of mans body there is a representation of the Vniuersall, and (by allusion) a kinde of participation of all the parts there, therefore was man called Microcosmos, or the little World. Deus igitur hominem factum, velut alterum quendam mundum,

*Indegenus durum sumus, experientisq; laborum,
Et documenta damus qua finis origine nati:*

From thence our kind hard-hearted is, enduring paine and care, Approoing, that our bodies of a stonie nature are.

His blood, which disperseth it selfe by the branches of veines through all the body, may be resembled to those waters, which are carried by Brookes and Riueres ouer all the Earth; his breath to the Aire, his naturall heate to the inclosed warmth which the Earth hath in it selfe, which stirred vp by the heate of the Sunne, assisteth Nature in the speedier procreation of those varieties, which the Earth bringeth forth; Our radicall moisture, Oyle, or Balsamum (whereon the naturall heate feedeth and is maintained) is resembled to the fat and fertilitye of the Earth; the haire of mans bodie, which addorne or ouer-shadowes it, to the grasse, which couereth the vpper face and skin of the Earth; our generative power, to Nature, which produceth all things; our determinations, to the light, wandering & vntable clouds, carried euery where with vncertaine winds; our eyes, to the light of the Sun and Moone; and the beautie of our youth, to the flowers of the Spring; which, either in a very short time, or with the Sunnes heat, fly vp, and wither away, or the fierce puffs of winde blow them from the stalkes; the thoughts of our mind, to the motion of Angels; and our pure vnderstanding (formerly called Mens, and that which alwayes looketh vpwards) to those intellectuall natures, which are alwayes present with God; and lastly our immortal soules (while they are righteous) are by God himselfe beautified with the title of his owne image and similitude. And although, in respect of God, there is no man iust, or good, or righteous: for in Angels deprehenſa est stultitia, Behold, hee found folly in his Angels (saith Job) yet with such a kind of difference, as there is betweene the substance and the shadow, there may be found a goodnesse in man: which God being pleased to accept, hath therefore called man, the image and similitude of his owne righteouſnesse. In this also is the little World of man compared, and made more like the vniuersall (man being the measure of all things; Homo est mensura omnium rerum, saith Aristotle and Pythagoras) that the foure Complexions resemble the foure Elements, and the seuen Ages of man the seuen Planets: Whereof our Infancie is compared to the Moone, in which wee seeme onely to liue and grow, as Plants; the second Age to Mercurie, wherein wee are taught and instructed; our third Age to Venus, the dayes of Loue, Desire, and Vanitie; the fourth to the Sunne, the strong, flourishing, and beautifull age of mans life; the fifth to Mars, in which wee seeke honour and victorie, and in which our thoughts trauaile to ambitious ends; the sixth Age is ascribed to Iupiter, in which we beginne to take account of our times, iudge of our felues, and grow to the perfection of our vnderstanding; the last and seuenth to Saturne, wherein our dayes are sad and ouer-cast, and in which we find by deate and lamentable experience, & by the losse which can neuer be repaired, that of all our vaine passions and affections past, the sorrow only abideth: Our attendants are sicknesses, and variable infirmities, and by how much the more wee are accompanied with plenty, by so much the more greedily is our end desired, whom when the Time hath made vnfoeable to others, we become a burthen to our felues: being of no other vse, than to hold the riches we haue, from our Successors. In this time it is, when (as aforesaid) we, for the most part, and neuer before, prepare for our eternall habitation, which we passe on vnto, with many sighes, grones, and sad thoughts, and in the end, by the workmanship of death, finish the sorrowfull businesse of a wretched life, towards which we alwayes trauel both sleeping and waking: neither haue those beloued companions of honor & riches any power at all, to hold vs any one day, by the glorious promise of entertainments; but by what crooked path soeuer we walk, the same leadeth on directly to the house of death; whose doores lye open at all houres, and to all persons. For this tyde of mans life, after it once turneth and declineth, euerrunneth with a perpetuall Ebbe and falling Stream, but neuer floweth againe: our Lease once fallen, springeth no more,

neither doth the Sunne or the Summer adorne vs againe, with the garments of new Leanes and Flowers.

For if there were any bayting place, or rest, in the course or race of mans life, then according to the doctrine of the Academicks, the same might also perpetually be maintained; but as there is a continuance of motion in naturall liuing things, and as the sap and iuyce, wherein the life of Plants is preserued, doth euermore ascend or descend: so is it with the life of man, which is alwayes either increasing towards ripenesse and perfection, or declining and decreasing towards rottennesse and dissolution.

§. VI.

Of the free power, which man had in his first Creation, to dispose of himselfe.

These be the miseries which our first Parents brought on all Mankind, vnto whom God in his creation gave a free and vnconstrained will, and on whom he bestowed the liberall choice of all things, with one onely prohibition, to try his gratitude and obedience. God set before him, a mortall and immortal Life, a nature celestiall and terrene, and (indeed) God gaue man to himselfe, to bee his owne Guide, his owne Workeman, and his owne Painter; that hee might frame or describe vnto himselfe what hee pleased, and make election of his owne forme: God made man in the beginning (saith SIRACIDES) and left him in the hands of his own counsaile. Such was the liberalitie of God, and mans felicitie: whereas beasts, and all other creatures reasonlesse, brought with them into the World (saith Lucilius) and that even when they first fell from the bodies of their Damis, the nature, which they could not exchange, and the supernall Spirits or Angels were from the beginning, or soone after, of that condition, in which they remaine in perpetuall eternitie. But (as aforesaid) God gaue vnto man all kind of Seeds & Grafts of life (to wit) the vegetatiue life of Plants, the sensuall of Beasts, the rationall of Man, and the intellectuall of Angels, whereof which soeuer he took pleasure to plant and cultivate, the same should surely grow in him, and bring forth fruit, agreeable to his owne choice and plantation. This freedom of the first man Adam, and our first Father, was enigmatically described by Aesclepius Mithras pienter (saith Mirandula) in the person and fable of Proteus, who was said, as often as he pleased, to change his shape. To the same end were all those celebrated Metamorphoses among the Pythagorians, and ancient Poets, wherein it was fained, that men were transformed into diuers shapes of beasts, thereby to shew the change of mans conditions, from Reason to Brutallitie, from Vertue to Vice, from Meeknesse to Crueltye, and from Iustice to Oppression. For by the liuely Image of other creatures did those Ancients represent the variable passions, and affections of mortall men; as by Serpents were signified Deceiters; by Lions, Oppressors, and cruell men; by Swine, Men giuen ouer to lust and sensualitye; by Wolves, rauening, and greedie Men; which also S. Matthew resembleth to false prophets, which come to you in sheeps clothing, but inwardly they are rauening wolves: by the Images of Stones and Rocks, foolish and ignorant Men; by Vipers, yngratefull Men: of which S. Iohn Baptist, O ye Generation Math. 3. 7.

Of Gods ceasing to create any more: and of the cause thereof, because the former fall ordered was exceeding good.

IN this worke of Man, God finished the Creation; not that God laboured as a man, and therefore rested; for God commanded, and it was finished, Qui voluisse est fecisse; What hee willed is made, saith Beda. Neither did God rest, that hee left the World made, and the creatures therein to themselves: for my Father worketh now his day, saith Christ, and I worke; but God rested (that is) he created no new species or kinds of creatures, but as before said, gave unto man a power gentler title, and to the rest of living creatures, and to Plants and Flowers their feeds in themselves; and commanded man to multiply and fill the Earth, and the Earth and Sea to bring forth creatures according to their severall kinds: all which being finished, God saw that his works were good, nor that hee knew nor, and comprehended not the beginning and end before they were; for God made every Plant of the field before it was in the Earth, but he gave to all things which hee had created the name of good, thereby to teach men, that from this good a God there was nothing made, but that which was perfect good and from whole simple puritie and from so excellent a cause, there could proceed no impure or imperfect effect; for man having a free will and liberal choice, purchased by disobedience his owne death and mortalitye, and for the crueltie of mans heart, was the Earth afterward cursed, and all creatures of the first Age destroyed: but the righteous man Noah and his Family, with those creatures which the Arke contained, referred by God to replenish the Earth.

CHAPTER III

Of the place of Paradise.

That the case of Paradise is greatly mistaken: and that it is no marvel that men should erre.

 Concerning the first Habitation of man, we read, that the Lord God planted a Garden Eastward in Eden, and there he put the man whom he made.
GEN. 2. 8. Of this seat or place of Paradise, all Ages have held dispute, and the opinions and judgements haue bene in effect as diuers, among those that haue written vpon this part of Genesis, as vpon any one place therein seeming most obscure: Some there are, that haue conceived the being of the terrestriall Paradise, without all regard of the Worlds Geographicalle; and without any respect of East and West, or any consideration of the place where Moyses wrote, and from whence he directed by the quarters of the Heauens the way how to find our admiration in what Region of the World this Garden was by God planted; wherein hee, was exceedingly reuerend and precise. Others, by being themselves ignorant in the Hebrew, followed the first Interpretation, or trusting to their owne iudgements, vn-derstood one place for another, and one Error is so fruitful, as it begeth a thousand Children: If the licentiousnesse thereof bee not timely repressed. And thirdly, those Writers which gaue themselves to follow and imitate others, were in all things so obedient Sectariours of those Masters, whom they admired and beleeued in, as they thought it safer to condemn their owne Vnderstanding, than to examine theirs.
For thus Psalms, in his Epistle of Paradise Magni erroris machinam uideramus: acclorare bellum transmutamus. Et de quo men habemus, etiam si non sit the authoritie of orearment led and perverted. And yet true, that many of the Fathers were farre wide from the vnderstanding of this place. I take it not, that I my self dare presume to censure them, for I reverence both their learning and their Pietie; And yet hot bound to follow them any further, than they are guided by truth: for they were men, et humanum est errare. And to the end that no man should bee proude of himselfe, God hath distributed vnto men such a proportion of knowledge, as the wisest may behold in themselves their owne weakenesse:

Nihil unquam dedis omnia Deus; God never gave the knowledge of all things to any one. Saint Paul confesse that hee knew not, whether he were taken vp into that iudgement heauen in the flesh, or out of the flesh; and Christ himselfe acknowledged thus much, that neither Men, nor Angels knew of the latter day; and therefore, seeing knowledge is infinite, it is God (according to S. Iude) who is only wise. Sapientia ubi inuenitur? (saith I O B) but where is wiselome found? and where is the place of understanding? man knoweth not the price thereof, for it is not found in the Land of the living. And therefore seeing God was found folly in his Angels, mens iudgements (which inhabite in houses of clay) cannot be without their mistakings: and so the Fathers, and other learned men, excusable in particulars, especially in those whereupon our saluation dependeth not.

§. II.

A recitall of strange opinions, touching Paradise.

NOW touching Paradise, first it is to bee inquired, whether there were a Paradise, or no? or whether Moses description were altogether mysticall, & allegoricall: as Origen, Philo, Fran. Georgius, with others haue affirmed; and that vnder the names of those foure Riuer, Pison, Gehon, Hiddekel, and Perath, the tree of life, and the tree of Knowledge, there were deliuered vnto vs other mysteries and significations; as, 20 that by the foure Riuer were meant the foure Cardinal vertues, Iustice, Temperance, Fortitude, and Prudence, or (by other) Oyle, Wine, Milke, and Hony. This Allegoricall vnderstanding of Paradise by Origen diuulged, was againe by Franciscus Georgius receiued (saith Sextus Senensis) whose friuolous imaginations Sextus himselfe doth fully and learnedly answer, in the 34. Annotation of his fift Booke. fol. 338 the last Edition.

30 S. Ambrose also leaned wholly to the Allegorical construction, and let Paradise in the third Heauen, and in the vertues of the minde, & in nostra principali, which is, as I conceiue it, in mente, or in our soules: to the particulars whereof he alludeth in this sort. By the place or garden of Paradise, was meant the soule or minde; by Adam, Mens, or Understanding; by Eue, the Senſe; by the Serpent, Delectation; by the Tree of good and euill, Sapience; and by the rest of the Trees, the vertues of the minde, or in the minde planted, or from thence springing. Notwithstanding all which, vpon the first of the Corinth, cap. 6. he in direct words alloweth both of a celeſtiall and terrestriall Paradise; the one, into which S. Paul was rapt; the other, into which Adam was put by God. Aug. Chrysostomensis was of opinion, that a Paradise had beene, but that there was not now any make thereof on the earth: the same being not only defaced, but withall the places how not so much as existing. To which Luther seemeth to adhere.

The Manichees also vnderstood, that by Paradise was meant the whole Earth; to which opinion, Adrianus inclineth. As I conceiue his words in two seuerall places. First, vpon this: Fill the earth; GEN. 10. Of which he giueth this iudgement. Hoc ipso etiam 40 *quod dixit, Replete terram, dominamini vniuersi animantibus, subijcite terram, clarissime docet, totam terram extantem, & omniuentis (ut sumerat) fructibus constam, sedem & horum illum Adæ, & posteritatis future fuisse; The words (saith he) in which God said, Bring forth fruites and multiply, and fill the earth, and subdue it, and rule ouer every creature, doe cleerely shew, that the vniuersall earth set or filled with all sorts of fruites (as then it was) was the garden and seate of A D A M, and of his future posteritie. And afterward hee acknowledged the place, out of the Acts, Cap. 17. Apothlos ex vno sanguine omne genus humanum 100 ad eam locum docet, ut habitarent super vniuersam faciem terre: tota igitur terra Paradisus illi erat; The Apostle (saith he) teacheth, that God hath made of one blood all mankind, to dwell ouer all the face of the earth: and therefore all the earth (saith hee) was that Paradise. Which coniectures I will answer in order. Goropius Becanus differeth not much from this opinion, but yet hee acknowledgeth that Adam was first planted by God in one certaine place, and peculiar garden; which place Goropius findeth nere the River of Accefines, in the confines of India.*

Tertullian, Bonaventure, and Durandus, make Paradise vnder the Equinoctiall, and Pastellus, quite contrary, vnder the North pole: the Chaldeans also for the most part, Bay. 15. 126. and all their Sectators, followed the opinion of Origen, or rather Origen theirs, who would either make Paradise a figure, or Sacrament only, or else would haue it seated out of this sensible world, or raised into some high and remote Region of the Aire. Strabus. and Rabanus, were both sicke of this vanitie, with Origen, and Philo: so was our venerable Beda, and Pet. Comestor, and Moses Barcephas the Syrian, translated by Masius. But as Hopkins saies of Philo Iudeus, that hee wooed, Quo malogenio afflatus; By what euill Angell he was bloune up into this error: so can I not but greatly maruaile at the learned men, who so grossely & blindly wandred; seeing Moses, and after him the Prophets, do so plainly describe this place, by the Region in which it was planted, by the kingdomes and prouinces bordering it, by the Riuers which watered it, and by the points of the Compasse vpon which it lay, in respect of Iudæa, or Canaan.

Nouiomagus also, vpon Bela, De natura rerum, beleueeth that all the earth was taken for Paradise, and not any one place. For the whole earth (saith he) hath the same beauty adscribed to Paradise. He addeth, that the Ocean was that fountaine, from whence the foure Riuers, Pison, Gehon, Tigris, and Euphrates, had their beginning: for he could not thinke it possible, that these Riuers of Ganges, Nilus, Tigris, and Euphrates, (whereof the one ranne through India, the other through Egypt, and the other through Mesopotamia and Armenia) could rise out of one fountaine, were it not out of the Fountaine of the Ocean.

S. III.

That there was a true locall Paradise Eastward, in the Countrey of Eden.

Gen. cap. 3.

TO the first therefore, that such a place there was vpon the earth, the wordes of Moses make it manifest, where it is written, And the Lord God planted a garden Eastward in Eden, and there hee put the man whom hee had made. And howloer the vulgar translation, called Hieromes translation, hath conuerted this place thus, Plantauit Dominus Deus Paradisum voluptatis à principio; The Lord God planted a Paradise of pleasure from the beginning, putting the word (pleasure) for Eden, and (from the beginning) for Eastward: it is manifest, that in this place Eden is the proper name of a Region. For what sense hath this translation (saith our Hopkins, in his Treatise of Paradise) that hee planted a garden in pleasure, or that a Riuer went out of pleasure to water the garden? But the seuerall Interpreters call it Paradisum Edenis, the Paradise of Eden, and so doth the Chaldaean Paraphrast truly take it for the proper name of a place, and for a Nounne appellatiue; which Region, in respect of the fertilitye of the soyle, of the many beautifull Riuers, and goodly Woods, and that the trees (as in the Indies) doe alwaies keepe their leaues, was called Eden, which signifieth in the Hebrew, pleasantnesse, or delicacie, as the Spaniards call the Countrey, opposite to the Ile of Cuba, Florida: and this is the mistaking, which may end the dispute, as touching the double sense of the word, that as Florida was a Countrey, so called for the flourishing beauty thereof, so was Eden a Region called pleasure, or delicacie, for its pleasure, or delicacy: and as Florida signifieth flourishing, so Eden signifieth pleasure: & yet both are the proper names of Countreys; for Eden being the proper name of a Region (called pleasure in the Hebrew) and Paradise being the choice seate of all that Region, Paradise was truly the Garden of Eden, and truly the Garden of pleasure.

Now, for Eastward, to translate it, from the beginning, it is also contrary to the translation of the Seuenty; to the ancient Greeke Fathers, as Basil, Chrysostome, Theodoret, Gregorie, and to the Rabines, as Ramban, Rabbi Salomon, R. Abraham, and Chimehi; and to the Latines, Senecius, Damasceus, &c. who plainly take Eden for the proper name of a Region, and set the word (Eastward) for ab initio: for Damasceus owne wordes are these, Paradisus est locus Dei manibus in Eden ad Orientem mirabiliter confusus; Paradise is a place maruailously planted by the hands of God, in Eden, toward the East.

And after all these Fathers, Guilhelmus Parisiensis, a great learned man, and Sixtus Senensis, of later times, doe both vnderstand these wordes of Eden, and of the East, contrary to the vulgar translation; Parisiensis, as indifferent to both, and Sixtus Senensis, directly against the vulgar: of which these are their owne wordes: After this I will begin to speake of Paradise terrestriall, which God planted from the beginning, or Eastward, &c. Post hec incipiam loqui de Paradiso terrestri, quem plantasse Deum ab initio vel ad Orientem, &c. And then Senensis; Moses enim clarissime prodit, Paradisum à Deo confusum in regione terre Orientalis, quæ dicitur Heden: Heden autem esse proprium nomen apparet ex quo capite Gen. ubi legitur C H A M habitasse ad Orientalem plagam Heden; For Moses (saith (saith he) doth shew most cleerely, that Paradise was planted of God in a Region of the East Countrey, which is called Heden: but that Heden is a proper name, it appeareth by the fourth Chapter of Genesis, where we reade, that C H A M dwelt on the East border of Heden. PERRINVS endeuoureth to qualifie this translation: for this particel (saith he) ab initio, is referred to all the time of the creation, and not to the very first day; alleging this place of Christ, that although the Deuill was said to be a man-slayer from the beginning, yet that was meant but after the sixth day. But surely, as I thinke (referring my selfe to better iudgement) the Deuill was from the instant of his fall a man-slayer in disposition, though he had not whereon to practise till mans creation. And for conclusion, S. Hierome (if that bee his translation) aduileth himselfe better in the end of the third Chapter of Genesis, conuerting the word (Eden) by (ante) and not (à principio) as, God did set a Cherubin before the Garden of Eden; Collocauit Deus ante Paradisum voluptatis Cherubin; and Pererius himselfe acknowledgeth, that this is the true sense of this place, precisely taken, according to the Hebrew. Posuit à parte Orientali horti Heden, Cherubin; Hec sit on the East-side of the Garden of Heden, Cherubin. BECANVS affirmeth, that the Hebrew word (Be) signifieth (with) as well as (in) and so the Text beareth this sense; That God planted a Garden with pleasure (that is to say) full of pleasure. But BECANVS followeth this construction, onely to the end, to finde Paradise vpon the Riuer of Acesines: for there he hath heard of the Indian Fig-tree in great abundance, which hee supposeth to be the tree of Knowledge of good and euill, and would therefore draw Paradise to the Fig-tree: which conceit of his I will answer hereafter.

Now, because Paradise was feated by Moses toward the East, thence came the custome of praying towards the East, and not by imitation of the Chaldaeans: and therefore all our Churches are built East and West, as to the point where the Sun riseth in March, which is directly ouer Paradise (saith Damasceus): affirming, that wee alwaies pray towards the East, as looking towards Paradise, whence wee were cast out; and yet the Temple of Salomon had their Priests and Sacrifices, which turned themselves in their seruice and diuine ceremonies, alwaies towards the West, thereby to auoide the superstition of the Egyptians and Chaldaeans.

But because East and West are but in respect of places; (for although Paradise were East from Iudæa, yet it was West from Persia) and the seruing of God is euery where in the world, the matter is not great which way we turne our faces, so our hearts stand right, other than this, that we who dwell West from Paradise, and pray turning our selues towards the East, may remember thereby to beseech God, that as by Adams fall we haue lost the Paradise on earth; so by Christs death and passion wee may be made partakers of the Paradise celestially, & the Kingdom of heauen. To conclude, I conceiue, that there was no other mysterie in adding the word (East) to Eden by Moses, than to shew, that the Region of Eden, in which Paradise vvas, lay Eastward from Iudæa and Canaan: for the Scriptures alwaies called the people of those Nations, the Sonnes of the East, vvhich inhabited Arabia, Mesopotamia, Chaldaea, and Persia: of which Ouid.

Eurus ad Kurotam, Nabataeque regna recessit;

Persidaq; radijs tuga subdita matutini.

The East winde with Aurora hath abiding Amongst the Arabians, and the Persian Hills, Whom the Sun first salutes at his vp-rising.

And if it bee objected, that Hiermy the Prophet threatening the destruction of Hierusalem, doth often make mention of Northerne Nations, it is to bee noted, that the North is there named, in respect of those nations that followed Nabuchodonosor, and of vvhom the greatest part of his Army was compounded; not that Babylon it selfe stood North from Hierusalem, though inclining from the East towards the North.

Now to the difference of this Translation, Peter Comestor giueth best satisfaction: for he vseth the word, From the beginning, that is, from the first part of the World, (à principio) id est, (saith hee) à prima orbis parte; and afterward hee affirmeth, that à principio, and ad Orientem, haue the same signification, From the beginning & Eastward is all one, à principio idem est quod ad Orientem.

But to returne to the prooffe of this place, and that this Story of Mankind was not Allegoricall, it followeth in the Text of the 2. Chap. & 9. Verse, in these wordes: For out of the ground made the Lord God to grow every Tree pleasant to the sight, and good for meate, &c. so as first it appeared that God created Adam elsewhere, as in the World at large, and then put him into the Garden: and the end why, is exprest: that he might dress it and keepe

keepe it: Paradise being a Garden or Orchard filled with Plants, and Trees, of the most excellent kinds, pleasant to behold, and (withall) good for meate: which proueth that Paradise was a terrestrialall Garden, garnished with Fruits, delighting both the eye and taste. And to make it more plaine, and to take away all opinion of Allegoricall construction, he affirmeth that it was watered and beautified with a Riuer, expressing also the Region, out of which this Riuer sprang, which hee calleth Heden; and that Heden is also a Countrey neere vnto Charan in Melopotamia, Ezechiel witnesseth.

But to all these Cabalists, which draw the Truth and Storie of the Scriptures into Allegories, Epiphanius answereth in these wordes: Si Paradysus non est sensibilibus, non est etiam fons, si non est fons, non est flumen, si non est flumen, non sunt quatuor principia, non Pison, non Gehon, non Tigris, nec Euphrates, non est ficus, non folia, non commeditur E. v. a. de arboribus, non est A. D. M., non sunt homines, sed veritas tam fabula est, et omnia ad Allegorias reuocantur: ut si Paradysus non sit sensibilibus, then there was no fountainne, and then no river, if no river, then no such foure heads or branches, and then not any such river as Pison, or Gehon, Tigris, or Euphrates, no such fige-tree, or fruit, or leaues, E. v. then did not eat of the fruit, neither was there any A. D. M., or any man, the truth was but a fable, and all things esteemed are called backe into Allegories. Wordes to the same effect hath S. Hierome vpon DANIEL: Contiscent eorum deliramenta, qui umbras & imagines in veritate sequuntur, ipsam canuntur euertere veritatem, ut Paradysum & flumina, & arbores putent allegoria Logibus sedebere submergere; Let the dotage of them bee silent, who following shadows and images in the Truth, endeavour to subvert the Truth it selfe, and thinke that they ought to bring Paradys, and the Rivers and the Trees vnder the Rules of Allegorie.

Furthermore, by the continuation and order of the Storie is the place made more manifest. For, God gave Adam free libertie to eate of every Tree of the Garden, (the Tree of knowledge excepted) which Trees Moses in the ninth verse saith that they were good to eat; meaning the fruit which they bare. Besides, God left all beaſts to Adam to be named, which hee had formerly made; and theſe beaſts were neither in the third Heauen, nor neere the Circle of the Moone, nor beaſts in imagination: for if all theſe things were Enigmatically or Myſtically, the ſame might alſo be ſaid of the creation of all things. And Ezechiel, ſpeaking of the glory of the Aſſyrian Kings, ſaith this ſpeech: All the Trees of Eden, which were in the Garden of God, enuied him; which proueth both Eden, and Paradiſe therein ſeated, to be terreftriall: for the Prophets made no imaginary comparifons. But Moses wrote plainly, and in a ſimple ſtile, fit for the capacities of ignorant men, and hee was more large and precise in the deſcription of Paradiſe, than in any other place of Scripture; of purpoſe to take away all ſcruple from the incredulitie of ſuſe ages, whom he knew (out of the gift of Prophecie) to be apt to fabulous inuentions, and that if hee had not deſcribed both the Region and the Riuer, and how it ſtood from Canaan, many of the vnbeleeuing Iſraelites and others after them, would haue miſconſtrued this Storie of Mankind. And is it likely, there would haue been ſo often mention made of Paradiſe in the Scriptures, if the ſame had beene an Vtopia? For we finde that the Valley, wherein Sodome and Gomorrah ſtood, (ſometimes called Pentapolis, of the five principall Cities therein) was before the deſtruction (which their vnnatural finne purchaſed) compared to the Paradiſe of the Lord, and like to the Land of Egypt toward Zoar: In like manner was Iſrael reſembled to the Paradiſe of Gon, before the Babylonians waſted it: which proueth plainly, that Paradiſe it ſelfe exceeded in beauty and fertility, and that theſe places had but a reſemblance thereof: being compared to a feate and ſoyle of farre exceeding excellency.

Belides, whence had Homer his invention of Alcinous Gardens, as Inflin Martyr noteth, but out of Moses his description of Paradise? Gen. 2. and whence are their praises of the Elizian fields, but out of the storie of Paradise? to which also appertaineth those Verses of the Golden Age in Ovid:

Oxid-Metam. 1.8

Ver erat æternum, placidique tentibus auris

Mulcebant Zephyri natos sine semine flores.

The ioyfull Spring did euer last,
And Zephyrus did breede Sweete flowers by his gentle blast,
Without the helpe of seed.

And it is manifest, that Orpheus, Linus, Pindarus, Hesiodus, and Homer, and after him, Ovid, one out of another, and all these together with Pythagoras and Plato, and their

Sectatours, did greatly enrich their inventions, by venting the stolne Treasures of Diuine Letters, altered by prophane additions, and disguised by poetical connexions, as if they had bin conceived out of their owne speculations and contemplations:

But besides all these testimonies, if we find what Region Heden or Eden was; if we proue the Riuer that ran out of it, and that the same afterwards was diuided into four branches; together with the Kingdomes of Hanila and Cush, and that all these lay Eastward from Canaan, or the Deserts of the Amorites, where Moses wrote; I then conceiue that there is no man that will doubt, but that such a place there was: And yet I doe not exclude the Allegoricall sense of the Scripture; for as well in this there were many figures of Christ, as in all the old Testament throughout: the storie being directly true notwithstanding. And to this purpose (saith Saint Augustine) Tres sunt de Paradiso generales sententia: una est eorum, qui tantummodo corporaliter Paradisum intelligi volunt: alia eorum, qui spiritualiter tantum (id est) Ecclesiam: tertia eorum, qui utroque modo Paradisum accipiunt; (that is) There are three opinions of Paradise: the one of those men, which will haue it altogether corporall: a second of those, which conceiue it altogether spirituall, and to be a figure of the Church: the third of those which take it in both senses; which third opinion S. Augustine approbeth, and of which Suidas giueth this allowable iudgement: Quemadmodum homo consiliis, & intelligibilibus simul conditus erat: sic & huius sanctissimum nomen, sensibile simul & intelligibile, & dupliciter esse praeditum;
(that is) As man was created at one time both sensible and intelligible: so was this holy Grove or Garden to be taken both wayes, and ended with a double forme.

§. IV.

why it should be needfull to intygate diligently of the place of Paradise.

BUt it may be objected, that it is needlesse, and a kind of curiositie to enquire so diligently after this place of Paradise; and that the knowledge thereof is of little or no vse. To which I answer, that there is nothing written in the Scripture, but for our instruction; and if the truth of the Storie be necessarie, then by the place proued, the same is also made more apparent. For if wee should conceiue that Paradise were not on the Earth, but lifted vp as high as the Moone; as that it were beyond all the Ocean, and in no part of the knowne World, from whence Adam was said to wade through the Sea; & thence to haue come into Indes, (out of doubt) there would be few men in the World, that would giue any credit vnto it. For what could seeme more ridiculous, than the report of such a place? and besides, what maketh this feat of Paradise to much disputed and doubted of, but the conceit that Fishe should be dinges, which waereth the East India, and Gehon, Nilus, which enricheth Egypt, and these two Riuers to farre distant, as if except all the World were Paradise; these Streames can no way be comprized therein.

Secondly, if the birth and works, and death of our Saviour, were said to have been 40 in some such Country, of which no man ever heard tell, and that his Miracles had bin performed in the Ayre, or no place certainly knowne: I assure my selfe, that the Christian Religion would have taken but a slender roote in the mindes of men: for times and places are approved witnesses of worldly actions.

Thirdly, if we should rely, or give place to the judgement of some Writers upon this place of Heaven (though otherwise for their doctrine in general, they are worthy of honour & reverence) I say that there is no habitable among the Grecians or Egyptians more ridiculous; for who would beleave that there were a piece of the World to fly by it selfe & separated as to hang in the Aire vnder the dike of the Moone, or who so doth think to conceiue, that from thence the foure riuers of Ganges, Nilus, Euphrates, and Tygris, should fall downe, and run vnder all the Ocean, and rise againe in this habitable world again those places where they are now found? Whence any man thinke, that I enforce or layne to the worst place are Perse Comestors own words: Effantem locus amoenissimus, longaterna & maris traditissima habitalibus Zona Persici, adde leuissus, vsq. ad humeros columbatentis, etc. (that is) It is a most pleasant place, covered from your habitable Zone by a long tract of land & sea, adorned with trees, springs and fountains, &c. I say

And Moses Barcephas upon this place writeth in this manner: Deus hoc quoq[ue] responsum Barcephas conuervoluntatem For ad idum in quo sublimare positum effertur: ad hoc nosse ceteris terris conuer-sed by the us.

ut illinc per precipitum delabantur suum tanto cum impetu, quantum verbum exprimeret non possunt, cui impetu impulsu pressu, sub Oceani vado rapinatur, unde rursus profusum ebulliant, in hoc a nobis culto orbe: which haue this sense: Furthermore (saith he) vegie this for an answer, that Paradise is set in a Region farre raised above this part which we inhabit; whereby it comes to passe, that from thence these Rivers fall downe with such a headlong violence, as words cannot expresse; and with that force so impulsed and prest, they are carried under the deepe Ocean, and doe againe rise and boyle up in this our habitable world: and to this he addeth the opinion of Ephram, which is this, Ephram dicit Paradisum ambire terram, atq; ultra Oceanum a possum esse, ut totum terrarum orbem ab omni circumdet regione, non aliter atq; Luna orbis Lunam cingit, (which is) That Paradise doth compass or embrace the whole Earth, and is so set beyond the Ocean Sea, as it enuironeth the whole Orbe of the Earth on every side, as the Orbe of the Moone doth embrace the Moone. To the end therefore that these ridiculous expositions and opinions doe not bring question vnto Truth it selfe, or make the same subiect to doubts or disputes, it is necessarie to discover the true place of Paradise, which God in his wisdom appointed in the very Nauell of this our World, and (as Melancthon saies) in parte terra meliore, in the best part thereof, that from thence, as from a Centre, the Vniuersall might be filled with people and planted; and by knowing this place, we shall the better iudge of the beginning of Nations, & of the worlds inhabitation: for neere vnto this did the Sons of Noah also disperse themselves after the flood, into all other remote regions & countries. And if it be a generous desire in men, to know from whence their owne forefathers haue come, and out of what regions and Nations, it cannot be displeasing to vnderstand the place of our first Ancestor, from whence all the streames and branches of Mankind haue followed & bin deduced. If then it doe appeare by the former, that such a place there was as Paradise, and that the knowledge of this place cannot be vnprofitable, it followeth in order to examine several opinions before remembered, by the Truth it selfe, & to see how they agree with the sense of the Scripture, and with common reason, and afterward to proue directly, and to delineate the Region in which God first planted this delightfull Garden.

§. V.

That the Flood hath not utterly defaced the markes of Paradise, nor caused Hills in the Earth.

ANd first, whereas it is supposed by Aug. Chrysostomus, that the Flood hath altered, deformed, or rather annihilated this place, in such sort, as no man can finde any marke or memorie thereof: (of which opinion there were others also, ascribing to the Flood the cause of those high Mountaines, which are found on all the Earth ouer, with many other strange effects) for mine owne opinion, I thinke neither the one nor the other to be true. For although I cannot deny, but that the face of Paradise was after the Flood withered, and growne old, in respect of the first beauty: (for both the ages of men, and the nature of all things Time hath changed) yet if there had beene no signe of any such place, or if the soile and seate had not remained, then would not Moses, who wrote of Paradise about 850. yeeres after the Flood, haue described it so particularly, and the Prophets long after Moses would not haue made so often mention thereof. And though the verie Garden it selfe were not then to be found, but that the Flood, and other accidents of time made it one common field and pasture with the Land of Eden, yet the place is still the same, and the Rivers still remaine the same Rivers. By two of which (neuer doubted of) to wit, Tygris, and Euphrates, we are sure to finde in what latitude Paradise lay; & learning out one of these Rivers, which afterward doth diuide it selfe into foure branches, wee are sure that the partition is at the very border of the Garden it selfe. For it is written, that out of Eden went a River to water the Garden, and from thence it was diuided and became into foure heads. Now whether the word in the Latine Trar (lation) (Inde) from thence, be referred to Eden it selfe, or to Paradise, yet the diuision & branching of those rivers must be in the North or South side of the very Garden (if the rivers run as they doe, North & South) and therefore these rivers yet remaining, & Eden manifestly known, there could be no such defacing by the flood, as is supposed. Furthermore, as there is no likelihood, that the place could be so altered as future ages knew it not, so is there no probability, that either these Rivers were turned out of their courses, or new waters created by the Flood which were not, or that the Flood (as before said) by a violent motion; when it began to decrease, was the cause of high Hills or drowne Vallies. For what descent of waters could there be in a Spherical and round bodie, where the top is in the highest hollow? seeing that all violent force of waters is stayed by the strength of winds; by descent from a higher to a lower, or by the ebbe or flood of the Seas. But that there was anie winde (whereby the Seas are most enlarged) it appeareth not; rather the contrarie is probable: for it is written, Therefore God made a wind to passe upon the Earth, and the waters ceased. So as it appaereth notwithstanding, that the waters staid, where there was this winde at all, but that God afterward, out of his goodness, caused the wind to blow, to drye vp the abundant slime and mudd of the Earth, and make the Land more firme, and to cleanse the Ayre of thicke vapours, and vntill some inists; and this we know by experience, that all downe-sight raines doe euermore disscuer the violence of outragious windes, and beat downe, and leuell the syelling and mountainous billow of the Sea: for anie ebbs and floods there could be none, when the waters were equall and of one height ouer all the face of the Earth, and which there were no draughts, Bayes, or Gulfs to receive a Flood, or any descent, or violent falling of waters in the round forme of the Earth and Waters, as before said: and therefore it seemeth most agreeable to reason, that the waters rather stood in a quiet calme, than that they moued with any raging or ouer-bearing violence. And for a more direct proue, that the Flood made no such destroying alteration, Ioseph auoweth that one of those pillars erected by Seth, the third from Adam, was to be seene in his dayes; which pillars were set vp about 1426. yeeres before the Flood, counting Seth to be an hundred years old at the creation of them; and Ioseph himselfe to haue liued some fortie or fiftie yeeres after Christ: of whom although there be no cause to beleecie all that hee wrote, yet that which hee auouched of his owne time, cannot (without great derogation) bee called in question. And therefore it may be possible, that some foundation or ruine thereof might then be seene. Now that such pillars were raised by Seth, all Antiquitie hath auoyced. It is also written in Ieremy (to whom although I giue little credite, yet I cannot condemne him in all) that the Citie of Enoch, built by Cain about the mountaines of Libanus, was not defaced by length of time: yea the ruines thereof Annius (who commented vpon that inuented fragment) saith, were to be seene in his dayes, who liued in the reigne of Perdinand and Isabella of Castile. And if these his words be not true, then was he exceeding impudent: for, speaking of this citie of Enoch, he concludeth in this sort: Cuius maxima & ingentis molu fundamenta visunt ut & uicatur ab incolis regionis, Cuius a Cain, & nostri mercatores, & peregrini referunt: The foundation of which huge Masse is now to be seene, and the place is called by the people of that Region, the Citie of Cain, as both our strangers and merchants report. It is also auowed by Pomponius Mela (to whom I giue more credite in these things) that the citie of Ioppa was built before the Flood, ouer which Cepha was King: whose name, with his brother Phineus, together with the grounds and principles of their Religion, was found grauen vpon certaine altars of stone. And it is not impossible, that the ruines of this other citie, called Enoch by Annius, might be seene, though founded in the first Age: but it could not be of the first citie of the world, built by Cain, the place rather than the time denying it.

And to proue directly that the Flood was not the cause of mountaines, but that there were mountaines from the creation, it is written, that the waters of the Flood ouerflowed by fiftene Cubits the highest Mountaines. And Masius Damascenus (speaking of the Flood, writeth in this manner: Est supra Minyadam excessus mans in Armenia (qui Baris appellatur) in quo conspicientes multos sermo est diluuii tempore liberatos. And vpon Minyada there is an high Mountaine in Armenia (called Baris) unto which it is said that many fled in the time of the Deluge, and that they saued themselves thereon. Now although it is contrarie to Gods Word, that any more were saued than eight persons, (which Masius doth not auouch, but by report) yet it is a testimonie, that such Mountaines were before the Flood, which were afterwards, and euer since, known by the same names; & on which Mountaines it is generally receiued that the Arke rested; but vnto us, as I shall proue hereafter. And againe it appeareth, that the Mount Sion (though by another name) was knowne before the Flood; on which the Thalmodists report, that many Giants saued themselves also; but, as Annius saith, without all authoritie eyther diuine or humane.

Lastly,

Gen. 8. 12. Lastly, it appeareth that the Flood did not turne vpside-downe the face of the Earth, as thereby it was made p^{er} knowledge; ^{Gen. 8. 12.} when Noah first out the Dore the second time, he returned with an Olive-lease in her mouth, which shee had pluckt, and which (until the Trees were discouered) shee found not; for otherwise she might haue found them floating on the water; a manifest prooofe, that the Trees were not torne vp by the routes, nor swamme vpon the waters, for it is written: saluum Olina, raptum non ascriptum, a lese pluckit, (which is) to take from a Tree, or to tear off. By this it is apparant, (there being nothing written to the contrary) that the Flood made no such alteration, as was supposed, but that the place of Paradise might be seene to succeeding Ages, especially vnto Moses, by whom it pleased God to teach the truth of the Worlds Creation, and vnto the Prophets which succeeded him: both which I take for my warrant, and to guide me in this Discouery.

S. VI.

That Paradise was not the whole Earth, as some haue thought: making the Ocean to bee the fountaine of those foure Riues.

Gen. 1. 18. Acts 17. 26. His conceit of Aug. Chrysostomus being answered, who onely giueth his opinion for reason, I will in a few words examine that of the Manichees, of Noëmagus, Vadianus, Goropius, Becanus, and all those that vnderstood, that by Paradise was meant the whole Earth. But in this I shall not trouble the Reader with many wordes, because by those places of Scripture formerly remembered, this Vniuersalitie will appere altogether improper. The places which Vadianus alleageth, Bring forth fruit and multiply, fill the Earth and subdue it, rule ouer every Creature, &c. with this of the Acts, and hath made of one blond all Mankind, to dwell on all the face of the Earth, doe no way proue such a generalitie: for the World was made for man, of which hee vvvas Lord and Gouernor, and all things therein were ordained of God for his vse. Now although all men vvvere of one and the same fountaine of bloud originally; and Adams posteritie inhabited in proceesse of time ouer all the face of the earth, yet it disproueth in nothing the particular Garden, assigned to Adam, to dresse and cultiue, in which hee liued in so blessed an estate before his transgression. For if there had bene no other choyce, but that Adam had bin left to the Vniuersall; Moses vvould not then haue said, Eastward in Eden, seeing the World hath nor East nor West, but respectiue. And to what end had the Angell of God bene set to keepe the East-side, and entrance into Paradise after Adams expulsion, if the Vniuersall had bene Paradise? for then must Adam haue bene chased also out of the World. For if All the earth vvvere Paradise, that place can receiue no better construction than this, That Adam vvvas driuen out of the World into the World, and out of Paradise into Paradise, except vvee should belecue vvith Metastorides, that there vvwere infinite Worlds. Which to deny, he thinks all one, as to affirme, That in so large a field, as the Vniuersall, there should grow but one Thistle. NOëMAGVS vpon Beda, seemeth to be led by this, that it vvvas vnpossible for those three Riues, Ganges, Nilus, and Euphrates (which vvater three portions of the World so far distant) to rise out of one Fountaine, except the Ocean bee taken for the Well, and the World for the Garden.

And it is true, that those foure Riues, being so vnderstood, there could bee no coniecture more probable, but it shall plainly appere, that Pison was fallie taken for Ganges, and Gehon fallie for Nilus, although Ganges be a Riuer by Haulah in India, & Nilus run through Ethiopia. The Senenys vvrite Chus for Ethiopia, and thereby the errors of the Manichees, and the mistakings of Noëmagus, Goropius, & Vadianus, vvith others, are made manifest. Yet was their coniecture faire more probable, than that of Ephrem, Cyrius, and Athanasius: That Paradise vvvas seated far beyond the Ocean Sea, and that Adam vvaded through it, and at last came toward the Country in vvwhich hee was created, and vvvas buried at Mount Caluery in Hierusalem. And certainly, though all those of the first Age vvvere of great stature, and so continued many yeres after the Flood, yet Adams shin-bones must haue contained a thousand fadome, and much more, if hee had foorded the Ocean; but this opinion is so ridiculous, as it needs no argument to disprove it.

Of their opinion which make Paradise as high as the Moone: and of others, which make it higher than the middle Region of the Ayre.

THirdly, whereas Beda saith, and as the Schoolemen affirme, Paradise to bee a place, altogether remoued from the knowledge of men (locus à cognitione hominum remotissimus) and Barcephas conceiued, that Paradise was farre in the East, but mounted aboue the Ocean, and all the Earth, and neere the Othe of the Moone (which opinion, though the Schoolemen charge Beda vvithall, yet Petrus layes it off from Beda vpon Strabus, and his Master Rabanus;) and whereas Rupertus, in his Geographic of Paradise, doth not much differ from the rest, but findes it seated next or neerest heauen; It may seeme, that all these borrowed this doctrine out of Plato, and Plato out of Socrates: but neither of them (as I conceiue) well vnderstood, who (vndoubtedly) tooke this place for Heauen it selfe, into which the Soules of the blessed vvwere carried after death.

True it is, that these Philosophers durst not for feare of the Acropagites (in this and many other diuine apprehensions) set downe what they beleueed in plaine termes, especially Plato: though Socrates in the end suffered death, for acknowledging one onely powerfull God; and therefore did the Duell himselfe doe him that right, as by an Oracle, to pronounce him the wisest man. Iustine Martyr affirmeth, that Plato had read the Scriptures; and St. Augustine gaue this iudgement of him as his opinion, that (few things changed) hee might be counted a Christian. And it seemeth to mee, that both Tertullian and Enochius conceiue, that Socrates, by that place aforesaid, meant the celestiall Paradise, and not this of Eden. Solinus I grant, reporteth, that there is a place exceeding delightfull and healthfull, vpon the top of Mount Atho (called Acrothones) which being aboue all Clouds of Raine, or other Intonouence, the people (by reason of their so many yeres) are called Macrobies (that is) Long-lived. A further Argument is vsed, for prooofe of the height of this place, because therein was Enoch preferred from the violence of the Floods: approved by Isidore, and Peter Lombard; in which place also Tertullian conceiued; that the blessed Soules were preferred into the last iudgement; which Trenans and Iustine Martyr also beleueed. But this opinion was of all Catholique Diuines reprobued, and in the Eleusine Councell damned; of which Saint Augustine more modestly gaue this iudgement: Sicut certum est, ENOCH & ELIAS nunc viuere: ita obuium sunt: non in Paradiso an alibi, incertum est; (that is) As it is certaine that ENOCH and ELIAS doe now liue: so vvhere they liue, in Paradise or elswhere, it is vncertaine. But Barcephas giues a third cause, though of all other the weakest. For (saith he) it was necessary that Paradise should be set at such a distance and height, because the foure Riues (had they not fallen so precipitate) could not haue had sufficient force to haue thrust themselves vnder the great Ocean, and afterward haue forced their passage through the earth, and haue risen againe in the farre distant Regions of India, Egypt, and Africa.

These strange fancies and dreames haue bene answered by diuers learned men long since, and lately by Hopkins, and Petrus, writing vpon this subiect; of whose arguments I will repeat these few: for to vse long discourse against those things, which are both against Scripture and Reason, might rightly bee iudged a vanity in the Answerer, not much inferior to that of the Inuenter.

It is first therefore alledged, that such a place cannot be commodious to liue in: for being set so neere the Moone, it had bene too neere the Sunne, and other heavenly bodies. Secondly, because it must haue bene too voynt a Neighbour to the Element of Fire. Thirdly, because the Ayre in that Region is so violently moued, and carried about vvith such swiftnesse, as nothing in that place can consist or haue abiding. Fourthly, because the place betwene the Earth and the Moone (according to Platonic and Afraganius) is seuentie times the Diameter of the Earth, which makes in a grosse account about one hundred and twenty thousand miles. Hereupon it must follow, that Paradise being raised to this height, must haue the compasse of the whole earth for a base and foundation: but had it bin so raised, it could hardly be hidden from the knowledge, or eyes of men: seeing it would deprive vs of the Sunnes light, all the fore-part of the day, being seated in the East, as they suppose. Now, to fortifie the former opinions, Tollasus addeth this, that those people which dwell neere those fairs of waters, are deafe from their infancy, like those which dwell neere the Catadupa, or ouer-falls of Nilus. But this I hold as fained. For I haue seen in the Indies, far greater water-falls, than those of Nilus, and yet the people dwelling neere them are not deafe at all. Tollasus (the better to strengthen himselfe) citeth Basil and Ambrōse together: to which Pererius, Sedagobus apud Basilium & Ambrōsium in coronā scriptis, que nunc extant, nusquam me legere memini; but I do not remember (saith he) that I neuer read those things, either in BASIL or AMBRŌSE.

But for the bodies of Enoch & Elias, God hath disposed of them according to his wisdom. Their taking up might be into the celestiall Paradise, for ought we know. For although flesh and blood, subiect to corruption, cannot inherit the Kingdome of heauen, and the seed must not in the ground before it grow, yet we shall not all die (saith S. Paul) but all shall be changed: which change, in Enoch & Elias, was easie to him that is Almighty. But for the rest, the Scriptures are manifest, that by the Flood all perished on the earth, (saying eight persons and therefore in the terrestriall Paradise they could not be.

For Tollasus his owne opinion, who soared not altogether so high as the rest, but beleued that Paradise was raised about the middle Region of the Aire, and twenty cubits about all Mountaines, that the Flood did not therefore reach it: (which Scotus and other later Schoole-men also beleued; for, say they, there were no sinners in Paradise, and therefore no cause to ouerwhelme it:) this is also contrary to the expresse letter of the Scripture: which directly, and without admitting of any distinction, teacheth vs, that the waters ouer-flowed all the mountaines vnder heauen. And were it otherwise, then might we aswell giue credit to Masius, Damascenus, & the Thalmudists, who affirme, that there were of the Giants that saued themselves on the Mountaine Baris, and on Sion. But to helpe this, Scotus, being (as the rest of the Schoolemen are) full of distinctions, saith; That the waters stood at Paradisus, as they did in the Red Sea, and at Jordan; and as the Flood was not naturall, so was Paradisus (saied by miracle. And Thomas Aquinas qualifieth this high conceit with this supposition, That it was not beleued, that Paradisus was so seared, as Neda and others seeme to affirme in words, but by Hyperbole and comparatively for the delicacie and beautie he resembled. But this I dare auow of all those Schoole-men, that though they were exceeding witty, yet they better teach all their Followers to shift, than to resolve by their distinctions. Wherefore not to stay long in answering this opinion of Tollasus, I confesse that it is written, that the Mountains of Olympus, Atho, and Atlas, ouer-reach and surmount all windes and clouds, and that (notwithstanding) there is found on the heads of the Hills both springs and fruits; and the Pagan Priests, sacrificing on these mountaine tops, do not find the ashes (remaining of their sacrifices) blowne thence, nor thence waite off by raines, when they returne: yet experience hath resolved vs, that these reports are fabulous, and Pliny himselfe (who was not sparing in the report of wonders) auoweth the contrary. But were it granted, yet the height of these Mountaines is far vnder the supposed place of Paradisus; and on these selfe Hills the ayre is so thin (saith S. Augustine, whom herein I mistrust) that it is not sufficient to beare vp the body of a bird, having therein no feeling of her wings, or any sensible resistance of ayre to mount her selfe by.

§. VIII.

Of their opinion that seate Paradisus vnder the Aequinoctiall: and of the pleasant habitation vnder those Climates.

Those which come neerer vnto Reason, finde Paradisus vnder the Aequinoctiall line, as Tertullian, Bonancutur, and Durandus: iudging, that thereunder might be found most pleasure, and the greatest fertility of soile: but against it Thomas Aquinas obiecteth the distemperate heat, which he supposeth to be in all places so directly vnder the Sunne; but this is (non causa pro causa) for although Paradisus could not bee vnder the Line, because Eden is farre from it, in which Paradisus was; & because there is no part of Euphrates, Tigris, or Ganges vnder it, (Ganges being one of the foure riuers, as they suppose) yet this conceit of distemper, (being but an old opinion) is found to be very vntrue, though for the coniecture not to bee condemned, considering the age when those Fathers wrote, grounded chiefly on this: that whereas

it appeared, that euerie Countrie, as it lay by degrees neerer the Tropick, and so toward the Aequinoctiall, did so much the more excede in heat: It was therefore a reasonable coniecture, that those Countries which were situated directly vnder it, were of a distemper vninhabitable: but it seemeth that Tertullian conceiued better, and so did Auicenne, for they both thought them habitable enough; and though (perchance) in those daies it might be thought a fantastical opinion (as all are which goe against the vulgar) yet we now find, that if there be any place vpon the earth of that nature, beautie, and delight that Paradisus had, the same must be found within that supposed vninhabitable burnt Zone, or within the Tropicks, and neere to the line it selfe. For hercof experience hath informed Reason, and Time hath made those things apparant, which were hidden and could not by any contemplation be discovered. Indeed it hath so pleased God to prouide for all liuing creatures, wherewith he hath filled the world, that such inconueniences which we contemplate a farr off, are found by triall and the witness of mens traualles, to be so qualified, as there is no portion of the earth made in vaine, or as a fruitlesse lump to fashion out the rest. For God himselfe (saith Isa. x) that formed the earth and made it, he hath prepared it, he created it not in vaine, he formed it to be inhabited. Now we finde that these hottest Regions of the world, seated vnder the Aequinoctiall line, or neere it, are so refreshed with a daily gale of Easternly winde (which the Spaniards call the Brize) that doth euermore blow strongest in the heate of the day, as the downe-right beames of the Sun cannot so much master it, that there is any inconuenience or distemperate heat found thereby. Secondly, the nights are so cold, fresh, and equall, by reason of the entire interposition of the earth, as (for those places which my selfe haue seen, neere the Line & vnder it) I know no other part of the world of better, or equall temper: Only there are some tracts, which by accident of high Mountaines are barr'd from this ayre and fresh wind, and some few sandie parts without trees, which are not therefore so well inhabited as the rest; and such difference of soiles we finde also in all other parts of the world. But (for the greatest part) those Regions haue so many goodly Riuers, Fountaines, and little Brookes, abundance of high Cedars, and other stately trees casting shade, to many sorts of delicate fruits, euier bearing, and at all times beautified with blossome and fruit both Greene and ripe, as it may of all other parts be best compared to the Paradisus of Eden: the boughes and branches are neuer vncliothed and left naked, their sap creepeth not vnder ground into the roote, fearing the injury of the frost: neither doth Pomona at any time despise her withered Husband Vernumnus, in his winter quarters and old age. Therefore are these Countries called Terra vitiosa, Vicious Countries: for Nature being liberrall to all without labour, necessitie imposing no industrie or trauell, idleness bringeth forth no other fruits than vaine thoughts, and licentious pleasures. So that to conclude this part, Tertullian and those of his opinion were not deceived in the nature of the place: but Aquinas, who misliked this opinion, and followed a worse. And (to say the truth) all the Schoolemen were grosse in this particular.

Of the change of the names of places: and that besides that Eden in Calestria, there is a Country in Babylon, once of this name, as is proued out of E. S. A. 37. and E. Z. E. C. 27.

These opinions answered, and the region of Eden not found in any of those imaginary vvorlds, nor vnder Torrida Zona; it followeth that now vve discover and find out the seat thereof, for in it vvvas Paradisus by God planted. The difficultie of vvhich search resteth chiefly in this, That as all Nations haue often changed names vvith their Masters; so are most of these places, by Moses remembered; forgotten by those names of all Historians and Geographers, as vvell ancient as moderne.

Besides, vve finde that the Affirians, Babylonians, Medes and Persians (Cyrus onely and a few other excepted) sought to extinguish the Hebrewes. The Grecians hated both their Nation and their Religion; and the Romans despised once to remember them in any of their Stories. And as those three Monarchies succeeded each other: so did they transforme the names of all those principall Places and Cities in the East: and after them, the Turke hath sought (vvhat he could) to extinguish in all things, the ancient memorie of those people; vvith which he hath subiected and intrahled.

Now

Now besides those notable markes, Euphrates and Tigris, the better to find the way which leadeth to the Country of Eden, we are to take for guides these two considerations (to wit) That it lay Eastward from Canaan and India; and that it was of all other the most beautifull and fertile. First then in respect of situation, the next Country to India Eastward was Arabia Petraea; but in this Region was Moses himselfe when he wrote; and the next vnto it Eastward also was Arabia the Desert, both which in respect of the infertility could not bee Eden, neither haue any of the Arabians any such Riuer, as are exprest to run out of it: So as it followeth of necessity, that Eden must be Eastward, and beyond both Arabia Petraea, and Deserta. But because Eden is by Moses named by it selfe, and by the fertility, & the riuer only described, we must seeke it in other Scriptures, and where it is by the additions of the neighbour Nations better described. In the Prophet Isay I find it coupled and accompanied with other adjacent Countries, in these words, spoken in the person of Senacherib by RASSAKEH: Haue the gods of the Nations deliuered them, which my Fathers haue destroyed, as GOSAN, and HARAN, & RESEPH, and the children of EDEN, which were at Telfassar? and in Ezechiel, where he prophesieth against the Tyrians: They of Haran, and Canneh, and Eden, the merchants of Sheba, Abur, and Chilmad, were thy merchants, &c.

But to auoid confusion, we must vnderstand that there were two Edens, one of which the Prophet Amos remembreth, where he diuideth Syria into three Prouinces, whereof, the first he maketh Syria Dmafene, or Decapoltan; the second part is that Valley called Auenis, otherwise Conualis, or the tract of Chamath, where Affria is ioyned to Arabia the Desert, & where Ptolomee placeth the City of Aueria: & the third is knowne by the name of Dannus Edenis, or Celestria, otherwise Vallis caua, or the hollow Valley, because the mountains of Libanus and Antilibanus, take all the length of it on both sides, and border it: for Cole in Greeke is Canaan Latine. But this is not that Eden, which we seeke: neither doth this Prouince ly East from Canaan, but North, and so ioyneth vnto it, as it could not be vnknewe to the Hebrewes. Yet, because there is a little Citie therein called Paradise, the Iewes beleued this Celestria to be the same which Moses describeth. For the same cause doth Hopkins in his Treatise of Paradise reprehend Beraudus, in that he confoundeth this Eden, with the other Eden of Paradise; though, to giue Beraudus his right, I conceiue that he led the way to Hopkins, and to all other later Writers, sauing, That hee sayled in distinguishing these two Regions, both called Eden: and that he altogether mis-vnderstood two of the foure Riuer (to wit) Pison and Gehon, as shall appeare hereafter. Now to finde out Eden, which (as Moses teacheth vs) lay Eastward from the Deserts, where he wrote, after he had passed the Red Sea, we must consider where those other Countries are found, which the Prophet Isay and Ezechiel ioyneth with it. For (saith ESAYAH) Gosan, Haran, and Reseph, and the children of Eden, which were at Telfassar. Also Ezechiel ioyneth Haran with Eden, who, together with those of Sheba, Abur, and Chilmad, were the Merchants that traded with the Citie of Tyre, which was then (saith EZECHIEL) the Mart of the people for many Isles. And it hath euer beene the custome, that the Persians conueyed their Merchandise to Babylon, and to those Cities vpon Euphrates, and Tigris, and from thence transported them into Syria, now Soria, and to the Port of the Mediterranean Sea: as in ancient times to the Citie of Tyre, afterward to Tripoly, and now to Aleppo, from whence they imbarque them at the Port of Alexandretta, in the Bay of Issius, now Liazzo. Ezechiel in the description of the magnificence of Tyre, and of the exceeding trade that it had with all the Nations of the East, as the onely Mart-towne of that part of the world, reciteth both the people, with whom they had thimmerce, and also what commodities euerie Countie yeldded: and hauing counted the seuerall People and Countries, he addeth the particular trade, which each of them exercised: They were thy merchants (saith the Prophet) in all sorts of shippes, in rayments of blue silke, and of bordered workes, fine linnen, corall, and pearle: and afterwards speaking of the Merchants of Sheba and Raamah, and what kinds they traded, he hath these words: The merchants of Sheba & Raamah were thy merchants, they occupied in thy Faures, with the chief of all Spices, and with all precious stones and gold. Now these be indeed the riches which Persia and Arabia Felix yelld: & because Sheba & Raamah are those parts of Arabia, which border the Sea, called the Persian Gulfe, therefore did those Nations both vent such Spice, sweet Gummes, and Pearles, as their owne Countries yelld;

and (withall) hauing trade with their Neighbour of India, had from them also all sorts of spices, and plenty of gold. The better to conuey these commodities to that great Mart of Tyre, the Shebans or Arabians entred by the mouth of Tigris, and from the Citie of Terredon (built or enlarged by Nebuchodonosor, now called Bassara) thence sent vp all the richest merchandises by boat to Babylon, from whence by the body of Euphrates, as farre as it bended Westward, and afterward by a branch thereof, which reacheth within three daies Iourney of Aleppo, and then ouer Land they past to Tyre, as they did afterward to Tripoly, (formerly Hieropolis) and thence to Alexandretta, as aforesaid. Now the Merchants of Canneh, which Ezechiel ioyneth with Eden, inhabited farre vp the Riuer, and receiued this trade from Arabia and India, besides those proper commodities which themselves had, and which they receiued out of Persia, which bordered them. S. Hierome vnderstandeth by Canneh, Seleucia, which is seated vpon Euphrates, where it breaketh into foure heads, and which tooke that name from Seleucus, who made thereof a magnificent Citie. Hieronymus thinks it to be Ctesiphon: but Ctesiphon is seated downe low vpon Tigris, and Canneh cannot be on that side, I mean on the East-side of Tigris; for then were it out of the Valley of Shinar. Plinie placeth the Schenita vpon Euphrates, where the same beginneth to be foordable, which is toward the border of Syria, after it leaueth to bee the bound of Arabia the Desert, and where the Riuer of Euphrates reflecteth from the Desert of Palmirena: for these people of Canneh (afterward Schenita) inhabited both borders of Euphrates, stretching themselves from their owne Citie of Canneh in Shinar Westward along the banks of Euphrates, as far as the City of Thapscus, where Ptolomee appointed the Foords of Euphrates: which also agreeth with the description of the Schenita by Strabo, whose words are these: Mercuratoribus ex Syria Seleuciam & Babyloniam cunctibus iter est per Schenitas; The Merchants which traueise from Syria to Seleucia and Babylon, take their way by the Schenites. Therefore those which take Canneh for Charran, doe much mistake it. For Charran, to which Abraham came from Vr in Chaldea (called by God) standeth also in Mesopotamia; nor vpon Euphrates it selfe, but vpon the Riuer of Chaboras, which falleth into Euphrates: and the Merchants of Charran are distinctly named with those of Canneh in Ezechiel (as) They of Haran, and Canneh, and Eden, the merchants of Sheba, Abur, and Chilmad were thy merchants. Wherefore Charran, which is sometime called Charite, & Haran, & Aran; is but the same Charran of Mesopotamia; & when it is written Aran, then it is taken for the region of Mesopotamia; or Aran flouiorum, the Greek word (Mesopotamia) importing, a country betweene riuer: for Misus in Greece, is Medius in Latine, and Potamos, flumius; and when it is written Haran or Aran, it is then taken for the Citie it selfe, to which Abraham came from Vr (as aforesaid.) For Strabo in the description of Arabia, giueth that tract of land from the borders of Celestria, to the edge of Mesopotamia, to the Schenita, who also inhabited on both sides of Euphrates, and were in after ages accounted of these Arabians which inhabited Bacanea, & the North part of the Deserts, stretching themselves toward the inhabited solitude of Palmirena, which lyeth between Syria and Arabia the Desert. So as these of Canneh lay in the very highway from Babylon to Tyre, & were neighbours (indifferent) to Charran and to Eden: and therefore they are by the Prophet Ezechiel coupled together, They of Haran, and Canneh, & Eden, &c. But S. Hierome made a good interpretation of Canneh, or Chalne, by Seleucia: for Seleucia was anciently called Chalanne (winklesse Applum;) and Isidore Admirus calleth it in his Commentaries vpon Genesis; the same by time and mixture of languages being changed from Chalne or Canneh, to Chalanne & of which name there are two other cities standing in Triangle with Seleucia, & almost the next vnto it, (as) Thelbe-canne, & Mann-canne, the one a little to the West of Seleucia; & the other opposite vnto it, where these riuer of Tigris and Euphrates are ready to ioine. Therefore, which of these the ancient Canneh was, being all three within the bound of the valley Shinar it is vncertaine: but it is a note as well of the importance of the place, as of the certaine feare thereof, that so many other cities did retain a part of the name in so many ages after. Neither is it vnkely, that these additions of Thelbe and Mann to the word Canneh, were but to make difference betweene the East and the West, or the greater and the lesse Canneh, or betweene Canneh the old and the new: which additions to distinguish cities by, are ordinary in all the Regions of the World.

Now of the other city ioyned with Eden, as Haran or Charran, S. Hierome on the

Ind. 1. Judges speake thereof in these words: Cumq; reuertentur, pvenient ad Charan, qua est in medio itinero contra Ninivem, undecimo die; when they returned, they came to Charan, (which is the mid-way against Nineve) the eleventh day.

AR. 7. 1. This city is by the Martyr Stephen named Charan (speaking to the high Priest: The Men, Brethren, and Fathers, hearken: The God of glory appeared to our Father ABRAHAM, while he was in Mesopotamia, before he dwelt in Charan. But the seat of this city is not doubted of: for it is not onely remembered in many Scriptures, but, withall, exceeding famous for the death and overthrow of Cassius the Romane, who for his vnstable greediness was called Gurgis aurarius; The gulf of aurice. Whereof Lucan:

Gen. 10. 10. But this city Canne or Chalne is made manifest by Moses himself, where it is written of NIMROD: And the beginning of his Kingdomes was Babel, & Erach, & Acad, & Chalne, in the land of Shinar or Shinar where Moses sheweth the first composition of the Babylonian Empire, and what cities and people were subiect vnto Nimrod, all which lay in the said Valley of Shinar, or nere it, and this Valley of Shinar is that Tract afterwards called Babylonia and Chaldaea, into which also Eden stretcheth itselfe. Chaldaea, Babylonia, Sinaar, idem sunt (saith COMESTOR.) Three names of one Country: which Region of Babylonia took name of the Towre Babel; & the Towre, of the confusion of tongues. And that Shinar was Babylonia, it is proved in the eleventh chapter of Genesis, in these words: And as they went from the East, they found a Plaine in the Land of Shinar, and there they abode: in which Plaine Babylon was built (as aforesaid.)

Verfa. Now Shinar being Babylonia, & Canneh, in the first beginning of Nimrods greatnes, and before he had subdued any strange, or far-off Nations, being one part of his Dominion, and also named by Moses to be in Shinar, it proueth, that Canneh ioyneeth to Babylonia; which also Ezechiel coupleth with Eden, and (further) affirmeth, that those of Eden were also the Merchants which traded with the Tyrians: and Esaie in the threats of Senacherib against Ierusalem (with other Nations that Senacherib vaunted that his Fathers had destroyed) nameth the children of Eden which were at Tellaifar. But before I conclude where Eden itselfe lyeth, it is necessary to describe, those other Coun-

Verfa. tryes, which Ezechiel ioyneeth therewith in the places before remembered, as, those of Sheba and Raamah. It is written in Genesis the tenth: Morauer the sonnes of Ham were Cush, &c. and the sonnes of Cush were Seba, and Havilan, and Sabtah, and Raamah, &c. and the sonnes of Raamah were Sheba, &c. and anon after, Cush begat Nimrod so as Sheba was the grand-child of Cush, and Nimrod the sonne of Cush, whose elder brother was Sebah, though some there are that conceive, to the contrary, that Nimrod was the elder in valour and understanding, though not in time and precedence of birth; who inhabited that part of Shinar, where Babel was built, afterwards Babylonia. His mother Raamah or Reama rooke that part adioyning to Shinar, toward the Sea side and Persian gulf (called afterward Reama and Sheba, by the Father and his Sonne, which possessed it.) For (saith EZEKIEL) the merchants of Raamah, and Sheba were the merchants who occupied in all Spices, and all precious stones, and gold. So as Sheba was that Tract of Country, which parteth Arabia Deserta from Arabia Felix, and which ioyneeth to the Sea where Tigris and Euphrates fall on, and render themselves to the Ocean. This part, and the adjoining Country, Strabo calleth Catabria, where the best Myrrhe and Frankincense is gathered, which people haue an interchange of trade with Indians, lying on the East side of the Persian gulf. By this it appeareth what were the Shebans, spoken of by Ezechiel, and knd to haue beene the Merchants of Tyre for gold, spices, and precious stones; of which they had not onely plenty of their owne, but were also furnished from that part of India (called Elana, according to Strabo) for exchange of their Aromaticques, and other proper commodities.

For, as Strabo reporteth out of ERATOSTHENES: In Persia ora insula est, in qua multa & pretiosa unguenta sunt, in alijsque, clari & perlucidi lapilli. ERATOSTHENES (saith Strabo) affirmeth, that in the beginning of the Persian gulf, there is an Island, in which there are many precious pearles bred; and in other, very cleare and shining stones. Now the difference betweene Sheba, the sonne of Raamah, and Seba, the sonne of Cush, is in this, That Seba is written with the Hebrew (Samech;) and Sheba with (Sehin;) but but whatsoeuer the difference may bee in the Hebrew Onomography, their Countries and Habitations are diuers. For Sheba is that which bordereth the Persian Sea, & Saba (whence the Queen of Saba) neighboured the Red Sea, and so the place of the 72. Psalms, expounded Reges Arabum & Saba, hath in the Hebrew this sense: Reges Sheba & Saba.

The Shebans, Ezechiel nameth together with the Edenites, because they inhabited vpon the Out-let of the same Riuer, vpon which the Edenites were seated: and so those of Sheba, towards the Sea-coast, and vpon it, past vnto the Country, by Tigris and Euphrates, being ioyned in one maine streame, and so through the Region of Eden, which Tigris boundeth, thereby the better to conuey their merchandise toward Tyre. And as the cities of Charan, and Canneh, border Eden on the West and Northwest: so doth Sheba on the South, and Chilmad on the North-east: Chilmad being a Region of the higher Media, as appeareth in the Chaldaean Paraphrast; which Country by the Geographers is called Goromitena, (L) placed by exchange for (R) which change the Hebrews alfo often vse.

Thus much of those Countries which border Eden, and who altogether traded with the Tyrians: of which, the chiefe were the Edenites, inhabiting Tellaifar: for these Senacherib vaunted, that his Fathers had destroyed; and this place of Tellaifar lay most conuenient, both to receiue the Trade from Sheba and Arabia, and also to conuey it ouer into Syria, and to Tyrus. Now to make these things the more plaine, wee must remember, that before the death of Senacherib, many piers of the Babylonian Empire fell from his obedience, and after his death these Monarchies were vtterly disioyned.

For it appeareth both in Esaie the 37. and in the second of Kings, by the threats of Rabsache, the vyllie the Army of Assyria lay before Ierusalem, that the Cities of Gossan, Haran, Reseph, and the Edenites at Tellaifar had resited the Assyrians, though by them (in a sort) mastered and recovered. Haec the gods of the Nations deliuered them, whom my Fathers haue destroyed, in Gossan, and Haran, Reseph, and the children of Eden, which were in Tellaifar. But it appeared manifestly after Senacheribs death; that these Nations formerly contending, were then freed from the others subiection: for Esaie 30. Hadden held Assyria, and Merodach Babylonia. And after that the Army of Senacherib was commanded by Rabsache which lay before Ierusalem (Ezechiel then reigning) while Senacherib was in Egypt, was by the Angel of God destroyed; the King of Babel (sent to Ezechiel, both to congratulate the recovery of his health; and his victory obtained ouer the Assyrians. After which overthrow, Senacherib himselfe was slain by his owne sonnes in the Temple of his Idols, Esaie Hadden succeeding him in Assyria. To the Babylonian Ambassadors sent by Merodach, Ezechiel shewed all his treasures, as well proper as consecrate, which furnished the kings of Babylon afterward to vndertake their conquest and subiection. So as, the suspition of warre encreasing betweene Babylon and Assyria, the Edenites which inhabited the borders of Shinar towards the North, and towards Assyria, were employed to beate off the incursions of the Assyrians; and their Garrison-place was at Tellaifar: and the very word (Tellaifar saith Strabo, signifying as much as a bulwarke against the Assyrians. This place Hierosolymus takes for Refem, others for Selucia; but this Tellaifar is the same, which Am. Merodach in the History of Isaiah (whom he followed in the enterprise of Persia) calleth Thulcha in stead of Tellaifar, who doeth therein the exceeding strength thereof in his 22. Booke: it is seated in an Island of Euphrates vpon a steepe and vnsailable Rocke, so much as the Emperour Isidore durst not attempt it; and therefore it was a conuenient place for a Garrison against the Assyrians, being also a passage out of Mesopotamia into Babylonia, and in which the Edenites of the Country adioyning were seated to defend the same. This place Proton calleth Terridata; hauing Refeph (which he calleth Refeph) on the left hand, & Canneh (which he calleth Thelbe-canne) on the right hand, not farre from whence is also found the City of Maan canne vpon Tigris, and all these situate together, as Esaie and Ezechiel haue sorted them. But the vnderstanding of these places is the more difficult, because Assyria (which the Chaldeans call Aturia) and Mesopotamia were so often confounded: the one taken for the other by interchange of Dominion. Assyria & Mesopotamia in Babylonian were transferrant (saith Niderus) Assyria and Mesopotamia took the name of Babylonia. Lastly, it appeareth by those adiacent Regions by the Prophets named; in what part of the World Eden is scared, as by Charran or Herran in Mesopotamia: also by Cannuch and Reseph, according to the opinion of Vasabius, who in these words translateth this place: Plantaverat autem Iehovah Deus hortum in Eden, ab Oriente, The Lord God planted a Garden in Eden, Eastward: that is (saith hee in his Annotations) Iusserat nasci arbores in Eden, Regione Orientali, in finibus Arabia & Mesopotamia, He commanded Trees to grow in Eden, an Eastern Region in the borders of Arabia and Mesopotamia.

S. X.

Of diuers other testimonies of the Land of Eden; and that this is the Eden of Paradise.

And for a more particular pointing out of this Eden, it seemes by the two Epistles of the Nestorian Christians, that inhabit Mesopotamia; which Epistles in the year 1552. they sent to the Pope about the confirming of their Patriarch, & Andreas Masius hath published them, translated out of Syriac into Latine. By these Epistles (I say) it seemes wee may haue some farther light for the prooue of that, which we haue said about the Region of Eden in those parts. For in them both there is mention of the Island of Eden in the Riuer Tigris, or at least, Tigris in both these Epistles is called the Riuer of Eden. This Island, as Masius in his Preface to these Epistles saith, is commonly called Gozaria (as it were, the Island, by an eminency.) It hath (saith hee) ten miles in circuit, and was sometimes walled round about, which name of the Island Eden may (doubtlesse) remaine to this day; though in the rest of the Region so called, this name be swallowed vp, with the same of those flourishing Kingdomes of Mesopotamia, Assyria, Babylonia, and Chaldaea. This Island of Eden hath vp the Riuer, and not farre beyond it, the City of Hafan-Cepha, otherwise Fertis Petra: below it, it hath Mofal or Mosel, from which (as in that which followeth it shall appeare out of Masius) it is not about twelue miles distant. Neither is it to trouble vs, that Mofal or Mosel, by Marius Niger is remembered among the Cities higher vp Tigris, in these words. Iuxta autem Tigrim, Cinitates sunt Darbata prope Taurum montem, qua nunc Mosel dicuntur, magna sunt, &c. (that is) By Tigris are these Cities: Darbata neere vnto mount Taurus (which is now called Mosel) which is a great one, &c. This opinion of Niger, displacing Mosel, and making it to be Darbata (I say) needs not here to trouble vs: seeing for this matter, the testimony of Masius, informed by the Christians that dwell there (the Seat of whose Patriarch it is) ought to be of credit, auowing that this Mofal (or Mozal) is in the Confinnes of Mesopotamia & Assyria, seated vpon Tigris, & in the neighbour-hood of Nineue; and that it is the famous Selencia Parthorum. The Nestorian Christians in their former Epistle, call it Attur in these words: Ex omnibus Cinitatibus & pagis quae sunt circum Cinitatem Mosel (hoc est) Attur in vicinia Nineue; Of all the Cities and Townes which are about the Citie of Mosel (that is) Attur in the neighbour-hood of Nineue. As also Niger acknowledgeth Ctesiphon, a City thereabout to be called Assur, (which is the same as Attur, after the Dialect of those Nations, which change S into T.) Neither is it much that he should mistake Ctesiphon, (which is not far off Selencia for Selencia, to be Assur. By this then we may come somewhat neere the end of our purpose. For the Ile of Eden, which lieth in the brest of Tigris, is but twelue miles from Mosel, and that ancient City, which Ptolomy and Tacitus call Ninus, and the Scriptures Nineue; Philestratus, and Simcon Sethi, Mofula, and Iohn Leau, Mofal, others Mosse, (though it bee not the same with Mosel) is set but a little higher vpon the same Riuer of Tigris, neere Mosel: so that we are like to find this Ile of Eden heereabout. For the same Andreas Masius, which placeth it about Mosel, makes it to be below Hafan-Cepha, which is vpon the same Riuer of Tigris.

The onely difficulty is this, that some perhaps may thinke, that the words of the Nestorians in both their Epistles, speake not of any Ile in Tigris, called the Ile of Eden, but of an Ile in Tigris, a Riuer of Eden. But this sense of their words in my opinion seemeth the more vnprobable. And yet if this were the meaning here, we haue a testimony from the Learned of those parts, that not onely Euphrates, but also Tigris was a Riuer of Eden, and that the name of Eden in those parts is not yet quite worne out, though the Region hath bin subiect to the same change, that all other Kingdomes of the world haue bene, and hath by conquest, and corruption of other Languages, receiued new and differing names. For the South part of Eden, which stretcheth ouer Euphrates, was after the flood called Shinar, and then of the Tower of Babel, Babylonia, and the North part of Eden is that Tract of Mesopotamia, Assyria, and Armenia, which embraceth both the banks of Tigris between Mount Taurus, and Selencia. And of this Region of Eden that ancient Aethicus maketh mention, (not that latter Aethicus, Disciple of Gallinius, otherwise by Plutarch and Athenus called Isiri, who liued in Egypt in the Reigne of Philadelphus, but another of a farre higher and remote time) the same being made Latine out of the Greeke by Saint Hierome. And though by corruption of the ancient Copie it be written in Aethicus, Adonis for Edenis, yet Adonis being a Riuer of Phoenicia, cannot be vnderstood to be the Region named by Aethicus. For Aethicus maketh it a Countrey, and not a Riuer, and ioyneth it with Mesopotamia and Aethiopia, calling the land of Chus Aethiopia, after the Vulgar, and Septuagint, And lastly, the Riuer which watereth the Regions, (saith Aethicus) falleth into the Gulfe of Persia: which Riuer he called Armodius, for Tigris; Tigris being but a name imposed for the swiftnes thereof. And out of Armenia both Tigris and Euphrates haue their originall: for out of Eden came a Riuer, or Riuer, to water the Garden; both which Riuer (to wit) Tigris and Euphrates, come out of Armenia, and both of them traueise Mesopotamia, Regions first of all knowne by the name of Eden for their beautie and fertility. And it is very probable, that Eden contained also some part of Armenia; and the excellent fertility thereof in diuers places, is not vnworthy the name of Eden. For in some part thereof (saith Strabo) the leaues are alway green, & therefore therein a perpetuall Spring. Also STEPHANVS DE VIBUS, mentioneth the Citie of Adana vpon Euphrates: and the name of Eden was in vse in Amos time, though he speake not of Eden in the East; but of Eden in Calestria. But to the end I may not burden the Readers patience with too long a Discourse, it may suffice to know, that Euphrates and Tigris (once ioyned together, and afterward separate) are two of those foure heads, into which these Riuer which are said to water the Garden of Paradise, were diuided: whose courses being knowne, Eden, (out of which they are said to come) cannot be vnknowne. Now that Hiddekel and Perath were Tigris and Euphrates, is agreed by all: for the Scientie and all others conuert Perath by Euphrates: & Hiddekel Tigris omnes exponunt: & all men vnderstand Hiddekel by Tigris. (saith Vasabius.) And because that which I haue said of the Ile of Eden, shall not be subiect to the censure of selfe-inuention, I haue heere-vnder set downe the words out of the two generall Epistles of the Nestorians, as MASIVS (ad verbum) hath conuerted them into Latine. The occasion of those Letters and Supplications to the Pope, were, that the Nestorian Christians, which inhabit Mesopotamia, Assyria, Persia, Babylonia, & haue to this day (at least in Queen Maries time they had) fifteene Churches in one Citie called Selencia Parthorum, or Mosel vpon the Riuer of Tigris; hauing no sufficient authoritie to choose themselves a Patriarch (which cannot bee done without foure or three Metropolitane Bishop at least) sent to the Bishop of Rome, in the year of Christ 1552. (as afore-said) a Petition to obtaine allowance vnto such an Election as themselves had made: hauing three hundred yeare before that vpon the like defect, sent one Marius thither to be confirmed; and in this negotiation they made knowne to the Bishop of Rome the state of the Christian Church in those parts: for vpon the death of their Patriarch (vho of a couctous desire to enrich himselfe had forborne to institute Metropolitane Bishops, vhen the places fell void) they all assembled themselves together to consult of the Church-gouernment. And because all the Patriarchs for an hundred yeares had bene of one House and Family: to the preiudice of the Church, and that there yet remained one Bishop of the same Stocke and Kindred, vho aspired to the same dignitie vvhich his Predecessors had held, the rest of the Professors refused to allow him. Vpon vvhich occasion, and for the choice of a Gouvernour more sufficient, the Teachers in all the Churches assembled themselves. The vvords of the generall Epistle to the Pope are these about the middle of the said Epistle: Perum nos non acceptauimus neq. proclamauimus ipsum, sed subitis conuenimus ex omnibus locis Orientalibus. & ex omnibus Cinitatibus & pagis quae sunt circum Cinitatem Mosel (hoc est) Attur in vicinia Nineue, ex Babylonia, ex Charra, ex Arbella, ex Insula quae est in medio Tigris, fluminis Eden, ex Tauris Persiae, ex Nisibi, &c. which is: But we did neither accept of this man, neither pronounced him: but suddenly we assembled our selues out of all parts of the East, and out of all the Cities and Villages which are about Mosel (or Attur) neighbouring Nineue, & out of Babylon, Carra, Arbella, and out of the land which lieth in the middle of Ti-gris, a River of Eden, or rather, out of the Ile of Eden, which lyeth in the River Tigris. And in a second Epistle at the same time sent, they vse these vvords: Nosq; supersunt apud nos Metropole, quorum est ordinare Catholicos, sed soli pauci Episcopi, Episcopus Arbela, Episcopus Salmasi, Episcopus Adurbeizan; eni vestigio conuenimus in Insulam, que est, intra Tigris flumen, Eden, secundum compallum inter nos, &c. (vvlichis) Neither are there remaining among vs any Metropolitan Bishops, to whom it belongs to ordaine a Patriarch, but onely a few Bishops, as the Bishop of Arbela, the Bishop of Salmasius, and the Bishop of Adurbeizan: but so, we assembled specially in the Island Eden, which is in Tigris, and agreed betwene our selues, &c.

Now this Island of Eden Masius describeth with other places; which being well conceived, the Nestorian Epistles, and the state of the Church may be in those parts (saith he) the better vnderstood. And after he hath distinguished the foure sorts of Christians in those parts of the World, and in the South part of Africa, which hee calleth Nestorians, Iacobites, Maronites, and Cophiti, he goeth on in these vvords: Max audita illius uorte, concurrisse aiebant tumultuario in illam quam modo dixi Tigris Insulam, que duodecim circiter passuum millibus supra Adolam posita, decemferè millia passuum suo ambitu continet, muris undiq; cincta, & pauci alijs quam Christianis hominibus habitata: which is, Now hearing of the death of the Patriarch, (as those that came to Rome reported) they ran tumultuously together into that Island of Tigris or Eden before spoken of, which Island is situated about twelue miles above Mosel, containing very neere ten miles in compass, and euery where incircled with a wall, inhabited by a few other men than Christians. And afterward he maketh a recapitulation of the Christian Churches; among the rest hee addeth the Ile of Eden by the name of Geserta, Insula Tigris: sive Geserta. Furthermore, describing the Citie of Hofan-cepia, or Fortis Petra, he placeth it supra prædictam Tigris Insulam rapti aspera impostam: Aboue the aforesaid Island of Tigris, being seated on a steepe Rocke. Of this Island of Geserta, Andrew Theuot maketh mention in his tenth Booke of his generall Cosmographie in these vvords: Geserta ou Gese est au milieu de la Riuierè du Tigre, & pense que cest une terrades plus fertile de toute l'Asie, Geserta ou Gese est in the middle of Tigris, the Soyle the most fertile of all Asia.

By this we see that the ancient name of Eden liueth, and of that Eden which lieth Eastward from Arabia Petrea, and the Desert where Moses wrote, and that Eden which bordereth Charran according to Ezechiel, and that Eden which is seated according to the assertion of the said Prophet, and ioyned with those Nations of Reseph, Canneh, and Charran, and the rest which traded with the Tyrians, and is found at this day in the parting of the two Regions of Assyria and Babylonia, where the Edenites in Thelassar were garriſond to resist the Assyrians, whose displantation Senecherib vaunted of (as aboue written;) and lastly, the same Eden, which embraceth Tigris, and looketh on Euphrates, two of the knowne Riuers of those foure, which are by all men ascribed to Paradise.

§. XI.

Of the difficultie in the Text, which seemeth to make the foure Riuers to rise from one streame.

BUT it may be objected, that it is written in the Text, That a Riuier went out of Eden, and not Riuers, in the plurall; which scruple Matthew Beronius hath thus answered in his Chronologie: The Latine Translation, saith hee, hath these vvords: *Et fluius egrediebatur de loco voluptatis ad irrigandum Paradisum, qui inde diuidebatur in quatuor capita: Quia uerba melius consentient cum rei narratione, & eiusdem explicatione, si ita reddantur. Et fluius erat egrediens ex Edene, (hoc est) fluius procedebat ex Edene regione ad rigandum pomarium; & inde diuidebatur, & erat in quatuor capita: which is, And a Riuier went out of the place of pleasure to water Paradise, and thence was diuided into foure heads: Which vvords (saith Beronius) doe better agree with the narration and explication of the place, if they be thus translated: And a Riuier was going forth of Eden (this is) Riuers went forth, and ran out of the Region of Eden to water the Orchard; and from thence it was diuided, and they became foure heads. The Tigurine differs from the Vulgar or Latine; for it conuertit it thus: Et fluius egrediebatur de delicijs; And a Riuier went out of pleasure, in stead of Eden; and the Latine addeth the word locus, or place, *Et fluius egrediebatur de loco voluptatis; And a Riuier went out of the place of pleasure: and so the word (place) may rightly be referred to Eden, which was (of all other) a Region most delightfull and fertile; and so also the word (inde) and thence was diuided, hath reference to the Countrey of Eden, and not to the Garden it selfe.

And for the word (Riuier) for Riuers, it is vsuall among the Hebrewes: for it is written: Let the Earth bud forth the bud of the Herbe that seedeth Seede, the fruitfull Tree, Gen. iii. 3. 2. &c. Here the Hebrew vseth the Singular for the Plurall, Herbe and Tree, for Herbs and Trees; and againe, We eate of the fruit of the Tree, in stead of (Trees:) And thirdly, The man and his wife hid themselves from the presence of God; In medio ligni Paradisi; In the middle of the Garden, for (Trees:) And of this opinion is David Kimchi, and 10 Vatablus, who vpon this place of Genesis say, that the Hebrewes doe often put the Singular for the Plurall, as illud, for unumquodq; illorum, and hee giueth an instance in this question it selfe, as, A Riuier (for Riuers) went out of Eden.

And this answer out of diuers of the Learned, may, not without good reason, bee giuen to the obiection, That Moses speaketh but of one Riuier, from which the heads should diuide themselves. Howbeit I deny not, but with as good (and perhaps better) reason, wee may expound the foure heads, to bee foure notable passages into famous Countreies. And so we may take the word (Riuier) Verse the tenth for one Riuier (to wit) Euphrates, as this name comprehendeth all the branches thereof. For this Riuier, (after he is past the place, where we suppose Paradise to haue bin, diuides it selfe, and ere long 20 yeeldeth foure notable passages into seuerall Countreies, though not all the way downe streame, (for this is no where in the Text) where it is noted, that following the Riuier downward, there is conueyance into the Countreies named in the Text, though part of the way. One of the Countreies (to wit, to Assyria) were vp Tigris.

To this end the Text speaking of Hiddekel, as it riseth from the Riuier of Eden, doth not say it compasseth or walketh the whole Region of Assyria, (as it had vsed this phrase of Pison and Gehon) but that it runneth toward Assyria. The first branch Pison, is Nahar-malcha, (by interpretation) Basilus, or flumen regium, which runneth into Tigris vnder Apamia; whence ariseth the name of Pasi-tigris, (as it were) Piso-tigris. This leadeth to the Land of Hauila or Susiana. The second branch Gehon, is that which 30 in Historians is Nabar-jares or Narragais for Nabar-ragas: both which names signifie flumen derivatus (a Riuier deriued,) also Acraçamus, quasi Rangus, by reason of the froggie Fennes which it maketh: this Gehon leadeth to the first seate of Chus; about the borders of Chaldaea and Arabia, and it is lost at length in the Lakes of Chaldaea. The third branch Hiddekel, may be expounded the vpper streame of Pison, or Basilus, which runneth into Hiddekel, properly so called (that is, into Tigris) aboue Seleucia, where it sheweth a passage vp Tigris into Assyria: where, because at length it is called Hiddekel or Tigris, hauing before no knowne proper name, the Text in this place calleth it Hiddekel from the beginning. The fourth Perath, or Euphrates, so called per excellentiam, being the body of the Riuier Euphrates, which runneth through Babylon and 40 Otis. But, bee it a Riuier or Riuers, that come out of Eden, seeing that Tigris and Euphrates are noted in the Text, there can bee no doubt, but that Paradise was not farre from these Riuers: for that Perath in Mose is Euphrates, there can be no question; and (indeede) as plaine it is that Hiddekel is Tigris. For Hiddekel goeth (saith Moser) Eastward towards Assur, as we find, that Tigris is the Riuier of Assyria proprie dicta, whose chiefe City was Nineue, as in Genesis the tenth it is written: That out of that Land (to wit) Babylonia, Nimrod went into Assur, and builded Nineue, which was the chiefe City of Assyria.

And as for the kind of speech here vsed in the Text, speaking of foure heads; though the heads of Riuers be (properly) their Fountaines, yet here are they to be vnderstood, to be spoken of the beginning of their diuision from the first streame. Caput aqua (saith VLPRIANVS) illud est, unde aqua nascitur; sive fonte nascatur, sive ex flumine, vel ex Iacu, prima initia, &c. If the beginning of the water bee out of a Fountaine, then is the Fountaine taken for the head: if out of a Lake, then the Lake; and if from a maine Riuier 50 any branch be separate and diuided, then where that branch doth first bound it selfe with new banks, there is that part of the Riuier, where the branch forsaketh the maine streame, called the head of the Riuier.

Of the strange fertilitie and happinesse of the Babylonian Soile, as it is certaine that Eden was such.

Herod. lib. 2.

ET may also bee demanded, whether this Region of Eden, by vs described, bee of such fertilitie and beautie, as Eden the seat of Paradise was: which if it be denied, then must we also consider, that there was no part of the Earth, that retained that fertilitie and pleasure, that it had before the curse: neither can we ascribe the same fruitfulness to any part of the Earth, nor the same vertue to any plant thereon growing, that they had before the flood; and therefore this Region of Eden may be now no such flourishing Countrey, as it was when it was first created in his perfection. Yet this I finde written of it: First, in Herodotus, who was an eye-witnesse, and speaker of the very place it selfe; for the Ile of Eden is but twelue miles or thereabout from Nineue, and so from Mosal. Ex Euphrate exiens in Tigrim, alterum flumen, iuxta quod Vrbis Ninus sita erat. Hac regio, omnium quas nos vidimus, optima est, &c. where Euphrates runneth out into Tigris, not farre from the place where Ninus is seated. This Region, of all that we haue seene, is most excellent; and hee addeth afterward: Cerevis autem fructu procreando adeo ferax est, ut nunquam non ferè ducenta reddat, &c. (that is) It is so fruitfull in bringing forth Corne, that it yeeldeth two hundred fold: The leaves of wheate and barley being almost foure fingers broad. As for the height of Aillet and Sesame, they are euen in length like unto Trees, which although I know to be true, yet I forbear to speake hereof, well knowing, that those things which are reported of this fruitfulness, will seeme very incredible to those, which neuer were in the Countrey of Babylon. They haue commonly in all the Countrey Palme Trees growing of their owne accord, the most of them bearing fruit, out of which they make both Meates, and Wine, and Honey, ordering them as the Figge Trees. Thus saith Herodotus.

To this Palme-tree so much admired in the East India, Strabo and Niger adde a fourth excellency, which is, that it yeeldeth bread; Ex quibus panem, & mel, & vinum, & acetum conficiunt. Of which these people make Bread, wine, Honey, and Vineger. But Antonius the Eremitie findeth a fift commodity, not inferior to any of those foure, which is, that from this selfe-same Tree there is drawne a kinde of fine Flake, of which people make their garments; and with which in East India they prepare the cordage for their ships. And that this is true, Athanasius in the life of Antonius the Eremitie, confesseth, saying: That hee receiued a garment made thereof from the Eremitie himselfe, which he brought with him out of Asia Region. So therefore those Trees, which the East Indies so highly esteeme and so much admire (as in dedde the Earth yeeldeth no Plant comparable to this) those Trees (I say) are in this vpper Babylon, or Region of Eden, as common as any Trees of the Field. Sunt etiam (saith STRABO) passim per omnem Regionem Palmae sua sponte nascentes; There are of Palmes ouer all the whole Region, growing of their owne accord. Of this place Quintus Curtius maketh this report: Eunites a partibus leuæ (Arabia odorum fertilitate nobilis) regia campensis interit inter Tigrim & Euphratem, iacens tam ubere & pingui solo, ut a passu repellit pecora dicantur, no facilius perimit; (that is) As you trauaile on the left hand of Arabia (famous for plenty of sweete Odours) there lyeth a Champaine Countrey placed betwene Tigris and Euphrates, and so fruitfull and fat a soile, that they are said to driue their Castell from pasture, lest they should perishe by sterility. Bui anno fegetes babylonij fecant; The Babylonians cut their Corne twice a yeere (saith Niger.) And as Countreys generally are more fruitfull to the Southward, than in the Northern parts: so we may iudge the excellency of this lye that report which Strabo maketh of the South part of America, which is the North border of Inden, or part thereof. His words be these in the Latine: Tota enim hac regio fragilis & arboribus abunde instructis, itemq. semper virentibus; This Region aboundeth with pleasant fruites, and Trees alwayes greene: which witnesseth a perpetuall Spring, not found elsewhere but in the Indies only, by reason of the Sunnes neighbourhood, the life & stirrer up of Nature in a perpetuall activity. In briefe, so great is the fertility of the ground, that the people are constrained twice to mow downe their Corne fields, and a third time to cut them vp with Sheepe: which husbandry the Spaniards wanting in the Valley of Mexico, for the first forty yeares, could not make our kind of Wheate beare seed, but it grew vp as high as the Trees, and was fruitlesse. Besides, those fields are altogether without weeds (saith (saith Pliny) who addeth this singularity to that soyle, That the second yeare the verie stubble (or rather falling downe of the seedes againe) yeeldeth them a harvest of corne without any further labour: his words are these, Perstatim tanta sunt, ut sequenti anno sponte restitibus fiat seges.

Of the River Pison, and the land of Hauilah.

AFTER the discouerie of Eden, and the testimonies of the fertilitie thereof, it resteth to proue that Pison and Gehon are branches of Tigris and Euphrates. For, that the knowledge and certaintie of these two Riuer should trouble so many wise men, it is strange to me, seeing necessitie it selfe (Tigris and Euphrates being knowne) findeth them out: for Euphrates, or Tigris, or both, be that Riuer or Riuer of Eden, which water Paradise, which riuer or riuer Moses witnesseth afterward diuided into foure heads, whereof the one is called Pison, the other Gehon &c. Could there be a stranger fancie in the world, than when we find both these (namely) Tigris and Euphrates in Assyria and Mesopotamia; to seeke the other two in India and Egypt, making the one Ganges, and the other Nilus? Two riuer as farre distant as any of fame knowne or discovered in the world: the Scriptures making it so plain, that these riuer were diuided into foure branches, and with the Scriptures, Nature, Reason, and Experience bearing witness. There is no error, which hath not some slipperie and bad foundation, or some appearance of probability, resembling truth, which when men (who studie to bee singular) finde out, (straining reason according to their fancies) they then publish to the world matter of contention & angling; not doubting but in the variable deformitie of mens minds, to find some partakers or iectators, the better by their helpe to nurse and cherishe such weake babes, as their owne intentions haue begotten.

But this mistaking and first for the Riuer of Pison seemeth to haue growne out of the not-distinguishing of that Region in India, called Hauilah, from Hauilah which adioyneth to Babylonia, afterward knowne by the name of Susiana. For Hauilah vpon Tigris tooke name from Hauilah the sonne of Cash; and Hauilah in India, from Hauilah the sonne of Isolan; the one remembered by Moses in the description of Paradise, the other where Moses setteth downe the generations of Nah, and his sonnes after the Flood. For the sonnes of Cash were Seba, Hauilah, Sabtah, and Raamah, and the sonnes of Isolan were Ophir, and Hauilah &c. of which latter (to wit) of Ophir and Hauilah the sonnes of Isolan, that land of Ophir, (whence Salomon had gold) and Hauilah adioyning, had their names. Now because Ganges is a great and a famous riuer of the East India, and Hauilah a Countrey of the same, and is situated vpon Ganges; hence it came that Ganges was taken for Pison, which riuer is said by Moses to water the land of Hauilah. Or perhaps it was supposed that those foure riuer named by Moses, must of necessitie be foure of the greatest in the world; whence (supposing that Ganges was the next great and famous riuer after Tigris and Euphrates) they chose out this riuer to make one of the foure. And yet certainly there is another riuer, whom in these respects they should rather haue chosen than Ganges: for the riuer Indus on this side India, for beauty, for neerenesse, & for ability, giueth no way place to Ganges, but exceedeth it in all. And how can any reasonable man conceiue, that Ganges can be one of the foure heads, seeing Indus cometh betwene it and Tigris? and betwene Tigris and Indus is all that large Empire of Persia, consisting of many Kingdomes. And againe, farther towards the East, and beyond India, are all those ample Dominions of Inda in the Ganges, which lie betwene those two proud Riuer of Indus and Ganges, now called the Kingdome of Mogor. So as if Indus be not accounted for any of the foure, because it is removed from Tigris by all the breadth of Persia, then how much lesse Ganges; which falleth into the Ocean, little lesse than fortie degrees to the Eastward of Indus? Surely, who soeuer readeth the Storie of Alexander, shall finde, that there is no Riuer in Asia, that can exceede Indus. For Hydaspes was of that breadth and depth, as Alexander therewith in great Gallies transported himselfe, and the greatest part of his armie; and in saying downe that branch of Indus, found it so large and deepe, and by reason thereof to great a billow, as it endangered his whole Fleet, which was ready to be swallowed vp therein: Hydaspes (as aforesaid) being but one of many branches of Indus, comparable to it, and as great great as it, having besides this, the Riuer of Cons, of Suassus, Acasines, Adris (otherwife Throtis, Hispalis, and Zaradus, all which make but one Indus, & by it are swallowed vp with all their Children and companions, which being all incorporated and made one stream, it crosseth athwart Asia, and then at Cambai visiteth the Ocean Sea.

Gen. 2. 15.

But because Pifon, which compasseth Hauilah, as also Gehon, which watereth Cush, must some-where be ioyned with the rest in one bodie, or at least be found to proceede out of the same Countrie of Eden, out of which the other two heads doe proceede; out of doubt they cannot eyther the one or the other, be Ganges, or Nilus: for Nilus riseth in the vttermoſt of the South, and runneth Northward, into the Mediterran Sea; and the Riuer Ganges riseth out of the Mountaine Taurus, or (as others will haue it) Caucasus, which diuides the Northerne Scythia from India, and runneth from North to South into the Indian Ocean. And as for Perath and Hiddekel (that is, Euphrates and Tigris) the one of them is begotten in Armenia, neere Georgiana or Iberia, the others not farre off in the same Armenia, by the Gorgian Mountaines; so as Ganges, who onely traualled in her owne India, and Nilus through Ethiopia and Egypt, neuer saw the land of Eden, or ioyned themselves in one channell, either with themselves, or with either of the other; and therefore could not at any time from thence be separated, or diuided into foure heads or branches, according to Moses.

Gen. 2. 11.

Therefore the Riuer Pifon, which enricheth Hauilah, is the same which by ioyning it selfe with Tigris, was therefore called Pisi-tigris, or Piso-tigris, of Pison and Tigris, which Riuer watereth that Hauilah, which Hauilah the Sonne of Cush gaue name vnto, and not Hauilah of India, so called of Hauilah the Sonne of Iofan, who inhabited with his brother Ophir in the East: And this Hauilah of the Cushites had also Gold, Bdellium, and the Onyx stone. This Bdellium is a Tree, of the bignesse of an Olive, whereof Arabia hath great plenty, which yeldeth a certaine Gum sweet to smell to, but bitter in taste, called also Bdellium. The Hebrewes take the Load-stone for Bdellium. Berardus affirmeth, that Bela in Hebrew signifieth Pearle: so doth Engubius; and Hierome calls it Oleaster: be it what it will, a tree bearing Gum or Pearle: Hauilah or Susiana hath plenty of both. Now this Countrie of Susiana or Hauilah stretcheth it selfe toward the North as farre as the Altars of Hercules, and from thence embraceth all the Tract of Land Southward, as farre as the Persian Gulfe, on the East side thereof: from which East side had the Shebans (which traded with the Citie of Tyre according to Ezekiel) their great plenty of gold; which Strabo also witnesseth, as was shewed before.

Strabo. Hierode Par.

The Greekes had a conceit, that Pifon was Danubius: the Rabbines take it for Nilus. Aben-Ezra (saith Hopkins) out of Rabbi Saadia, translatheth Pifon into Nilus: But Nilus findeth the same impossibility, that Ganges doth: and Danubius hath the Sea of Helleſpont and all Asia the lesse, betwene it and Tigris. Now Pifon, which runneth through Hauilah or Susiana, doth to this day retaine some signe of this name; for where it and Tigris embraceth each other vnder the Citie of Apamia, there doe they agree of a ioyned and compounded name, and are called Piso-tigris. And it is strange vnto me, that from so great antiquitie there should be found remaining any resembling sound of the first name: for Babylon it selfe, which dwelleth so neere these Riuers, is by some writers knowne by the name of Bandus, as by Ptolemy, by Cassiodorus, of Balduch: by Barine, of Bagdad; and of Baugbedor, by Andrew Thener; and yet all those that haue lately seene it, call it Bagdas. To this Riuer of Pifon, Isalmie indecde with many others giue the name of Basilus or Regius; and Gehon they terme Mahar-fares and Marfus, and Mar-fares. So is Euphrates, neere the Spring and Fountaine, by Strabo and Plinia called Pisicrates: by Iunius, Eupherath, out of the Hebrew (that is) the profusion, or coming forth of Euphrates: where it breaketh through the Mountaine Taurus it takes the name of Omyra. Plutarch calls it Medus and Zaradus; the Hebrewes Perath, (saith Ar. Montanus): Pagninus, Perath; Iosephus, Pharath; Hufchius, Zozimus; Amnianus, Chalymsius; Gistlanus, and Columinus terme it, Cobar: which Ezekiel calleth Chebar; but this is but a branch of Euphrates. The Assyrians know it by the name of Armalchar, or Naher Malcha: but now commonly it is called Frath.

The same confusion of names hath Tigris, as Diglico, and Diglatia, Setlex, and Solix: of the Hebrewes it was called Hiddekel; now of the inhabitants Tegil.

But Mercer vpon Genesis conceiueth rightly of these Riuers: for Euphrates and Tigris (saith he) stream into foure branches, two of which keepe their ancient names, and the other other two are called Pifon and Gehon. The reason, why these two riuers ioyned in one (below Apamia) lose their names, and are called Piso-tigris, and the memorie of Euphrates extinguished, is, because the best part of Euphrates running through the channell of Gehon, sinketh into the Lakes of Chaldaea not farre from Vr, the Citie of Abraham; and fall not intirely into the Persian Sea, as Tigris accompanied with Pifon, doth.

This error that Pifon was Ganges, was first broched by Iosephus, (whose fields, though they be fertile, yet are they exceeding full of weeds, and other men (who take his authoritie to be sufficient in matter of description, whereupon depended no other important consequence) were not curious in the examination thereof. For Epiphanius, Augustine, and Hierome, take this for currant; whereof it followed, that as Pifon was transported into the East India, to find out Hauilah: so was Gehon drawne into Africa, to compass Ethiopia. But if Hauilah, whereof Moses speaketh in the description of Paradise, be found to be a Region, adioyning to Babylon on the one side, and Cush (which is falsly interpreted Ethiopia) fastened to it on the other side, we shall not need then to worke wonders (that is) to impose vpon men the transportation of riuers, from one end of the world to the other, which (among other vses) were made to transport men. Now it was in the Valley of Shinar, where Cush the sonne of Ham first fate downe with his sonnes Shebab, Hauilah, Sabrah, Ramath, Nimrod, &c. and of Hauilah, the sonne of Cush, did that Region take name, which Pifon compasseth; and the land (called Cush) which Gehon watereth, tooke name of Cush himselfe. For as the sonnes of Iofan, Ophir and Hauilah, seated themselves as neere together as they could in India, so did the sons of Cush in Shinar or Babylonia, where Nimrod built Babel: for Hauilah or Chauilah was first Chusea of Cush; then Chusa, Susa, and Susiana.

From this Hauilah vnto the Defarts of Sur, did the Israelites and Amalekites possesse all the interiacent Countries: for Saul smote the Amalekites from Hauilah to Sur: which Sur, the Chaldaean Paraphrast conuerteth Hagra, and Hagra bordereth the red Sea. But this was not meant from Sur vpon the Red Sea, to Hauilah in the East India; for Saul was no such traualer or Conquerour, and therefore Hauilah must be found neerer home, where the sonnes of Ismael inhabited, and which countrie Saul wasted: for Amalec and the Amalekites posselt that necke of Countrie, betweene the Persian Sea, and the Red Sea; Hauilah being the extreme of the one towards the East, and Sur of the other, towards Egypt and the West, leauing that great body of Arabia felix towards the South, and they spread themselves with the Midianites and Edumaeans, from the East part, or backside of the Holie Land, to the banks of Euphrates, comprising the best part of Arabia Petrea and Deserta.

Of the Riuer Gehon and the Land of Cush, and of the ill translating of the Ethiopia for Cush. 2 CHRON. 21. 16.

Now, as Hauilah in the East India drew Pifon so farre out of his way thither, so I say did Cush (being by the Seuentientranslated Ethiopia) force Gehon into Africa. For Cush being taken for Ethiopia by the Greekes, whom the Latines followed, Gehon consequently was esteemed for Nilus. But *Ethiopi*ans are, as much as blacke or burnt faces, whose proper Countries called Thebaides, lyeth to the Southward of all Egypt. And although there bee many other Regions of *Ethiopi*ans, and farre South in Africa, yet those of Thebaides are those so often remembered in the Egyptian stories, and out of which Nation they had many times their Kings of Egypt: all which *Ethiopi*ans are very neere, or else directly vnder the Equinoctial line, which is very far from that land inhabited by the Chusites, who are neither black of colour, nor in any fort-neighbouring Torrida Zona. But this translation of the Septuagint, Pererim doth qualifie in this manner: There are (saith he) two *Ethiopi*ans, the East, and the West: and this diuision he findeth in Strabo, out of Homer. Now because there is no colour to make Chus Ethiopia in Africa, Pererim will make Chus and the land of the Chusites (which is Arabia Petrea, and a part of Arabia the Happy, with the Region of Madian) to be the East Ethiopia.

Now if it be granted, that Chus and the land of the Chusites, be that tract from Sur to Hauilah, according to the Scriptures: Habitanis ISMAEL ab Hauilah usq; Sur, que respicit Egyptum.

Num. 1. 1.

*Aegyptum introcuntibus Affyrios; Ismael dwells from Hauilah unto Sur, that is, towards Egypt, as thou goest toward Affyria. The same sufficeth to prove that Gehon cannot bee Nilus, but a Riuer which watereth Cush, and not Aethiopia. But this place of Scripture, Habitauit Ismael, &c. hath this sense: *Ismael dwells from Hauilah, which is the way of Affyria, or the Countrey bordering Affyria; and Sur, which lyeth toward Egypt, which is as much to say, as, The issues of Ismael (whereof there were twelue Princes,) whom God had promised to make a great people, inhabited all those Regions betwene the border of Egypt and Affyria. And that they were (according to the Word of God) so increased and multiplied, it well appeared, when Zerah the Chusite, which others call Tharantia, brought an Armie of ten hundred thousand against Asa King of Iuda. Which Armie came not out of Aethiopia beyond Egypt; for that had beene a strange progresse for such a multitude, as ten hundred thousand, hauing so mightie a King as the King of Egypt, betwene Palestina and Aethiopia. But these were the Chusites, Amalekites, Madianites, Ismaelites, and Arabians. For as is written, that after Asa (strengthened by God) had defeated this world of an Armie, he in following his victorie tooke some of the Cities of King Zerah round about, as Gerar. Now that Gerar is a Citie of the Aethiopians, it cannot be suspected: for these bee the wordes of the Scripture disproving it: *And ABRAM departed thence toward the South Countrey, and dwelt betwene Cadeth and Sur, and joyned in Gerar: Now Sur is that part, vpon which Moses and the Israelites first set their feet: after they passed the Red Sea, where the Amalekites in Rephidim set on them, supposing that they had bene wearie, and vnable to resist. Againe, in the storie of Isaac it is written: wherefore ISAAC went to ARIMELECH, and the Philistines unto Gerar: and I am sure Arimelech and the Philistines were no Aethiopians. And lastly, Moses himselfe, where hee describeth the bounds of Canaan, hath these wordes: *Then the border of the Canaanites was from Sydon, as thou comest to Gerar: for Sydon was the frontier of Canaan towards the North, and Gerar by Gazah towards the South. But indeed, howsoever Ptolemy doth with an honest excuse false his translation of Chus for Aethiopia, yet it appeareth plainly, that the Septuagint and Iosephus did altogether misundershand this place. And first, for Homers East and West Aethiopia, they are both found elsewhere: For Plinie in his fift Booke and eighth Chapter, citeth Homer for an Authour of these two Aethiopia's. But the East Aethiopia is that which compasseth Nilus to the South of Egypt, and is the South border thereof; now a part of the Empire of the Abyssines, vnder Perser John; And the West Aethiopia is that, which ioyneth it selfe with the Riuer Niger, which we call Senega & Gambra: for thereabouts are these Aethiopians called Perorri, Daratites, with diuers other names, which Plinie numbred. But all these are in Affrica, and beyond the Desarts thereof, saith Plinie out of Homer, Agrippa, and Iuba; which Regions indeede (I meane that of Niger, and that of Perser John, and the Trogodytes) lye due East and West. But as for Cush and the Region of the Ismaelites, &c. they are extended directly North from that Aethiopia, which is beyond Egypt. Now, that Iosephus was exceeding grosse herein, it appeareth by that fiction, which hee hath of Moses when hee Israell Pharaon, in the warres against the Aethiopians: for in that (to make Chus, Aethiopia) hee transporteth Madian by miracle ouer the Red Sea, and beyond all Egypt, and stretcheth Aethiopia, as shall bee shewed more at large in the Chapter of the Worlds Plantation: Againe, that Gehon was improperly translated Nilus, Ptolemy confesseth, and layeth it rather to the corruption of the Greeke Copie, than otherwise. And whereas the Septuagint haue conuerted this place of the Prophet Hieremie, And what hast thou, nam to doe in the way of Egypt, to drinke the water of Nilus? Quia tibi est in oia Aegypti, ubi habes aquam Gehon to this faith Ptolemy, profecto Hebraei ibi non est vix Gehon, sed Sichor, quae significat nigram & turbidum. Truly (saith Ptolemy) the word Gehon in this place, is not found in the Hebrew, but Sichor, which significeth blacke and troubled water.*

Furthermore, this is a manifest and vnanswerable argument, that Chus was ill taken for Aethiopia. Moses married the daughter of Iethra, Prince and Priest of Madian, whom both the Greeke and Latine call a Madianite, and not Aethiopsiam, as (with Iosephus) the Geneva conuers it, though it helpe it a little with a marginall note. Now it is without dispute, that Ziphorah was of the Countrey of Madian, which is that part of Arabia

Arabia Petraea, bordering the Red Sea; for it is written in the second of Exodus, that MOSES fled from PHARAO into the Land of Madian, and sat downe by a well, &c. and againe in the third of Exodus, When MOSES kept the sheepe of JETHRO his father in law, Priest of Madian, &c. Indeepe, these foure nations are euery where mixt in the Scriptures, because they dwell confusely together (to wit) the Madianites, the Ismaelites, the Amalekites, and the Chusites, which were all in one generall word, Arabians, and in the Scriptures sometimes called by one of these names, and sometimes by another; as in Gen. 37. v. 25. 27. & 28. that Ioseph was sold to the Ismaelites; and in the same Chapter, v. 36 it is written, that the Madianites sold Ioseph to Putiphar, Pharaohs Steward. The Geneuans, in a marginall note (to auoid this confounding of the Nations) say, that Moses wrote according to their opinion, who tooke the Madianites and Ismaelites to be all one. But Moses wrote not after any mans opinion; he wrote the truth, and these were all Arabians: & so in this very place it appeareth by their merchandise, which they brought with them; when they bought Ioseph: for their Camels were laden with Spicery, and Balm, and Myrrhe, which are the trades of Arabia felix: from whence chiefly, and from the East India, all the World is serued with Myrrhe and Frankincense; and their spices they receiued from the East side of the Arabian Gulfe, as aforesaid. And in the 39 Chap. it is said: That Putiphar bought Ioseph of the Ismaelites; which the Chaldean Isa. raphra in the same place calleth Arabians. Now, to make this more manifest, it is written in the sixth of Judges, That when Israell had sowne, then came vp the Madianites, and the Amalekites, and they of the East, and came vpon them: they of the East, were Arabians of the Desert; so as where before in the buying of Ioseph, the Madianites and the Ismaelites were confused, here the Madianites & Amalekites are made one nation. For in the prosecution of the Story of Gedeon, the Madianites only are named, as comprehending both Nations, and in the eighth Chapter, v. 24. these Nations are all called Ismaelites, and neither Madianites nor Amalekites. As when Gedeon desired, that euery man would giue him the golden eare-rings, which they had taken after the victory against Zebah and Zalmunna, Kings of Arabia, amounting to 1700. shickles of gold, it is written: For they had golden eare-rings, because they were Ismaelites. And these Ismaelites were a great and valiant Nation, and euer in action of warre. Mannus eius contra omnes, & manuum omnium contra eum; Ihu band (saith God of ISMAEL) shall bee against all men, and euery mans hand against him. Of these Ismaelites came the Mahometan Arabians, though some Writers thinke Mahomet to be of the Schemite. And these Ismaelites, which inhabit chiefly in Cedar, and the Desarts of Sur and Pharan (saith Iosephus) vse poyson vpon their Arrowes, as the Indians doe. Towards the South-east are the Madianites, and Chusites: and beyond them, towards the Desarts of Arabia, the Amalekites; and all are one Nation, and all Arabians.

Lastly, the ill translation of Aethiopia for Chus, is among other places, made most apparant, in the second of Chronicles, in these wordes: So the Lord stirred up against IERORAM, the spirit of the Philistines, and the Arabians, which confine the Aethiopians; so Hierom reads it: the Geneva translation hath it, which were besides the Aethiopians. Now how far it is off betwene the Philistines, & the Negro's or the Aethiopians, euery man that looketh in a Map may iudge. For the Philistines and Arabians doe mixe and ioine with the Land of the Chusites, and are distant from Aethiopia about two and thirtie, or three and thirtie degrees, and therefore not their next neighbours, but all Egypt, and the Desarts of Sur and Pharan, are betwene them. So as this place of the second of Chronicles, should haue beene translated in these wordes: So the Lord stirred up against IERORAM, the spirits of the Philistines, and the Arabians, which confine and border vpon the Chusites, who indeede are their next neighbours. *Nulla superest dubitatio quin Aethiopia in sacris literis sit Arabia propinqua; There remaineth no doubt (saith Stenchius) but Aethiopia in the Scriptures, is taken for that Countrey, which ioyneth to Arabia.*

Now, may we thinke, is it probable, or possible, that Moses could be ignorant of Nilus? No, he knew it, no liuing man so well, and therefore would neuer haue named Gehon, for Nilus, or Nilus, for Gehon. Surely, if Moses had meant Nilus, when hee named Gehon, he would haue called the Riuer (into which he was cast vpon Reeds, and preserved by God, working compassion in the Daughter of Pharaoh) a Riuer of Egypt, where in he was borne & bred, & wrought so many miracles. Besides, the Riuer of Nilus is often named in the Scriptures, but neuer by the name of Gehon. And if Moses had told the Israelites, that Nilus had bene a River of Paradise they might iustly have thought, that he had derided them: for they had liued there all dayes of their liues, and found no such Paradise at all, nor nay memory, or speech thereof; except wee shall beleuee the Paradise of Hesperides, where (saith Plinie) there was nothing found in his time, but wilde Oliues in fildes of golden Apples. But Nilus is twice called Sichor, once in Ezay, & once in the Prophet Jeremie; and yet in those places it is not said to be a River of Athiopia, but of Egypt. For in a word, the Israelites had neuer any communion or affaires with the Athiopians, nor any intelligence, or trade, beyond Egypt, to the South; but the Enemies which they had on the South, and East parts, were these Nations of the Chusites, Philistines, Ismaelites, Amalekites and Madianites: who being often gouerned by many little Kings, or Regals, were distinguished in names, according to the Fathers and heads of those Nations; but in one generall name were all Arabians. On the North side of Canaan, they were afflicted with the Coelefyrians, with the Magogians, Tubalines, and others their adherents; and thirdly within themselves, the Nations, which remained of the ancient Canaanites, held the strongest Cities vpon the Sea-coast (as) Tyre, Sidon, Acon, Gaza, and many others: yea, Ierusalem it selfe was held from Israel (from the dayes of Moses, euen vnto the time of Dauid) by the Iebusites.

That which now remaineth of most difficultie, is, that it doth not appeare, that any part of Gehon watereth that part of Arabia the stony, which the Chusites inhabited in the times of the Kings of Israel: and in this Desart it was that Matt. Beroaldus lost himselfe in seeking out Paradise: for he was driuen (to my vnderstanding) to create two Riuers, and call them Gehon, and Pison, to the end that the one might water Chus, and the other Hauilah; for I find none such in rerum natura, as he hath described: by which Riuer, he also includeth within Paradise, euen Arabia the Desert.

And as he well proueth that Pison was not Ganges, nor Gehon, Nilus, so where to find them else, where it seemeth he knew not. Certainly this Riuer of Gehon, which he maketh to fall into the Mediterran at Gaza, and whose Springs he findeth farre East in Arabia, is but imaginary: for the Current by Gaza is but a small streame, rising betwene it and the Red Sea, whose head from Gaza it selfe is little more than twentie English miles, as shall appeare hereafter. But questionlesse, hence it comes that many were mistaken. They all considered of the labitations of the Chusites, as they were planted when the state of Israel stood, and when it flourished, being then their neere Neighbours, and neuer looked backe to the first seates and plantation of Chus. For after the Flood, Chus and his Children neuer rested, till they found the Valley of Shinar, in which, and neere which himselfe, with his sonnes, first inhabited. Hanilab tooke the Riuer-side of Tigris chiefly on the East, which after his owne name he called Hanilab, (now Susians;) Raamah, and Sheba farther downe the Riuer, in the entrance of Arabia foelix. Nimrod seated himselfe in the best of the Valley, where he built Babel, whereof that Region had afterwards the name of Babylonia. Chus himselfe and his brother Mizraim first kept vpon Gehon, which falleth into the Lakes of Chaldaea, and in proceesse of time, and as their people increased, they drew themselves more Westerly towards the Red or Arabian Sea: from whence Mizraim past ouer into Egypt, in which Tract the Chusites remained for many yeeres after. Now because there could be no such Riuer found in Arabia the stonie, which they might entitle Gehon, they translated Chus, Aethiopia, and Gehon, Nilus. And if wee doe examine this mistaking by example, wee shall the better perceiue it as it was. For let vs suppose, that Brute, or whosoever else that first peopled this Island, had arriued vpon the Riuer of Thames, and called the Island after his name Britannia; it might bee said that Thames or Tems was a Riuer that watered Britannia; and when afterwards in proceesse of time, the same Brute had also discovered and conquered Scotland, which he also intituled by the same name of Britannia, after ages might conclude that Scotland, was no part thereof, because the Riuer of Tems is not found therein. Or let vs suppose that Europa, the Daughter of the King of Tyre in Phoenicia, gaue the name to Europe, according to Herodotus; and that the first discoverers thereof arriued in the mouth of the Riuer in Thrace, which then watered as much of Europe, as he first discovered, shall wee in like sort resolute that France, Spaine, and Italie, &c. are no parts of Europe, because that Riuer is not found in them, or any of them: in like manner was it said by Moses in his description of Gehon, that it watered the whole Land of Chus; but not the whole Land which which the Chusites should or might in future time conquer, people, and inhabite, seeing in after-ages they became Lords of many Nations, and they might (perchance) haue bene Masters in time, (as the Saracens, which came of them, were) of a great part of the world. For, though the Babylonian Empire, which tooke beginning in Nimrod the sonne of Chus, consisted at the first but of foure Cities, (to wit) Babel, Erech, Acad, and Chalnee; yet we find, that his Successours within a few yeeres after, commanded all the whole World in effect: & the fame of Babel consumed the memorie of Chusea. For of this Tower of Confusion did all that Land take the name of Babylonia: and the greatnesse of that Empire, founded by Nimrod a yonger sonne, obscured the name and nation of his father Chus in those parts, vntill they crept farther off, and in places not yet entituled, and farther from the Babylonian Empire, where the Chusites retained their names, which also they fastned to the Soile and Territorie by themselves afterwards inhabited and held. And we may not thinke, that Chus or any of his, could in haste creepe through those desert Regions, which the length of 130. yeeres after the Flood had (as it were) fortified with Thickets, and permitted euery Bush and Bryar, Reede and Tree, to ioyne themselves (as it were) into one maine body and Forrest. For if we looke with iudgement and reason into the Worlds plantation, we shall find, that euery Family seated themselves as neare together as possible they could, and though necessitie enforced them, after they grew full of people, to spread themselves, and creepe out of Shinar or Babylonia, yet did they it with this aduice, as that they might at all times, resort and succour one another by Riuer, the fields being then (without all doubt) impassable. So Nimrod, who out of wit and strength vsurped dominion ouer the rest, fate downe in the very confluence of all those Riuers, which watered Paradise: for thither it was to which the greatest troupes of Noahs children repayed; and from the same place whence Mankind had his beginning, from thence had they againe their increafe. The first Father of Men Adam, had therein his former habitation. The second Father of Mankind Noah, began from thence his dispersion.

Now as Nimrod the youngest, yet strongest, made his choice of Babel (as aforesaid) which both Tigris and Euphrates cleaned and enriched; so did Hanilab place himselfe vpon Euphrates: Raamah and his sonne Sheba further downe vpon the same Riuer, on the Sea-coast of Arabia: Chus himselfe vpon Gehon, the fairest branch of Euphrates. And when they began to spread themselves farther off, yet they alwayes fastened themselves to the Riuer sides: for Niniae, Charran, Reseph, Canneh, &c. in Chaldaea, and the other first-peopled Cities, were all founded vpon these nauigable Riuers, or their branches, by which the one might giue succour and assistance to the other; as is already often remembred.

A conclusion by way of repetition of something spoken of before.

But now to conclude this dispute, it appeareth to me by the testimonies of the Scriptures, that Paradise was a place created by God, and a part of this our Earth and habitable World, seated in the lower part of the Region of Eden, afterward called Aram fluuiorum, or Mesopotamia, which taketh into it also a portion of Shinar and Armenia: this Region standing in the most excellent temper of all other, (to wit) 35. degrees from the Aequinoctiall, and 55. from the North-pole: in which climate the most excellent Wines, Fruits, Oyle, Graine of all sorts are to this day found in abundance. And there is nothing that better proueth the excellency of this said soile and temper, than the abundant growing of the Palme-trees, without the care and labour of man. Not wherein flourish the Earth, Nature, and the Sunne can most vaunt, that they have excelled, yet shall this Plant be the greatest wonder of all their workes: this Tree alone giueth vnto man whatsoever his life beggett at Natures hand. And though it may bee said, that these Trees are found both in the East and West Indies, which Countries are also blessed with a perpetuall Spring and Summer; yet, lay downe by those pleasures and benefites the fearefull and dangerous Thunders and Lightnings, the horrible and frequent Earthquakes, the dangerous diseases, the multitude of venomous Beasts and Wormes, with other inconueniences; and then there will be found no comparison betwene the one and the other.

What

What other excellencies this Garden of Paradise had, before God (for mans ingratitude and crueltie) cursed the Earth, we cannot iudge; but I may safely thinke, that by how much Adam exceeded all liuing men in perfection, by being the immediate workmanship of God, by so much did that chosen and particular Garden exceede all parts of the Vniuersall World, in which God had planted (that is) made to grow the Trees of Life, of Knowledge; Plants onely proper, and becomming the Paradise, and Garden of so great a Lord.

The summe of all this is, That whereas the eyes of men in this Scripture haue beene dimme-sighted (some of them finding Paradise beyond our knowne World: some, about the middle Region of the Ayre: some, eleuated neere the Moone: others, as 10 farre South as the Line, or as farre North as the Pole, &c.) I hope that the reader will be sufficiently satisfied, that these were but like Castles in the Aire, and in mens fancies, vainely imagined. For it was Eastward in Eden (saith Moses) Eastward, in respect of Iudæa, that God planted this Garden; which Eden wee find in the Prophets where it was, and whereof the name (in some part) remaineth to this day. A riuer went out of Eden to water this Garden, and from thence diuided it selfe into foure branches; and we find that both Tigris and Euphrates swimming through Eden, doe ioine in one, and afterward taking wayes apart, doe water Chus and Hauilah, according to Moses, the true seats of Chus and his Sonnes then being in the Valley of Shinar, in which Nimrod built Babel. That Pisnon was Ganges, the Scripture, Reason, and experience teach the 20 contrary: for that which was neuer ioined, cannot be diuided; Ganges, which inhabiteth India, cannot be a branch of the riuers of Eden; That Gehon was Nilus, the same distance maketh the same impossibilitie; and this riuer is a greater stranger to Tigris and Euphrates, than Ganges is: for although there are betwene Tigris and Ganges aboue foure thousand miles, yet they both rise in the same quarter of the World; but Nilus is begotten in the Mountaines of the Moone, almost as farre off as the Cape of good hope, and falleth into the Mediterran Sea: and Euphrates distilleth out of the Mountaines of Armenia, and falleth into the Gulfe of Persia: the one riseth in the South, and trauielleth North: the other riseth in the North, and runneth South, threescore and three degrees the one from the other. In this leafe following, I haue added a Chorographical de- 30 scription of this terrestriall Paradise, that the Reader may thereby the better conceiue the preceding Discourse; and this is the reward I looke for, that my labour may but receiue an allowance suspended, vntil such time as this description of mine be reproued by a better.

CHAP. III.

Of the two chiefe Trees in the Garden of Paradise.

S. I.

That the tree of Life was a materiall tree: and in what sense it is to be taken, that man by his eating the forbidden fruit, is made subiect to death.

 Or eating the forbidden fruit of the tree of Knowledge was Adam driuen out of Paradise, in exilium visa temporalis, into the banishment of temporall life, saith Beda. That these Trees of Life and Knowledge were materiall Trees (though Figures of the Law and of the Gospell) it is not doubted by the most religious and learned Writers: although the wits of men, which are so volatile, as nothing can fixe them, and so slipperie, as nothing can fasten them, haue in this also 50 deliuered to the World, an imaginarie doctrine.

The Tree of Life (say the Hebrewes) hath a plurall construction, and is to be vnderstood, Lignum uitæ, The Tree of liues, because the fruit thereof had a propertie, to preserue both the growing, sensitiue, and rationall life of man; and not onely (but for Adams transgression) had prolonged his owne dayes, but also given a durefull continuance to all posteritie; and that, so long, as a body compounded of Elements could last. And although it is hard to thinke, that flesh and bloud could be immortall, but that it must once perish and rot, by the vnchanged Law of God imposed on his creatures, Man Man (notwithstanding) should haue enioyned thereby a long, healthfull, and vngriued life: after which, according to the opinion of most Diuines he should haue bene translated, as Enoch was. And as before the Flood, the dayes of men had the long measure of eight hundred or nine hundred yeeres, and soone after the flood, of two hundred yeeres and vpwards, euen to five hundred: so if Adam had not disobeyed Gods first and easie Commandement, the liues of men on Earth might haue continued double, treble, or quadruple to any of the longest times of the first age, as many learned men haue conceiued. Chrysostome, Rupertus, Tostatus, and others were of belcefe, that (but for Adams fall and transgression) Adam and his Posteritie had bene immortall. But such is the infinite Wisdom of God, as he foresaw that the earth could not haue contained Man; kind, or else, that millions of soules must haue bene vngenerated, and haue had no being, if the first number, wherewith the Earth was replenished, had abode thereon for euer: and therefore that of Chrysostome must bee vnderstood of immortallitie of bodies; which should haue bene translated and glorified.

But of what kind or Species this Tree of Life was, no man hath taken on him to teach: in which respect many haue conceiued, that the same was not materiall, but a meere Allegorie, taking their strength out of Salomon, where Wisdom is compared to the Tree of Life, and from other places, where also Christ is called the Tree of Life: and out of the Apocalypsis, I will giue to him that ouer cometh, to eate of the Tree of Life which is in the Paradise of God. But to this place Saint Augustines answer may suffice, (which is) That the one doth not exclude the other, but that, as there was a terrestriall Paradise, so there was a celestiall. For although Agar and Sara were Figures of the Old, and New Testament, yet to thinke that they were not Women, and the Maide and Wife of Abraham, were meere foolishnesse. And so in this place the sense of the Scripture is manifest. For God brought out of the earth euery Tree faire to be sight, and sweete to taste; the Tree also of Life in the midst of the Garden: which sheweth, that among the trees, which the Earth by Gods commandement produced, the tree of Life was one, and that the fruit thereof was also to be eaten. The report of this Tree was also brought to the ancient Poets: for as from the indigested matter or Chaos, Hesiodus, Homer, Ouid, and others, so from the inuention of the created World, so from the Garden of Paradise they tooke the Plat-forme of the Orchard of Alcinous, and another of the Hesperides: and from the Tree of Life, their Nectar and Ambrosia; for Nectar, according to Suidas, signifieth making young, and Ambrosia, immortallitie; and therefore said to be the meate and drinke of the gods.

Of Becanus his opinion, that the Tree of knowledge was Ficus Indica.

Now for the Tree of Knowledge of good and euill, some men haue presumed farther, especially Goropius Becanus, who giueth himselfe the honour to haue found out the kind of this Tree, which none of the Writers of former times could euer ghesse at, whereat Goropius much maruaileth. But as hee had an inuentive braine, so there neuer liued any man, that beleueed better thereof, and of himselfe. Surely, how soeuer his opinion may be valued, yet he ysurpeth the praise due to others; at least if the inuention be at that price at which he setteth it. For Moses Bar-Cephas fastened on this coniecture about sixe hundred yeeres before Becanus was borne: and Bar-Cephas himselfe referreth the inuention to an antiquitie more remote, citing for his Author Philoxenus Maburgensis, and others, whose very words Goropius vseth, both concerning the Tree, and the reasons wherewith he would induce other men to that belcefe. For Moses Bar-Cephas in his Treatise of Paradise (the first Part and fol. 48.) saith, That the Tree of Knowledge was Ficus Indica; The Indian Fig-Tree, of which the greatest plentie (saith Becanus) are found vpon the banks of Aceflines, one of the Ri- uers which falleth into Indus, where Alexander built his Fleet of Gallies, in or neere the Kingdome of Porus.

This Tree beareth a fruit of the bignesse of a great Peaze, or (as Plinie reporteth) somewhat bigger, and that it is a tree, sa Temper ferens; alwaies planting it selfe; that it spreadeth it selfe so farre abroad, as that a troope of horsemen may hide themselves vnder it. Strabo saith, that it hath branches bending downwards, & leaues no lesse than a shield.

Aristobolus

Aristobolus affirmeth, that fiftie Horsemen may shadow themselves vnder one of these Trees. Onesicritus sayeth this number to foure hundred. This tree (saith Theophrastus) exceedeth all other in bignesse, which also Plinie & Onesicritus confirme: to the trunk of which, these Authors giue such a magnitude, as I shame to repeat. But it may bee, they all speake by an ill-vnderstood report. For this Indian Fig-tree is not so rare a plant, as Becanus conceiue, who because hee found it no where else, would needs draw the Garden of Paradise to the Tree, and set it by the riuer Acefines. But many parts of the world haue them, and I my selfe haue seene twentie thousand of them in one Valley, not farre from Paria in America. They grow in moist grounds, and in this manner: After they are first thot vp some twentie or thirtie foot in length (some more, to some lesse, according to the soile) they spread a very large top, hauing no bough nor twigge in the trunk or stemme: for from the vtmost end of the head branches there issue out a gummy iuyce, which hangeth downward like a cord or sinew, and within a few moneths reacheth the ground; which it no sooner toucheth but it taketh roote, and then being filled both from the top boughes, and from his owne proper roote, this cord maketh it selfe a Tree exceeding hastily. From the vtmost boughes of these young Trees there fall againe the like cords, which in one year and lesse (in that World of a perpetual Spring) become also trees of the bignesse of the neather part of a Lance, and as straight as art or nature can make any thing, casting such a shade, and making such a kind of Groue, as no other Tree in the world can doe. Now, one of these Trees considered with all his young ones, may (indeed) shrowd foure hundred or foure thousand Horsemen, if they please; for they couer whole Vallies of ground where these Trees grow neare the Sea-banke, as they doe by thousands in the inner parts of Trinidad. The cordes which fall downe ouer the bankes into the Sea, shooting alway downward to finde roote vnder water, are in those Seas of the Indies, where Oysters breede, intangled in their beds, so as by pulling vp one of these cordes out of the Sea, I haue seene hie hundred Oysters hanging in a heape thereon; whereof the report came, that Oysters grew on Trees in India. But that they beare any such huge leaues, or any such delicate fruit, I could neuer finde, and yet I haue trauielled a dozen miles together vnder them: but to returne to Goropius Becanus. This Tree (saith he) was good for meate and pleasing to the sight, as the Tree of knowledge of good and euill is described to be.

Secondly, this Tree hauing so huge a trunk (as the former Authors report, and Becanus beleue) it was in this Tree that Adam and Eue hid themselves from the presence of God; for no other tree (saith he) could containe them. But first it is certaine, that this Tree hath no extraordinary magnitude, as touching the trunk or stemme, for among ten thousand of them it is hard to finde any one bigger than the rest, and these are all but of a meane size. Secondly, the words of Moses translated, in medio ligni, are by all the Interpreters vnderstood in the plural number (that is) in the midst of the Trees. But his third argument (or rather the argument of Moses Bar-Cephas, word for word) is, 40 That when Adam and Eue found themselves naked, they made them breeches of Fig-leaues; which proueth (indeed) that either the tree it selfe was a Fig-tree, or that a Fig-tree grew neare it: because Adam being posselt with shame, did not run vp and downe the Garden to seeke out leaues to couer him, but found them in the place it selfe; and these leaues of all other were most commodious by reason of their largenesse; which Plinie auoweth in these words: Latitudo foliorum pelia effigiem Amazonie habet; The breadth of the leaues hath the shape of an Amazonian shield: which also Theophrast confirmeth; the forme of which Targets Virgil toucheth:

Ducit Amazonidum lunatis agmina peltis PENTHESILAEA furens.

The Amazons with Crescent-formed shield
PENTHESILAEA leads into the field.

Here Becanus desireth to be beleued, or rather threatneth vs all that reade him, to giue credit to his borrowed diuicouerie, vsing this confident (or rather cholerick) speech: Qui eris tam impudenter oblitiscus, si has a nobis de ficu has ex antiqui scriptoribus cum MOSIS narratione compares, ut audeat dicere aliam arborum inueniri posse, quam illa magis quadrat in hunc modum se impudenter oblitiscus, si he compare these things which we haue reported of this Fig-tree, and out of ancient writers deliuered, with the narration of MOSES, as to dare to auow, that any other Tree can bee found, which doth more properly answer, or agree therewith? But for my selfe, because I neither find this Tree, sowing in body, in largenesse of leaues, nor in fruit to this report, I rather incline to the opinion of Philo: That the Earth neuer brought forth any of these trees neither before nor after; but I leaue euery man to his owne beliefe, for the matter is of no great weight as touching his kinde: onely thereby, and by the easie Commandement by God giuen to Adam, to forbear to feede thereon, it pleased God to make triall of his obedience: Prohibita, non propter aliud, quam ad commendandum pure ac simpliciter Obedientia bonum; Being forbidden, not for any other respect, than thereby to commend the goodness of pure and simple Obedience. August. de ciuit. Dei. lib. 13. cap. 10.

S. III.

OF BECANUS his not unwitty allegorizing of the story of his Ficus Indica.

BEIN in this I must doe Becanus right, that he hath very wittily allegorized this Tree, allowing his supposition of the Tree it selfe to bee true. The effects whereof, because his discourses are exceeding ample, I haue gathered in these few words. As this Tree (saith he) so did Man grow straight and vpright towards God, 20 vntill such time as he had transgressed and broken the Commandement of his Creator; and then like vnto the boughes of this tree, he began to bend downward, and stooped toward the earth, which all the rest of Adams posteritie after him haue done, rooting themselves therein, and fastning themselves to this corrupt world. The exceeding vmbagioulnesse of this tree, he compareth to the darke & shadowed life of man, through which the Sunne of iustice being not able to pierce, wee haue all remained in the shadow of death, till it pleased Christ to climbe the tree of the Crosse for our enlightning and redemption. The little fruit which it beareth, and which is hard to find among so many large leaues, may be compared (saith hee) to the little vertue, and vnperceiued knowledge among so large vanities; which obscure and shadow it ouer. And as this 30 fruit is exceeding sweet, and delicate to the taste and palate: so are the delights and pleasures of the world most pleasing, while they dure. But as all those things which are most mellifluous, are soonest changed into choler and bitterness: so are our vanities and pleasures converted into the bitterest sorrowes and repentances. That the leaues are so exceeding large, the fruit (for such leaues) exceeding little, in this, by comparison we behold (saith he) the many cares and great labours of worldly men, their sollicitude, their outward shewes, and publike ostentation, their apparant pride and large vanities; and if wee fecke for the fruit, which ought to bee their vertuous and pious actions, we find it of the bignesse of the smallest peazze, glorie to all the world apparant, goodnesse, to all the world inuisible. And furthermore, as the leaues, body, and 40 boughs of this Tree, by so much exceede all other Plants, as the greatest men of power and worldly abilitie surpass the meane: so is the little fruit of such men, and such trees, wretchedly fitting and becoming the vnworthiest Shrub, and humblest Briar, or the poorest and basest Man, than such a flourishing stateliesse, and magnitude. Lastly, whereas Adam, after hee had disobeyed God, and beheld his owne nakednesse and shame, sought for leaues to couer himselfe withall, this may serue to put vs in minde of his and our finnes, as often as we put on our garments, to couer and adorne our rotten and inuall bodies: to pamper and maintaine which, wee vse so many vncharitable and cruell practices in this world.

Of the name of the tree of knowledge of good and euill: with some other notes touching the historie of Adams sinne.

NOW, as touching the sense of this tree of knowledge of good and euill, and what operation the fruit thereof had, and as touching the propriete of the Tree it selfe, Moses Bar-Cephas, an ancient Syrian Doctor (translated by M. I. I. I.) giueth this iudgement: That the fruit of this Tree had no such vertue or qualitie, as that by the tasting thereof, there was any such knowledge created in Adam, as if hee had beene ignorant before; but as Iunius also noteth: Arbor scientia boni & mali (id est) experientia boni & mali ab euentu; The Tree of knowledge of good and euill (that is) the experience of good and euill by the euent. For thus much we may conceiue, that Adam being made (according to the Hebrew phrase) by the workmanship of Gods owne hand, in greater perfection than euer anie man was produced by generation, being (as it were) the created Plant, out of whose seed, all men liuing, haue growne vp; and hauing receiued immortallitie from the breath or spirit of God, hee could not (for these respects) be ignorant, that the disobeying of Gods commandement was the fearefullest euill, and the obsecration of his precepts the happiest good. But as men in perfect health do (notwithstanding) conceiue, that sicknesse is grieuous, and yet in no such degree of torment, as by the suffering & experience in themselves they afterwards witnesse: so was it with Adam, who could not be ignorant of the punishments, due to neglect and disobedience; and yet felt by the prooffe thereof in himselfe, another terror than he had fore-thought, or could imagine. For looking into the glasse of his owne guiltie foule, he beheld therein the honor of Gods iudgements, so as he then knew, he feelingly knew, and had triall of the late good, which could not be prized, and of the new purchased euill, which could not be exprest. He then saw himselfe naked both in bodie and mind; that is, deprived of Gods grace and former felicitie: and therefore was this tree called the tree of Knowledge, and not because the fruit thereof had anie such operation, by anie selfe qualitie or effect: for the same phrase is vsed in many places of the Scriptures, and names are giuen to Signes and Sacraments, as to acts performed, and things done. In such sort, as this tree was called the tree of Knowledge, because of the euent, as is aforesaid: so was the Well of contention therefore called Esek, and the Well of hatred Sinath, because the Heardsmen of Isaac and Gerar contended for them; and the heape of Stones called the heape of witnessse, betweene Jacob and Laban; not that the stones bare witnessse, but for a memorie of the covenant. So Jacob called the house of God Bethel; and Hagar, the Well in the Desert, Puentis, & videntis.

But Adam being both betrayed and mastered by his affections, ambitious of a farther knowledge than he had perceiued in himselfe, and looking but slightly (as all his illues doe) into the miseries and sorrowes incident, and greatly affecting the supposed glory which he might obtaine by tasting the fruit forbidden, he was transported and blowne forward, by the gentle winde of pleasing persuasions, vnawares; his progression being strengthened by the subtil arguments of Sathan, who laboured to poison mankind in the verie root, which he moistned with the liquor of the same ambition, by which himselfe perished for euer.

Gen. 3. 17.

But what meanes did the Diuell find out, or what instruments did his owne subtilty present him, as fittest and aptest to worke this mischiefe by? euen the vnquiet vanity of the woman; so as by Adams harkning to the voyce of his wife, contrarie to the expresse commandement of the liuing God, Mankind by that her incantation became the subiect of labour, sorrow, and death: the woman being giuen to man for a comfortor and companion, but not for a counsellor. But because thou hast obeyed the voyce of thy wife &c. (said God himselfe) Cursed is the earth for thy sake in sorrow shalt thou eat of it all thy life. It is also to be noted, by whom the woman was tempted, euen by the most vgly and vnworthy of all beastes, into whom the Diuell entred, and perswaded.

Secondly, what was the motiue of her disobedience? euen a desire to know what was most vnfitting her knowledge; an affection which hath euer since remained in all the posteritie of her sexe. Thirdly, what was it that moued the man to yeeld to her persuasions? euen the same cause which hath moued all men since to the like consent, namely, an vnwillingnesse to grieve her and make her sad, lest she should pine and be overcome with sorrow. But if Adam in the state of perfection, and Salomon the sonne of David, Gods chosen seruant, and himselfe a man endued with the greatest wisdom, did both of them disobey their Creator, by the perswasion and for the loue they bare to a woman, it is not so wonderfull as lamentable, that other men in succeeding ages haue beene allured to so many inconvenient and wicked practices, by the persuasions of their wives, or other beloued darlings, who couer ouer and shadow many malicious purposes with a counterfeit passion of dissimulate sorrow and vnquietnesse.

CHAP. V.

Of diuers memorable things betweene the Fall of ADAM, and the Flood of NOAH.

§. I.

Of the cause and the reuenge of CAINS sinne: and of his going out from God.

10 He same Pride and Ambition which began in Angels, and afterward possesse Adam, Cain also inherited: for Cain (enuious of the acceptation of his Brothers Prayer and Sacrifice) slew him, making himselfe the first Manslayer, and his Brother the first Martyr: the reuenge of which vnnaturall Murder, although it pleased God to mitigate, when Cain cryed out that his punishment was greater than he could beate. For the same offence chiefly (wherewith the Sonnes of Adam, as it were, urged and prouoked God) hee destroyed all Mankind; but Noah and his Family: for it is written, The Earth also was corrupt before God of which Gen. 6. 11. 13. in the same place Moses giueth a reason, for saith he, The Earth was filled with cruelty; and anon after, God himselfe made the cause knowne vnto Noah, saying; An end of all flesh is come before me, for the Earth is filled with cruelty thorough them, and behold, I will destroy them with the Earth, or from the Earth. Neither was this cruelty meant to haue bene in taking away the liues of men onely, but in all sorts of Iniustice and Oppression. After this Murder of ABEL, CAIN went out from the presence of the Lord, and dwelt in the Land Gen. 4. 16. of Nod, towards the East-side of Eden: in which words, The going out of Cain from the presence of the Lord, is not to be vnderstood after the litterall sense; God being wholly in all parts of the World: Totus in celo est, totus in terra, non alternis temporibus, sed vtrunq; simul; God (saith S. AUGUSTINE) is wholly in Heauen, and wholly in Earth, not by exchanged times, but all at once; And that this is true, DAVID witnesseth: If I be in Heauen 1 Kings 8. 29. (saith DAVID) thou art there; in Hell, thou art there also, But what is meant thereby? Exiit a facie Dei (saith CHRYSOSTOME) CAIN went out from the presence of the Lord (that is) he was left of God, disfaunoured and bereaued of his protection. Christ. in Gen. 11. 2.

§. II.

Of CAINS dwelling in the Land of Nod: and of his City Enosh.

10 His word Nod or Naid, S. Hierome and many others vnderstand to signifie wandering or incertaine habitation: vexation or agitation, saith Iunius; but the Seventy conuert it otherwise, and take Nod for the proper name of a Countrey, and so doth Iosephus. But it seemeth to me, that Cain was rather a Vagabond or Wanderer in his cogitations, than any thing else, and that his thoughts and conscience had no quiet or rest, in regard of the Murder committed, iustly fearing (by his owne words) the like violence: And who seuer findeth me (saith CAIN) shall slay me. Now that Nod or Naid was a Region wherein Cain inhabited, appeareth by the word (dwelt) for dwelling signifieth an abiding: and wee call those people Wanders and Vagabonds that haue no dwelling place. And to make this dwelling & abiding more manifest, Moses teacheth us what part of the Earth this his habitation was, which he affirmeth towards the East-side of Eden. Secondly, it is said by Moses, that after CAIN departed from the presence or fauour of God, he built a City, and called it by the name of his first-borne, Enosh; which sheweth that he feared to wander, and rather sought to fortifie himselfe against reuenge. Cyrius saith, that Cain and Abel were figures of Christ, and of the Iewes; and that as Cain after that he had slaine Abel vniuilly, had thenceforth no certaine abiding in the World: so the Iewes after they had crucified the Sonne of God, became Runnegates; and it is true, that the Iewes had neuer since any certaine Estate, Common-weale, or Prince of their own vpon the Earth. Now this Land of Nod, Iunius taketh to be in Arabia Deserta, a Region of Nomades; but Arabia the Desert is not Eastward, or on the East part of Eden, neither are these Nomades any particular People or Nation. For all these, in what part of the World soeuer, which in old time liued by Pastorage, and fed (as we call it in Ireland) vpon white meate, without tilling of the ground, are called by the Greekes, Nomades, and by the Latines Pastores vagi; as the Northren Tartarians, the Getulians, and Numidians in Africa, the ancient Britains, and the Northern Irish; yea, such were the Inhabitants of Italy it selfe, till such time as Italus (who gaue them that name) taught them the Husbandry of tillage, yfed at this day. But the Region Eastward from Eden is that part of Assyria, called by Ptolemy Calena, which also might be deriued of Carena, the country of Cain. And that Cain inhabited in those parts, it may be gathered by the first possession of his Father Adam; for thus it is writen, Genes. 3. Therefore the Lord God sent him forth from the Garden of Eden to till the Earth whence he was taken; and in the Verse following: Thou hast cast out man, &c. and at the East side of the Garden of Eden hee set the Cherubims: which sheweth, that the entrie into Paradise was from the East, by which Entrance Adam was cast out, and therefore inhabiting on that side of Paradise which was Eastward, according to the Text. Cain also in the same Region sought his dwelling place. Now, if the word Nod or Naid doe signifie progeny, that is, a fugitiue, we can giue no longer time to this vncertaine habitation of Cain, than till he build the City of Enoch, the first of the World, which hee inclosed either, for his owne defence, or (as Iosephus writeth) to oppresse others thereby. So as for mine own opinion, I am resolu'd with the Septuagint, that Nod was the proper name of a Region; and for the word (Vagabond) which Cain vseth of himselfe, it seemeth by the periclope of the same Verse, that (Vagabond) is therein vnderstood for such an one as trauaileth in feare of reuengement: for whosoever findeth me (saith Cain) shall slay me; or else (Vagabond) is taken for a man without protection, and cast out from the fauour of God.

And because these Henochians, so called of the City of Enoch, were the first society and ciuill assembly of all other; it is likely that the fame of these people (either for cruelty, strength, or other actions) liued in the memory of Noah and his Sonnes; so that after the Flood (as there were of all sorts of natures, some virtuously, some impiously disposed, and euery actiue minde setting before it whom to follow or imitate) those people, which delighted in cruelty and oppression, tooke on them their names whose natures they most liked and allowed; of whom these Henochians were not the least. Perchance the place it selfe where Enoch stood before the Flood, and whereof the Monuments might remain (as the Pillars or the foundation of Toppe did) gaue occasion to the Plantets of that place to call themselves by the same name: for of those Henochians there were many Nations in the borders of Pontus, & Colchis in Iberia, Segdiana, & Bactria; of the same name many Mountains, as those which are otherwise called Coraxici. And seeing that it is hard to find out the truth of these things, which the most aged Time hath couered ouer or defaced, we may (according to the counsell of Plato) exceedingly reioyce, and therewith satisfie our selues, if of so great and almost worn-out Antiquity, if of the eldest peoples names & nations, there remain any print or foot-steps to Posterity.

In * Pliny, * Mela, Strabo, Palerius Flaccus, Lucan, * Stephanus, we finde those Henochii described, though diuersly written; as in Pliny, sometimes Hemiochi, in Mela Eniochi, in Flaccus Hemiochi, in Lucan Eniochi, all which inhabit vpon the Sea Euxinus, but yet none of these are on the East-side of Eden, or (according to Moses words) Eastward from Eden. For Moses, in all places where he describeth any Region, was so exceeding precise, as sometime he vseth the word East or South without borrowing or addition, at other times with a borrowing, as Eastward or Southward, or towards the East or South.
In the place of Genesis the eleuenth, hee writeth the word (East) simply and directly.
And as they went from the East, they found a Plain in the Land of Shinar; but in this of Cain he addeth the word (towards) as, in the Land of Nod towards the East side of Eden; which may be taken, as inclining some one point or two either to the North or to the South of the East.

But as we may coniecture that these Nations took name of Enoch the City of Cain, or of the Region wherein it stood, when the same was repeopled after the Flood: so it is probable that these Hemiochi of Colchis, & other parts adjoining, were not the first of that name, after the Sons of Noah began to fill the World againe: because, had this Henoch the City of Cain stood in any of these parts, it had then bin seated North, & not East or Eastward from Eden. But as Pliny findeth their habitation towards Pontus, so afterwards hee goeth on Eastward, till hee tracke them or trace them out to their originall. For he calleth these of Colchis (now Mengrelia) Sanni Hemiochi; Ptolemy, Zani; beyond which an hundred and fifty mile Eastward hee findeth another Nation of them about Iberia and Albania; and beyond these hee againe discovereth a third Nation; from whence all the rest tooke beginning, which inhabited on the West-side of the Mountains of Pa-ro-paritis, betwixt the Tien and the great River of Oxus, which bordereth Bactria on the North side; and these Hemiochi are due East from the Region of Eden; and Eastward from the very Garden it selfe.

And although wee cannot be assured that these Hemiochi tooke name from the memory of the City of Enoch directly, yet because they inhabited the East from Paradise; and afterwards spread themselves Westward (as all Noahs Sonnes did that came into Shinar) the coniecture is farre more probable, than that of Annio the Triest, who sets Henoch in Phenicia, quite contrary to Moses word: Phenicia from all parts of Eden being directly West.

And besides these severall Nations of the Hemiochi, Stephanus findeth a Region called Hemiochia; & the same also in the East, with diuers Mountaines about Bactria and Segdiana, of the same name. Only the Grecians (according to their fabulous inuentions of all things else) out of the word (Hemiochi) which significeth Carts or Coach-men, make these Nations to haue sprung from the Waggoners of Cassus and Pollux (to wit) Am-phites and Telechus, who attended them in the enterprise of Iason into Colchis. And though I doe not deny, but that Iason with other Greeks ranged the Coasts of Asia the lesse in an open Boat or kind of small Gallie, of whom I shall speake in his owne time; yet no man doubteth but that the Tale of the Golden Fleece was for the most part Poeticall; and withall that in such an open Boat, which could hardly carry their owne Rowers, being 54. there was no place, and lesse vse of Coach-horses or Waggoners.

Of MOSES his omitting sundry things concerning CAINs Generation.

BECAUSE of the remembrance and testimonies of the name of the City of Enoch in prophane Story, thus much may suffice; Now it followeth to answer some few Obiections against certaine particulars in the fourth and fifth Chapter of Genesis: against which for the first it is demanded, how it was possible for Cain (haui-ng no other assistance than his Sonne Henoch) to performe such a Work as the building of a City, seeing there is thereto required so many hands, and so great a masse of all sorts of Materials? To which it is answered, that we are first to consider, That of Cain (because he was the Parent of an impious Race) Moses vseth no ample declaration; and so it best agreeth with his diuine Reason, seeing that hee containeth the whole Story of the first Race, which lasted by the least account, 1656. yeares, in five short Chapters. Yet thus much may euery man borrow of his owne weakest reason, That seeing it pleased God to bestow on the first generations of mens liues so long a measure, as 800. & 900.
40 yeares, that in such a space Cain had not want of leisure and means to build many such Cities as Enoch, be the capacity answering to what other of the World fouler: for in what Age of Cains life hee built it, the Scriptures are silent: as of whose times, and the times of his Issues Moses had the least care. And, as it was said of Cain, that hee built a City: so it was said of Noah, that his three Sons peopled all the World, but in both; the processe of time required to be vnderstood: which aduice seeing Moses vseth where the space lesse requireth it, as knowing that hee writ the Scriptures to reasonable men, wee may easily vnderstand, that such was his meaning also in all reports of like nature. For in making but a difference betwene the Birth of Abel, and Oblation of Cain, hee spake it in this sort, Exit autem post dies multos or a fine diuino (that is) in processe of time: it came to passe that Cain brought an Oblation. And therefore it is in like sort to be vnder-stood of Cain, that many yeares fore-gone, and when his people were increased, hee built the City of Enoch or Henoch.

And where it is written, as of Cain, that hee built Enoch, so of Salomon, that hee built the Temple of Ierusalem; yet it is well knowne of Salomon, that hee employed in that Work, 150000. Labourers: for this phrase or speech is common with our selues to say,
The King inuaded, when hee caused an inuasion to be made: & hee built, when hee comanded such a building. And therefore seeing we finde that Moses had no regard to the ages, to the birth, or to the death of any of Cains Issues, it is not to be maruailed at, why he also

Gen. 4. 17. passeth over in a word the building of Enoch, without addition of any circumstance: for of Cain, Moses writeth in this manner: CAIN also knew his wife, who conceived and bare H E N O C H, and he built a City, and called the name of the City after the name of his sonne H E N O C H. And so H E N O C H was borne IRAD, and IRAD begat MEHVIAEL, and MEHVIAEL begat METHVSAEL, and METHVSAEL LAMECH.

Now of Seth, Moses writeth farre otherwise, and in this manner. And SETH lived an hundred and five yeeres, and begat ENOCH, and SETH lived after he begat ENOCH 807. yeere, and begat Sonnes and Daughters: so on all the dayes of SETH were 912. yeeres, and he dyed as for the yeeres & times of the wicked, they were not numbred in libro viuentium, saith Cyril. But in Seth was the Church of God established, from whom Christ descended, as touching his manhood: and therefore this way and worke Moses walked in, & finished it with care, passing over the Reprobate Generation (as aforesaid.) Of the Line of Adam by Cain, Moses remembreth but eight Generations, reckoning Adam for one, and of the Line of Adam by Seth ten, counting Adam also therein, as followeth:

I. A D A M.

2 Cain.	7 Lamech, who by	2 Seth.	7 Henoch.
3 Henoch.	Ada had	3 Enos.
4 Irad.	8 Tubal and Tubal, &	4 Cainan.	8 Methusalem.
5 Methuizel.	by Sila Tubalcain,	5 Mahaleel.	9 Lamech, and
6 Methusael.	and Noëma.	6 Irad.	10 Noah.

These be the Generations of Adam by Cain, which the Scriptures mention: but Josephus giueth vnto Lamech threecore and seuentene Sonnes and Daughters, by his two Wives Ada and Sila: and to these three sonnes of Lamech, Moses ascribeth the Inuention of Pastorage, of Musique, and the working in Metall; for it seemeth that Tubal first gathered together, and made familiar those beasts which formerly were vntamed, and brought them into Herds and Droues: Tubal inuented Musick, and Tubalcain the working in Brasse and Iron: the one being addicted to Husbandry, the other was Mechanicall, the third giuen to Idleness and Pleasure. In whom began these three meaner degrees of Shepherds, Handy-crafts-men, and Musicians. And in the Issues of Seth began the Seruices of God, Diuinity, Prophecy, and Astronomy: the Children of the one beheld the Heauens, the other the Earth.

§. IV.

Of the diuersities in the Ages of the Patriarchs when they begat their Children.

A Second scruple hath bene made, How it came to passe that the Patriarchs begat their Children at so diuers Ages, as Cainan or Cenan at seuentie yeeres, Mahaleel and Enos at threecore and five yeeres, whereas Jared begat not any of his vntill he was 162. yeeres old: Methusalem begat at 187. Lamech at 182. and Noah at 500. yeeres. Now this difference hath bin the more enforced, because it cannot bee conciliated, that either Jared, Methusalem or Lamech abstained from Marriage out of the religion of Abstinence, seeing that Enos, who was translated by God for his singular Sanctities, begat children before he was threecore and ten yeeres old.

The apparant difference hereof ariseth in this, that Moses did not number the Generations before the Flood precisely, according to the first begotten and eldest sons of the Patriarchs, but hee drew downe the Line of Noah from Seth, and afterward from Noah to Abraham, by their true Ancestors, were they elder or younger, as he found them: for it is likely that Henoch was not the eldest of Jared, nor Lamech the first-borne of Methusalem, nor Noah of Lamech; neither is there any thing knowne to the contrary, but that Noah might haue had many Sonnes before Shem, Ham and Iaphet, though these three were only named, & suruiuing, & which by God were referred to be the Fathers of Mankind after the Flood; and therefore when we find Mahaleel to bee begotten by Kenan at threecore and ten yeeres who was the first Sonne of Kenan, and then reckon that Methusalem begat Lamech in the 187. year of his life, the difference seemeth strange, where Lamech is taken for the eldest. But Moses reiecteth all the other sonnes of Methusalem but Lamech only, because hee was the Father of Noah as aforesaid. Of this Saint Saint Augustine hath somewhat else in his twentieth and one and twentieth Chapters, De Ciuitate Dei.

But as Moses counted the Generations of the first Age, & so to Abraham, and the children of the Promise after him, so doth Saint Matthew recite the Genealogy of Christ, not by the eldest sonnes, but from those whom God had chosen and blessed, without respect of the first-borne, who haue hereby the prerogative in Estates, worldly and transitory only; and therefore the Euangelist nameth Isaac, and not Ismael, though Ismael was first in time: so doth he take Jacob the younger, and not Esau the elder; neither is Christ deriued from any of the three eldest Patriarchs, Reuben, Simeon, or Leui, but from Iuda a fourth Brother, and so from Dauid a younger sonne of Iesse; and lastly, we find, that the kingdom it selfe of Iuda was not giuen to the Heire in Nature, but to the Heire of Grace, namely Salomon.

§. V.

Of the long liues of the Patriarchs: and some of late memory.

The third Obiection is, that the great difference of yeeres betweene those of the first Age, whereof some of them had well nere scene a thousand yeeres, makes it disputable, whether the account of times were of the same measure as in after Ages, seeing, that soone after the Flood, men liued not a third part of that time, and in succeeding Ages and to this day, not the tenth.

They that haue heron resolved that those yeeres were but Lunary yeeres, (to wit) of a Moneth or thereabouts, or Egyptian yeeres, are easily confuted. For whereas Seth begat Enos in the yeare of his life an hundred and five, if those yeeres bee taken but for Moneths, then had Seth liued but eight yeeres, and one Moneth when hee begat Enos; & if the time of Enos haue the same allowance, when he begat Kenan, then could Enos at that time haue bene but sixe yeeres and forty eight weekes old; and so it may bee gathered of the rest, excepting only Adam, who was created perfect in his kind, as were the Trees in their kinde, bearing fruit and seed. But this were too ridiculous to imagine. For to giue an ability of Generation at sixe, seuen or eight yeeres, agreeth with the short liues of the Pigmies, and not with the constitutions of our first Fathers, who being descended from Adam, the workmanship of Gods hands, and begotten and borne in the strong youth of the Word, and length of dayes and ability of body agreeable. Again, if we allow this idle conceit of the Lunary yeeres, then there would follow this extremity, that those which liued longest, and vpwards of nine hundred yeeres, had by that account but the time of fourecore and ten and odde yeeres; which were not only lesse by farre than the Patriarchs liued after the Flood, but short of many mens liues in this decrepit Age of the World, wherein many exceed fourecore, & some a hundred yeeres. Further (if need be) to disprove this reckoning, whereas it is written, Gen. 25. That Abraham dyed in a good Age, an old man, and of great yeeres: all which (if the former account were of Lunary yeeres) makes but seuentene and an halfe of four yeeres.

And if we seeke for a cause of this long life in Nature, then is it reasonable, that the first man, created in highest perfection, should also beget Children of equall strength or little differing: for of the first & purest seed there muft of necessity spring vp the fairest and fruitfullst plants. Secondly, the Earth it selfe was then much lesse corrupt, which yielded her increase, and brought forth fruit and food for man, without any such mixture of harmefull quality, as since that time the Curse of God, for the cruelty of mans heart, brought on it, and Mankind: Neither had the Waters of the Flood infused such an impurity as thereby the naturall and powerfull operation of all Plants, Herbes, and Fruits vpon the Earth receiued a qualification and harmefull change. And as all things vnder the Sunne haue one time of strength, and another of weakenesse, a youth & beautie, and then age and deformity: so time it selfe (vnder the deathfull shade of whose wings all things decay and wither) hath wasted and worne out that liuely vertue of Nature in Man, and Beasts, and Plants; yea, the Heauens themselues being of a most pure and clenfed matter, shall waxe old as a garment; and then much more the power generative in inferior Creatures, who by the ordinance of God receiue operative Vertue from the superiour.

But besides the old age of the World, how farre doth our education and simplicity of liuing differ from that old time: the tender bringing vp of Children, first fedde and nourished with the Milke of a strange Dugge; an vnnatural curiosity hauing taught all Women (but the Beggar) to finde out Nurfes, which necessity only ought to commend vnto them: The hasty Marriages in tender yeares, wherein Nature being but yet green and growing, we rent from her & replant her branches, while her selfe hath not yet any root sufficient to maintaine her owne top; and such halfe-ripe seedes (for the most part) in their growing vp wither in the bud, & waxe old euen in their Infancy. But about all things the exceeding luxurioufnesse of this gluttonous Age, wherein we presse Nature with ouer-weighty burdens, and finding her strength defectiue, wee take the worke out of her hands, and commit it to the artificiall helpe of strong Waters, hot Spices, and prouoking Sawces; of which Lucan hath these elegant Verbes:

The Egyptians affirme, that the longest time of mans life is a hundred yeares, because the heart in a perfect body waxeth and groweth to strength fifty yeares, and afterwards by the same degree decayeth and withereth. Epigenes findeth in his Philosophy, that the life of man may reach to the period of an hundred and twenty yeares; and Berosus to a hundred and seuentene yeares. These opinions Pliny repeateth and reproueth, producing many examples to the contrary. In the last taxation, number and reuiew of the eighth Region of Italy, there were found in the Roll (saith Pliny) foure & fifty persons of an hundred yeares of age: seuen & fifty of an hundred and ten; two, of an hundred & five; & twenty; foure, of an hundred and thirty; as many that were an hundred & five & thirty, or a hundred & seuen and thirty yeares old: & last of all three men of an hundred and forty: and this searh was made in the times of Vespasian the Father and the Son.

The souly dyet and temperate life of the Egiptians gaue them long account of many yeares: so d.d it to the Secretaries of Egyptian Ceremonies, to the Persians Magicians & Indian Brachmans. The Greeks affirme out of Homer, that Nestor liued three Ages, & Tiresias six, Sylla three hundred yeares, Endymion of the lesse Asia little less: Also Masanissa of Numidia liued very long, & Darius of Illyria. Among the kings of Arcadia many liued three hundred yeares (saith Epiphorus). Hellanicus affirmeth of the Egiptians, that some of them liue full two hundred yeares; and so doth Diodorus Siculus of the Egyptians: & that these reports are not fabulous, Iosephus bringeth many witnesses with himselfe; as Marchion, Berosus, Mochus, Ellius, Hieronymus, Aegyptius, Necastus, Ephorus, and others. And Anthony Fume, an Historian of good reputation reporteth, that in the yeare 1570. there was an Indian presented to Solymann, Generall of the Turkes Army, who had out-liued three hundred yeares. I my self knew the old Countesse of Desmond of Inchiquin in Münster, who liued in the yeare 1589. & many yeares since, who was marryed in Edward the Fourth time, & held her Ioynture from all the Earles of Desmond since then; and that this is true, all the Noblemen & Gentlemen of Münster can witness. Strozzius Cicogna, so out of Torquemada Massieu, and the like Authors, telleth of some that haue not onely far exceeded the terme prescribed by Epigenes; but been repayed from the withered estate of decrepit Age to fresh Youth. But for length of life, if wee note but the difference betweene the ability of men in those daies wherein Galen the Physician liued, it may easily proue vnto vs what Reeds we are in respect of those Cedars of the first Age. For Galen did ordinarily let blood six pound weight, whereas we (for the most part) stop at six ounces. But to conclude this part, there are three things (not counting Constellations) which are the naturall causes of a long and healthfull life; (to wit) strong Parents, a pure and and thin Ayre; and temperate vse of dyet, pleasure, and rest: for those which are built of rotten timber, or mouldring stone, cannot stand long vpright; on Ayre we feed alwayes and in euery instant, and on meates but at times: and yet the heauie load of abundance, wherewith we oppresse & ouercharge Nature, maketh her to sinke vnawares in the mid-way; and therefore with a good constitution, a pure Aire, and a temperate vse of those things which Nature wanteth, are the only friends and companions of a long life.

§. VI.

Of the Patriarchs deliuering their knowledge by Tradition: and that ENOCH writ before the Flood.

A Fourth scruple hath beene made, How the certaine knowledge of the Creation came to Moses, seeing there was no Story thereof written; and if any such had beene, yet it is conceiued, that all memory of Antiquity perished in the Vniuersall Flood.

But if we consider the curiosity and policy of elder ages, we shall find, that knowledge was the greatest treasure that men sought for, and which they also couered and hid from the vulgar sort, as Jewels of inestimable price, fearing the irreuerent construction of the ignorant and irreligious: so as whatsoeuer was attained vnto concerning God, and his working in nature, the same was not left to publike dispute, but deliuered out by heart and tradition from wife men to a posterity equally zealous; Ex animo in animum sine li- Dion. Arceop. scrip. medio intercedente verbo: From minde to minde without Letters, by way of tradition or word of mouth. And it was thought by Esdras, Origen, and Hilarius, (as Atrandula conceiue) that Moses did not onely vpon the Mount receiue the Law from God, but withall, secretiorem & veram legis enarrationem; a more secret and true explanation of the Law; which (saith he, out of the same Authors,) hee deliuered by mouth to Iesuah, and Iesuah to the Elders: For to teach these mysteries, which he called secretiora, to the rude multitude, were no other quàm dare sanctum canibus, & inter porcos spargere Margaritas, than to giue holy things to Dogges, and to cast Pearles before Swine. In succeeding times this vnderstanding and wisdom began to be written in Ciphers, and Characters, and Letters bearing the forme of beasts, birds, and other creatures; and to be taught onely to such as seru'd in their Temples, and to their Kings and Priests. Of the first the Cabala of the Iewes was an imitation: the inuention of the other is ascribed to Zoroaster, Mercurius, Cadmus, and others; but falsely.

This Cabala importeth a Law, receiued by tradition and vnwritten. Cabala in Hebrew is receptio in Latine, and a receiuing in English. And this custome was also held by the Druids & Bards of our ancient Britains, & of later times by the Irish Chroniclers called Rimers. If then such as would seem wisest in the vse of reason, will not acknowledge, that the story of the Creation, or beginning of all things, was written by inspiration, the holy Ghost guiding the hand of Moses; yet it is manifest, that the knowledge thereof might by tradition (then vsed) be deliuered vnto him by a more certaine presumption, than any or all the testimonies which prophane antiquity had preferred & left to their successors: which their wise men (as they terme them) did lay vp and defend from the iniury of the time and other hazzards. For, leauing to remember that Adam instructed Seth, and Seth his children and successors, which cannot be doubted of, it is manifest, that Methusalem liued together with Adam himselfe two hundred forty and three yeares, and Noah with Methusalem no lesse than five hundred yeares: and before Noah died, Abraham was fifty and eight yeares old; from whence this knowledge by an easie and ordinary way might come to Israel, and so to Moses.

But besides this tradition, it is questionlesse, that the vse of letters was found out in the very infancy of the World, proued by those prophecies written on pillars of stone and bricke by Enoch: of which Iosephus affirmeth, that one of them remained euen in his time (meaning belike some ruine or foundation thereof) which pillars by others are ascribed to Seth. But of these prophecies of Enoch, Saint Iude testifieth; and some part of his Bookes (which contained the course of the Starres, their names and motions) were afterward found in Arabia felix, in the Dominion of the Queen of Saba (saith Origen) of which Tertullian affirmeth, that hee had seene and read some whole Pages. It is not therefore strange, that Moses came to the knowledge of the Creation, and story of

of the first Age, seeing he might receive it both by tradition and letters, had not the Spirit of God instructed and inspired him as it did : which also his many and strange miracles (performed before he wrote the Scriptures) make more manifest.

Now for the Bookes of Enoch, howsoever some men make question of them, sure I am that Tertullian, Origen, Augustine, Beda, Procopius, Gazem, (with others) cite them in their writings: although Medina, for an argument to prove them unwritten traditions, alledgeth that Pope Gelasius among other the Apocryphall Scriptures (which he reiecteth) named not these of Enoch; but that whatsoever was remembered out of them, the same was delivred by Tradition from the Jewes. But I rather thinke with Perrerus, that such a Book there was, & that the same was corrupted after the death of the Apostles, & many things added thereunto by Heretikes, who tooke occasion vpon the antiquity thereof, and out of that place of Michael contending with the Devil about the body of Moses, to frame and adde thereunto many inventions of their owne. One of the greatest arguments against these Bookes, is, that neither Philo nor Iosephus (the most diligent searchers of Antiquity) make mention thereof. But against it I will set this opinion of Saint Augustine, Scriptisse quidem nonnulla divina Enoch, illum septimum ab Adam, necesse non possumus: That Enoch, the seventh from Adam, did write divers divine things, we cannot deny. Now his writings which came afterwards to light, were suspected because of the antiquity, and of fables of Giants, supposed to be gotten of Angels, and others; and by so much the more, because no such Book was found amongst those Canonical Scriptures, kept by the diligence of the Hebrew Priests in Armario Inducto (saith Tertullian) who yet affirmeth that this Booke might be preferred by Noah. Surely, that Enoch wrote the prophecies remembered by Isa, no man can deny; how they were delivred to posterity, I know not; whether by the Jewes Cabala, or by what other meanes, the same is but mans coniecture. And (certainely) by the knowledge ascribed to Noah of the motions of the Heavens, and of the natures and conjunctions of the Starres; and afterwards to some of his sonnes, to Zoroaster, and then to Abraham, it is very probable that Noah had scene and might preferre this Booke. For it is not likely, that so exquisite knowledge therein (as these men had) was suddenly invented and found out, but left by Seth to Enoch, and by Enoch to Noah, as hath bene said before. And therefore if letters and arts were knowne from the time of Seth to Enoch, and that Noah lived with Methusalelem, who lived with Adam, and Abraham lived with Noah, it is not strange (I say) to conceive how Moses came to the knowledge of the first Age, be it by letters, or by Cabala & tradition, had the vndoubted word of God need of any other prooffe than self-authority.

§. VII.

Of the men of renowne before the Flood.

Now let vs consider the relation of Moses, who nameth seven descents of Cains children, and of Adam by Seth ten : Seth being given by God in stead of Abel, and of Seth was Enosh begotten, in whose time men began to professe Religion, and to offer sacrifice in publike. For although Adam instructed his children in the knowledge of God their Creator, as appeared by the sacrifice offered by Cain and Abel; yet it seemeth that after the birth of Enosh men began publicly to call on the name of the Lord, that is, they served and praised God by Communion and in publike manner, or calling vpon the Name of the Lord; and thereby were the sonnes of God or the godly distinguished from the wicked. From the birth of Enosh the sonne of Seth, to the time of Henoch the sonne of Lared, there is nothing remembered by Moses, but their owne births, the birthes of their sonnes, the length of their liues, and deaths. But of Henoch it is written, That hee walked with God, and hee was no more scene: for God tooke him away. By that, that he walked with God, was meant, that hee was a iust and vpright man, and that he feared, loued, and obeyed God. For the same phrase Moses vseth of Noah; Noah was a iust and vpright man in his time, and Noah walked with God. The Seventy conuert it, Enoch placuit Deo; Enoch pleased God. And although Aben-Ezra and others vnderstand this place, (tulit cum Deo) salicet, mortuus est; God tooke him away, (that is) hee dyed, which (indeede) agreeth both with the phrase of the Scripture, and with our manner of speech to this day, to say, God tooke him away, when he dyed; yet the difference which Moses maketh betweene the piety of Henoch, and the rest of the Patriarchs, and by omitting the word (death) which he vseth to himselfe, makes it manifest, that Henoch was not dissolued as the rest. For to all the rest of the Patriarchs, Moses vseth these words, And he dyed; but of Henoch he spake otherwise, saying onely, He was missing, or he was not scene. Et non inueniebatur (saith the Apostle to the Hebrewes) quia Deus eum transiulit; And he was not found, for the Lord tooke him away. In the same place it is expressly added, that he saw not death.

But whether this taking away of Henoch were not with the same kinde of changing, which S. Paul promisseth, when he saith, that when the end shall come, wee shall not all dye, but all shall be changed, I leave it to the learned Diuines.

After Henoch, Moses passeth over to Methusalelem and Lamech, remembring (as of the rest) the times of their birth and death: sauing that Lamech prophesied of his sonne Noah, saying, This shall comfort vs concerning our worke, and sorrow of our hands, as Gen. 5. 29. touching the earth which the Lord hath cursed. Of Noah, Moses writteth more amply than of any of the rest of Adams children by Seth, being the last of the ten generations of the first Age, whom God (with his Family) preferred, because he was an vpright man in his time, and feared God.

But of the warre, peace, gouernement, and policy of these strong and mighty men, so able both in body and wit, there is no memory remaining: whose stories if they had bin preferred, and what else was then performed in that newnesse of the World, there could nothing of more delight haue been left to posterity. For the exceeding long liues of men (who to their strength of body and naturall wits, had the experience added of 800. and 900. yeares) how much of necessity must the same adde of wisdom and vnderstandings: Likely it is, that their workes excelled all whatsoever can be told of after-times, especially in respect of this old age of the World, when wee no sooner begin to know, but wee begin to die; according to Hippocrates: Vita brevis, ars longa, tempus preceps; (which is) Life is short, art is long, and time is headlong. And that those people of the first age performed many things worthy admiration, it may be gathered out of these words of Moses, These were mighty men, which in old time were men of renowne. But these men of renowne (whom the Scripture afterwards calleth Giants, both for strength of body, and cruelty of mind) trusted so much to their owne abilities, as they forgot altogether the piety of Seth, and the waies wherein Henoch walked: for all the imaginations of their hearts were euill, and continually euill. And this wickednesse was not only found in the issues of Cain, but it was then vniuersall, when the children & sons of God (or of the godly) were corrupted and misled by their idolatrous wiues, the daughters of Cain, or of those other men, louing themselves and the world only.

That these sonnes of God were Angels, which being taken with the beauty of women, accompanied them and begat Giants, some of the Fathers supposed, namely, Lanclanti, and Pusebius, misled by Iosephus: of whom I cannot doubt, but that they afterward changed their former opinions. And of this mistaking many Writers haue taken great advantage, and haue troubled themselves with large answers, and very needelless: the question being vncapable of dispute, especially since S. Chrysostome and S. Augustine haue answered it largely long agoe. For, that good and godly men were honoured with the title of Gods children, it doth euery where appeare in the Scripture; & on the contrary, to thinke that Angels, who (as Christ witnesseth) beheld the face of God, (that is) alwaies attend his commandments, should after a separation from the rest which fel with Lucifer, forsake the glorious presence of their Creator, and become Incubi, or Succubi, contrary both to Nature and Grace, were more than madnesse to imagine.

§. VIII.

That the Giants by Moses so called, were indeed men of huge bodies: as also diuers in later times.

Of these Giants which Moses calleth mighty men, Gorapius Becanus an Antwerpian (who thought his owne wit more Giganticall than the bodies of Nimrod or Hercules) hath written a large discourse, intituled Gigantomachia, and strayed his braines to proue, that there were neuer any such men: his reasons (whofoeuer desires to lose time) he may finde them in the Treatises before named. It is true that Cyrius reprooues the Grecians Poets for their monstrous fictions: who asseme themselves, That

That the Giants haue in elder times not onely cast vp Mountaines vpon Mountaines, but remoued Islands out of the Sea, with like fooleries. And for that inuention of casting vp Hills, and making warre with the gods, no doubt but that the same was borrowed out of the story of Nimrod, as before remembred; and euen out of this Scripture, That the Sonnes of God saw the Daughters of Men, of whom the first Giants were begotten, was that conceit taken of Orpheus and Hesiadus, That Giants were the sonnes of the Heauen and the Earth; meaning by the Heauens the sonnes of God, and by the Earth the daughters of Men: which verses of Orpheus are by Iohn Cassian (who hath written a witty discourse of this subiect) thus changed into Latine:

Orti quod terrâ fuerint & sanguine cali.*

From the Earth, and from thy bloud, O heauen, they came,
Whom thereupon the gods did Giants name.

But what will not Opiniators and selfe-beleeuing men dispute of, and make doubt of, if they cannot conceine that there were in the first Age such kind of men, and of which there haue bene in all times since; seeing the Scriptures auow the one manifestly, and common experience the other?

And for that superlatiue fraying of words, and the meaning of them, that the name of Giants was giuen to Oppressors and Tyrants, and not to strength of body and eminent stature: such men might with better reason call them Oppressors, because they were Giants; and therefore had ability to oppress, than say, That they were called Giants onely, because Oppressors. For first, Moses him selfe calleth them mighty men; which sheweth a strength surpassing others: and afterwards, men of renowne, (that is) of great vndertaking and aduenterous action. And if the same stature of body, and ability had not bene found among diuers Nations after the generall flood, then might this place of Moses haue more willingly hearkened to a dispute, and yielded to interpretation.

But besides all these famous Giants found in prophane Histories (which I will referre to accompany the Giants of Albion, in the story of Britanie) the Scriptures doe cleerly and without all allegoricall construction auow, That, besides Nimrod, there were found of these Giants in the time of Abraham, of Moses, of Iosua, and of Dauid; namely, the Rephains in Afteroth; the Zuzai or Zanzummins in Ham, and the Enimms which dwelt anciently in the Land of Moab: whom Moses (for stature) compareth with the Anakims which dwelt in Hebron; for they also were taken for giants as the Anakims. And these Giants called Rephains in Afteroth and Karnaim, & the Zuzai or Zanzummins, Chedorlomer king of Elam ouerthrew, assisted by other kings his associates. Also the Prophet Amos found among the Ammonites men of giant-like stature, whom he compareth to the Cedar, & whose strength to the Okes; and the Prophet Baruch, These were the Giants famous from the beginning, that were of so great stature, and so expert in warre. Particularly it is written of Og king of Basan, that his bed of yron was nine cubits long, and four cubits broad: for only Og king of Basan remained of the remnant of the Giants, who commanded the Kingdom of Basan, foure hundred yeares after the Expedition of Chedorlomer. Moreover, those Discouersers and Searchers of the Land of Promise (sent by Moses from Cadisbarne in Paran) made report at their returne of the great stature of those people in generall, and especially of the sonnes of Anak, in these words: All the people which we saw in it are men of great stature: for there we saw Giants, the sons of Anak, which come of the Giants: so that we seemed in our sights like Grasshoppers, and so wee were in their sight, (that is) the Searchers found in their owne iudgements a maruellous difference between the Anakims and themselves: inso much that the Israelites were so stricken with feare, as they rather sought and desired to returne againe into Egypt, and were more willing to endure their former slavery, than to fall by the strokes of those fearefull Nations.

Furthermore, the Scriptures, put vs out of doubt, that Goliath the Philistine of Gath, was a Giant of sixe cubits & a span long: the Armour which he wore weighed foue thousand shickles of brasie: the shitt of his speare was like a Weauers beame, and his speare-head weighed sixe hundred shickles of yron. Also in Samuel there is mention of another Goliath of another Goliath, surnamed Gethew, because he was of Gath: and of three other Giants; of which the first was slaine by Iehonathan, Dauids Nephew, who had twelue fingers, and as many toes: a man of great stature, and his fingers were by sixes, euen foure & twenty.

Also that Samson was of surpassing strength, no man doubteth, who tore a Lion as he had bene a Kid, and after slue thirty of the Philistines, & (after that) a thousand more of them with a law-bone of an Ass: And lastly, hee tooke the gates of Azzah, and the two Posts, and lifted them away with the barres, and put them vpon his shoulders, and carried them to the top of the Mountaine before Ebron. If then it be approued by euery iudgement, that both Nature and the Heauens waxe old, and that the great age of Time hath (with it selfe) infeebleed and almost worne out the vertue of all things, then, I say, That as in all other kindes the Earth (before that Sinne had increased the curse and corruption) brought forth her yongue ones more strong and beautifull, than it did in after-ages: so also those Giants, those mighty men, and men of renowne, as far exceeded the proportion, nature, and strength of those Giants, remembred by Moses of his own time, and after him their successors, as the ordinary proportion of all men in generall, soon after the flood and in times farre off, exceeded the bulkes and bodies of men which are now borne in the withered quarter and Winter of the World. If therefore Giants were common in the third and fourth age, much more in the first flourishing youth and newnesse of the world.

But the wickednesse (especially in cruelty and oppression) of these men was such, as God therefore by the flood gaue end to all flesh, but to the iust Noah and his Family. And God repented him that hee had made man: which S. Augustine thus expoundeth; Neg. enim sicut hominem, ita Deum facti sui penitet, cuius est de omnibus omnino rebus tam fixa sententia, quam certa prescientia. Sed si non uisatur Scriptura talibus uerbis, non se quodammodo familiaris insinuat omni generi hominum, quibus uult esse consultum: ut & perterreat superbientes, & excitet negligentes, & exerceat quarentes, & alacres intelligentes; God (saith he) doth not repent him of any thing which he hath done: (as men use to doe) but if the Scripture did not use those words or the like, it should not (in a sort) insinuate it selfe familiarly to all sorts of men, for whom it would prouide: that it might terrifie the proud, stirre up the negligent, exercise the searchers of truth, and nourish those that understand.

CHAP. VI.

Of idolatrous corruptions, quickly rising, and hardly at length vanishing in the world: and of the Reliques of Truth touching these ancient times, obscurely appearing in Fables and old Legends.

That in old corruptions we may finde some signes of more ancient truth.

Ere before we proceede any further, the occasion offereth it selfe for vs to consider, how the Greekes and other more ancient Nations, by fabulous inuentions, and by breaking into parts the Story of the Creation, and by deliueing it ouer in a mytticall sense, wrapping it vp mixed with other their owne trumpery, haue sought to obscure the truth thereof; and haue hoped, that after-ages, being thereby brought into many doubts, might receiue those inter-mixt discourses of God and Nature, for the inuentions of Poets & Philosophers, and not as any thing borrowed or stolne out of the Bookes of God. But as a skillfull and learned Chymist can as well by separation of visible elements draw helpfull medicines out of poyson, as poyson out of the most healthfull herbs & plants (all things hauing in themselves both life and death) so, contrary to the purposes and hopes of the Heathen, may those which seeke after God and Truth, finde out every where, and in all the ancient Poets and Philosophers, the Story of the first Age, with all the works and maruailes thereof, amply and liuely express.

S. II.

That the corruptions themselves were very ancient: as in the Family of NOAH, and in the old Egyptians.

BUt this defection and falling away from God, which was first found in Angels, and afterwards in Men (the one having erred but once, the other euer) as concerning mankind it tooke such effect, that thereby (the liberall grace of God being with-drawne) all the posterity of our first Parents were afterwards borne and bred in a world, suffering a perpetual Eclipse of spirituall light. Hence it was that it produced plants of such imperfection and harmfull quality, as the waters of the generall flood, could not so wash out or depure, but that the same defection hath had continuance in the very generation and nature of mankind. Yea, euen among the few sonnes of Noah, there were found strong effects of the former payson. For as the children of Sem did inherit the virtues of Seth, Enoch, and Noah; so the sonnes of Cham did possesse the vices of the sonnes of Cain, and of those wicked Giants of the first Age. Whence the Chaldeans began soone after the flood to ascribe diuine power and honour to the Creature, which was only due to the Creator. First, they worshipped the Sunne, and then the fire. So the Egyptians and Phoenicians did not onely learne to leaue the true God, but created twelue seuerall gods, and diuine powers, whom they worshipped, and vnto whom they built Altars and Temples. For Herodotus saith, Vndecim Deorum nomina primos Egyptios in usu habuisse, atque Græcos ab illis cepisse mutatos, esse, prius Aris, & Imagines, & Tempia Dijs sibi erexisse; The Egyptians (saith he) first aduised the names of the twelue gods, which the Greekes received from them, who first erected vnto themselves Altars, Images, and Temples for the gods.

§. III.

That in proceſſe of time these lesser errors drew on greater: as appeareth in the groſſe Superſtitious of the Egyptians.

BUt as men once fallen away from vndoubted truth, doe then after wander for euer more in vices vnknewen, and daily prauaile towards their eternal perdition: so did these groſſe and blinde Idolaters euery Age after other descend lower and lower, and shrink and slide downwards from the knowledge of one true & vny God; and did not thereby erre in worshipping mortall men onely, but they gaue diuine reuerence, and had the same respect to Beasts, Birds, Fishes, Fowles, Windes, Earth, Water, Ayre, Fire, to the Morning, to the Evening, to Plants, Trees and Rootes, to Passions and Affections of the Minde, to Palenesse, Sicknesse, Sorrowes, yea to the most vnworthy and basest of all these. Which barbarous blasphemy, Rhodius Anaxandrides describeth in this manner:

§. IIII.

S. IIII.

That from the reliques of ancient Records among the Egyptians and others, the first Idols and Fables were inuented: and that the first IUPITER was CAIN, VULCAN, TUBAL CAIN, &c.

BUt in so great a confusion of vanities, where among the Heathens themselves there is no agreement or certainty, it were hard to find out from what example the beginnings of these inuentions were borrowed, or after what ancient pattern they erected their building, were it not certain, that the Egyptians had knowledge of the first Age, and of whatsoever was done therein, partly from some inscriptions vpon stone or metall remaining after the Flood; and partly from Mizraim the son of Cham, who had learnt the same of Cham, and Cham of his father Noah: for all that the Egyptians write of their ancient Kings, & date of times, cannot be fayned. And though other Nations after them had by imitation their Iupiters also, their Saturnes, Vulcans, & Mercuries, with the rest, which S. Augustine out of Varro; Eusebius out of many prophane Histories; Cicero, Diodorus Siculus, Arnobius, and many more haue obserued, to wit the Phœnicians, Phrygians, Cretians, Greeks, and other Nations, yet was Cain the sonne of Adam (as some very learned men conceiue) called and reputed for the first and ancient Iupiter; and Adam for the first Saturne: for Iupiter was said to haue inuented the founding of Cities; and the first Citie of the World was built by Cain, which he called Enoch, of whom were the Henochij before remembered. And so much may be gathered out of Plato in Protagoras, which also Higinius in his 275. Chapter confirmeth. For besides that many Cities were founded by diuers men; Tamen primam latissimam & primam antiquissimam Ioue edificatam: set the first and largest was built by the first and most ancient Iupiter, seated in the East parts, or in India, according to that of Moses: And CAIN dwelt towards the East side of Eden, &c. where also the Henochij were found after the Flood. And therefore was Iupiter by the Athenians called Poleus, a Founder of Cities; and Hercules, an inchoer or strengthener of Cities; (say Phoramus and Pausanias) and that to Iupiter Herculis there were in very many places Altars and Temples erected. And that therewere Cities built before the Flood, Plato also witnesseth, as may be gathered in this his affirming, that soone after mankind began to increase, they built many Cities; which, as his meaning, he deliuereth in plaine termes, in his third Booke of Laws: for he saith, that Cities were built an exceeding space of time before the destruction by the great Flood.

This first Iupiter of the Ethnickes was then the same Cain, the sonne of Adam, who marrying his owne Sister, as also Iupiter is said to haue done, inhabited the East, where Stephanus conceiveth that Cain built sixe others, as Atich, Jared, Tebe, Iesca, Selet and Gebat: but where Philo had this I know not. Now as Cain was the first Iupiter, and from whom also the Ethnickes had the inuention of Sacrifice: so were Tubal, Tubal and Tubalcain (inventors of Pastorage, Smiths-craft, and Musick) the same, which were called by the ancient prophane Writers, Mercurius, Vulcan, & Apollo; and as there is a likelihood of name betwene Tubalcain and Vulcan: so doth Augustine expound the name of Norma or Naamath, the sister of Tubalcain, to signifie Venus, or beautifull, Voluptas, or pleasure; as the wife of Vulcan is said to be Venus, the Ladie of pleasure and beautie. And as Adam was the ancient and first Saturne, Cain the eldest Iupiter, Eua, Rhea, and Nemea or Naamath the first Venus: so did the Fable of the diuiding of the World betwene the three Brethren the Sonnes of Saturne, arise from the true Storie of the diuiding of the Earth betwene the three Brethren the Sonnes of Noah: so also was the Fiction of those Golden Apples kept by a Dragon, taken from the Serpent, which tempted Eua: so was Paradise it selfe transported out of Asia into Africa, and made the Garden of the Hesperides: the prophesies, that Christ should breake the Serpents head, & conquer the power of Hell, occasioned the Fables of Hercules killing the Serpent of the Hesperides, and descending into Hell, and captiuating Cerberus: so out of the taking vp of Henoch by God, was borrowed the conuerſion of their Hercules (the inuents of Religion, and such Arts as the life of man had profit by) into Starres and Heauenly Signes, and (withall) that leauing of the World, and ascension of Aſtra: of which Ouid:

Ouid, Met. 1.

Nat. Com. l. 1. c. 2.

For although thereby the *Ethnick*s would vnderstand Iustice it selfe to haue fayled, as it is a vertue abstract, and may be considered without a person, yet, as it is vsuall among the ancient Poets to describe Vertues and Vices by the persons of men and women, as Desire by Cupid, Valour by Mars, Beautie or Lust by Venus; so doe they also the persons of Men by like Vertues and Vices: and therefore by Iustice and Ashtara, Enoch; the iustice and pietie of Enoch being in the same manner exprest, as that of Noah was by Moses: for Noah was said to be a iust man, And Noah a it walked with God. And of Enoch it is written, That hee walked with God, and hee was no more seene: for God tooke him away.

Gen. 7.
Gen. 5. 22, 24.

From this storie also of the first Age, and from that part where Moses remembreth the Giants begotten by the sonnes of good men vpon the daughters of the wicked (whom Moses calleth mightie men, and men of renowne) did they steale those wondrous great acts of their ancient Kings, and powerfull Giants; and againe their warre vnderaken against the gods, from the building of the Tower of Babel by the Giant Nimrod, as Saint Augustine termeth him. Which warre of their Giants, Cornelius Seneca thus describeth:

L. de Civ. Dei.

Tentare (nesci) olim detrudere mundo Sydera, captiuq; Iovis transerre Gigantes Imperium, & villo leges imponere caelo.

The Giants did aduance their wicked hand
Against the Starres, to thrust them headlong downe;
And robbing Ioue of his Imperiall Crowne,
On conquered Heavens to lay their proud command.

Whereby was meant that Nimrod purposed to raise the building of Babel to that height, as God neither by drawing waters from the deepe, nor by any coniunction of the starres, should bury them vnder the moisture of a second Floud, but that by this building (if they had bene herein victorious) they would haue giuen the Law to Heaven it selfe. Also the making of leagues, peace and covenants among Heathen Nations and Kings, confirmed by sacrifice, whereof Virgil both in the eighth and twelfth of his Aeneides hath a touch, was (as it seemeth) borrowed from Moses, Exod. 24. who when he read the Booke of the Couenant, sprinkled the people with blood.

We find also many remembrances of Seth, the paternall Ancestor of Henoch and Noah: for Anenophis, the same King of Egypt, which reigned at such time as Moses carried thence the children of Israel, (as of late some learned men, mistaking his time, supposed) called his sonne and successeur Setho, of Seth: and of the same Seth (as many men of good iudgement haue granted) were the Princes of Thrace, called Seuthes, whereof there were many very famous. But herein was the memorie of Seth most manifestly preferred, that the Egyptians worshipped Seth, as their most ancient parent, and of the first tradition: in honour of whom they called a principall Prouince Sethistica. We also finde in Bithynia the Citie of Sethia, and others of the same name elsewhere. And sure, from the Egyptians did the Grecians borrow this kinde of Theologie, though they scorned to acknowledge any antiquitie preceding their owne: and that they might not seeme to learne elsewhere, they gaue the same names to their owne Idols, which the Egyptians did to theirs.

§. V.

Of the three chiefe IVPITERS; and the strange storie of the third.

BVt of all those armies of Iupiters remembred by the Ancients, Cicero maketh but three, because those were of most fame: which other Writers haue also done, who fought out, and laboured in their originals.

The first was Iupiter, the sonne of Aether and Dies, so called, because the one had reference to his celestiall conditions (for Aether is as much as shining or pure fire;) and the other diuined his naturall vertues, which dayes and times make more perfect, and are the witness of mens actions.

The second was said to be the sonne of Caelum or Heauen, for the same former respect; and this Iupiter was an Arcadian, and King of Athens.

The

The third, of whom all the Grecian fables were denised, was of Crete (now Candia) the sonne of Saturne and Ops. The name deriued from the Latine is taken of Iunius Pater, from the Grecke word Zeus; it signifieth life, but somewhat strayned. Boetius in his Genealogie of the gods, conceiuet, that his name was borrowed from Iupiter the Planet; but whether that starre had such a name, before the same was giuen to men, I know not. Iupiter is hot and moist, temperate, modest, honest, aduenturous, liberall, mercifull, louing, and faithfull (that is) giuing these inclinations. And therefore those ancient Kings beautified with these conditions, might be called thereafter Iupiter; but howsoeuer they were, or were not with those vertues enriched, yet, by imitation, all Kings, in the eldest times assumed those Titles and Sir-names: great Princes affecting as high Titles of honour and reputation in the world, (howsoeuer deserved) as the worthiest, that euer were, acquired by their well deseruings. Ioues omnes Reges vocarunt antiqui; The Ancients called all Kings Iupiters, as Tacitus in his Varia historia confirmeth: Reges olim Ioues vocarunt omnes; In old times all Nations called their Kings Iupiters. But where this last and most remembred Iupiter was borne, it is vncertaine. Some there are that make him of Crete: others, that hee was but sent thither by his mother Ops of Nat. Com. l. 1. c. 7 Opis, to be fostered and hidden from the furie of Titan his vnkle: because it was conditioned betwene Saturne and Titan, that Saturne being a younger brother, and reigning (for his owne life) by *Titan*s permission, hee should put to death all his male children, lest the Titans might be interrupted by any of them in their succession; which agreement, because Saturne performed in his first borne, it is fayned that Saturne deuoured his owne children. Hereof Lycophron, thus turned into Latine;

Hand sit pignior, Saturne to be the fatter, is not knowne, Crudis sepulchrum quid sit ipse filijs. By being the graue and buriall of his owne.

This composition betwene Titan and Saturne, Syllia also witnesseth in these;

Conceptis verbis; TITAN inrare coegit SATVRNVM, de senatium nutriti allum, Quo possint regnare semis post fata Nepotes.

Things thus agreed: Titan made Saturne sweare
No sonne to nourish; which by reigning might Vsurp the right of Titans lawfull heire.

But Opis the mother of Iupiter, being deliuered at once both of Iupiter and Iuno, conveyed Iupiter (first called Lysanirs) into Crete, as shee did afterwards his two brothers, Neptune and Pluto: where he was brought vp in Gnosus, the chiefe Citie of that Island, by Cressa the King, or by the Curetes, a people and nation thereof. Enob. in Temp.

Other challenge him to be of Thebes and Thebane: others call him an Arcadian: others make him of Messena. The like contention is found among the Greekes touching his education and first fostering. Some affirme, that he was fed by Hony-bees: in recompence whereof he changed their blacke coats and skins into yellow, a reward well fitting such a god: others, that he was nourished by Bears: others, by Goates: and of all these the idle Greekes haue many pretty tales. But in the end when Titan had knowledge, that Saturne had broken his faith, he set on him, and tooke him & his wife prisoners, whom Iupiter againe rescued and deliuered.

But lastly, the father and the sonne equally ambitious, the one doubted the other. Saturne being the lesse powerfull, fled into Italy, & left his Kingdomes in Greece to his sonne. And although this Prince at the first purchased great honour, and for his many vertues the name of Iupiter was giuen him; yet, after hee was once settled and became potent, he gaue himselfe ouer wholly to palliardize and adulterie, without all respect of Honour, Law, or Religion. And it is reported by such as doe ascribe the actions of many to one Iupiter, that not therewith satisfied, hee was afterwards knowne to offend in the sinne of Sodome with Ganimedes and others; and did not onely begin with incest, marrying his owne sister Iuno, but he rauished, betrayed, stole away, and tooke by strong hand all the beautifull women borne in his time, within the limits of his owne Kingdomes, or bordering them. Among whom these hereafter written, were of greatest fame; Niobe, Laodamia, and Alcmena, the wife of Amphitryon, by whom hee had Pelaeus, Sarpedon, Argus, and Hercules: by Taygete hee had Taygetus, of whom the Mountaine Taygetus tooke name, with another sonne called Saon, of whom Saonora:

by Antiope he had Amphion and Zetus: by Leda, Cassor and Pollux, Heleu and Clytemnestra: by Danae, Perseus: by Iordana, Dencalion: by Charme (the daughter of Eubulus) Britomartis: by Protegenia, he had Ablin the father of Eudymius: and by Io (the daughter of Inachus) Epaphus, the founder of Memphis in Egypt: which Epaphus married Libya, of whom that Countrey tooke name, for so the Greekes afterward called Africa. He rauished Aegina the daughter of Aeolus, and caried her into the Iland Oenopia or Oenotria, afterward called Aegina, on whom he begat Aecus: by Torbibia he had Achellau and Carbinu: by Ora, Colaxes: hee had also Dardanus by Eledra, who buile Dardanium, afterward Ilium and Troy. He begat the brothers Talicy, on Thalia, and on Garamantis, Hiarhas. He had besides these (if they be ye not their chiefe God) Philus and Pilumnus, inueters of the Bakers craft; and I know not how many more; but I know well that he could not be father to all these, who were borne in ages so farre differing. And of these his feuerall rauishments, betrayings, stealing away of mens wiues, daughters, and sonnes, buying of virgins, and the like, came in all those ancient fables of his transformations into shoures of gold, eagles, buls, birds, and beastes; and of him, and by him (in effect) all that rabble of Gracian forgeries. And yet did not the Greekes and Romans feare to entitle this Monster, Optimus Maximus, though Cicero in his second Booke, de natura Deorum, affirme, that hee deserued nothing lesse; and in his Oration, pro domo sua, reprocheth Clodius for his incest, by the name of Iupiter. His buriall was in Crete (saith Lucian.) Cretenses non solum natum apud se sepulchrum Iouem testantur, sed etiam sepulchrum eius ostendunt; The Cretians or Candians doe not onely know that Iupiter was borne and buried among them, but they shew his graue and sepulchre: which Epiphanius also confirmeth, for in his time there remayned the monuments of his tombe in the Mountaine Iafus. This Callimachus in his hymnes also witneseth, but, as offended thereat, saith thus:

The Cretians cuer lyars were, they care not what they say:
For they a tombe haue built for thee, O King, that liu'lt alway.

Diodorus Siculus tells by way of report from the Libyan fables, confirmed (as hee saith) by some Greek Writers, that the originall of these gods was from the Westerne parts of Africa. For there among the Atlantida reigned one Trannus (which signifieth Heauen) called so for his great skill in Astrologie, and for his knowledge, and benefits to the people, honoured by them as a god after his death. He had by many wiues 45. sons; but by his principall wife Titea, he had seuenteen sonnes and two daughters, all which were called after their mothers name the Titanes. Of Titea, likewise it is said, that shee for her goodnesse was canonized as a goddesse, being dead, and called the Earth, as her husband was stiled Heauen. But of all the children of Titea, her daughter Bastia (which name founding as Queene in English, shee is by the Latine translator of Diodorus called Regina) excelling the rest as farre in vertue as in yeares, was by generall consent of her brethren, and of the people, appointed to rule as Queene after his fathers death, being as yet a Virgin. Shee tooke to husband her brother Hyperion, to whom shee bare a sonne and a daughter, called Sunne and Moone. The beautie and towardlinesse of these children moued her brethren to enuy, & bred in them a feare of being excluded from the succession: wherefore they tooke the boy and drowned him in the Riuer Eridanus, now called Poe. The losse of this child caused his sister to breake her owne necke; and the losse of both her children made the mother to play many mad pranks, dancing with Cymbals, after a wilde fashion, in sight of all the people, before whom shee is said to haue vanished away. Ere shee dyed, her sonne (as the fable hath it) signified vnto her in a dreame, that hee and his sister, by the prouidence of God, should become immortal, that also the Sunne and Moone should be called by their names, and that their death should be reuenged vpon the murderers. According to which it is said, that the people did so call those two Planets, and vntill held her selfe as a goddesse, and termed her the great Mother, vvhich name they had formerly giuen to her, for her motherly care in cherishing her brethren vvhilst they were young. Hyperion and his Race being extinguished, the other sonnes of Trannus diuided the Kingdome. Of these Atlas and Saturne were chiefe. Atlas reigned ouer the countries lying about the Mountaines, which afterward bare his name; a iust and wise Prince, deeply skilfull in Astrologie, and for inuention of the Sphere, said to haue supported Heauen.

He

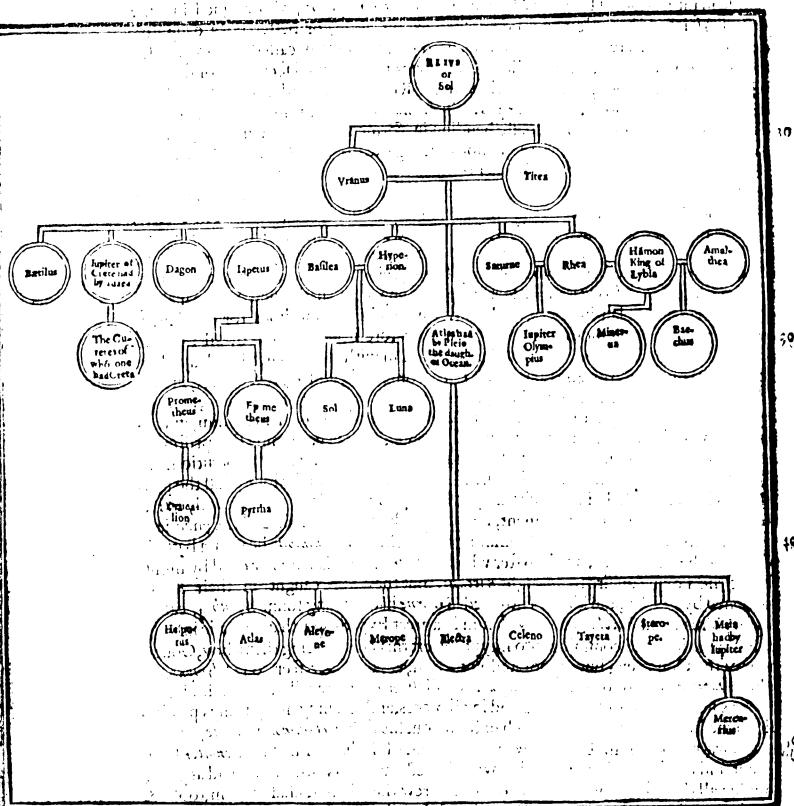

He had many sonnes; but the principall of them called Hesperus, being of his fathers qualities and studies, was said to haue beene caried away by the winde, from the top of an high Hill in the midst of his contemplations; and his name in honour of him, imposed by the people vpon the morning starre. The seuen daughters of Atlas were also said to haue beene excellent Ladies, who accompanying such as came to be Deified, or registered among the Worthies, brought forth children, and were able in qualitie to those that begat them. Of these it is held, that the seuen starres called Pleiades tooke name. Saturne, the brother of Atlas, reigned in Scythia, part of Africk, and Italie. Iupiter, another of the sonnes of Trannus, reigned in Crete; who had ten sonnes which he called Curetes; he called that Iland after his wiues name, Idea, in which lile hee dyed, and was buried. But this Iupiter must not haue beene that great one, but vncle to the great Iupiter, if these fables of the Libyans were true. Saturne (as these Libyans tell the tale) was a great Tyrant, and fortified strong places, the better to keepe his people in subiection. His sister Rhea was married to Hammon, who reigned in some part of Africk. Hammon louing others as well as his wife, or better, got a daughter, called Minerva, neare to the Riuer Triton, who thereupon was called Tritonia. Hee also begat on Amalthaea a sonne called Bacchus, whom hee caused secretly, for feare of his life, to be brought vp at Nysa, an Iland in the Riuer Triton, vnder the tuition of his daughter Minerva, and certaine Nymphs. To Amalthaea hee gaue in reward a goodly Countrey, that lay on the Sea-coast, bending in forme of a horne, whence grew the tale of Amalthaea's plentifull horne, famous among the Poets. When Rhea heard these newes, shee fled from her husband to her brother Saturne, who not onely entertained her as a sister, but tooke her to wife, and at her instigation made warre vpon Hammon, vanquished him by assistance of the Titanes, and made him flee into Crete. The Curetes, Iupiter's children before mentioned, held the Iland at that time; which was new named Crete by Hammon, after the name of Crete the Kings daughter, whom hee tooke to wife, and had with her (women, as may seeme, being very gracious in those names) the Kingdome. Bacchus was growne a proper young man, had found out the making of wine, the arte of planting trees, and many things else commodious for mankind, before the flight of his mother in law. Now therefore hearing report of all that had hapned, and that Saturne was coming against him with the Titans; hee leuyed an Armie, to which the Amazons, liuing not farre from Nysa, added great forces, in loue of Minerva, who was entred into their profession. So Bacchus leading the men, and Minerva the women, they set forward against Saturne, met him, ouerthrew him, and taking many of the Titans prisoners, returned to Nysa; where pardoning the prisoners, that promised to become his true followers, he prepared for a second Expedition. In the second Expedition he behaued himself so well, that he wan the loue of all the people by whom he passed; in somuch that partly for good affection to him, partly in hatred of Saturne's rigorous gouernment, he was greatly strengthened, and the enemie as much infeebled by daily reuolts. Coming to the Citie of Hammon, he wan a battaile of Saturne, before the very walls. After which, Saturne with his wife Rhea fled by night, setting the Towne on fire to despight Bacchus. But they were caught in their flight, pardoned by Bacchus, and kindly entreated. Saturne had a young sonne by Rhea, called Iupiter. This child Bacchus tooke with him in a great Expedition that he made into the East Countreies; and coming into Egypt, he left this Iupiter, being then a boy, Gouernour of the Countrey; but appointed vnto him, as an Ouer-seer, one Olympus, of whom Iupiter grew to be called Olympus. Whilste Bacchus trauielled through all Nations, as farre as into India, doing good in all places, and teaching many things profitable to the life of man; the Titanes had found out his father Hammon in Crete, and began to warre vpon him. But Bacchus returned out of India, with whom Iupiter from Egypt, and his sister Minerva, together with the rest, that afterwards were held as gods, joyning all their forces, went into Crete, ouerthrew the Titanes, chased them, tooke & slue them, and freed the world of them all. After all this, when Hammon and Bacchus were dead, they were deified; and the great Iupiter, the sonne of Saturne, succeeding them, reigned Lord alone ouer all the world, hauing none of the Titans left aliue, nor any other to disturbe him. Betweene this tale of the Libyan gods, and the Egyptian fables of Osiris, there is a rude resemblance, that may cause them both to be taken for the crooked Images of some one true historie. For the Expeditions of Osiris, and of

Bacchus,

Bacchus, the waies of the Giants in the one storie, of the Titanes in the other; the Kingdom of Egypt given by Hercules Lybicus to Orus; by Bacchus to Imper, the rattles of Hys, and the symbols of Basilea, with many petty circumstances, needrely enough resemble each other, howeuer not alike fitted to the right persons. Sanchoniato (as Ensebius cites him) would haue all these to be Phoenicians; and is earnest in saying, That it is a true storie, and no allegorie. Yet he makes it seeme the more allegoricall, by giuing to Phanus or Hecumen for daughters, Fate and Beautie, and the like, with addition of much fabulous matter, omitted by Diadorus, though Diadorus haue enough. To the Genealogie he adds Elius or the Sunne, as father of Phanus, and among the children of Phanus, Is, Isis, Tetis, and Dagon (whom Diadorus doth not mention by their names) giuing withall to Phanus the proper name of Terrenus or Indigema, and of Ilus to Saturne, but omitting Imper of Crete. The Pedigree of them is this:

Ensebius, l. 1. c. 7.

§. VI.

Of CHAM, and other wicked ones, whereof (some say) some affected the name of Gods.

OF Iupiter Belus, the sonne of Saurinus Babylonian, otherwise Admetus, it seemeth that Cicero had not heard, (ascribed by that name) who was more ancient than any of the former three by him demembred: for long after these times were the Greekes but Saluages, if they seeke no further off for their Gods. But the Egyptians, euen after the flood began (somewhat before this Chaldean Iupiter) to intitle Cham, the parent of their owne Misraim, Iupiter Chammon, or Hammon. For the Etymologie of this word (Hammon) which the Greekes deduce ab acri, from the sands, is ridiculous (saith Peuce); neither yet is his owne much better, who brings it from Hammath, which signifieth heate: because the said Temple of Iupiter Hammon was seated in Libya, where the ayre is exceeding hot & scorching. And as for the antiquitie of the latter Iupiter (among the Greekes & Romans the most renowned) it is certaine that he was borne not long before the warre of Troy, as by many of his finnes is made manifest; namely, Cait r, Pellux, Hercules, Sarpedon, and others, which liued in that age of Priamus, ynder whom, and with whom Troy was destroyed.

Now seeing that mortall men, and the most wicked, were esteemed immortall among the Heathen; it was not to be wondered at, that Alexander Macedon, Tylerius, Nero, Caligula, & others, fought to be numbred among them, who were as deformed monsters as the rest: For by what reason could the same Deitie be denied vnto Laurentia and Floa, which was giuen to Venus; seeing they were as notorious and famous harlots as the

That the wiser of the ancient Heathen had farre better opinions of God.

But that euer Pythagoras, or Plato, or Orpheus, with many other ancient and excellently learned, beleueed in any of these fooleries, it cannot be suspected, though some of them (ouer-busily) haue mixed their owne inventions with the Scriptures: for in punishment for their fictions, did Pythagoras hang both Homer and Hesiodus in hell, where he fained that they were perpetually stung & pinched with Serpents. Yet it cannot be doubted, but that Homer had read ouer all the books of Moses, as by places shone thence, almost word for word, may appeare; of which Iustine Martyr remembreth many in that Treatise conuerted by Micamula. As for Plato, though hee dismembred in some things, for feare of the Inquisition of the Areopagites, yet Saint Augustine hath already answered for him (as before remembred). Et mirifice quod delectatur, est quod de uno Deo tradita fuerant; And he was greatly delighted in the doctrine of one God, saith Iustine Martyr. Now howeuer Laetantius pleased to reprehend Plato, because (saith he) Plato sought knowledge from the Egyptians, and the Chaldeans, neglecting the Iewes, and books of Moses; Ensebius, Cyrillus, and Origen, shude reason to beleue the contrarie, thinking that from thence hee took the grounds of all by him written of God, or fauouring of Diuinitie; and the same opinion hath Saint Ambrose of Pythagoras.

But whether it were out of the same vanitie, which possesse all those learned Philosophers and Poets, that Plato also published (not vnder the right Authors names) those things which hee had read in the Scriptures; disauering the feueritie of the Areopagites, and the example of his Master Socrates; by them put to death by poison, I cannot iudge. Iustine Martyr (as it seemeth) ascribeth it wholly to Platoes feare, whose words, among many other of the same effect, are these; Plato Mosis mentionem facere, et id, quod unum solumque Deum docuerat, sibi apud Athenienses, autem non putauit, veritus Areopagum. Prius fearing the Areopagites thought it not safe for him among the Athenians to make mention of Moses, that hee thought that there is but one God. But for that Diuinitie which he hath written in: Plato id, ipsum de Deo deservit quod & Moses; He discomfited, and taught the same of God (saith Iustine Martyr) which Moses did. For where it pleased God by his Angell to answer Moses, Ego sum qui existens (which is) I am; and existens misit me ad vos; I am hath sent me vnto you, herein did Plato (saith Iustine Martyr) no otherwise differ, than that Moses vsed the word (qui) and Plato the word quod: Moses existens qui existit (inquit); PLATO quod quod existit; For MOSES saith, He who is; PLATO, That which is. Now of Gods incomprehensible nature, and of the difficultie either to conceive, or expresse the same, hee giueth this testimonie: Genitorem vniuersitatis tam difficile est inuenire, quam inuentum impossibile dignè profari; It is as hard to find out the Creator of the vniuersall, as it is impossible, if he were found, to speake of him worthily. And what can be more agreeable to the Maiestie of Gods Nature, than this propertie by Plato acknowledged? Deus bonus, & quidem, Deus causa bonorum: malorum autem omnium non causa; God is absolutely good, and so (assuredly) the cause of all that is good: but of any thing that is evil he is no cause at all: and againe, Charitas Dei fuit causa factiōis mundi, & originis omnium rerum; The love of God was the cause of the worlds creating, and the originall of all things. APULIUS the Platonist; Summus Deus infinitus est, non solum loci exclusione, sed etiam naturæ dignitate: Et nihil est Deo similis & gratius, quam vir animo perfectio bonus; The most high God is also an infinite God, not onely by exclusion of place, but by the dignitie of nature: neither is there any thing more like or more acceptable to God than a man of a perfect heart. THALES affirmed that God comprehended all things, and that God was of all things the most ancient: Quia nunquam esse cepit; Because he neuer had any beginning. ZENO, that God beheld euen the thoughts of men. ARISTOTELIS, that therefore all men ought to be carefull in the actions of their life, because God was euerie where present & beheld all done. But what can be more agreeable to Moses storie of the Creation, than this opinion and description of the Worlds beginning in Euripides, Scholler of ANAXAGORA?

Heauen and Earth one forme did beare:
But when diu'joynd once they were
From mutuall embraces,
All things to light appeared then;
Of trees, birds, beasts, fishes, and men
The still-remayning races.

And as in Pythagoras, in Socrates, and in Plato: so we find the same excellent vnderstanding in Orpheus, who euerie where exprest the infinite and sole power of one God; though he vse the name of Iupiter, thereby to auoide the enuie and danger of the time: 30 but that hee could attribute those things to the sonnes of men, and mortall creatures, which he doth to this Iupiter, there is no man who hath euer heard of God, that can imagine.

Nomina Deorum (saith MIRANDULA) quos ORPHEVS canit, non decipientium demonum, à quibus malum & non bonum prouenit; sed naturalium virtutum diuinarumq; sunt nomina; The names of those Gods whom Orpheus doth sing, are not of deceiuing Demits, from whom euill comes, and not goodnesse; but they are the names of naturall & diuine vertues. Yea, that he yet reacheth higher, and speakech of God himselfe, this his instruction to Musæus, and the Hymne following, teach vs: Respicimus verò ad diuinum hunc sermonem ei diligenter animam aduerte, intendens cordis rationis capax conceptaculum: rectam autem ascendende viam, & solum aspicere mundi Regem. Vnus est ex se genitus, ex eo omnia nata sunt: ipse verò in idis versatur, nec quisquam eum intueri potest mortalium, sed ipse nihilominus omnes intuetur.

Then marking this my sacred speech, but truly lend Thy heart, that's reason's sphere, and the right way ascend,
And see the worlds sole King. First, he is simply one Begotten of himselfe, from whom is borne alone
All else; in which hee's still: nor could it ere befall
A mortall eye to see him once, yet hee sees all.

And againe the same Author,

The first of all is GOD, and the same last is he.
GOD is the head and midst, yea from him all things be.
GOD is the Base of earth, and of the starred skie.
He is the male and female too, shall neuer die.
The spirit of all is GOD, the Svnne and MOON, and what is higher:
The King, th original of all, of all the end.
For close in holy brest he all did comprehend, Whence all to blessed light, his wondrous power did send.

Now besides these former testimonies, that all the learned men of ancient times were not so stupid and ignorant, as the Egyptians, Græcians, and other Nations by them infected were, I will onely repeate two or three other opinions, and leaue the Reader to those large and learned Collections of Iustine Martyr, Clemens, Laëtantius, Eusebius, Eusebinus, Peucer, Plessis, Dancius, and others. For Cleanthes the Stoick, being demanded of what nature God was, described him by these attributes and properties: Bonus, iustus, sanctus, clemens, potens, vtilis, speciosus, optimus, seuerus, liber, semper commodus, tutus, gloriosus, caritatis, &c. Good, iust, holy, possessing himselfe, profitable, beautifull, best, seuer, free, alwayes doing good, safe without feare, glorious and selfe-charitie. EPICURVS affirmed, that God who beheld all things, and pierced euerie nature, was onely and euerie where powerfull: agreeing with DEMOCRITVS: Rex omnium ipse solus; Hee is the only King of kings: and with Pindarus the Poet, Deus vnus, Pater, creator summus, atq; optimus artifex, qui progressus singulis diuersos secundum merita præbet; One God, the Father, the most high Creator, and best artificer, who giueth to euerie thing diuers proceedings according to their deserts. This God (saith ANTISTHENES) cannot bee resembled to any thing, and therefore not elsewhere knowne; Nisi in patria illa perenni, cuius imaginem nullam habes: Sane onely in that euerlasting Countrey, whose image thou hast none at all. Hereof also XENOPHANES COLOPHONIVS: Vnus Deus inter deos & homines maximus, nec corpore, nec mente mortalibus similis; There is one God among gods and men most powerfull, neither corporally, nor mentally like unto mortals: and XENOPHON, Deus qui omnia quatit, & omnia quiescere facit, magnus potensq; quod omnibus patet: qualis autem forma sit, nemini patet, nisi ipsi soli, qui luce sua omnia perlustrat; God who shaketh all things, and setteth all things at rest, is great and mightie, as is manifest to all: but of what forme hee is, it is manifest to none, save onely to himselfe, who illuminateth all things with his owne light.

Finally, Plato saith: Totius rerum natura causa, & ratio, & origo Deus, summus animi genitor, æternus animantium sospitator, assiduum mundi sus opifex, sine propagatione genitor, neq; loco, neq; tempore villo comprehensus, eiq; paucis cogitabilis, nemini estimabilis; God is the cause, ground, and originall of the whole nature of things, the most high Father of the soule, the eternall preseruer of liuing creatures, the continuall framer of his world, a begetter without any propagation, comprehended neither in any place, nor time; therefore few can conceive him in thought, none can expresse what hee is. Therefore was it said by S. HEROME, Sicut enim cunctos Philosophorum reuoluas libros, necesse est, ut in eis reperias aliquam partem vniuersum Dei, ut apud PLATONEM, fabricatorem mundi, Deum: apud ZENONEM, Stoicorum Principem, in eros & immortales animas &c. If thou consider all the bookes of the Philosophers, thou canst not but find in them some part of the Vessels of God, as in PLATO, God the Creator of the world: in ZENO, Prince of the Stoicks, Heel and immortal soules, &c.

And this is certaine, that if we looke into the wisdom of all Ages, we shall finde that there neuer was man of solid vnderstanding or excellent iudgement: neuer any man whose minde the Arte of education hath not bended, whose eyes a foolish superstition hath not afterward blinded; whose apprehensions are sober, and by a peniue infestit- 50 on aduised; but that he hath found by an vnresistable necessitie, one true God, and euerlasting being, all for euer causing, and all for euer sustayning, which no man among the Heathen hath with more reuerence acknowledged, or more learnedly exprest, than that Egyptian Hermes, howeouer it fayled afterward in his posteritie: all being at length by deuilish policie of the Egyptian Priests purposely obscured, who inuented new gods, and those innumerable, best sorting (as the Deuill perswaded them) with vulgar capacities, and fittest to keepe in awe and order their common people.

§. VIII.

That Heathenisme and Iudaisme, after many wounds, were at length about the same time under IULIAN miraculously confounded.

BVt all these are againe vanished: for the inuentions of mortall men are no lesse mortall than themselves. The Fire, which the Chaldeans worshipped for a God, is crept into euery mans chimney, which the lacke of fuell starueth, water quencheeth, and want of ayre suffocateth: Iupiter is no more vexed with Iunoes ielousies; Death hath perished him to chastitie, and her to patience; and that Time which hath deuoured it selfe, hath also eaten vp both the Bodies and Images of him and his: yea, to their staire Temples of stone and durefull Marble. The houses and sumptuous buildings erected to Baal, can no where be found vpon the earth, nor any monument of that glorious Temple consecrated to Diana. There are none now in Phœnicia, that lament the death of Adonis; nor any in Libya, Creta, Thessalia, or elsewhere; that can aske counsaile or helpe from Iupiter. The great god Pan hath broken his Pipes, Apollones Priests are become speechlesse, and the Trade of riddles in Oracles, with the Deuills telling mens fortunes therein, is taken vp by counterfeit Egyptians, and cozening Astrologers.

But it was long ere the Deuill gave way to these his ouerthrowes and dishonours: for after the Temple of Apollo at Delphos (one of his chiefe Mansions) was many times robbed, burnt, and destroyed; yet by his diligence the same was often enriched, repaired, and reedified againe, till by the hand of God himselfe it received the last and vnder subuersion. For it was first robbed of all the Idols and Ornaments therein by the Eubæan Pyrates: Secondly, by the Phlegians vterly sackt: Thirdly, by Pyrrhus the sonne of Achilles: Fourthly, by the Armie of Xerxes: Fifthly, by the Captaines of the Phœnenses: Sixthly, by Nero, who carried thence five hundred brazen Images: all which were new made, and therein againe set vp at the common charge. But what fouer was gathered betwene the time of Nero and Constantine, the Christian Armie made spoile of, defacing as much as the time permitted them; notwithstanding all this, it was againe gloriously rebuilt, and so remained till such time as Julian the Apostata sent thither to know the successe of his Partisan enterprise, at which time it was vterly burnt and consumed with fire from Heauen; and the Image of Apollo himselfe, and all the rest of the Idols therein, molten downe and lost in the earth.

The like successe had the Iewes in the same Julians time, when by his permission they assembled themselves to rebuild the Temple of Ierusalem: for while they were busied to lay the foundations, their buildings were ouerthrowne by an Earthquake, and many thousands of the Iewes were ouerwhelmed with the ruines, and others slaine, and scattered by Tempest and Thunder: though Am. Marcellinus report it more fauourably for the Iewes, ascribing this to the nature of that Element. For, saith hee, Allypius and the Ruler of the Prouince of Iudæa, being by Julian busied in the reedifying of this Temple, flaming Balls of fire issuing neere the foundation, and oft consuming the Workemen, made the enterprize frustrate.

Of the last refuges of the Deuill to maintaine his Kingdome.

NOW the Deuill, because hee cannot play vpon the open Stage of this World (as in those dayes) and being still as industrious as euer, findes it more for his advantage to creepe into the mindes of men; and inhabiting in the Temples of their hearts, workes them to a more effectuell adoration of himselfe than euer. For whereas hee first taught them to sacrifice to Monsters, to dead Stones cut into faces of Beasts, Birds, and other mixt Natures; he now sets before them the high and shining Idol of glorie, the All-commanding Image of bright Gold. He tels them that truth is the Goddess of dangers and oppressions: that chastitie is the enemy of Nature, & lastly, that as all vertue (in generally) is without taste; so pleasure satisfieth and delighteth euery sense: for true wisdom (saith he) is exercised in nothing else, than in the obtraying of power to oppresse, and of riches to maintaine plentifully our worldly delights. And if this Arch-Politian find in his pupils any remorse, any feeling or feare of Gods future Iudgement, he perswades them that God hath so great neede of mens soules, that he will accept them at any time, and vpon any conditions: interrupting by his vigilant endeouours all offer of timefull returne towards God, by laying those great blockes of rugged poeuerie, & despised contempt in the narrow passage leading to his diuine presence. But as the minde of man hath two Ports, the one alwaies frequented by the entrance of manifold vanities; the other desolate and ouer-growne with grasse, by which enter our charitable thoughts and diuine contemplations: so hath that of death a double and twofold opening: worldly miserie passing by the one, worldly prosperity by the other: at the entrance of the one we find our sufferings and patience to attend vs: (all which haue gone before vs to prepare our ioyes) at the other our cruelties, conuouff-ness, licentiousnesse, iniustice, and oppressions (the Harbingers of most fearefull and terrible sorrow) staying for vs. And as the Deuill our most industrious enemy was euer most diligent: so is he now more laborious than euer; the long day of Mankind drawing fast towards an evening, and the Worlds Tragedie and time neere at an end.

CHAP. VII.

Of NOAH'S Flood.

§. I.

Of Gods fore-warning: and some humane testimonies: and some doubting touching the truth of NOAH'S Flood.

F this destruction it pleased God to giue warning vnto Noah: who (saith Iosephus) fearing to perish among the rest, Secedens cum suis in aliam regionem migravit: He departed with his children, & translated into another Regio. And of these Giants from whom Noah withdrew himselfe, Herodotus writeth in this manner; That they exceeded in all sorts of inhumane and unchristian wickednesse, and that they were contemptors & religious & Deorum; contemptors of religion and of the Gods: among which might me (saith Herodotus) unus erat qui Deorum, venerantior, & prudentior cunctis, &c. huius nomen erat NOAH. There was one more wise and reuerencing the Gods than the rest, whose name was NOAH: who with his three sons Sem, Iaphethus, and Cham, and with their Wiues, and the Wife of Noah, (namely, Tites the great, Pandora, Noela, and Noela) preferred themselves in the Arke. This Arke God commanded Noah to prepare: And God sayd vnto NOAH, Make thee an Arke of Pine-trees: thou shalt make Cabines in the Arke, and shalt pitch it within, and without with Pitch. For God made Noah to know, that an end of all flesh was at hand, and that the graues of the rebellious and cruell Generations were already fashioned in the Cloudes, which soone after should swallow vp & couer all liuing creatures, which breathed in the Aire: Noah and his family excepted.

But this vniuersall graue of waters, and generall Deluge hath not bene receiued by all: for diuine testimonies doe not perswade all natural men to those things, to which their owne reason cannot reach: Dum absoluata in obscura veritas latet: whilst the truth lieth wrapt up in obscuritie. Many there are who haue disputed against the vniuersalitie of this ouerflowing, and haue iudged that this Flood of Noah fell but in some particular places and Kingdomes: moued lo to thinke, because in elder ages there haue bene many other Floods (as they suppose) of that nature. Hereof Nicholas Damascenus writeth in this manner, as his words are cited by Iosephus. Est super Atynia dam excessus mons in Armenia, qui Baris appellatur, in quo multos confusientes sermo est diluuij tempore liberatos; & quendam simul in Arca demersum in huius vertice hessisse, lignorum reliquia multa tempore conseruata, qui scriasse est fuit, de quo etiam MOSES Indorum Legislator scribit: thus farre this Author. There is (saith he) above Minyas (or the Countrey of Minye) an exceeding high Mountaine in Armenia, called Baris: on which it is reported, that many hauing fled thither, were saued in the time of the Deluge: and that one was carried in an Arke, and rested vpon the top of the Mountaine, whereon there remained a long time after certaine pieces thereof; and this might bee the same, of which MOSES the Law-giuer of the Iewes maketh mention. And of this opinion were the

Thal-

Thalmoditis (saith Annius) that many Giants saved themselves vpon Mount Sion.

But Berosus (who after Moses was one of the most ancient, howsoeuer he haue bene since deformed & corrupted) doth in the substance of all agree with Moses as touching the generall Flood, taking from thence the beginning of his History in these words: Ante agnatum cladem famulosque, qui uniuersis perijt Orbis, &c. Before that famous destruction of waters, by which the world uniuersally perished: witnessing withall, that Noah with his wife Ticea, & his three Sons with their wiues (in all eight persons) were only saved.

§. II.

Of the Flood in the time of OGGES: and that this was not NOAH'S Flood.

BUt from the vanitie of the Greeks, the Corrupters of all truth, (saith Lactantius) who without all ground of certainty vaunt their Antiquitie, came the error first of all: who therein flattering themselves also, sought to perwade the world that there was no Flood preceded the Fould of Oggies, King of the Thebans in Boeotia, or rather of Attica; and therefore (saith Rhodoginus) Oggies nunc appellans Poeta, tanquam percutus dixerit, ab Oggie vetustissimo: The Poets gave the name of Oggia to things exceeding ancient, as of Oggies the most ancient.

But let Oggies be as ancient as those men can make him, yet it is manifest, that he liued but in Jacobs time (though Eusebius makes him later, and in Moses time) and was borne 67. yeeres after him. There is also an opinion, that Oggies was Cadmus (and then was he late latter) as Rhodoginus in the ninth Booke of his Antiquities remembereth: *Sans tamen qui in Agypto regnasse autem hunc: unde sit CADMVS qui in Graciam profectus Thebas condidit, a Bosce ingulato sic nuncupatus: quoniam Syrorum lingua Bos dicitur Thebe. There are (saith he) who thinke that this Oggies did reigne in Egypt, whereby he should be CADMVS, who trausailing into Greece built Thebes, so named of a Beesse: because in the Syrian Language, a Beesse is called Thebe.*

But this Flood of Oggies fell in the yeere of the World 3440. according to Eusebius, who followed the account of the Septuagint: and the Flood of Noah in the yeere 2242. after the same account; and so there came 1200. betweene these Floods, wanting but two, though herein Eusebius was much mistaken, and corrected this opinion in his Chronologie. Now although the very yeere and time of this ouerflowing in Achaia, or rather Attica, be not precisely set downe, but that there is a great difference among Writers, yet whoeuer makes it most ancient, finds about 500. yeeres difference betweene that and the generall Flood.

For Paulus Orosius affirms, that this tempest fell vpon the Athenians, but 1040. yeeres before Rome was built. Bucholzerus saith, it was 1043. elder than Rome; which was founded: according to the same Bucholzerus in the worlds yeere 3219. though after the account which I follow (and whereof I will giue my reasons in the Story of Abraham) it was built in the Worlds yeere 3280. Now the generall Flood preceded the building of Rome (saith Bucholzerus) 1563. yeeres: and the Flood of Oggies (as before) 1043. Hence it followeth by easie calculation, that (if he place Oggies in his true age) the difference betweene these two Floods must be 520. yeeres, to which we (allowing 60. more) find 580. And that this of Oggies was not the same of Noah (except we call Noah, Oggies Priscus, as some doe) it appears by this, that the Flood of Oggies then King of Attica or Oggia, did not extend it selfe any further than the banks of Archi-Pelago, or the Aegean Sea. For whereas Mela, Plinie, and Solinus witness, that the Cittie of Ioppe in Iudaea was founded before the Flood; and that (notwithstanding the waight of Waters) there remained on certaine Altars of stone the Title of the King, and of his Brother Phineus, with many of the grounds of their Religion: sure it is no where found among prophane Historians nor in the Scriptures, that euer the Flood of Oggies spread it selfe ouer any part of Syria, much lesse ouer all the Earth. But that it drowned both the Regions of Attica about Athens, and that of Achaia in Peloponnesus, it is very probable. For it seemeth that at that time it was, when Helice and Bura were swallowed vp (Citties situate on the North part of Peloponnesus): of which Ouid:

*Si queras Helicen, & Bura, Achaidos urbes,
Inuenies sub aquis.*

*Si queras Helicen, & Bura, Achaidos urbes,
Inuenies sub aquis.*

Bura and Helice, on Achaian ground
Are sought in vaine, but vnder Sea are found.

Of this Flood of Oggies was inuented the Fable of Apello and Diana. For Latona, the daughter of Caeus, the sonne of Titan, being beloued and forced by Iupiter, and by him gotten with child, Iuno thereat enraged, permitted her (as they say) no part of the Earth to be deliuered on; & withall, caused the monstrous Serpent Python to follow & affright her, wherefoeuer she travelled: till at length arriving at the Ile of Ortygia, she was there receiued; in which she was deliuered, first of Diana, and then of Apello, being Twins: whereof Barlaam makes this exposition: That at such time as the Deluge (which happened in Oggies his reigne) ceased, out of the abundant moisture of the Earth (heat by putrefaction being thereto mixed) there were exhaled such thick mists and foggies, that in Attica, and along the Coasts of the Aegean Sea, neither the beames of the Sunne by day, nor of the Moone by night, could pierce the ayre; or be perceived by the inhabitants: so as when at length (the Earth being dried, and these vapours dissipated) the ayre began to be cleare, the people of Ortygia clyped the light of the Moone somewhat before day, & in the same morning the Sunne also appeared: fabulously (because Diana represented the Moone, and Apello the Sunne) they were reported to be borne in the Ile of Ortygia, thereof afterwards called Delos, which signifieth manifestation.

And surely it is not improbable, that the Flood of Oggies, being so great, as Histories haue reported it, was accompanied with much alteration of the ayre, sensibly discerned in those parts, and some vnusuall face of the Skyes. Varro in his Bookes de gente populi Romani (as he is cited by Saint Augustine) reporteth out of Cassor, that so great a miracle happened in the Starre of Venus, as neuer was seene before, nor in latter times. For the colour, the greatnesse, the figure, and the course of it, were changed. This fell out, as Adraflus Cysaeternus, and Dion. Crisostomus, famous Mathematicians, affirmed, in the time of Oggies.

Now concerning the course of that or any other Planet, I doe not remember, that I haue any where read of so good Astrologers, flourishing among the Greeks, or elsewhere in those dayes, as were likely to make any calculation of the revolutions of the Planets, so exact, that it should need no information. Of the colour and magnitude, I see no reason why the difference found in the Starre of Venus, should be held miraculous; considering, that lesser mists and foggies than those which couered Greece with so long darkness, doe familiarly present our senses with as great alterations in the Sunne and Moone. That the figure should varie, questionlesse it was very strange: Yet I cannot hold it any prodigie: for it stands well with good reason, that the side of Venus which the Sunne beholds, being enlightened by him, the opposite halfe should remaine shadowed, whereby that Planet would, vnto our eyes, descrying onely that part whereon the light falleth, appeare to be horned, as the Moone doth seeme; if distance (as in other things) did not hinder the apprehension of our senses.

A worthy Astrologer now liuing, who by the helpe of perfecting Glasses hath found in the Starres many things vnknowne to the Ancients, affirmeth so much so haue bene discovered in Venus by his late obseruations. Whether some wattie disposition of the ayre might present as much to them that liued with Oggies, as Gallienus hath seen through his Instruments; I cannot tell: sure I am, that the discouerie of a truth formerly vnknowne, doth rather cunquie Man of ignorance, than Nature of error. One thing herein is worthy to be noted, that this great, but particular Flood of Oggies, was (as appeareth by this of Saint Augustine) accompanied with such vnusuall (and therefore the more dreadfull, though naturall) signes, testifying the concurrence of causes with effect, in that inundation; whereas the Flood of Noah, which was generally, and altogether miraculous, may seeme to haue had no other token, or fire shewing, than the long preaching of Noah himselfe, which was not regarded: for they were eating and drinking, when the Flood came suddenly, and took them all away.

§. III.

Of DEVCALIONS Flood: and that this was not NOAHS Flood: nor the Vmbri in Italie a remnant of any vniuersall Flood.

A Second Flood of great fame, and of which the time is more certaine, was that of Deucalion in Thessalia, of which S. Augustine out of Varro: His temporibus (us Varro scribit) regnauit Atheniensibus CRANAO, successor CECROPS (us autem nostri, EUSEBIUS & HIERONYMVS) adhuc eodem CECROVE permanente, diluuium fuit, quod appellatum est DEVCALIONIS: (that is) In these times (as Varro reporteth) CRANAEVS the successor of CECROPS governing the Athenians, or (as our EUSEBIUS and HIEROMEVS) CECROPS yet living, that Flood (called DEVCALIONS) happened.

And in the beginning of the eleuenth Chapter of the same eighteenth Booke, he vseth these words: *Eduxit ergo MOSES ex Egypto populum Dei nouissimo tempore Cecropis Atheniensium Regis, cum apud Assyrios regnaret Alcatades, apud Sicyonios Marathus, apud Argiuos Tripas: Moses led the people of God out of Egypt about the latter time of Cecrops King of the Athenians, Alcatades reigning over the Assyrians, over the Sicyonians Marathus, and over the Argiuos Tripas. So as leauing the curiositie of a few yeeres, more or lesse, it appeareth, that this Flood of Deucalion was either at the e-gression of the children of Israel out of Egypt, or neere it: and then after Noah 753.
yeeres, according to Funtilius, who makes Cecrops to liue in the yeere of the World 2409.
or if we follow Mercator, then 739. yeeres after Noah, and in the yeere of the World 2395. But if Deucalion were borne in the age of the World 2356. according to Codaman; then giuing vnto Deucalion 40. yeeres of age when this Flood happened, it falleth within one yeere of Mercators account. But Deucalion by all approued Historians is said to haue bene 82. yeeres old at that time. Now Clemens Alexandrinus dares the time of this Flood of Deucalion, and the conflagration and burning in Phaëtons time, by the reigne of Crotopus, King of the Argiuos; but Crotopus liued King of the Argiuos sixe yeeres after Israel departed Egypt, which makes twenty yeeres difference, according to Funtilius, who will haue this Flood and Burning to haue fallen 14. yeeres before Moyses left Egypt: for he gaue of the Worlds yeeres to the Flood and Burning the yeeres 2440 and to Moyses his egression the yeere 2454. And yet Cedrenus thinke that Moyses was more ancient, and liued with Imachus; but that cannot be true: for then had the Flood of Deucalion, and the burning of Phaëton, preceded the Flood of Ogyges, which is denyed by all: for that of Thessalia (called Deucalion) followed that of Attica (called Ogygia) at least 250. yeeres, or thereabouts. Eusebius in his Chronologie makes it 230. & so doth V. Orosius: Eusebius about the 50. yeere of Moyses life, and Cyrillus about the 67. and both after Noahs Flood 770. yeeres: for these be Clemens Alexandrinus his words: *Fuit autem in Graecia tempore quidem Phorci, qui fuit post Inachum, inundatio que fuit tempore Ogygis: There happened in Graeco in the time of Phorcius, who liued after Inachus, the Flood of Ogyges. Now if the Flood of Ogyges in Attica were 1020. or 1016. yeeres before the first Olympiad, according to Eusebius and Orosius (as before) then is it manifest, that taking 763. out of this number of 1020. it tels out, that Ogyges Flood, happened before the Hebrewes left Egypt 250. yeeres, or 260. yeeres, according to the difference between the opinions of Eusebius and Orosius. And for my selfe (who rather follow those Chronologers, which giue 60. yeeres more to Abraham after the Flood, than the rest) I reckon the times which come between these Floods in this sort. The generall Flood was in the yeere of the World 1656. Iacob was borne in the yeere of the World 2169. so as from the beginning of the Flood to Iacobs birth, there were consumed 513. yeeres. Ogyges Flood happened 100. yeeres after Iacob was borne; and therefore after the generall Flood 613. yeeres. Now Deucalion was borne in the yeere of the World 2356. and had liued 82. yeeres, when his Kingdome of Thessalia was ouerwhel-med; (which added to 2356. make 2438.) his Flood was after Noahs Flood ended, 782.
yeeres. And hereto Annias his Xenophon agreeeth, who makes 700. yeeres betwene the generall Flood and Deucalions birth; to which adde 82. yeeres of his Age (as before) and then the Flood of Thessalia followed the generall 782. yeeres. The words of that Xenophon are these: *Ab inundatione terrarum ad ortum Deucalionis, secundum annum Sphaeræ, septingenti supputantur anni, qui natus annu duos & octoginta Thessaliam vidit inundatam: From the drowning of the World to the birth of Deucalion, in the second yeere

yeere of SPHERVS, are numbered 700. yeeres, and when DEVCALION was 82. yeeres old, he saw Thessalia drowned. This Flood happened in the Winter time about Parnassus; witnesseth Aristotle in the first of his Meteors. And Varro (whom Saint Augustine so often citeeth for his excellent Learning, especially in Antiquities) findeth this Flood of Deucalion to haue happened in the time of CRANAEVS, who succeeded Cecrops: Orosius thinke it somewhat later, Amphytrion reigning in Athens, the third from Cecrops: Only this of Deucalion was very great, and reached not only ouer Thessalia it selfe, and the Regions adioyning Westward, but it couered the greatest part of Italie: and either the same, or some other particular Flood then happening, oppressed Egypt, saith Eusebius.
And therefore did the Greekes cyther thinke it, or saie it to be vniuersall; and Deucalion then King, sauing himselfe and some others on the Mountaine of Thessalia (of all other the highest, saith Solinus) was by reason thereof (as Strabo witnesseth) said to be the preseruer of Mankind. That this Flood couered a great part of Italie, Plinie and Solinus make it probable, who affirme, that the people then inhabiting Italie, were therefore called Isaëci: quia ab inuersionibus diluuij superfuissent; and therefore also were they esteemed the most ancient Nation, as Strabo confirmeth in his first Booke, and Trezenius in his second: which Vmbri these Authors make the Parents of the Sabines, and the Sabines to be the Parents of the Samnites, Piceni, Lucani, Bruttij, and all others inhabiting anciently the banks of the Mediterranean Sea. But that these Vmbri were not the Inhabiters of Italie before the Flood of Noah, and so tooke name by sauing themselves vpon the Apennine Mountaines, the Scriptures teach vs; shewing who, and who only then were preferred: which is sufficient. Report hath aduentured further, telling vs, that the first people which after the generall Flood inhabited Italie, were the Camafenes; (so named from Camefe, whom CAI in originibus another of Annias his Authors, names for a con-fort of Ianus) which people liued altogether a sauage life; till such time as Saturne arriuing on those Coasts, deuised Lawes to governe them by: the memorie of whose Acts in that Region, Diador and Thallus among the Greekes, Nepos Cassius and Varro among the Latines, haue preferred; and of whom Virgil:

*Primus ab aethero venit SATVRNVS Olympo, Arma IOVIS fugiens, & regnis exil adeptus,
Is genus indocile, ac dispersum montibus altis
Composuit, Legesq; dedit; Latiumq; vocari Maluit.*

SATVRNE descending from the Heauens high,
Fearing the Armes of IVPITER his Sonne,
His Kingdome lost, and banisht thence, doth flie.
Rude people on the Mountaine tops he wonne
To liue together, and by Lawes: which done,
He chose to call it Latium.

And afterward in the Verses following he speaketh of the Ausones, and after them, of the Sicani: Nations, which againe fought to dis-plant the ancient Inhabiters:

Tummannus Ausonia, & gentes venere Sicani.

Then came thither Ausonian Bands, and the Sicanian Tribes.

Of these Sicani (which left Spaine, and sat downe in Italie) Thucydides and Plinie giue telimonie: who were again expelled by the Ligij, saith Thucydides. After all these plantations & replantations, came the Vmbri, defended of the Gauls (saith Annias), not of those Gauls of France, but of those of Scythia, who commanded a great part of Italie, euen all Metruia and Campania; as Herodotus, Plinie, and Dionysius haue assured vs: and therefore this Flood of Deucalion was longer after that of Noah. For all those Nations were planted in Italie, and dispossest of Italie again, before the Vmbri were euer heard of, or had being.
So that Kingdome was first called Camafene, then Latium or Saturnia, then Ausonia, then Sicania; before the Vmbri (in whose time Deucalions Flood happened) posselt the same, about 306. yeeres before the Warre of Troy: Lycaon then governing Arcadia; who being the father of two and twentie sonnes, the youngest called Oenotrius invaded Italie, who gaue it the name of Oenotria. This name it held vntill Italus of the same Nation changed it into Italie, after his owne name, about 250. yeeres before the fall of Troy. After these, came the Pelagis, of whom Plinie in his third Booke and fifth Chapter, and Strabo in his fifth, Thucydides in his sixth, speaks at large; and after them the Lydi, vnder Tyrrhenus their Captaine, that gaue name to the Tyrrheni; who casting thence the Vmbri, tooke from them three hundred Castles, and built therein twelue Cities; to which (after they had posselt and past ouer the Appennine Mountaines) they added diuers others, whereof Telsina (afterward Banonia) was one.

Now that there was not anciently such a Nation as these Vmbri in those parts, I doe not asseme; having respect to the testimonies before repeated. And Stephanus thinks, that the name was deriued from the Greeke word Ombros; but that these Vmbri of Italie were defended of the Nation of Seythians (called Galls) it shall be shewed hereafter. 10

Of some other Records testifying the vniuersall Flood: and of two ancient Deluges in Egypt: and of some elsewhere.

Euseb. de prep.
Euseb. l. 9. c. 4.

Saint Augustine out of Varro affirmeth, that the Greekes and Latines made not any mention of the vniuersall Flood, because they had nothing of Antiquitie foregoing that of Ogyges; and therefore (according to Rhodogianus, before remembered) were all things among the Greekes (which antiquitie had worne out of knowledge) called Ogygia, which we in Englishe commonly call (worme-eaten) or of defaced date. But as all the parts of the Earth were successiue planted and peopled; and as all Nations had their proper times, and not their beginning at once and at the instant: so did euery Familie, which afterward became a great People, with whom the knowledge of diuine Letters was not received, finde no Parent of more antiquitie, than such as they had themselves, nor allow of any before their owne; and as the Gracians, so did others vaunt themselves to be Indigene, and growing out of the Earth, or inuent some other prophane or ridiculous beginning. But the Chaldeans had certaine knowledge of Noahs Flood, as Herophilus witnesseth; and Nicolaus Damascenus maketh particular mention thereof (As is aforesaid) though he also asseme by heere-say, that some Giants saued themselves vpon the Mountaine Baris in Armenia, but speake not thereof as from any authoritie approved: vsing the word Sermo est; That such a speech there was. And Eusebius remembereth a place out of the ancient Historian Abydenus: who writeth, that Sisithrus, to preserve himselfe from a Flood fore-told him by Saturus, fled to the Hills of Armenia by ship, ad Armenian nauigio consugielat: who the third day (after the Waters were fallen) sent forth birds, that finding no land to rest on, returned againe, which he also did a second time, but at the third returne the birds feet were couered with mudde and slime. To this effect are Eusebius words out of Abydenus, which may seeme a true description (though in other termes) of Noahs Flood.

Herod. l. 4. c. 6.

Cyrollus also affirmeth, that Alex. Polyhistor maketh mention of this generall Flood. And Plato in Timæo produceth an Egyptian Priest, who recounted to Solon out of the holy Bookes of Egypt, the storie of the Flood vniuersall, which (saith he) happened long before the Gracian inundations. Fryer Annius his Xenophon remembereth a third Flood, which also Diodorus Siculus confirmeth, somewhat more ancient than that of Ogyges in Assica. For he named the generall Flood for the first, which happened (saith he) vnder the old Ogyges: Sub prisco Ogyge, which was Noah; he calleth the second Niliaca: Hercules and Prometheus then liuing, 44. yeeres before that of Attica, in the 34. yeere of Belo-chus King of the Affrians, though I doe not beleue him as touching the time. But this Flood couered a great part of the nether Egypt, especially all that Region subiect to Prometheus; and hercof came the fable of the Vulture on Prometheus his Liuer, afterward slaine by Hercules of Egypt: which fiction Diod. Siculus deliuereth in these words: *Flu-minum propter cursu velocitatem, profunditatemque, aquarum, Aquilam tunc appellatum, HER-CVLI EM cum consilijs magnitudine, tum virtute, voluit esse vestigio compressisse, & aquarum impetum ad priorem cursu conuertire: Unde & Graeci quidam Poeta rem gestam in fabulam vertentes, HERCVLEM tradunt Aquilam PROMETHEI iccu depascientem occidisse; This Flood (meaning of Nilus) for the swiftnesse of his course, as also for the depth, was in those dayes called the Eagle: but HERCVLES by his great indgement and vertue did againe compress and brighten this Riuer, so farre extended and ouer-spread, turning it into the old channels: whence certaine Greeke Poets (converting this labour and worke of HERCVLES into a fable)* fable) denied, that HERCVLES slew the Eagle which fed on PROMETHEUS Liuer; meaning, that he deliuered Prometheus of that sorrow & torment, which for the losse of his People and Countrey (by the Waters destroyed and couered ouer) he suffered.

A fourth Flood chanced about Pharus in Egypt, where Alexander Macedon built Alexandria, as Annius conceiueh out of his Xenophon, who in this briefe fort writeth of all these Inundations: Inundationes plures fuisse: prima nouimestru inundatio scironum sub prisco Ogyge: secunda Niliaca, &c. There were many Innauations (saith the same Xenophon): the first, which was vniuersall of nine Moneths, and this happened vnder the first Ogyges: the second was Niliaca, and of one Moneths continuance, in the time of Hercules and Prometheus, Egyptians: a third of two Moneths, vnder Ogyges Atticus: the fourth of three moneths, in Thessalia, vnder Deucalion: and a fifth of the like continuance (called Pharonica) vnder Proteus of Egypt, about the time of Helens rape. Diodorus in his fifth Booke and eleuenth Chapter, taking the *Samothrac*es for his Authors, remembereth a Flood in Asia the lesse, and elsewhere, of no lesse destruction than any of the other particular Inundations, laying, that the same happened before that of Deucalion; the Sea of Pontus and Hellepont breaking in ouer the Land.

But there haue been many Floods in diuers times, and ages, not inferior to any of these two last remembered, Niliaca and Pharonica in Egypt: as in the yeere of our Redemption 590. when in October of the same yeere, Gregory then being Bishop of Rome, there happened a maruellous overflowing in Italy, and especially in the Venetian Territorie, and in Liguria, accompanied with a most fearefull forme of thunder & lightning: after which followed the great Plague at Rome, by reason of the many dead Serpents cast vp & left vpon the Land, after the Waters decreased and returned. And in the yeere 1446. there perished 10000. people, by the breaking in of the Sea at Dordrecht in Holland: of which kind I take that Flood to be of Achaia or Attica. Before that, and in the yeere 1238. Themius speaketh of an Earthquake, which swallowed many thousands: and after that, of a Flood in Frisland, in which there perished 100000. persons. Strozius Sicog. in his Magia misarista, telleth of an Inundation in Italie, in the time of Pope Damasus, in which also many Cities of Sicil were swallowed: another in the Papacie of Alexander the sixt: also in the yeere 1515. Maximilian being Emperor. He also remembereth a perillous ouer-flowing in Polonia, about Craconia, by which many people perished. Likewise Vignier a French Historian speaketh of a great Flood in the South part of Langue-doc, which fell in the yeere of our Lord 1557. with so dreadfull a tempest, as all the people attended therein the very end of the World, and Iudgement Day; laying, That by the violent descent of the Waters from the Mountaines, about Nismes there were removed diuers old heapes and mountours of ground, and many other places torne vp and rent: by which accident there was found both Coyne of Silver and Gold, diuers pieces of Plate, and Vessels of other Metall, supposed to be hidden at such time as the Goths invaded that Prouince, in the yeere 1156.

§. V.

That the Flood of NOAH was supernaturall, though some say it might haue bene forced by the Starrs.

NOW howsoever all these Floods, and many other, which haue couered at several times severall Regions, not only in these parts of the World, but in America also, (as I haue learned of some ancient Southfayers among them) may be ascribed to naturall causes and accidents; yet that vniuersall Flood (in the time of Noah) was powred ouer the whole face of the Earth by a power aboue Nature, and by the especial commandment of God himselfe, who at that time gaue strength of influence to the Stars, & abundance to the Fountaines of the Deepe; whereby the Irruption of Waters was made more forcible, than any ability of nature could effect, or any second causes, by whatsoever vnion, could performe, without receiving from the Fountain of all power strength, & faculties supernaturall. Henricus Meelinensis, a Scholler of Albertus Magnus, in his Commentaries vpon the great coniunctions of Alon Masar, obserueth, that before the Flood of Noah, the like coniunction of Iupiter and Saturne, happened in the last degree of Cancer, against that constellation since called the Ship of Argos; by which the Flood of Noah might be fore-told, because Cancer is both a watric Signe, and the House of the Moone, which is the Ladie of the Sea, and of Moyfture, according to the rules of Astronomie, and common experience. And this opinion Petrus de Aliaco vpon Genesis confirmeth, affirming, that although Noah did well know this Floud by diuine reuelation, yet (this coniunction being notorious) he could not be ignorant of the second causes thereof: for those were not onely signes, but also working causes, by strength received from the first cause, which is God himselfe: and further, that by "Cataractae Caeli (Englished the Windores of Heauen) Moses meant this great and watrie coniunction; the word (Cataractae) signifying flowing downe or comming downe. Now (saith P. de Aliaco) it pleased God to ordaine by the course of the Heauens such a constellation, by which all men might behold therein their destruction towards, and thereby forsake those wicked wayes wherein they walked, and call vnto God for mercy.

Of this iudgement was Gul. Parisiensis, who vnderstood, that the words Cataractae Caeli, or Windores of Heauen, were to be taken for the former coniunction, or for these watrie Signes, Cancer, Pisces, Pleiades, Hyades, and Orion; and of the Plants, Mars, Venus and the Moone: which are the forcible causes of the greatest Inundations. His owne words are these: Nondum inteligo Prophetam Hebraorum Cataractas Caeli uocasse, nisi partes illas Caeli, quae generatiue sunt Pluuiarum & Inundationum Aquarum quales sunt signa aquatica, ut Cancer, &c. as aforesaid. As yet (saith he) I perceiue not what the Prophet of the Hebrewes meant by those words (Cataractae Caeli, or Windores of Heauen) vntill he thereby vnderstanding those Celestiall powers, by whose influences are engendered the Raine, and Inundations of waters, such as are the watrie Signes of Cancer, &c.

But in a word, as it might please God, that in the course of his vnfearchable Wisdom this coniunction should at such time be: so did he (as aforesaid) adde vigor and faculty, and gaue to euery operation increafe of vertues, violent eruptions to Springs & Fountaines, commanding them to cast out the whole treasure and heape of their waters; taking retention from the Clouds, and condensing ayre into water by the ministerie of his Angels, or howsoeuer else best pleased his All-powerfulnesse.

S. VI.

That there was no need of any new Creation of Matter to make the vniuersall Floud: And what are Cataractae Caeli, GEN. 7. VERS. 11.

Now if it be objected, that God doth not create any thing of new; for God resteth the seventh day: (that is) he did not then after create any new species which granted, it may seeme that then all the Earth and Ayre had not waters sufficient to couer the habitable World fiftene Cubits aboue the highest Mountaines. Of this proposition, whether God hath so restrayned himselfe, or no, I will not dispute; but for the consequent (which is) that the World had want of water to ouer-couer the highest Mountaines, I take that conceit to be vnlearned and foolish: for it is written, that the Fountaines of the great Deepe were broken up (that is) the waters forsooke the very bowels of the Earth; and all whatsoeuer was differt therein, pierced & brake through the face thereof. Then let vs consider, that the Earth had aboue one and twentie thousand miles, the Diameter of the Earth, according to that circle, seven thousand mile, and then from the Superficies to the Center some three thousand five hundred miles. Take then the highest Mountaine of the World, Caucasus, Taurus, Olympus, or Atlas, the Mountaines of Armenia or Scythia, or that (of all other the highest) in Tenneris, and I doe not finde, that he that looketh highest, stretcheth about thirtie miles vpright. It is not then impossible, answering reason with reason, that all those waters mixed within the Earth three thousand five hundred miles deepe, should not well helpe to couer the space of thirtie miles in height, this thirtie miles vpright being found in the depths of the Earth one hundred and fixtene times: for the Fountaines of the great Deepe were broken up, and the waters drawne out of the bowels of the Earth. Secondly, if we consider what proportion the Earth beareth to the extension of the Ayre ouer and aboue it, wee shall finde the difference exceeding great. If then it pleased God to condense but so much of this Ayre, as euery where compasseth and embraceth the Earth, which condensation is a conuerfion of Ayre into Water, a change familiar in those Elements; it will not seeme strange to men of iudgement, yea but of ordinarie vnderstanding, that the Earth (God so pleasing) was couered ouer with Waters, without any new Creation.

Lastly,

Lastly, for the opinions of Gulielmus Parisiensis, and Alianenſis, to which I may adde Berofus and others, That such a coniunction there was, fore-shewing that destruction by Waters which followed; and that by the word Cataractae Caeli, or Windores of Heauen, was meant this coniunction; there needs no other answer than that obseruation of Ludouicus Vines, who affirmeth, That by the grauest Astrologian it was obserued, that in the yeere 1524. there should happen the like coniunction as at Noahs Floud; than which (saith he) there was neuer a more faire, drie, and seasonable yeere: the like destruction was prophesied of the yeere 1588. But Picco Earle of Mirandula proueth, that there could not be any such coniunction at that time.

To conclude, I find no other mysterie in the word Cataractae Caeli, than that the clouds were meant thereby: Moses vsing the word Windores of Heauen (if that be the sense of the word) to expresse the violence of the Raynes, and powring downe of Waters. For who soeuer hath seene those fallings of water, which sometimes happen in the Indies, which are called the Spowts, (where clouds do not breake into drops, but fall with a resistlesse violence in one body) may properly vse that manner of speech which Moses did; That the Windores or Floud-gates of Heauen opened: (which is) That waters fell contrarie to custome, and that order which we call naturall. God then loosened the power retentive in the vppermost ayre, and the waters fell in abundance: Behold (saith Job c. 12. v. 15.) he withholdeth the waters, and they drie up or better in Latine, Et omnia siccantur; And all things are dried up but when he sendeth them out, they destroy the Earth: And in the 26. Chapter: He blindeth the waters in the clouds. But these Bonds God loosed at that time of the generall Floud, & called vp the Waters which slept in the great Deepe; and these ioyning together, couered the Earth, till they had performed the worke of this will: which done, he then commanded them to returne into their darke and vast Caues, and the rest (by a winde) rarified againe into ayre, formerly condensed into drops.

Of some remainder of the memorie of NOAH among the Heathen.

NOAH is commanded by God, before the fall of those Waters, entred the Arke which he had built, with his own Wife, and his Sonnes, and his Sonnes Wiues, taking with them of euery Creature which tooke life by generation, seuen of the cleane, & of the vncleane, two. Noah, according to Philo, signifieth quietnesse: after others, and according to the prophesie of his Father Lamech, cessation; to whom after-times gaue many Names, answering his antiquitie, zeale, vertue, and other qualities: as, The first Ogges, because in the time of the Grecian Ogges there was also a great Floud of Achaia: Saturne they called him, because he was the Father of Nations: Others gaue him the Name of Promethew, who was said to steale away Iupiters fire; fire in that place being taken and vnderstood for the knowledge of God and heavenly things. Others thinke, that he was so called for his excellent wisdom and foresight. He had also the Name of Iannus, (i. e. id est) vinosus, because Iain signifieth Wine in the Hebrew. And so Tertullian findes him written in Libri Ritualibus, in the Books of Ceremonies, preceding both Saturne, Vranus, and Ioue: which three enjoyed an elder time than all the other ancientest fayned gods. And this Name Iain is taken from the Hebrew and Syrian, and not from the Latine: for it was in vse before there was any Latine Nation, or any Kingdome by that Name knowne. Of the antiquitie of Iannus, Fabius Pictor giueth this testimony: IANI atate nulla erat Monarchia, quia mortalibus pectoribus nondum haerent vlla regnandi cupiditas, &c. Vinum & Far primus populus docuit IANUS ad sacrificia: primus enim Aras & Pomaria & sacra docuit; In the time of IANUS (saith he) there was no Monarchie: for the desire of rule had not then folded it selfe about the hearts of men. IANUS first taught the people to sacrifice wine and Meale: he first set up Altars, instituted Gardens and solitarie Groves, wherein they used to pray; with other holy Rites and Ceremonies. A greater testimony than this there cannot be found among the Heathen, which in all agreeth so well with the Scriptures. For first, whilest Noah flourished, there was not any King, or Monarch; Nimrod being the first that tooke on him foueraigne authority. Secondly, Noah after the Floud was the first that planted the Vine, and became a Husbandman; and therefore offered the First-fruits of both (to wit) Wine and Meale. Thirdly, he was the first that rayfed an Altar, & offered sacrifice to God, at thanksgiving for his merciful goodnesse towards him. Noah was also signified in the Name of Bifrons (which was giuen to Iannus) because he beheld the times both before & after the Flood. Quia praterita nouit, & futura profpexit, saith ARNOBIVS: because he knew what was past, and provided for what was to come. He was also in the person of Iannus shadowed by the Name of Chaos, and Semen Orbis, The Seed of the world: because as out of that confused Heape was drawne all the kinds of Beasts and Plants, so from Noah came all Mankind. Whereof Ouid in the person of Iannus:

Me Chæos antiqui (nam sum res prisca) vocabant, Aspice quàm longi temporis ælia cano.

The ancient call'd me Chæos: my great yeares
By those old times, of which I sing, appears.

He was also intituled Colum and Sol, Heauen and the Sunne, for his excellent knowledge in Astronomie: Vermunus, Bacchus, and Liber Pater; not that latter, which Diad. Siculus and Alex. Aphrodisens so call, because he was the restorer of the Greekes to their former libertie, but in respect of the Flood. For the Greekes called Liber γρ, and his Turkes Hyades, of Rayne, because Noah entred the Arke when the Sunne ioyned with the Starres Hyades, a constellation in the Brow or Necke of Taurus, and euer after a Monument of Noahs Flood. He was also by others surnamed Triton, a Marine god, the sonne of Neptune; because he liued in safetie on the Waters. So was he knowne by the name of Dionysus, quasi Diouisor, mentem pungens, Bute-braine, or Wit-slinger; though Diadorus conceiue otherwife, and deriue that name à Patre & Loco, Of his Father, and the place of his birth, (to wit) of Ioue, and Nysa, a Towne of Arabia Felix, saith Strabo out of Orpheus. He had also the by-name of Taurus, or Taurophagus; because he first yoked Oxen, and tyll'd the ground: according to that of Moses; And NOAH became an Husbandman. Now howeouer the Grecians vaunt of their Theban Bacchus (otherwise Dionysus) it is certaine, that the Name was borrowed, and the Invention stolne from Noah. But this Name of Bacchus, more anciently Bæcus, was taken (saith Gul. Stuckius, and out of him Danius from Noachius, (N) being changed into (B); and it is the more probable, because it cannot be doubted but that Noah was the first planter of the Vine after the Flood: and of Noah (the first and ancient Bacchus) were all those fables deuised, of which Diadorus complaineth in his fourth Booke and fifth Chapter. This first Bacchus (to wit) Noah, was surnamed Nysus, of the Mountaine Nysa in India; where the Grecian Bacchus neuer came, whatsoeuer themselves faime of his enterprises: and these Mountaines of Nysa ioyned with those of Parapanisus, and those other Easterne Mountaines, on which the Arke of Noah rested after the Flood.

Furthermore, to the end that the memorie of this second Parent of Mankind might the better be preserved, there were founded by his Issues many great Cities, which bare his Name, with many Riuer & Mountaines; which oftentimes forgot that it was done in his regard, because the many Names giuen him brought the same confusion to places as to himselfe. Notwithstanding all which, we find the Citie of Noah vpon the banks of the red Sea, and elsewhere: the Riuer of Noas in Thrace, which Strabo calleth Noarus; Ptoleme, Danuis; diuiding Ithya from Pannonia. Thus much for the Name.

§. VIII.

Of sundry particulars touching the Arke: as the place where it was made, the matter, fashion, and name.

Now in what part of the World Noah built the Arke, it doth not appeare in the Scriptures, neither doe I find any approued Author that hath written thereof: only Goropius Becanus in his Indo-Serbia conceiue, that Noah built his Arke neere the Mountains of Caucasus, because on those Hills are found the goodliest Cedars: for when Alex. Macedon made the waire among a people, called Nyses, inhabiting the other side of Caucasus, he found all their Burials & Sepulchers wrought ouer with Cedar. To this place (saith Becanus) Noah repaired, both to separate himself from the reprobate Giants, who rebelled against God & Nature, as also because he would not be interrupted in the building of the Arke; to which also he addeth the conueniencie of Riuer, to transport the Timber which he vsed, without troubling any other Carriages.

Only

Only this wearisome of, that the Arke was built in some part of the Easterne World, & to my vnderstanding, not far from the place where it rested after the Flood. For Noah did not vse any Mast or Sayle (as in other Ships) therefore did the Arke no otherwise moue, than the Hulke or body of a Ship doth in a calme Sea. Also, because it is not probable, that during these continuall and downe-right Raines there were any Windes at all, therefore was the Arke little moued from the place where it was fashioned and set together: for it is written, God made a wind to passe vpon the Earth, and the waters ceased. And therefore it may be gathered, that during the fall of the Waters, there was not any Storme or forcible winde at all, which could driue the Arke any great distance from the place where it was first by the Waters lifted vp. This is also the more probable, if that ancient opinion be true, as it is very likely, that the Arke had fundum planum, a flat bottom, and not rayed in forme of a Ship, with a sharpenesse forward, to cut the waues, for the better speed.

This kind of Vessell the Hebrewes call Thebet, and the Greekes Larnax, for so they termed Deucalions Ship: and some say, that the Hill Parnassus, to which in eight dayes hee arriued, was first call'd Larnassus; and by the change of (L) into (P) Parnassus; but Pau. Steph. de Urb. fanijs thinks that it tooke name of a Sonne of the Nymph Cleodora, called Parnassus, fol. 127. the Inuenter of Auguration.

Paccrini findes the word (Parnassus) to haue no affinity with the Greeke, but thinks it derived from the Hebrew word Nahus, which signifieth Auguration and Dimination: or from Har or Parai, as in his Chapter of Oracles in the Lease before cited.

Iosephus calls the Arke Machina, by the generall name of a huge Frame, and Epiphanius out of the Hebrew, Aron; but herein lyeth the difference betweene Aron and Thebet, That Aron signifieth properly the Arke of the Sanctuarie, but Thebet such a Vessell, as swimmeth, and beareth it selfe vpon the Waters.

Lastly, this Arke of Noah differed from the fashion of a ship in this, that it had a Couer and Roofe, with a Crest in the midst thereof, and the sides declining like the Roofe of an House, to the end, both to cast off the Waters, and that thereunder Noah himself and his children might shelter, and separate themselves from the noysomnesse of the many Beasts, which filled the other rooms and parts of the Arke.

Of what Wood the Arke was built, it is vncertaine. The Hebrew word Gopher once and in this place onely vsed, is diuersly vnderstood: and though the matter be of little importance, yet this difference there is, That the Genuea Translation calls it Pine-tree; the Rabbine, Cedar; the Seuentic, square Timber; the Latine, smooth Timber. Others will haue it Cypress Trees, as dedicated to the dead, because Cypress is worne at Funerals. But out of doubt, if the word Gopher signifie any speciall kind of Timber, Noah obeyed the voyce of God therein; if not, he was not then curious as touching the kind or nature of the wood, hauing the promise of God, and his grace and mercie for his defence: For with Noah God promised to establish his covenant. Plinie affirmeth, that in Egypt it was the vse to build ships of Cedar, which the wormes ate not; and he auoweth, that he saw in Tricia, in the Temple of Apollo, Cedar beames, laid in the time of the foundation of the Citie, and that they were still found in his time, which was about 1188. yeares after: prouing thereby, that this kind of wood was not subiect to putrifying or mouldring in a very long time. But in that it is easie to cut, light to carie, and of a sweete sauour, lasting also better than any other wood, & because neere the place where the Arke rested, there are found great store of these Cedar trees, as also in all the mountains of the East, besides those of Libanus, it is probable enough that the Arke might be of that wood: which hath, besides the other commodities, the greatest length of Timber, and therefore fittest to build ships withall. Peterius conceiue, that the Arke had diuers sorts of Timber, & that the bottome had of one sort, the decke & partition of another, all which may be true or false, if Gopher may be taken for Timber in generall. True it is, that Cedar will serue for all parts of a Ship, as well for the body, as for Masts and Yards. But Noah had most respect to the direction receiued from God: to the length, breadth, and height, and to the partitions of the Arke; and to pitch it, and to diuide it into Cabines: thereby to seuer the cleaue beasts from the vncleane, and to preserve their severall sorts of food; & that it might be capable of all kind of liuing creatures, according to the numbers by God appointed. All which when Noah had gathered together, he cast his confidence wholly on God; who by his Angels steered this Ship without a Rudder, and directed it without the helpe of a Compass, or the North star. The Pitch which Nash vsed, is by some supposed to haue beene a kind of Asphaltum, whereof there is great quantitie about the Valley of Sodom and Gomorrah, how the dead Sea, or Asphaltus and in the Region of Babylon, and in the West India: and herein it exceedeth other Pitch, that it melts not with the Sunne, but by the fire onely after the manner of hard Wax.

S. IX.

That the Arke was of sufficient capacite.

THE Arke, according to Gods commandment, had of length three hundred Cubits, little of breadth, and thirte deepe or high: by which proportion, it had six parts of length to one of breadth, and ten times in length to one of depth; of which S. AUGUSTINE: Proculdubio figura est peregrinantis in hoc seculo Civitatis Dei, (hoc est) Ecclesie, que sit salua per lignum, in quo peccatis Mediator Dei & hominum, homo Iesus Christus: nam & mensurata est longitudine, altitudine, latitudine, eius significat corpus humanum, in cuius veritate ad homines pronuntiatus est venturus, & venit, &c. without doubt: (saith he) it is a figure of the Citie of God trauielling in this world as a stranger (that is) of the Church, saued by the Tree, whereupon the Mediator betwene God and Man, the Man Iesus Christ did hang: for each the very measure of the length, height, and breadth, answereth the shape of Mans body, in the truth whereof the coming of Christ was fore-told and performed.

By what kind of Cubite the Arke was measured, it hath beene a disputed question among the Fathers, and others; and the differences are in effect these: The first kind of Cubit (called the Common) containeth one foot and a halfe, measured from the sharpe of the elbow to the point of the middle finger. The second (the Palme-Cubit) which taketh one-handfull more than the common. The third is called Regius Cubitus, or the Persian Cubit, which exceedeth the common Cubit three ynches. The fourth is the sacred Cubit, which containeth the common or vulgar Cubit double, wanting but a quarter or fourth part. Lastly, there is a fifth Cubit, called Geometrical, which containeth six common Cubits. But of all these sorts, which were commonly measured by the vulgar Cubit, the alteration and diminution of mens statures hath made the difference. For there is now a lesse proportion of bodies, so is the common Cubit, from the sharpe of the elbow to the point of the middle finger, of lesse length than it was in elder times.

S. AUGUSTINE considering the many sorts of Beasts and Birds which the Arke held, with their food and water, was sometimes of opinion, that the Arke had proportion after the Geometrical Cubit, which containeth almost sixe of the Common: For, measuring the Arke by the vulgar Cubit, it did not exceed the capacite of that Vessell built by Hero of Syracuse, or the Ship of Etolie Philo-pater. But S. Augustine (who at the first was led by Origen) changed his iudgement as touching the Geometrical Cubit; and found, vpon better consideration, that there needed not so huge a Body to preferue all sorts of Creatures, by God appointed to be reserved. For it was not needfull to take any kinds of Fishes into the Arke, because they were kept liuing (saith S. Augustine) in their owne element. Non fuit necesse conseruare in Arca, que possent in aquis viuere, non solum mersa sicut Pisces, verum super-natantia, sicut multe alies: it was not needfull to conserue those Creatures in the Arke, which could liue in the waters; and not onely Fishes which can liue under water, but also those Fowles which sit and swim on them. And againe, Terra non aqua, palea est, quia ADAM non huius, sed illius fructum vestrum comedit: it was not the Earth, and not the waters, which God curs'd; for of the forbidden fruite of the Earth, and not of the Sea, did ADAM eat. So as S. Augustine gathereth hereupon (as afore said) that to huge a Frame needed not.

And if we looke with the eyes of iudgement hereunto, wee shall finde nothing monstrous therein; although the imaginations of men, who (for the most part) haue more of mischiefe and of ignorance, than of any reuerend reason, found many impossibilities in this worke of God. But it is manifest, and vndoubtedly true, that many of the Species, which now seeme differing, and of severall kinds, were not then in terrena natura. For those Beasts which are of mixt natures, either they were not in that age, or else it was not needfull to preferue them, seeing they might be generated againe by others: as the Mules, the Hyen's, &c. the like; the one begotten by Asses and Mares, and the other by Foxes and Wolues. And whereas by discouering of strange Lands, wherein there are found diuers Beasts & Birds, differing in colour or stature from those of these Northern parts; it may be supposed by a superficial consideration, that all those which were red and pyed Skinned, or Feathers, are differing from those that are lesse painted, and were plaine russet or blacke; they are much mistaken that so thinke. And for my own opinion, I find no difference, but only in magnitude, betwene the Cat of Europe, and the Owne of India; & euen those Dogges which are become wilde in Hispagniola, with which the Spaniards vsed to deuoure the naked Indians, are now changed to Wolues, and begin to destroy the breed of their Catell, and doe also oftentimes teare asunder their owne Children. The common Crow and Rooke of India is full of red feathers in the drownd and low Islands of Caribana; and the Black-bird and Thrush hath his feathers mixt with blacke and carnation, in the North parts of Virginia. The Dog-fish of England is the Sharke of the South Ocean: For if colour or magnitude make a difference of Species, then were the Negro's, which we call the Blacke-Mores, non animalia rationalia, not Men, but some kind of strange Beasts: and so the Gyants of the South America should be of another kind, than the people of this part of the World. We also see it daily, that the natures of Fruits are changed by transplantati-on, some to better, some to worse, especially with the change of Climate. Crabs may be made good Fruit by some grafting, and the best Melons will change in a yeere or two to common Cowcumbers, by being set in a barren Soyle. Therefore taking the kinds precisely of all Creatures, as they were by God created, or out of the Earth by his Ordinance produced; the Arke, after the measure of the common Cubit, was sufficiently capacious to containe of all, according to the number by God appointed: For if we adde but halfe a foot of measure to the common Cubit, which had a foot and a halfe of Giantly stature (and lesse allowance we cannot giue to the difference betwene them and vs) then did the Arke containe 600. foot in length, and 100. foot in breadth, and 60. foot deepe.

But first of all, to make it manifest that the Geometrical Cubit is not vsed in the Scripture, the stature of the Giants therein named may suffice. For if the Bed of Q, King of Babylon, had beene nine Geometrical Cubites long, it had taken 54. Cubites of the common, which make 80. foot: and Goliath, who had the length of six Cubites and a handfull, which makes nine foot and a handfull (a proportion credible) if these Cubites had beene Geometrical, then had beene 54. foot in height, and vprwards, which were monstrous and most incredible; for (according to this proportion) had the head of Goliath beene nine foot long, and farre weightier and bigger than all Dauid's bodie, who carried it away.

Again, if the Geometrical Cubit had beene vsed for a Measure in the Scripture, as many Commenters haue obserued, then had the Altar (appointed to containe five Cubites of length, five of breadth, and three of height) haue reached the length of 27. foot vpright, and so must their Priests haue ascended by steps or Ladders to haue performed their Sacrifices thereon, which was contrarie to Gods Commandment given in these words: Thou shalt not goe up with steps vnto mine Altar, that thy Name be not dishonoured thereon; and therefore was the Altar but three common Cubits high, which make, foure foot, that their Priests standing thereby might execute their Office: Wherefore I may conclude, that the Cubit mentioned in the Scriptures was not the Geometrical, but the ordinarie Cubit of one foot and a halfe, according to the measure of Giantly stature, which measure (double lesse) might giue much the more capacite to the Arke; although it be also probable, that as the Men were, so were the Horses whereon they rode, and all other creatures of a correspondent size. And yet (as I take it) though by this it meanes there were not any whit the more roome in the Arke, it were not hard to conceiue, how all the distinct Species of Animals, whose liues cannot be preferued in the Waters, might according to their present quantites be contained in a Vessell of those dimensions which the Arke had; allowing to the Cubit one foot and a halfe of our now vsuall measure: whence it followeth of necessitie, that those large Bodies which were in the days of Nash might haue roome sufficient in the Arke, which was measured by a Cubit of length proportionable.

How the appointed number of creatures to be saued, (that is) seuen of the cleane, two of the vncleane (with necessarie foode) might haue place in the Arke; Dauid hath very learlearnedly declared: the briefe summe of whose discourse to that purpose, is this. *The length of the Arke was three hundred Cubites, which multiplied by the breadth, namely fiftie Cubites, and the product by the height of thirtie Cubites, becometh the whole Concavities have bene 450000. Now whereas the posts, walls, and other partitions of Lodgings may seeme to have taken vp a great part of the hollow: the height of the roofe, which (the perpendicular being one Cubit) contained 7500 cubical Cubes, was a sufficient recompence: If therefore in a Ship of such greatnesse we seeke roome for 89. distinct Species of Beasts, or (lest any should be omitted) for 100. severall kinds, we shall easily find place both for them, and for the Birds, which in bignesse are no way answerable to them, and for meat to sustaine them all. For there are three sorts of Beasts, whose bodies are of a quantitie best knowne, the Beeffe, the Sheepe, and the Wolfe: to which the rest may be reduced, by saying, (according to Aristotle) that one Elephant is answerable to foure Beeces, one Lyon to two Wolves, and so of the rest. Of Beasts, some feede on vegetables, others on flesh. There are one and thirtie kinds of the greater sort, feeding on vegetables: of which number, onely three are cleane, according to the Law of Moses, whereof seven of a kind entred into the Arke, namely, three couples for breede, and one odde one for sacrifice: the other eight and twentie kinds were taken by two of each kinde, so that in all there were in the Arke one and twenty great Beasts cleane, & six and fiftie vncleane, estimable for largenesse as ninetie one Beeces; yet for a supplement (lest perhaps any Species be omitted) let them be valued as a hundred and twentie Beeces. Of the lesser sort feeding on vegetables, were in the Arke sixe and twentie kinds, estimable with good allowance for supply, as fourescore Sheepe. Of those which devour flesh were two and thirtie kinds, answerable to three score and foure Wolves. All these two hundred and eightie Beasts might be kept in one storie or roome of the Arke, in their severall Cabbines; their meate in a second: the Birds and their prouision in a third, with place to spare for Noah and his family, and all their necessaries.*

S. X.

That the Arke rested upon part of the Hill Taurus (or Caucasus) betwene the East Indies, and Scythia.

T. I.

A preterition of some questions lesse materiall: with a note of the use of this question, to finde out the Metropolis of Nations.

What time Noah tooke to build the Arke, I leaue to others to dispute: but hee receiued the Commandement from God a hundred yeers before the waters fell; and had therefore choice of time and leysure sufficient. As for the number of Decks & Partitions, which Origen diuides into foure, S. Augustine into three, I will not trouble the Reader with the controuersie: or whether those creatures which sometimes rest on the Land, other times in the Waters, as the Crocodiles (now called Alligators) the Sea-Cowes or Sea-Horses, were kept in the Arke, or no, I thinke a needlesse curiositie; and yet to this Pererius, and others before him, that a Fish-pole might be made as well within the Arke, as in Hiero his Ship of Syracuse. Lastly, to consider or labour to disprove the foolerie of the Hebrewes, who suppose that the Arke was lightened by a Carbuncle, or had Windows of Crystall to receiue in Light, and keep out Water, were but to reuiue the buried vanities of former times. But that which I seeke most to satisfie my selfe and others in, is in what part of the World the Arke rested after the Flood: because the true vnderstanding of some of these places (as the Seat of the terrestrial Paradise, and the resting of the Arke) doe onely and truly teach the Worlds Plantation, and the beginning of Nations; before and after the Flood; and all stowie, as well generall as particular, thereby may be the better vnderstood.

T. II.

A proposall of the common opinion, that the Arke rested upon some of the Hills of Armenia.

And first, for the true place where the Arke rested after the Flood, and from what part of the World the Children of Noah quailed to their first settlement and place.

plantation, I am resolu'd (without any presumption) that therein the most writters were vtterly mistaken. And I am not led so to thinke out of my Humour or newnesse of opinion, or singulartie; but doe herein ground my selfe on the originall & first truth, which is the word of God, and after that vpon reason, and the most probable circumstances thereon depending. For whereas it is written, that the Arke staid upon one of the mountaines of Ararat, which the Chaldean Paraphrast hath conuerted Kardu, meaning the hills Gordai or Gordiai in Armenia the greater: (as the words Gordai and Kardu seeme to be one and the same) of which opinion also the most of our Interpreters are, I finde neither Scripture nor reason which teacheth any such thing: (to wit) that it rested on that part of Ararat, which is in the greater Armenia. Nicolasus Damascanus calls this mountaine of Ararat, Baris, being the same which the Chaldean nameth Kardu, to which mountaine the Fryer Amnius (citing this place out of Iosephus) makes him finde another adioyning, called Ocila, and to say that the Arke (of which Moses the Lawgiuer of the Hebrewes wrote) did first take ground on this Ocila. But I doe not finde any such mountain in being, as this Ocila; neither is there any mention of it in the place of Iosephus. Strabo remembereth a Promontorie in Arabia Felix, of that name, and Plinie findes a Mart-towne so called in the same, which Platonic calls Ocilia, Pinetus, Acyla, and Niger Zidon. But this Ocila of Damascanus, or rather of Amnius, seemeth to bee one and a part of the Armenian mountaines. Berosus calleth those mountaines of Armenia Gordai, and Curtius Cordai: Platonic Gordai and Gordiai: of which the Countrie next adioyning is by this Nicolasus Damascanus called Ninysada, perhaps (as Becanus coniectures) for Milyada or rather Minni: which word is vfed for Armenia Minor. And the very word of Armenia seemes to be compounded of this word Minni, and Aram: as if we should say Minni of Syria; for that Armenia also was a part of Syria, Plinie witnesseth. Epiphanius placeth the Cardes about these mountaines, whom others call Gordien or Gordien. The mountaines are seated apart from all other to the North of that Ledge of the mountaines called Taurus, or Niphates in the plains of Armenia the great, nere the Lake Thosphis: whence the River of Tigris floweth in 75. degrees of longitude, and 41. and 42. degrees of latitude. One of the mountaines Gordai (that which surmounteth the rest) Epiphanius calls Lubar, which in the Armenian signifieth a place of descent: but this out of Iosephus, which name (saith Iunius) was of the euent, because of Noahs coming downe with his children. But this also I take to be a supposed euent; seeing any hill from whence on every side we must descend, may thus be called: as Iunius corrects the place in Iosephus καταβας (Kubaris). That the place is thus to be read, he coniectureth, because Ioseph. l. 1. c. 4. sayes, the place is called καταβας (as it were the descent or coming downe) and Epiphanius. l. 1. contr. Hares. calls it καταβας, which word in the Armenian and Egyptian tongue signifieth descent, of Lubar, which is to descend; whence also Lubra is a Synagogue, because it was commonly built on some high place: whereof also the Latine Delubrum may seeme to bee deriued; and Ab. 6. 9. they that belonged to the Synagogue of the Egyptians are called Libertini, for Lubra tenu. Yet this opinion hath bene embraced from age to age, receiuing a habit of strength by time, and allowance without any farther examination; although the name of Lubar might otherwise rightly be giuen, especially to that mountaine, by reason that the passage was more faire, vp and downe vnto it, than to any of the rest adioyning.

T. III.

The first argument against the common opinion. They that came to build Babel, would haue come sooner, had they come from a neerer place as Armenia.

But there are many arguments to perswade me, that the Arke of Noah did not rest it selfe in any part of Armenia, and that the mountaine Ararat was not Baris, nor any one of the Gordian mountaines.

For the first, it is agreed by all which follow Berosus, that it was in the 130. yeere, or in the yeere 131. after the flood, when Nimrod came into the valley of Shinar, which Valley was afterward called Babylonia, Chubb, and Chaldaea. If then the Arke had first found land in Armenia, it is very vnprobable, that the children of Noah which came into that valley could haue spent so many yeeres in so short a passage: seeing the Region of Mesopotamia was onely interiacent, which might by easie iourneyes haue bene past ouer in twenty twentie dayes; and to hasten and helpe which passage, the nauigable riuer of Tygrus offered it selfe, which is euery where tranſſable by boates of great burden: ſo as where the Defart on the one ſide reſiſted their expedition, the riuer on the contrary ſide ſerued to aduance it; the riuer riſing out of the ſame Ledge of mountaines, or at the foote of them, vvhether the Arke of Noah vvas firſt ſuppoſed to ſettle it ſelfe; Then if the Nations vvhich followed Nimrod ſtill doubted the ſurpriſe of a ſecond flood (according to the opinions of the ancient Hebrewes) it ſoundeth ill to the ears of reaſon, that they would haue ſpent many yeeres in that low and ouerflowne Valley of Meſopotamia, ſo called of the many Riuer which imbroyder or compaſſe it: for the effects wiſſened their affecti- ons, and the workes vvhich they vnderooke, their vnbeliefe, being no ſooner arriued in Shinar, but they began to prouide themſelues of a defence (by erecting Babel) againſt 10 any future or feared inundation. Now at Babel it was that Nimrod began his Kingdome, the firſt known Citie of the world, founded after the flood about 131 yeeres, or (as others ſuppoſe) ten yeeres later: though (for my ſelfe) I rather thinke, that they vnderooke that worke in two reſpects; firſt, to make themſelues famous, To get vs a name (ſaith the Text:) Secondly, thereby to vſurpe dominion ouer the reſt.

The ſecond argument, That the Eaſterne people were moſt ancient in populofitie, and in all humane glory.

For a ſecond Argument: The ciuilitie, magnificence and multitude of people (where- 20 in the Eaſt parts of the world firſt abounded) hath more weight than any thing which hath bene, or can be ſaid for Armenia, and for Noahs taking land there. And that this is true, the vſe of Printing and Artillerie (among many other things which the Eaſt had) may eaſily perſwade vs, that thoſe Sunne-riſing Nations were the moſt ancient. The certaintie of this report, that the Eaſt Indians (time out of minde) haue had Gunnes and Ordnance of batterie, confirmed by the Portugals and others, make vs now to vnderſtand, That the place of Philoftratus in vita Apollonij Tiani, l. 2. c. 14. is no fable, though expreſſt in fabulous words: vvhether he ſaith, that the viſſe men, vvhich dwell be- 30 tweene Hypheſis and Ganges, vſe not themſelues to goe forth into battaile: but that they drie away their enemies vvvith thunder and lightning ſent from Iupiter. By which meanes there it is ſaid, that Hercules Aegyptius and Bacchus, ioyning their forces, were defeated there; and that this Hercules there caſt away his golden ſhield. For the inuen- tion of letters vvas ignorantly aſcribed to Cadmus, becauſe hee brought them firſt into Greece: of which the people (then rude and ſavage) had reaſon to giue him the honour, from whom they received the benefit. But it is true, that letters are no leſſe ancient 40 than Seth or Iteoch were: for they are ſaid to haue written on pillars of ſtone (as before remembred) long before the flood. But from the Eaſterne world it was that Iohn Cuſtewberg a German, brought the deuice of Printing: by whom Conradus being inſtructed, brought the practice thereof to Rome: and after that Nicholaus Gerſon a Frenchman, bet- 40 tered both the letters and inuention. And notwithstanding that this myſterie was then ſuppoſed to be but newly borne, the Chinians had letters long before either the Egypti- ans or Phenicians; and alſo the Art of Printing, when as the Greekes had neither any ci- uill knowledge, or any letters among them.

And, that this is true, both the Portugals and Spaniards haue wiſſened, who about an hundred yeeres ſince diſcouered thoſe Kingdomes, & doe now enjoy their rich trades therein: for the Chinians account all other Nations but Saluages, in reſpect of themſelues.

And to adde ſtrength to this argument, the conqueſt and ſtorie of Alex. Macedon may juſtly be called to witneſſe, who found more Cities and ſumptuoſitie in that little King- dome of Perus, which lay ſide by ſide to the Eaſt India, than in all his other trauals & yn- 50 der takings. For in Alexanders time learning & greatneſſe had not trauielled ſo far to the Weſt as Rome: Alexander eſteeming of Babe but as a barbarous Countrey, and of Rome as of a Village. But it was Babylon that ſtood in his eye, and the fame of the Eaſt pierced his eares. And if we looke as farre as the Sun-riſing, and heare Pavlus Venetus what hee reporteth of the vttermoſt Angle and Iſland thereof, wee ſhall finde that thoſe Nations haue ſent out, and not receiued, ſent knowledge, & not borrowed it from the Weſt. For the farther Eaſt (to this day) the more ciuill, the farther Weſt the more ſavage.

And

And of the Iſle of Iapan (now Zippingari) Pemetus maketh this report: Incola religioni, literis, & ſapientia ſunt additiſſimi, & veritatis indagatores acerrimi; nihil illis frequentius oratione, quam (more noſtro) ſacris in delubris exercent: unum cognoscunt Principem, unum Deum adorant. The Ilanders are exceedingly addicted to religion, letters, and Philoſophic, and moſt diligent ſearchers out of truth: there is nothing among them more frequent than prayer, which they uſe in their Churches, after the manner of Chriſtians. They acknowledge one King, and worſhip one God. The antiquitie, magnificence, ciuilitie, riches, ſumptuous buildings, and policie in gouernment, is reported to be ſuch by thoſe who haue bin employed into thoſe parts, as it ſeemeth to exceede (in thoſe formerly named, and di- 10 uers other particulars) all other Kingdomes of the world.

t. V.

The third argument, From the wonderfull reſiſtance which SEMIRAMIS found in the Eaſt Indies.

But for a third argument, and alſo of a treble ſtrength to the reſt, I lay the inuaſion of Semiramis before the indifferent and aduſed Reader: who may conſider in what age ſhee liued, and how ſoone after the worlds new birth ſhee gathered her Armie (as Diodorus Siculus out of Creſſus reporteth) of more than three Millions to inuade India, 20 to which hee adioyned alſo 500000 Horſe, and 100000 Waggons: whereof if we beleeue but a third part, it ſhall ſuffice to proue that India was the firſt planted and peopled Countrey after the flood. Now as touching the time wherein ſhee liued: All Hiſtorians conſent, that ſhee was the wife of Ninus; and the moſt approved Writers agree, that Ninus was the Sonne of Belus, and Belus of Nimrod, that Nimrod was the Sonne of Cuſh, Cuſh of Cham, and Cham of Noah. And at ſuch time as Nimrod came to Shinar, hee was then a great Nation, as by the building of the Citie and Tower of Babel may appeare; and being then ſo multiplied and increaſed, the two deſcents caſt betweene Nimrod and Semiramis, brought forth in that time thoſe multitudes, whereof her Armie was compoſed. Let vs then ſee with whom ſhee encountered in that warre with this her 30 powerfull Armie: euen with a multitude, rather exceeding, than equalling, her owne, conducted by Stavrobates King of India beyond Indus: of whole multitudes this is the witneſſe of Diod. Siculus. STAVROBATES ANTIQ. MAIORIBUS QUAMQUE CRANT SEMIRAMIDIS COPIS: STAVROBATES GATHERING TOGETHER GREATER TROUPES THAN THOSE OF SEMIRAMIS. If then theſe numbers of Indians had bene increaſed but by a Colonie ſent out from Shinar, (and that alſo after Babel was built, which no doubt tooke ſome time in the performance) this increaſe in the Eaſt, and this Armie of Stavrobates muſt haue bene made of ſtone, or ſomewhat elſe by miracle. For as the numbers which Semiramis gathered might eaſily grow vp in that time, from ſo great a Troupe as Nimrod brought with him into Babylonia (as ſhall be demonſtrated hereafter in the Storie of Iſrael) ſo 40 could not any ſuch time, by any multiplication natural, produce ſo many bodies of men as were in the Indian Armie victorious ouer Semiramis, if the Colonie ſent thither had bene ſo late as Rebel ouerturned, and the confuſion of Languages. For if wee allow 65 yeeres time after the Flood, before Nimrod was borne: of which, thirty yeeres to Cuſh ere hee begat Seba, after whom hee had Hauilah, Sabtah, Raamah, and Sabtecha: Gen. 10. 7. and then thirty yeeres to Raamah, ere hee begat Sheba and Dedan, both which were borne before Nimrod: and ſue yeeres to his ſue elder brothers, which make ſixtie ſue, and then twice thirty yeeres for two Generations more, as for Nimrod, Sheba and Dedan with others, to beget their ſonnes; and that a third Generation might grow vp, which makes in all an hundred twenty ſue yeeres, there will then remaine 50 ſue yeeres to haue bin ſpent in trauielling from the Eaſt, ere they arriued in Shinar in the yeere after the Flood 131. And ſo the followers of Nimrod might bee of ſufficient multitude. But as for thoſe which make him to haue arriued at Shinar in the yeere 101. and the confuſion to haue bene at Peleg birth, theſe men doe all by miracle: they beget whole Nations without the helpe of time, and build Nimrod Towne in the Ayre, and not on thoſe low and marſh grounds (which require ſound foundations) in the Plaines of Shinar. For except that huge Towre were built in a day, there could bee no confuſion in that yeere 101. or at Peleg birth. And therefore it is farre more probable, that Nimrod vſurped Regall authority in the 131. yeere after 1 after the Flood, (according to Berosus) and that the worke of babel lasted forty yeeres (according to GLYCAS) Homini in ea persicienda totis 40 annis incassum laborantibus; Men labouring in vaine 40. yeeres to finish it. By which account it falls out, that it was 170. yeeres after the Flood, ere a Colony was sent into East India; which granted the one being the maine body, and the other but a Troupe taken thence; it can hardly be beleueed, that Staurabates could haue exceeded Semiramis in numbers: who being then Empresse of all that part of the world, gathered the most of Nations into one bodie.

Glycas Gen. & d. Caraxes from thence. fol. 173.

¶ VI.

The fourth Argument from diuers considerations in the person of NOAH.

Fourthly, it is no way probable, that Noah, who knew the world before the flood, & had lived therein the long time of 600. yeeres, was all that space 130. yeeres after the flood, without any certaine habitation: No, it will fall out, and better agree with reason, that Nimrod was but the conductor of those people, by Noah destined and appointed to fill and inhabit that middle part of the earth and the Western world; (which traualles Noah put ouer to young and able bodies) and that Noah himselfe then covered with many yeeres, planted himselfe in the same place which God had assigned him: which was where he first came downe out of the Arke from the waters: For it is written, that after Noah came downe out of the Arke hee planted a Vineyard, and became a Husbandman: whose businesse was to dresse and manure the earth; and not to range ouer so many parts of the world, as from Armenia into Arabia felix, where hee should (if the tradition be found) haue left certaine Colonies: thence into Africa towards Tripoli, then into Spain, where they say he settled other companies, and built Cities after the names of Noela and Nargla his sonnes wiues: from thence into Italy, where they say hee found his sonne Cham the Saturne of Egypt, who had corrupted the people and subiects of Camer in his absence: with whom Noah (as they make the storie) had patience for three yeeres; but then finding no amendment, they say he banisht him out of Italy. These be but the fancies of Berosus Annianus, a plaine imitation of the Græcian fables. For let euery reasonable man conceiue, what it was to traualle farre in such a forrest as the World was, when after so great a rotting of the earth by the flood, the same lay waste and ouer-grown for 130. or 140. yeeres, and wherein there could hardly be found either part or passage through which men were able to creepe for woods, bushes and bryars that in those yeeres were growne vp.

And there are so many reasons, proving that Noah neuer came into the valley of Shinar, as we need not suspect his passage into Italy or Spain: For Noah, who was Father of all those Nations, a man reuerenced both for his authority, knowledge, experience and pietie, would neuer haue permitted his children and issues to haue vnder-taken that vnbeleueing presumptuous worke of Babel. Rather by his presence and pre-uaient persuasions he would haue bound their hands from so vaine labours, & by the authority which he receiued euen from God himselfe, hee would haue held them in that awfull subiection, as whatsoeuer they had vainly conceiued or feared, yett they durst not haue disobeyed the personall commandment of him, who in the beginning had a kinde of Regall authority ouer his children and people. Certainly, Noah knew right well, that the former destruction of mankind was by themselves purchased through crueltie and disobedience; and that to distrust God, and to raise vp building against his Almighty power, was as much as in them lay, a prouocation of God to lay on them the same, if not a more sharpe affliction. Wherefore, there is no probability, that euer he came so farre West as Babylonia; but rather, that hee sent those numbers, which came into Shinar (being the greatest troupe, because they had the greatest part of the world to plant) vnder Nimrod, or those vpon whom he vsurped. Nanclerus and Celestinus take the testimony of Mesiodius Bishop of Tyre for current, that there were three Leaders of the people after their encrease (to wit) Nimrod, Sapbene, and Isolan: of which Nimrod commanded the issues of Cham, Isolan of Sem, and Sapbene of Japhet. This opinion I cannot iudge of, although I will not doubt, but that so great a worke as the worlds plantation, could not be effected without order and conduction.

Of the sonnes of Sem: Isolan, Itaiah, and Ophir, are especially noted to haue dwelt in the East India. The rest of Sem's issues had also the Regions of Persia and the other adioyning adioyning to Indus, and held also a part of Chaldea for a time: for Abraham inhabited Ur, till he was thence called by God; and whether they were of the Sonnes of Isolan, or of all the rest a certaine number (Cham and his issue onely excepted) that Noah kept with himselfe; it cannot be knowne. Of which plantation I shall speake at large in the Chapter following.

Now another reason which mooues me to beleuee, that Noah stayed in the East far away from all those that came into Shinar, is, that Moses doth not in any word make mention of Noah in all the story of the Hebrewes, or among any of those Nations which contended with them. And Noah, being the Father of all mankind, and the chosen servant of God, was too principall a person, to be either forgotten or neglected, had hee not (in respect of his age and wearisome experience of the world) withdrawne himselfe, and rested a part with his best beloued, giuing himselfe to the seruice and contemplation of God and heavenly things, after he had directed his children to their destined portions. For he landed in a warme and fertile soile, where hee planted his Vineyard, and drest the earth after which, and his thanksgiving to God by sacrifice, hee is not remembered in the Scriptures, because he was so farre away from those Nations of which Moses wrote; which were the Hebrewes chiefly, and their enemies and borderers.

¶ VII.

Of the senselesse opinion of ANNIUS the Commentor vpon BEROSUS: who finds diuers places where the Arke rested; as the Caspian and Gordian hills which are three hundred miles asunder; and also some place of Scythia.

It remaineth now that we examine the Arguments & authorities of Frier Annius, who in his Commentaries vpon Berosus and others, laboureth maruailously to proue, that the Arke of Noah rested vpon the Armenian mountaines called Caspj; which mountaines separate Armenia from the vpper Media, and doe equally belong to both. And because all his Authours speake of the mountaines Gordian, he hath no other shift to vnitie these opinions, but by vnitng those farre-distant mountaines together. To effect which, hee hath found no other inuention, than to charge those men with error, which haue carefully ouerseene, printed, and published Ptolomies Geographie, in which they are altogether disuicered. For that last edition of Mercators, sets these hills five degrees (which makes three hundred English miles) asunder. And certainly, if we looke into those more ancient copies of Vilanius and others, we shall find nothing in them to helpe Annius withall: for in those the mountaines Caspj stand seuen degrees to the East of the Gordian, which make 420. miles. And for those Authours by whose authority Annius strengtheneth himselfe, Pindorus whom he so much followeth, giueth this iudgment vpon them in the like dispute. Aberrantur verò omnes, non negligentia, sed regno videlicet: rum stus ignorantia. They haue all erred (saith he) not through negligence, but through ignorance of the situation of Kingdomes. But for an induction, to proue that the Arke of Noah stood on the mountaines of Armenia, hee beginneth with the antiquity of the Scythians: and to proue the same he citeth Marcus Porcius Cato, who auoweth that 250. yeeres before Ninus, the earth was ouerflowne with waters, & in Scythia Sagarenatum mortale genus; and that in Scythia the stocke of mortall men was reuicred. The same Authour also teacheth that the Vmbri before remembered (who were so called, because saued from Democalion flood) were the Sonnes of the Galli, a Nation of the Scythians. Ex his uenisse LANVM cum DYIM, & Galli progenitoribus Vmbrosum; From these Scythians, he saith, that LANVS came with DYIM, and with the Galli the progenitors of the Vmbri; And againe, Equidem principatus originis semper Scythi tributur. Certainly, the Prime antiquitie of off-spring is alway giuen to the Scythians. And herein truly I agree with Annius, that those Regions called Scythia and now Tartaria, and by some Writers Sarmatia, Asiatica, were among the first peopled: and they held the greatest part of Asia vnder tribute till Ninus time. Also Plinie called the Vmbri which long time inhabited Italy, Gens antiquissima, a most ancient Nation, who descended of these Scythians. Now that which Annius laboureth is to proue that these ancient Scythians (meaning the Nephewes of Noah) did first inhabit that Region of the mountaines, on which the Arke rested; and confessing that this great ship was grounded in Armenia, he saith a nation of Scythians called Araxe, taking name of the mountain Arax, neere the Riuer of Araxes. And because his Author Cato helpeth him in part

(to wit, That in Scythia mankind was restored after the great flood, 250. yeares before Ninus) and in part utterly destroyeth his conceit of Armenia, by adding the vvord Saga, as, In Scythia Saga renatum mortale genus, In Scythia Saga mankind was restored, hee therefore in the Proeme of his Commentary vpon Berosus, leaueth out the addition of Saga altogether in the repetition of Cato his words, and writes, homines in Scythia saluati. For Scythia Saga or Saca, is vndoubtedly vnder the Mountaines of Parapanisus; on which, or neare which it is most probable that the Arke first tooke ground: and from thofe East parts (according to Moses) came all those companies which erected the Tower of Babel in Shinaar or Babylonia.

But now the best authority which Annius hath, is out of Diodorus: where hee hath read, that the Scythians were originally Armenians, taking name a Scythia Kege carum, from Scythia their King. But (in a word) wee may see his vanity, or rather (indeede) his fallshood in citing this place. For Diodorus, a most approoued and diligent Author, beginneth in that place vvith these vvords: Fabulantur Scythae; The Scythians fable; and his Interpreter in the table of that worke giueth this title to that very Chapter. Scytharum origo & successus, fabula; The originall and successe of the Scythians, a fable. And (indeede) there needs no great disproofe hereof, since Ptolomy doth directly delineate Scythia Saga or Saca, and sets them in 130. degrees of longitude: and the Persians (saith Herodotus) call all the Scythians, Saca which Pliny confirmeth: for in respect that these Saca (saith Pliny) are the next Scythians to the Persians, therefore they giue all the rest that name. Now that any Nation in Armenia can neighbour the Persians, there is no man beleueth. But this supposed Scythia Araxea in Armenia lyeth in 78. degrees of longitude (that is) 42. degrees distant from the Saca; and the Country about Araxes Ptolomy calleth Colchene and Saducene and Sacapene without any mention of Scythia at all: and yet all those which are or were reputed Scythians either with Imanus or without, Tab. Afr. 7. 6. 8. to the number of 100. severall Nations, are by Ptolomy precisely set downe.

But to come to those later Authors, whereof some haue written, others haue scene a great part of those North-east Regions, and searched their antiquities with great diligence: First, Marius Niger boundeth Scythia within Imanus, in this manner: (for Scythia without these Mountaines is also beyond our purpose) Scythia inter Imaum montem ea est, que proprio vocabulo Cassaria hoc tempore dicitur: ab Occasu Sarmatia Asiatica: ab Oriente Imao monte: a Septentrione terra incognita: a Meridia Saccis, Sogdianis, Margianis, usque ad Oxiannus in Hyrcanum mare exenti; & parte ipsius maris hinc usque ad Rha fluminis ostia terminatur: Scythia within the Mountaine Imaus is that part of the world, which in their owne speech is at this time called Cassaria; and the same is bounded on the West side by Sarmatia Asiatica, (or of Asia) on the East by the Imaum Mountaines: on the North by unknowne Lands: on the South by the Saccæ (which are in the Saccæ) the Sogdiani, and the Margiani, to the mouth of Oxus, falling into the Hyrcan Sea, and by a part of the same Sea as farre as the mouth of Rha.

Now if Niger sets all Sarmatia Asiatica, to the West of Scythia, then Sarmatia (que magna sanè regio est, & quæ innumerabiles nationes complectitur) which is a great Region, comprehending innumerable Nations (saith Niger) much of it being betwene Scythia and Armenia; doth sufficiently warrant vs, that Armenia can be no part of Scythia; and to make it more plaine, hee disseuereth Scythia it selfe from any part of Armenia, by the Regions of Colchis, Iberia, Albania, which he leaueth on the right hand of Sarmatia, and yet makes Sarmatia but the West bound of Scythia.

And for Paulus Pemetus, he hath not a vvord of Armenia among the Tartarian or Scythian Nations, neither doth his fellow Frier Ioh. Plancarpio cited by Vincentius in his description of Scythia make any mention of Armenia; neyther doth Haytonus, an Armenian borne, of the blood of those Kings (though afterward a Monke) euer acknowledge himselfe for a Tartarian, or of the Scythian Races defended: though he write that storie at large, gathered by Nicholaus Salcuni, and (by the commandement of Pope Clement the fifth) in the yeere 1307. published.

Neyther doth Matthias a Michon (a Canon of Craconia in Polonia) a Sarmatian borne, and that trauielled a great part of Sarmatia Asiatica, finde Armenia any way within the compasse of Tartaria, Scythia, or Sarmatia; and yet no man (whose Trauailles are extant) hath obserued so much of those Regions as he hath done: prouing and disproving many things, heretofore subiect to dispute. And among others he bueth that ancient and

receiued opinion, That out of the Mountaines Riphai, and Hyperborei in Scythia, spring the Riuer of Tanais or Don, Volga or Edel; prouiding by vnanifwerable experience, that there are no such Mountaines in verum natura; and (indeed) the Heads and Fountaines of those famous Riuer are now by the Trade of Muscovia knowne to euery Merchant, and that they arise out of Lakes, low, wooddie, and marsh grounds. The Riuer of Tanais or Don, ariseth to the South of the Citie Tulla, some twentie English miles, out of a Lake called Imanowero, in the great Wood Okenitzkyles or Sciphanolies, Volga, which Ptolomy calls Rha, and the Tartars call Edel, riseth out of a Lake called Frogon, in the great Wood Podkonzi: from which Lake the two other famous Riuer flow of Byzibenes (now Neyper) and Dniuna or Dimidna. And this learned Polonian doth in this fort bound the European Sarmatia. In Sarmatia of Europe are the Regions of Russians, Lithuanians, Muscovians, and those adioyning, bounded on the West by the Riuer of Vissa, the Name perchance mis-printed Vissa for Vistula, a Riuer which parts Germanie and Sarmatia; and for the East border he nameth Tanais, or Don. Sarmatia Asiatica he cutteth from Europe by the same Riuer of Tanais, and the Caspian Sea, to with-hold it from stretching farther East: this Asian Sarmatia being part of that Scythia which Ptolomy calleth Scythia intra Imaum montem: Scythia within the Mountaine Imaus. And the same Matthias Michon farther affirmeth, that the Scythians (which Frier Annius would make Armenians) came not into Sarmatia Asiatica it selfe about three hundred and a few odd yeeres before his owne time: these be his vvords: *Constat eam esse gentem novam, & aduentitiam a partibus Orientis (mutatis sedibus) paulo plus abhine trecentis annis. Afie Sarmatiam ingressam: It is manifest (saith he, speaking of the Scythian Nation) that this is a late planted Nation, come from the coasts of the East: from whence they entred into Asia, and gat new seats a little more than 300. yeeres since: For (indeed) before that time the Goths or Poulozi inhabited Sarmatia, Asiatica. And this Matthias liued in the yeere 1511. and this his Discourse of Sarmatia was printed at Anguisa in the yeere 1506. as Bucholzcrus in his Chronologie witnesseth. Now these Scythians (saith he) came from the East, for in the East it was that the Arke of Noah rested, and the Scythæ Saca were those people which liued at the North foot of those Mountaines, of Taurus or Ararat, where they encounter or begin to mixe themselves with the great Imanus. And were there no other testimony than the generall description of the Earth now extant, and the witness of Ptolomy, it is plaine, that betwene all parts of Armenia, and Scythia, there are not only those three Regions of Colchis, Iberia, and Albania, but the Caspian Sea: on the East shore of which Sea, but not on the West, or on that part which any way toucheth Armenia, there are (indeed) a Nation of Scythians (called Ariace) betwene Iaxartus and Iactus; but what are these Scythians to any Ariace, or Scythia Araxea, which Annius placeth in Armenia, more than the Scythians of Europe?*

†. XIII.

40 The fift Argument, The Vine must grow naturally neere the place where the Arke rested.

TO this if we adde the consideration of this part of the Text, That NOAH planted a Vineyard, we shall find that the fruit of the Vine or Rayfin did not grow naturally in that part of Armenia, where this resting of the Arke was supposed: for if the Vine was a franger in Italie and France, and brought from other Countries thither, it is not probable that it grew naturally in Armenia, being a farre colder Country. For Tyrrhenus first brought Vines into France, and Saturnus into Latium: yea at such times as Brennus and the Gauls invaded Italie, there were few or no Vines in France. For (saith Plutarch in the life of Camilus) the Gauls remained betwene the Pyrenæi and the Alpes, S. ruius Armenia neere vnto the Senones, where they continued a long time, vntill they drunke Wine, which was first brought them out of Italie; and after they tasted thereof they hastened to inhabit that Country, which brought forth such pleasant fruit: so as it appeareth, that the Plant of the Vine was not naturall in France, but from Italie brought thither; as by Saturne from elfe where into Italy.

Now it is manifest, that Noah trauielled not farre to seeke out the Vine. For the Plantation thereof is remembered, before there was any counsaile how to dispose of the World among his children: and the first thing he did, was, to till the ground, & to plant a Vineyard, after the Sacrifice and Thankesgiuing to God; and wherefoerer the Arke rested, there there did the Vine grow naturally. From whence it doth no where appeare, that he tra-uailed far for the Scriptures teach vs, that he was a Husband-man, & not a Wanderer.

I. IX.

An answer to an obiection out of the words of the Text: The Lord scattered them from thence upon the face of the whole earth.

AND that all the children of Noah came together into Shinar, it doth not appeare saith that it may be inferred out of these words (from thence) because it is written:
So that the Lord scattered them from thence upon all the earth; which hath no other sense, but that the Lord scattered them (to wit) those that built this Towre: for those were from thence dispersed into all the Regions of the North and South, and to the Westward. And by these words of Sybilla (as they be conuerted) it seemeth that all came not together into Shinar; for they haue this limitation: Quidam eorum turtem edificauerunt altissimam, quasi per eam caelum effent ascensuri: Certaine of them built a most high Towre, as if they meant thereby to haue scaled the Heauens.

I. X.

An answer to the obiection of the name of Ararat, taken for Armenia: and the height of the Hills there.

BEFORE I conclude this part, it is necessarie to see & consider, what part of Scripture, and what reason may be found out, to make it true or probable, that the Arke of Noah was forsaken by the waters on the Mountaines of Armenia. For the Text hath only these words: The Arke rested on (or vpon) the Mountaines of Ararat; or Armenia, saith the marginal note of the Geneva: the Chaldean Paraphrast calls it Kardu; of which, the highest hath the name of Lubar, saith Epiphanius. Now this Ararat; (which the Septuaginta do not conuert at all, but keepe the same word) is taken to be a Mountaine of Armenia, because Armenia it selfe had anciently that name: so as first out of the name, and secondly out of the height (which they suppose exceeded all other) is the opinion taken, that the Arke first sat thereon.

But these suppositions haue no foundation: for neither is Ararat of Armenia alone, neither is any part, or any of those Mountaines of equall stature to many other Mountaines of the World; and yet it doth not follow, that the Arke found the highest Mountaine of all other to rest on: for the Plaines were also vncovered, before Noah came out of the Arke. Now, if there were any agreement among Writers of this Ararat, and that they did not differ altogether therein, we might giue more credit to the conceit. For in the Bookes of the Sybills it is written, that the Mountaines of Ararat are in Phrygia, vpon which it was supposed that the Arke stayed after the Flood. And the better to particularize the place and seate of these Mountaines, and to prooue them in Phrygia, and not Armenia, they are placed where the City of Calenes was afterward built. Likewise in the same description there maketh mention of Marস্যas; a Riuer which runneth through part of Phrygia, and afterward ioyneth it selfe with the Riuer Meander, which is farre from the Gordicean Mountaines in Armenia. We may also finde a great mistaking in Iosephus (though out of Berosus, who is in effect the Father of this opinion) that Iosephus sets Ararat betwene Armenia and Partmia, toward Adiabene, and affirmeth withall, that in the prouince of Ceron (by others Kairos and Arnos, so called by reason that the waters haue from thence no descent, nor issue out) the people vaunt that they had in those dayes reserved some peices of Noahs Arke. But Partmia toucheth no where vpon Armenia, for Armenia bordereth Adiabene, a Prouince of Affria: so that all Media and a part of Affria is betwene Partmia and Armenia. Now whereas the discovery of the Mountaine Gordice was first borrowed out of Berosus by Iosephus; yet the Text which Iosephus citeth out of Berosus, differs far from the words of that Berosus, which wandreth vp and downe in these dayes, set out by Annins. For Berosus, cited by Iosephus, hath these words: Fertur & nauighuius pars in Armenia apud montem Cor-dicarum superesse, & quosdam Bitumen inde abrasum secum reportare, quo vice amuletis loci huius homines uti solent: (which is) It is reported also that a part of this ship is yet remaining in Armenia vpon the Gordicean Mountaines; and that diuers doe scrape from it the Bitumen or Pitch, and carrying it with them, they use it in stead of an amulet. But Annins his

Edition

Edition of the Fragment of Berosus vseth these words: Nam eleuata ab aquis in Gordice montis superficie quiescit, cuius adhuc dicitur aliqua pars esse, & homines ex illa Bitumen tolleere quod maxime utuntur ad expiationem: For the whole Arke being lifted up by the waters, rested on the top of the Gordicean Mountaines, of which it is reported that some parts remaine; and that men doe carry thence of the Bitumen to purge by Sacrifice therewith: so as in these two Texts (besides the difference of wordes) the name is diuersly written. The ancient Berosus writes Gordice with a (G.) and the Fragment Gordice with a (G.) the one that the Bitumen is vsed for a preseruatiue against Poyson or Inchantment, the other in Sacrifice. And if it be said that they agree in the general, yet it is reported by neither from any certaine knowledge, nor from any approved Author: for one of them, vseth the word (fertur) the other (dicitur) the one, that so it is reported, the other, that so it is said; and both but by heare-say, and therefore of no authority nor credit. For common bruit is so infamous an Historian, as wise men neither report after it, nor giue credit to any thing they receive from it.

Furthermore, these Mountaines which Protonice calls Gordice, are not those Moun-taines which himselfe giueth to Armenia, but he calleth the Mountaines of Armenia Mosehici. These be his owne words: Montes Armenie nominantur, qui Mosehici ap-pellantur, qui prestantur effi, ad superiacentem partem Ponti Cappadocum; & mons qui Paryades dicitur: The Mountaines of Armenia are they which are called Mosehici, stretch along to the higher part of Pontus of the Cappadocians: also the Hill which is called Paryades:
which Mountaines Plinie calleth Paryades, & both which lye to the North of Gordice or Baru, in 43. and 44. and a halfe; and the Gordicean Mountaines in 39. and a halfe: from the Northernmost of which did the Georgians take their names, who were first Gordians and then Georgians, who amidst all the strength of the greatest Infidels of Persia and Turkie, doe still remaine Christians. Concerning the other suppositions, that the Moun-taines of Gordice, or therswise Baru Kardu or Lubar (which Protonice calleth Torgodicean) are the highest of the World, the same is absolutely false.

I. XI.

Of Caucasus, and diuers farre higher hills than the Armenian.

FOR the best Geographers with other, that haue seene the Mountaines of Armenia find them farre inferiour, and vnder-set to diuers other Mountaines euen in that part of the World, and else where: as the Mountaine Athos betwene Macedon and Thrace, which Protonice calls Olympus, now called Lacus, (saith Cassaldus) is farre surmounting any Mountaine that euer hath bene seene in Armenia: for it casteth shade three hundred furlongs, which is seuen and thirtie miles and vpwards: of which Plutarch: Athos adumbrat latera Lemnia bouis: Athos shadoweth the Cow of Lemnos. Also the Mount of Olympus in Thessalie, is said to be of that height, as neither the Windes, Cloudes or Raine ouertop it. Again, the Mountaine of Ansandrus in Mytia, not farre from Ida, whence the Riuer Scamandrus floweth, which runneth through Troy, is also of a farre more admiration than any in Armenia, and may be seene from Constantinople. There are also in Mauritania neere the Sea, the famous Mountaines of Atlas, of which HERO-DOTVS: Exstat in hoc mari Mons cui nomen Atlas, ita sublimis esse dicitur, ut ad illius verticem oculis mortalium pervenire non possint: Vpon this Coast there is a Mountaine called Atlas, whose height is said to be such, as the eye of no mortall man can discern the top thereof.
And if we may beleuee Aristotle, then are all these inferiour to Caucasus, which he ma-keth the most northerly both for breadth and height: Caucasus Mons omnium maximus, qui situm ad ortum Iunæ, acuminatq; latitudine, cuius iuga a Sole radiantur effi, ad continentium ab ortu: & iterum ab occasu Caucasus (saith ARISTOTTE) is the greatest Moun-taine both for breadth and height of all those in the North-east, whose tops are lightened by the Sun-beames, effi, ad contineum (which is, saith Macrobius): betwene the first crowing after mid-night and the breake of day: Others affirme, that the top of this Mountaine holds the Sunne-beames when it is darke in the Valley; but I cannot beleuee either:
for the highest Mountaine of the World knowne is that of Tenerife in the Canaria: which although it hath nothing to the Westward of it for 1000. Leagues together but the Ocean Sea, yet doth it not enioy the Suns company at any such late houres. Besides these Mountaines which Aristotle calleth Caucasus are those which separate Calchis from Iberia,

Iberia; though (indeed) Caucasus doth diuide both Colchis, Iberia, and Albania from Sarmatia: for hee acknowledgeth that the Riuer of Phasis riseth in the same Mountaine, which himselfe calleth Caucasus; and that Phasis springeth from those Hills which funder Colchis from Iberia, falling after ward into Eufratus: which Riuer (it is manifest) yeeldeth it selfe to the Sea, two degrees to the North of Trapezus (now Trabsfunda) howsoeuer Mercator bring it from Peryardes.

†. XII.

Of diuers incongruities if in this Storia we should take Ararat for Armenia.

SO as it doth first appeare, that there is no certaintie what Mountaine Ararat was: 10
For the Bookes of the Syblis set it in Phrygia, and Berosus in Armenia: and as for Berosus authoritie, those men haue great want of proofes that borrow from thence.

Secondly, that Baris was the highest Hill, and therefore most likely that the Arke grounded thereon, the assertion and supposition haue equall credit: for there are many Hills which exceed all those of Armenia; and if they did not, yet it doth not follow (as is before written) that the Arke should fit on the highest.

Thirdly, it cannot be proued that there is any such Hill in Armenia, or in rerum natura, as Baris: for Baris (sayth Hierame) significeth high Towres: and so may all high Hills be called indifferently; and therefore we may better giue the name of Baris to the Hills of Caucasus (out of which Indus riseth) than to any Hills of Armenia. For those of 20
Caucasus in the East, are vndoubtedly the highest of Asia.

Fourthly, the Authours themselves doe not agree in what Region the Mountaines Gordaei stand: for Ptolomee distinguisheth the Mountaines of Armenia from the Gordaei, and calleth those of Armenia Moschici and Peryardes, as aforesaid. Now Peryardes is seated neere the middle of Armenia, out of which on the West-side riseth Eufrates, and out of the East-side Araxis: and the Mountaines Moschici are those Hills which disioyne 30 Colchis, Iberia, and Albania (now the Country of the Georgians) from Armenia.

†. XIII.

Of the contrary situation of Armenia, to the place noted in the Text: and that it is no maruaile that the same Ledge of Hills running from Armenia to India, should keepe the same name all along: and euen in India be called Ararat. 30

LASTly, we must blow vp this Mountaine Ararat it self, or else we must digge it down, and carry it out of Armenia, or find it else where, and in a warmer Country, and (withall) set it East from Shinar; or else we shall wound the Truth it selfe with the weapons of our owne vaine imaginations.

Therefore to make the mistaking open to euery eye, we must vnderstand, that Ararat (named by Moses) is not any one Hill, so called, no more than any one Hill among those Mountaines which diuide Italie from France is called, the Alpes: or any one among those which part France from Spaine is the Pyrenian; but as these, being continuations of many Hills, keep one name in diuers Countries: so all that long Ledge of Mountaines, which Plinie calleth by one name Taurus, and Ptolomee both Taurus, Niphates, Contras, Coronus, Sariphi, vntill they encounter and crosse the Mountaines of the great Imanus, are of one generall name, and are called the Mountaines of Ararat or Armenia, because from thence or thereabout they seeme to arise. So all these Mountaines of Hircania, Armenia, Coraxis, Caspji, Moschici, Amazonici, Heniuchi, Scythici, (thus diuerly called by Plinie and others) Ptolomee calls by one name Caucasus, lying betweene the Seas Caspium and Eufratus: as all those Mountaines which cut afunder America, euen 40 from the new Kingdome of Granado, to the streight of Magellan, are by one name called Andes. And as these Mountaines of Ararat runne East and West, so doe those maruailous Mountaines of Imanus stretch themselves North and South; and being of like extent well-neere, are called by the name of Imanus, euen as Plinie calleth these former hills Taurus, and Moses the hills of Ararat. The reason of severall names giuen by Ptolomee, was, thereby the better to distinguish the great Regions and Kingdomes, which these great mountaines bound and disieue: as Armenia, Mesopotamia, Assyria, Media, Susiana, Persia, Partbia, Caramania, Aria, Margiana, Bactria, Sogdiana, and Parapanisus: hauing all these Kingdomes either on the North or South side of them. For all the mountaines of Asia (both the lesse and the greater) haue three generall names, (to wit) Taurus, Imanus, and Caucasus: and they receiue other titles; as they seuer and diuide particular places and regions. For these mountaines which funder Cilicia from the rest of Asia the lesse on the North side, are called Taurus; and those mountaines which part it from Comagena (a Prouince of Syria) are called Amannus: the mountaines called Taurus running East and West, as Imanus doth North and South. Though Taurus the Riuer of Eufrates forceth her passage, leaving the name of Amannus to the mountains on her West-banke; and on her East side the mountains are sometimes knowne by the name 10 of Taurus, (as in Ptolomee three tables of Asia) and sometimes Niphates; (as in the fourth) retaining that vncertaine appellation so long as they bound Armenia from Mesopotamia; and after the Riuer of Tygris cutteth them afunder, they then take the name of Niphates altogether, vntill they separate Assyria and Media; but then they call themselves Contras, though betweene the vpper and nether Media, they doe not appeare, but altogether discontinue. For at Mazada in Media they are not found, but runne through the Easterne Media by pieces: in the middle of which Region they call themselves Orontes, and towards the East part Coronus; out of the Southerne part whereof the Riuer of Bagradas riseth, which diuideth the ancient Persia from Caramania; and then continuing their course Eastward by the name of Coronus, they giue to the Parthians and 20 Hircanians their proper Countries. This done, they change themselves into the mountaines of Sariphi, out of which riseth the Riuer Margus, afterward yeelding her selfe to Oxus (now Abia): and drawing now neere their wayes end, they first make themselves the South border of Bactria, and are then honoured with the Title of Parapanisus; and lastly of Caucasia, euen where the famous Riuer of Indus, with his principal companions Hydaspis and Zaradrus, spring forth and take beginning. And here doe these Mountaines build themselves exceeding high, to equal the strong Hills called Imanus of Scythia, which encounter each other in 35. 36. and 37. degrees of Latitude, and in 140 of Longitude: of the which the West parts are now called Delanguer, and the rest Nagracot; and these Mountaines in this place onely are properly called Caucasi (saith Ptolomee) 30 that is, betweene Parapanisus and Imanus: and improperly, betweene the two Seas of Caspium and Pontus.

†. XIII.

Of the best Vine naturally growing on the South side of the Mountaines Caucasi and toward the East Indies: and of other excellencies of the soile.

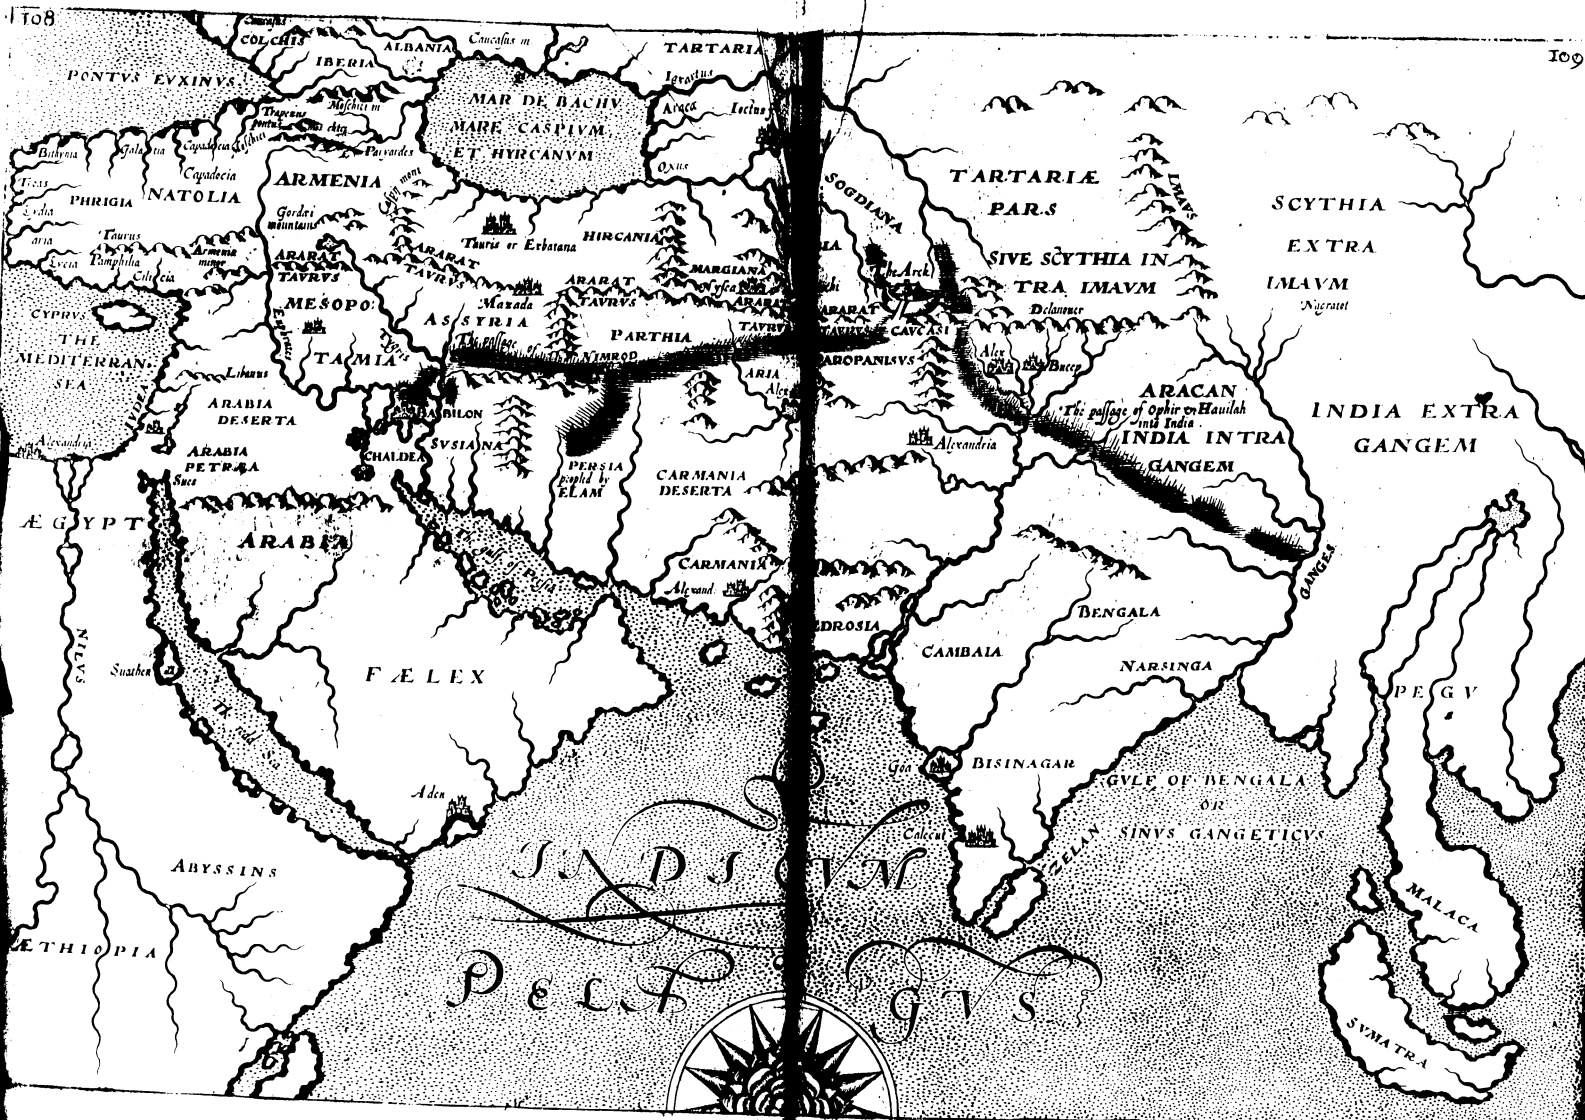

NOW in this part of the World it is, where the Mountaine and Riuer Imanus, and the Mountaine Nysens (so called of Bacchus Nysens or Noah) are found: and on these highest Mountaines of that part of the world did Goropius Becanus conceiue that the Arke of Noah grounded after the Flood: of all his coniectures the most probable, and by best 40 reason approued. In his Indosythia he hath many good Arguments, though mixt with other fantasticall opinions of his subiect. And as the same Becanus also noteth; that as in this part of the world are found the best Vines: so it is as true, that in the same Line, & in 34. 35. & 36. degrees of Septentrionall Latitude, are the most delicate Wines of the World, namely in Indus, Candia, and other parts of Greece: and likewise in this Region of Margiana; and vnder these Mountaines Strabo affirmeth, that the most excellent Vines of the World are found; the clusters of Grapes containing two Cubits of length: & it is the more probable, because this place agreeth in Climate with that part of Palestina, where the searchers of the land, by Moses directio, found bunches of equal bignes at Escol. 50
The fruitfulness of this place (to wit) on the South bottome of these Hills, Curtius witnesseth. For in Margiana neere the Mountaines of Meros did Alexander feast himselfe & his Armie ten daies together, finding the most delicate Wine of all other.

†. XV.

The conclusion, with a brife repeating of diuers chiefe points.

AND therefore to conclude this opinion of Ararat, it is true, that those Mountaines doe also trauesse Armenia: yea, and Armenia it selfe sometime is knowne by the name the Valley of Shinaar in 79. and 80. And therefore Armenia lyeth from Shinaar North-west, ninety five degrees from the East; and if Armenia had bene but North, yet it had differed from the East one whole quarter of the Compass. But Gregorie and Hierome warne vs, In scripturis ne minima differentia amitti debet: nam singuli sermones, syllabe, apices, & puncta in diuina Scriptura plana sunt sensibus; In the Scriptures the least difference may not be omitted: for every speech; syllable, note, or accent, and point in diuine Scriptures are replenished with their meanings. And therefore seeing Moses teacheth vs that the children of Noah came from the East, we may not beleue Writers (of little authority) who also speake by heare-say and by report, ut fertur, & ut dicitur, as Berosus and Nicolaus Damascenus, determining herein without any examination of the Text, at all ad-uenture. But this is infallible true, that Shinaar lyeth West from the place where the Arke of Noah rested after the floud; and therefore it first found ground in the East, from whence came the first knowledge of all things. The East parts were first ciuill, which had Noah him selfe for an Instructor: and directly East from Shinaar in the same degree of 35. are the greatest grapes and the best Wine. The great Armies also which ouer-topped in number those Millions of Semiramis, proue, that those parts were first planted. And whereas the other opinion hath neither Scripture nor Reason sufficient: for my selfe I build on his wordes who in plain termes hath told vs, that the Sonnes of Noah came out of the East into Shinaar, and there they abode. And therefore did the Arke rest on those Easterne Mountaines, called by one generall name Taurus, and by Moses the Mountaines of Ararat, and not on those Mountaines of the North-west, as Berosus first faired; whom most part of the Writers haue followed therein. It was, I say, in the plentiful warme East where Noah rested, where hee planted the Vine, where hee tilled the ground & liued thereon. *Placuit vero NOACHO agricultura studium, in qua tradenda ipse omnium peritissimus esse dicitur: ob eamq. rem sua ipsius lingua ISH-ADAMATH (hoc est) telluris vir, appellatur celebratissq. est; The studie of Husbandrie pleased NOAH (saith the excellent learned man ARIAS MONTANUS) in the knowledge & order of which it is said, that NOAH excelled all men: and therefore was he called in his owne language a man exercised in the earth. Which also sheweth, that he was no Wanderer, and that he troubled not himselfe with the contentions, beginning againe in the world, & among men, but stayed in his destined places, and in that part of the world, where hee was first deliuered out of the prison of the Arke, whereinto God had committed him, to preserve him and mankind.*

CHAP. VIII.

Of the first planting of Nations after the Floud; and of the Sonnes of NOAH, SHEM, HAM, and IAPHET, by whom the earth was repopled.

§. I.

Whether SHEM and HAM were elder than IAPHET.

These Sonnes of Noah, which was the eldest, there is a question made. Saint Augustine esteemed Shem for the eldest, Ham for the second, and Iaphet for the youngest: and herein the opinions of Writers are diuers. But this we finde euery where in the Scriptures, and especially in Moses, that there was neuer any respect giuen to the eldest in yeeres, but in vertue; as by the examples of Henoch, Abraham, Isaac, and Daniel, is made manifest. In a few wordes, this is the ground of the controuersie; The Latine translation, and so the Geneaua, hath conuerted this Scripture of Genesis the 10. v. 21. in these wordes: Vnto SHEM also the Father of all the Sonnes of HEBER, and elder brother of IAPHET, were children borne. But Iunius, agreeing with the Sepuagint, placeth the same wordes in this manner: To SHEM also the Father of all the sons of HEBER, and brother of IAPHET the eldest sonne, were children borne: So the transposition of the word (elder) made this difference. For if the word (elder) had followed after Iaphet, as it is in the vulgar translation placed before it, then had it bene as plaine for Iaphet, as it is by these translations for Shem. Now (the matter being otherwise indifferent) seeing Gods blessings are not tyed to first and last, in bloud, but to the eldest in pietie, yet the arguments are stronger for Iaphet than for Shem. And where the Scriptures are plainly vnderstood without any danger or inconuenience, it seemeth strange why any man of iudgement should make valuation of coniecturall arguments, or mens opinions. For it appeareth that Noah in the tise hundreth yeere of his life, begate the first of his three Sonnes, Shem, Ham, and Iaphet: and in the fixe hundreth yeere (to wit) the hundreth yeere following, came the generall floud; two yeeres after which Shem begate Arphaxad, which was in the yeere 602. of Noahs life, and in the yeere of Shems life one hundred: so as Shem was but 100. yeeres old, two yeeres after the floud: and Noah begat his first borne being 500. yeeres old; & therefore, were Shem the elder, he had then bene a hundred yeeres old at the floud, and in the fixe hundreth yeere of Noahs life, and not two yeeres after. Which seeing the Scriptures before remembred hath denied him, and that it is also written: Then Noah awoke from his wine, and knew what his younger sonne had done unto him (to wit) Ham; of necessitie the first place doth belong to Iaphet. This younger sonne, so conuerted by the vulgar and Geneua, lunium turnes it filius minimus; His youngest sonne; but S. Chrysostome takes it otherwise, and findes Cham to bee the middle or second brother, and Iaphet the youngest sonne of all: which Cham for his disobedience and the contempt of his Father (whose nakednesse he derided) was dis-inherited, & lost the preeminencie of his birth, as Ejan and Ruben did. Peterius conceiveth that Ham was called the younger in respect of Shem the eldest, but auoweth withall, that the Hebrew hath not that precise difference of younger and youngest, because it wanteth the comparatiue degree. It is true that Shem himselfe was alwaies named in the first place, yet whereas in the first Verse of the tenth Chapter of Genesis, Shem is accounted before Iaphet: in the second Verse Moses leaueth to begin with the issue by Shem, and reciteth the children of Iaphet first. So the first place was giuen to Shem for his election and benediction, and for this weightie respect, that the Hebrew Nation, Abraham, the Prophets, Dauid, and Christ our Saviour were descended of him. And therefore, whether we shall follow the Vulgar Pagninus, and the Geneua, who agree in this conuersion, Shem frater IAPHET maior; or with the Septuagint, Iunius, and Tremellius, Shem frater IAPHET maioris; or with Peterius, Shem frater IAPHET ille magnus; inferring that Shem was the great and famous brother of Iaphet, let the Reader iudge. But for ought that I haue seene to the contrary, it appeareth to me that Iaphet was the eldest. For where Peterius qualifieth the strength of the former Argument, That Shems age at the time of the floud did not agree with the elderhip (with a supposition that the Scriptures tooke no account of smaller numbers) I doe not finde in the Scriptures any such neglect at all: for it is written, that Shem was an hundred yeeres old, & begat Arphaxad two yeeres after the floud; and againe in the 12. Verse: So Shela liued after he begat Ebar, foure hundred and three yeeres, &c. so as the number of two yeeres, of three yeeres, of five yeeres, and afterward of two yeeres, were alwaies precisely accounted.

§. II.

Of diuers things that in all reason are to be presumed, touching the first planting of the world; as that all histories must yeelde Moses: that the world was not planted all at once, nor without great direction: and that knowne great Lords of the first ages were of the issue of HAM.

BUt lets go vnto the Worlds plantation after the floud, which being rightly vnderstood, we shall find that many Nations haue supposed or fained themselves those Ancestors and Fathers, which neuer saw or approached the bounds of their Countries, and of whom they are by no way or branch descended. For it is plaine in the Scriptures how the sonnes and issues of Noah were distributed, and what Regions were first planted by them, from whence by degrees the rest of the world was also peopled. And if any prophane Author may receive allowance herein, the same must bee with this caution, That they take their beginning where the Scriptures end. For so farre as the storie of Nations is therein handled, we must know, that both the truth and antiquitie of the bookes of God finde no companions equall, either in age or authoritie. All record, memorie, and testimonie of antiquitie whatsoeuer, which hath come to the knowledge of men, the same hath bene beeene borrowed thence, and therefore later than it, as all carefull obseruers of time haue noted: among which thus writeth Eusebius in the Proame of his Chronologie: Moses is found more ancient than all those whom the Grecians make most ancient, as HOMER, HESIOD, and the Traian warre; and farre before HERCVLES, MYSEVS, LYNVS, CHIRON, ORPHEVS, CASTOR, POLLVS, ASCVLAPIVS, BACCHVS, MERCVRIVS, and APOLLO, and the rest of the gods of the nations, their Ceremonies, or holy Rites, or Prophets: and before all the deeds of IVPITER, whom the Greekes haue placed in the top and highest Turret of their Diuinitie.

For of these three Iupiters remembred by Cicero, the ancientest was the sonne of Aether, whose three sonnes begotten on Proserpina, were borne at Athens, of which Cecrops was the first King: and in the end of Cecrops time did Moses bring the children of Israel out of Egypt: Eduxit MOSES populum Dei ex Egypto nouissimo tempore CECROPIS Atheniensis Regis; Moses brought the children of Israel out of Egypt, in the last dayes of Cecrops, King of the Athenians, saith S. Augustine: and yet was not Cecrops the Founder of the Citie it self, but Theseus long after him. But because the truth hereof is diuersly proued, and by many learned Authors, I will not cut a funder the purpose in hand, by alleaging many authorities in a needlesse question, but leaue it to the proper place.

The Sonnes of IAPHET were,

Gomer,	{ The Sonnes of GOMER were,	Akenaz,
Magog,		Riphat,
Madai,		Tagomah.
Javan,
Tubal,	{ The Sonnes of IAVAN were,	Elisba,
Mesbach,		Tarsis,
and		Kittim,
Tiras.		Dodanim.

First, we are to consider, that the world after the Floud not planted by imagination, neither had the children of Noah wings to flie from Shinaar, to the uttermost border of Europe, Africa and Asia in haste, but that these children were directed by a wise Father, who knew those parts of the world before the Floud, to which he disposed his children after it, and sent them not as Discouersers, or at all-adventure, but assigned & allotted to euery Sonne and their issues, their proper parts. And not to harken to fabulous Authors, who haue no other end than to flatter Princes (as Virgil did Augustus in the fiction of Aeneas) or else to glorifie their owne Nations; Let vs build herein vpon the Scriptures themselves, and after them vpon Reason and Nature. First therefore wee must call to minde and consider, what manner of face the earth euery where had in the 130. yeere after the great inundation, and by comparing those fruitfull Vallies, with our own barren and cold ground, informe our selues thereby, what wonderfull Desarts what impassable fastnesse of woods, reeds, byrars, and rotten grasse, what Lakes and standing Pooles, and what Marishes, Fens, and Bogs, all the face of the earth (excepting the Mountaines) was pestered withall. For if in this our Climate (where the dead and destroying Winter depresseth all vegetatiue and growing Nature, for one halfe of the yeere in effect; yet in twenty or thirty yeeres, these our grounds would not all ouergrow and be couered according to the nature thereof either with Woods, or with other offensiue Thickets and Bushments: much more did all sorts of Plants, Reedes, and Trees, prosper in the most fruitfull Vallies, and in the Climate of a long and warme Summer, and hauing withall the start of 130. yeeres, to raise themselves without controulment.

This being considered, it will appeare, that all these people which came into Shinaar, and ouer whom Nimrad either by order or strength tooke the Dominion, did after the confusion of Languages, and at such time as they grew to be a mighty People, disperse themselves into the Regions adioyning to the said Vallie of Shinaar, which contained the best part of Mesopotamia, Babylonia, and Chaldea; and from the borders thereof in time they were propagated: Some of them towards the South, others towards the West and North. And although there were allotted to Shem many Regions, both East and West from Shinaar, with the Dominion of Palestina, which the Canaanites first possesed; yet could he not enjoy the lot of his inheritance on the Iuddaie, but by time and degrees. For wee finde, that Abraham, the true successour of Shem, dwelt in Chaldea at Vr; and from thence (called by God) hee crested at Charran in Mesopotamia: from whence after the death of Thare hee traualled to Sichem in Palesina: and yet there had passed betwene Shem and Abraham (reckoning neither of themselves) seven Descents, before Abraham moued out of Chaldea; where, and in Babylonia, all those people by Nimrod commanded, inhabited for many yeeres, and whence Nimrod went out into Affrya, and founded Nineue. Indeede the great Masters of Nations (as farre as wee can know) were, in that Age of the Issues of Nam; the blessing of God giuen by Noah to Shem and Iaphet taking little effect, vntill diuers yeeres were consumed; and vntill the time arrived, which by the wisdom of God was appointed. For of Chus, Mizraim, and Canaan, came the People and Princes, which held the great Kingdome of Babylonia, Syria, and Egypt, for many Descents together.

§. III.

Of the Isles of the Gentiles in IAPHET'S portion: of BEROSVS his too speedie seating GOMER the sonne of IAPHET in Italie; and another of IAPHET'S sonnes TUBAL in Spaine: and of the Antiquitie of Longinque Navigation.

TO beginne therefore (where Mosis beginneth) with the sonnes of Iapheth, among whom the Isles of the Gentiles were diuided: which diuision, as well to Iapheth's sonnes as to the rest which came into Shinaar, was (if the diuision were made at Phaleg's birth) in the yeere of the World 1757. or 1758. and (by that account) in the yeeres after the Flood one hundred and one, of which question elsewhere.

The habitations proper to the sonnes of Iapheth were the Isles of the Gentiles, which include all Europe with all the Ilands adioyning, and compassing it about: Europe being also taken for an Iland, both in respect that the Sea Hellepont and Aegæum, Bosphorus and Euxinus cut it off from the great Continent of Asia, as also because Europe it selfe is (in effect) surrounded with water, sauing that it is fastned to Asia by the North, for it hath those Seas before named to the East, the Mediterran to the South and Southwest, the Ocean to the West, and British, Germane, and Baltick Sea, with that of Glaciale to the 30 North North-east, and North-west. Besides, it hath about it all the Cyclades or Isles lying betwene Greece and the lesser Asia, and the Isles of Rhodes, Cyprus, Crete, or Candia, Sicilia, Corfica, Sardinia, Malta, the Isles of Brittanie and Zealand, with their young ones adiacent.

This partition and portion of Iapheth, with the part which hee held in Asia, and the North, which was also very great, answereth to that blessing of God by Noah, Dilates Deus IAPHETH: Let God spread abroad (or increase the Posteritie of) IAPHETH, and let him dwell in the Tents of Shem. For though Iunius here vseth the word (alliciat) and not dilates: and the Genua persuaades; yet the Septuagint haue dilates or amplifices; and such was the blessing giuen to our Fathers, which God promised to Abraham and his Seede for euer. And the dwelling in the Tents or Tabernacles of Shem was a blessing by God to the Posteritie of Iapheth: noting not onely an enlargement of Territories, but that thereby they should bee made participant of Gods Church. But to come to Iapheth's sonnes, of whom Gomer is the eldest. This Gomer (if we may beleeue Berosus and Annius, whose authoritie the greatest number of all our late Writers haue followed) did in the tenth yeare of Nimrod's Reigne depart from Babylonia, and planted Italie: which also Funtius confirmeth in these words, Anno decimo NIMROD, &c. In the tenth yeere of NIMROD'S Reigne, GOMERVS GALLVS planted a Colonie in that Land afterward called Italie: and in the twelfth yeere of the same NIMROD'S Reigne TUBAL seated himselfe in Auluria in Spaine (now called Bislay) which was in the 140. and 50 in the 142. yeeres after the Flood, according to BEROSVS. But this opinion is very ridiculous. For before the confusion of Tongues the children of Noah did not separate themselves, at least so many of them as came with Nimrod into Shinaar. Let vs therefore consider with reason, what time the building such a Citie and Towre required, where there was no prepared matter, nor any readie meane to performe such a worke as Nimrod had erected (and as Funtius himselfe out of his Author Berosus witnesseth) ad altitudinem & magnitudinem montium; To the height and magnitude of the Mountaines. Sure that both this Citie and Towre was almost builded, the Scriptures witnesseth: But she

The Lord came downe to see the Citie and Towre, which the Sonnes of men builded. Let vs then but allot a time sufficient for the making of Bricke to such a Worke, of the greatest height (and therefore of circuit and foundation) answerable that euer was. For where the vniuersall Flood covered the highest Mountaines fiftene Cubits; Let vs build vs a Citie and a Towre (saith NIMROD) whose top may reach vnto the Heauen: meaning, that they would raise their Work about fiftene Cubits higher than the highest Mountaine, otherwise they could not assure themselves from the feare of a second inundation: a great part whereof was finished before it fell, and before they left the Worke. They also began this building vpon a ground, the most oppressed with waters of all the world: as by the great ruine which these waters, forcibly ouer-bearing and ouer-flowing, made in the time of the succeeding Emperours, is made manifest, approoued also by the Prophet Jeremie, speaking of Babylon in these words: Thou that dwellest vpon many waters. It cannot be doubted but that there needed a substantiall foundation, for so high a raised building on a marish ground: and to which, Glyca vpon Genesis giueth fortie yeeres. For it seemeth, that the Towre was neere finished when God ouerthrew it: it being afterward written, so the Lord scattered them from thence vpon all the Earth, and they left to build the Citie. Out of which place it may be gathered (because the Towre is not then named) that they very neere had performed the Work of their supposed defence, which was the Towre: and that afterward they went on with the Citie adioyning, wherein they inhabited. It is also to be noted, that till such time as this confusion seized them (whereupon the Towre was throwne downe) these Nations did not disperse themselves: for from thence the Lord scattered them vpon all the Earth, (that was) when they perceived not one anothers speech. Now to thinke that this Worke in the newness of the Word (wanting all instruments and materials) could be performed in ten yeeres; and that Tubal and Gomer in the same yeere could creepe through 3:00. miles of Desart, with Women, Children, and Cattell: let those light Beleeuers, that neither tyethemselues to the Scripture, nor to reason, approve it, for I doe not. And if the Arke of Noah was 100. yeeres in building, or but neere such a time, (and then) when the World had stood 1554. yeeres, it were more than foolishnesse and madnesse it selfe, to thinke that such a Worke as this could be performed in ten; when the World (from the Flood to the arrival at Babel, and beginning of this building there) had but 111. yeeres, and whereof they had spent some part in traualing from the East. Again, if all Asia set to their helping hands in the building of the Temple of Diana, and yet they consumed in that Work 400 yeeres (or be it but halfe that time) and in such an Age as when the World flourish'd in all sorts of Artificers, and with abundant plenty of materials & carriages: This Worke of the Tower of Babel could hardly (with all the former wants supposed) be erected in those few yeeres remembered. And for conclusion, let all men of iudgement weigh with themselves how impossible it was for a nation or Family of men, with their Wives, and Children, and Cattell, to trauaile 3000. miles through Woods, Bogs, and 40 Declines, without any Guide or Conductor; and we shall find it rather a Worke of 100. yeeres than of 100. dayes. For in the West Indies, of which the Spaniards haue the experience, in those places where they found neither Path nor Guide, they haue not entered the Country ten miles in ten yeeres. And if Nimrod's people spent many yeeres by the account before remembered in passing from the East India or the higher part thereof, which standeth in 115. Degrees of Longitude, vntill they came into Shinaar which lyeth in 79. Degrees (the distance betwene those places contayning 36. Degrees, which makes 7.0. Leagues, which is 2160. miles) & did all the way keep the Mountaines and hard ground; then the difference betwene Babylon and Bislay is much more: for the bodie of Bislay lyeth in ten Degrees, and Babylon or Shinaar, (as aforesaid) in 79. for the length of way from Shinaar to Auluria or Bislay is 69. Degrees, which make 1380. Leagues, or of miles 4140. And therefore if Nimrod took diuers yeeres to find Shinaar, which was but 2160. miles; or (supposing that the Arke rested in Armenia) little about 400. miles: there is no cause to the contrary, but to allow as many yeeres to Gomer & Tubal to trauaile 3000. miles, to Countries lesse known vnto them by far, than the Land of Shinaar was to Nimrod. For Paradise was knowne to Noah before the Flood: and so was the Region of Eden by Moses afterward remembered; but what hee vnderstood of most part of the World else it is unknowne. And therefore did Annius ill aduise himselfe to plant Gomer in Italie, and Tubal in Spaine in the tenth & twelfth of Nimrod's roads Reigne: Shall the Earth be brought forth in one day, or shall a Nation be borne at once? But it may be objected, That the Sonnes of Iaphet might come by Sea, and so save this great trouble through Defarts by Land. But we neuer reade of any Navigation in those dayes, nor long after. Surely he that knoweth what it is to imbarke so great a people as we may wittily suppose those Conductors carryed with them, will not easily beleue that there were any Vessels in those dayes to transport Armies, and (withall) their Cattel, by whose Milke they liued and fed their Children: For Milke and Fruit were the banqueting Dishes of our Fore-Fathers. And in the eldest times, euen the Kings and Fathers of Nations valued themselves by the Heardes and numbers of their Cattel: who had Flockes of Sheepe, and great Droues and Heardes of their own, and their own 10 Sheep-heardes and Heardsmen. Now if Tubal had past by Sea from any part of Palestina, Syria, or Cilicia, he might haue made good choice within the Streights, and not haue ouer gone Granado, Valentia, and other Prouinces in that Tract: past the Streights of Gibraltar, disdayned all Andalusia and Portugal, with all those goodly Ports and Countries; and haue fought out the yron, woody, and barren Countrey of the World (called Biscay) by a long and dangerous Navigation. But before the iourney of the Argonauta, there were scarce any Vessels that durst croffe the Seas in that part of the world: and yet that which Iafon had (if the Tale be true) was but a Galley, & a poore one (God knowes) and perchance such as they vse this day in Ireland: which although it carryed but foure and fittie Passengers, yet it was farre greater than any of the former times: 10

And for those Boates called longe naues or Gallies, Pliny saith that Agesilaus ascribeth the deuice to Paralus: and philostephanus to Iafon: Ctesius to Samyras, and Saphanau to Semiramis: Archimachus to Egeon: to which inuention the Erythrae are said to haue added 30 certaine numbers of Oares: and then Aminocles the Corinthian to haue increased them: the Carthaginiens afterwards to haue brought them to foure Banks: the Quinq. Remi first to haue bene vse by Nesichthon the Salaminian, with which Vessels in those parts of the World, the Romans serued themselves in the Punicke Warre. But these bee perhaps but the partialities of Writers, or their ignorance. For there are that as constantly cast the deuiling of these Gallies on Sesofirus, though Semiramis vsed them in the passage of her Armie ouer Indus in Abrabams time. So it is said, that Danaus was the first that brought a Ship into Greece: and yet the Samothracians challenge the inuention; and yet Tertulian, (on the contrarie) giues it to Minerva: others to Neptune; Thucydides to the Corinthians. And so ignorant were the people of those Ages, as the Egyptians vsed to 40 coast the Shores of the Red Sea vpon raffes, deuised by King Erythrus: and in the time of the Romans, the Brittains had a kind of Boat (with which they crost the Seas) made of sin ill twigs, and couered ouer with Leather: of which kind I haue scene at the Dingle in Ireland, and elsewhere. Naves excorior circumfusa in Oceano Britannico (saith) Textor: of which Lucan the Poet:

And although it cannot be denyed, when Noah by Gods inspiration was instructed in so many particulars concerning the Arke, that then many things concerning Navigation were first reuealed; yet it appeares that there was much difference between the Arke of Noah, and such Ships as were for any long Navigation. Yea, ancient Stories shew, that it was long after these times, ere any durst presume vpon any long Voyages to Sea, at least with multitudes of Women, and Children, and Cattel: as also common reason can tell vs, that euen now when this Art is come to her perfection, such Voyages are very troublefome and dangerous. So as it doth appeare, that there was not in that Age of Nimrod any Ship, or vse of Ships fit for any long Navigation. For if Gomer & Tubal 10 had passed themselves and their people by Sea; the exercise of Navigation would not haue bene dead for so many hundred yeares after. Leauing therefore the fabulous to their Fables, and all men else to their fancies, who haue cast Nations into Countries far off, I know not how, I will follow herein the Relation of Moses and the Prophets: to which Truth there is ioynd both Nature, Reason, Policie, and Necessitie: and to the rest, neither probabilitie, nor possibilitie.

§. IIII.

Of GOG and MAGOG, TVBAL, and MESSECH, seated first about Asia the lesse; out of EEZECHIEL, CAP. 38. 39.

Now although many Learned and Reuerend men haue formed (I know not whereby led) a Plantation of the World, which also hath been and is receiued; yet I hope I may be excused, if I differ altogether from them in many particulars. Certainly, that great Learned man of this latter Age, Arias Montanus was also in some things much mistaken: and for Iosephus, as hee hath many good things, and is a Guide to many errours withall, so was hee in this Plantation of the World very grosse and fabulous; whereby both Enchirius, Hieroglyphitanus, Epiphanius, and others, that haue taken his testimonies for currant, haue bene by him farre misse-led. But the better 30 to conceiue what Regions of the World Gomer the first sonne of Iaphet posselt, as also Tubal, it is needefull to begin with Magog: because the Scriptures take most knowledge of Gog and Magog: which two names haue troubled many Commentators, saith Math. Beroldus, who hath laboured herein with great diligence, and whom (of all that euer I read) I find most iudicious in the examination of this Plantation. Hee takes authoritie from the Prophet Ezechiel chiefly, who in the 38. and 39. Chapters directeth vs, what Nations the Gomerians, Tabalines, and Togermians were, together with the Magogians: of which Gog was Prince or Chiefe Conductor in their Attempts against Israel. For besides the portions of Europe, and the North-east parts of the greater Asia, which Iapheths Issues posselt, all Asia the lesse was peopled by them. And that those of the Issue 40 of Iapheth (whom Ezechiel speaks of) were seated hereabout, it may best appeare, if we consider the circumstances of the place, and the dependencie vpon the former Prophecie in the 37. Chapter. For in that 37. Chapter, Ezechiel prophesieth of the vning of the two Kingdomes of Israel and Iuda, after their deliuerie from captiuitie.

C. 37. v. 19.

By which Prophecie of Ezechiel, it appeareth, that God purposed to gather together his people, to giue life to dead bones, and to rule them by one Prince. For to that purpose it is written: And DAVID my Seruant shall bee King ouer them, and they shall haue one Shepheard, (that is) they shall be vnited as they were in Dauids time. Hereupon in the 38. Chapter Ezechiel prophesieth against those Nations, which should seek to impeach this Vnion, and disturbe the people of Israel, whom God purposed to receiue to grace; 50 and promised to restore. And so in the same Chapter are those Nations coupled together, which infested the Israelites after their returne, and sought to subiect them: all which were the Subiects or Allies of Gog, Prince of the Magogians, or Cassagians, next bordering Palestina, or the holy Land, followed also by the rest of the Nations of Asia, the lesse, which lay North from Iudaea. The words of Ezechiel are these: Sonne of man, I shew thee face against Gog, and against the Land of MAGOG, the chiefe Princes of MESECH 60 for Mosoch and TVBAL: and afterward, Behold, I come against the chiefe Prince of MESECH and TVBAL: and in the sixth verse; GOMER and all his bands, and the Prince of Togorma of the North quarters. Herein Ezechiel hauing first deliuered the

the purpose of his Prophecie, teacheth what Nations they were, that should in vanitie assayle Israel. He ioyneth them together vnder their Prince Gog, and sheweth that their habitations were on the North quarters of Iuda, and how seated and ioyned together. Gog signifieth in the Hebrew saith Saint Hierome telum or covering of a house: and Pintus vpon Ezech affirmeth that by Gog is meant Antichrist: for (saith hee) Antichristus est Diaboli regnum (in specie humana: That Antichrist shall be the covering of the Devill vnder humane forme. He addeth, that Mage is as much to say as Gog: the Letter (M being an Hebrew Preposition, and importeth as much as of or from: so hee taketh Mage for those people which follow Antichrist. So farre Pintus; at least in this assumption, that he expoundeth Mage, not for any one person, but for a Nation, with which agreeeth this oblation of Beroaldus. Mage (saith he) in Hebrew is written Ham-Mage, which sheweth Mage to be a Region or Nation: for the Letter (H) which is vsed but for an Emphasis (which the Hebrewes call Hetia edia) is neuer added to proper names of men, but often to place. So as Gog was Prince of that Nation (called either Mage, or according to others, the people of Gog) also Prince of Misib-ch, (or Mofech) and of Tubal: as by the first Verse of the 29. Chapter is made manifest: Behold I come against thee Gog the chiefe Prince of Meshech and Tybal. This must needs bee meant by the Successours of Selucus Nicator, who did not (as other conquering Nations) seeke to make the Tewes their Tributaries only, but endeuoured by all means, and by all kind of violence to extinguish the Religion it selfe (which the Hebrewes protest) and the acknowledging of one true God: and to force them to worship and serue the mortall and rotten gods of the Heathen; of which nothing remained but the very name, and dead Images. Saint Ambrose and Isidore take Gog for the Nation of the Goths: be like because they invaded Europe, and sacked Rome, and many other places and Cities thereabout. Hermolus Barbarus out of Pompey, Mela deriues the Turkes from the Scythians, esteemed Mazogians of Gog. Many take Gog for the proper name of a Man: others of a Region: others for a Nation inhabiting a Region, as Iunius, who sayes that Gog is the name of a Nation, nominated from him whom the Greekes Stories call Gyges: who in former time hauing slaine Candaules the Lydian, gaue his owne name to that Nation, thence after called Gygides: and thereof also the Gygen Lake; which Lake Sirabo also findeth in Lydia. (of which Gyges was King) fortie Furlongs from Sardis. Plinie calleth it Gygen lacum. Hierodotus and Nicander set it about the Riuer of Hyllus, and Alexander; but the difference is not great. Marius Niger maketh mention of this Gyges King of Lydia: who after hee had subdued the Countrey about the Riuer Rhodus which runneth into the Hellspont, called the Promontorie Trapesa after his owne name Gyges. These Opinions doe also seeme to strengthen that of Iunius. For Mage, saith hee, is that part of Asia the lesse, which Halyattes obtained, and after him his Sonne Crasus; who (as Iunius further notes) hauing mistred all those Regions as farre South as Libanus, in that Border built the Citie Gyza or Gogkai (which in the Syrian signifieth the Citie of Gog) seated in Calestria, whose people were the ancient Enemies of the Tewes.

Now that Mage is found in Calestria, Plinie affirmeth, saying; Calestria habet Bami-byren que alio nomine Hierapolis vocatur, Syris vero Mage Calestria habet in it Bambyce, which by another name is called Hierapolis, but of the Syrians Mage. Hee further telleth vs that the monstrous Idoll Ateractis, called by the Greekes Derecto, was here worshipped. Lactantius makes mention hereof, saying that the Citie had anciently another name, which yett hee expresseth not; forbearing perhaps the word Mage, as founding nothing elegantly in the Greeke. But if we may beleue Sirabo, then was Edessa in Mesopotamia the same Bambyce or Hierapolis, where the same Idoll was worshipped. Ortelius is doubtfull whether one of these Authors did not mistake the place of this Bambyce or Hierapolis. It may well enough bee that the same name and Religion was common to them both. Certaine it is, that both of them lay due North from Palestina, and were both subiect vnto the Kings of the Race of Selucus. Now I doe not condemne the Opinion of Hermolus Barbarus following Iosephus, but grant, that perhaps Mage might also bee the Father of the Scythians; notwithstanding that in this place, where Gog is made the Prince of Mage, the Nations of Calestria and the North parts adioyning bee meant by Mage: for by a latter Plantation from these parts they might bee propagated into Scythia. Yet it is not to be denyed, that the Scythians in old times coming out of the North-east waited the better part of Asia the lesse, and possessed Calestria, where they built both Scythopolis and Hierapolis, which the Syrians call Mage. And that to this Mage Ezechiel had reference, it is very plaine: for this Citie Hierapolis or Mage standeth due North from Iudea, according to the words of Ezechiel, that from the North quarters those Nations should come. For as the Kings of the South which infected the Israelites were the Pharacians, Kings of Egypt: so those of the North were the Kings of Asia and Syria, the Successours of Selucus, the Successour of Alexander Macedon. Gulielmus Tyrtius thinks that this Hierapolis is that Kages, mentioned in the storie of Tobias. Plinie takes it not onely to haue beene called Bambyce, mentioned in the storie of Tobias, but also Edessa: not that by Euphrates; but another of the same name; now the known name is Alleppe: for so Belonius expounds this Hierapolis, or Mage. This Citie had the Title of Sacred, as the Sacred Citie, (for so the word Hierapolis signifieth) yet was it a place of most detested Idolatry, and wherein was worshipped the Idoll of the Mermayde Ateractis, or Atergitis, according to Plinie, which the Greekes call Derecto.

If then we conferre the words of Ezechiel in the third verse of the thirtie eight Chapter, wherein he ioyneth together Gog Mesech, and Tubal: and withall remember that Hierapolis was the Citie of Mage, which also is seated directly North from Iudea: with whom also Ezechiel completh Gomer, and all his bands of the North quarters; wee may (as I conceiue) safely conclude, that these Followers and Vassals of Gog (which were the Northern Nations in respect of Iudea) were not the Gomerians of France, nor the Tubalines of Spain, but a people of the lesser Asia, and Calestria: and therefore that the opinions of Berosus, Iosephus, and whosoever else hath followed them therein are to be rectified. But if Iosephus referre himselfe to later times, and thinke that some Colonie of the Tubalines might from Iberia and Asia passe into Spain (to wit) from that piece of Land betwene Calceis (or Mengrelia) and Albania, (most part possessed by the Georgians) then is his iudgement of better allowance. For without any repugnance of opinions, it may be granted, that in proceesse of time these people might from their first habitation, passe into the Countries neere the Euxine Sea, and from thence in after-Ages into Spain.

Iosephus makes mention of the Iberi, saying, that they were anciently called Thobelos, as of Tubal; from whence (saith Iustine) they passed into Spain to search out the Mines of that Region: hauing belike vnderstood that it was a Southerly Countrey and Mountainous. For it seemeth that the Tubalines called Chalybes liued altogether by the exchange of Iron, and other Metals, as Apollonius witnesseth in these following Verses, telling how the Argonautes did visit them;

*Hæc gens tellurem rigido non vertit aratro,
Sed ferri venas scindit sub montibus altis:
Mæribus hæc mutat, quæ vitæ alimenta ministrant:*

The Chalybes plough not their barren Soyle
But vndermine high Hills for Iron Veines:
Changing the purchase of their endlesse toyle
For Marchandize, which their poore liues sustaines.

But it is more probable, that Spain was first peopled by the Africans, who had euer since an affection to returne thither, & to repeople it anew. This appeared by the Carthaginians of old, who were easily drawne to passe ouer the Streights into that Countrey; and after by the *Moor*s who held Granada, and the South parts eight hundred yeeres, till the time of Ferdinand and Isabel. And either of these opinions are more probable, than that in the twelfth yeere of *Nimrod*s Reigne, Tubal past into Spain, and therein built Saint Fual: a poore Towne, and a poore deuice, God knowes. Certaine it is that we must finde Mosoch or Mesech, and Tubal Neighbours, and Gomer and Togarma not farre off, or else we shall wrong Ezechiel: for he called Gog the Leader or Prince of Mesech and Tubal, and maketh Gomer and Togarma their Assitants. And that Mesech inhabited Asia, Frontinus (though he followed Berosus) confesseth, for these bee his words: MESACVS, qui à MOSE MESECH, prius ab Adula monte vsq; ad Ponticam regionem posuit: hæc regio postea Cappadocia dicta est, in qua vrbs Mæzica, &c. hæc est terra MAGOG principalis; MESACVS, whom MOSES calleth MESECH, placed the ancient

Arrians from the Mount Adulus, unto the Coast of Pontus. This Region was afterward called Cappadocia, in which is the Towne Maxica, &c. this is the principall Country of MAGOG. And this doth Annius also auow, and yet forgets that Gog was Prince both of Mefech and Tubal: and therefore, that the one was a Nation of Spaniards, the other of Cappadocians, is very ridiculous; Spain lying directly West, and not North from Indea. Also Ezechiel in the 27. Chapter, where he prophesieth of the destruction of Tyre, nameth Mefech and Tubal ioynly. And for a finall prooffe, that these Nations were of a Northern Neighbour Land (how farre fouer stretched) Ezechiel in the 38. Chapter makes them all Horsemen. Then, and much people with thee, all shall ride upon Horses, even a great multitude and a mighty. Then if any man belecue that these troupes came out of Spain, over the Pyrenes, and first passed over a part of France, Italie, Hungarie, and Sarmatia, and imbarqued againe about the Hellspont, or else compassed all Pontus, and Euxinum, to come into the lesser Asia, which is like the length or compasse of the then knowne World; he may be called a strong beleueer, but he shall neuer be iustified thereby. But on the contrarie it is knowne, that Seleucus, as a Prouince neighbouring Palestina or Iudaea, and that Hierapolis (or Magog) ioyned vnto it: whose Princes commanded all Syria, and Asia the lesse, (namely the Selenicida) and held it, till Scipio, Asiaticus ouerthrew Antiochus the Great: after which they yet possesse Syria till the time of Tigranes: and whether Mefech be in Cappadocia, or vnder Iberia, yet is it of the Tabalines, and one and the same Dominion.

Of Gomer the like may be said. First, he seated himselfe with Togorma, not farre from Magog and Tubal, in the borders of Syria and Cilicia. Afterward hee proceeded further into Asia the lesse; and in long tract of time his valiant Issue filled all Germanie, rested long in France and Brittanie, and possessed the vtmost borders of the earth, accomplishing (as Melancthon well notes) the signification of their parents name, which is Vtmost bordering. But when these borderers wanted further place, wherein they might exonerate their swelling multitudes that were bounded in by the great Ocean, then did they returne vpon the Nations occupying the Countries, through which they had formerly passed, oppressing first their Neighbours, afterwards the people more remote. Hereupon it was (as the worthy restorer of our Antiquities, M. William Camden hath noted) that they were called Cimbri, which in their old Language doth signifie Robbers; necessitie forcing them to spoyle their Neighbours, to whom in their originall they were as neere ioyned, as afterwards in the feates which they possessed. For that the Warlike nations of Germany were in elder Ages accustomed to be beaten by the Gauls, the authoritie of Cesar affirming it is prooffe sufficient. But in times following they pursued richer Conquests, and more easie though further distant, by which (to omit their other enterprizes not here to be spoken of) they were drawne at length into Asia the lesse, and occupied those parts, which had formerly bene held by their Progenitours. I say not that they claymed those Lands as theirs by Descent; for likely it is, that they knew little of their owne Pedigree. Neyther can any man therefore deny, that they were of olde seated in Asia, because in late Ages they returned thither; vnlesse hee will thinke, that all those Nations which from farre parts haue invaded and conquered the Land of Shinaar, may by that Argument bee proued not to haue issued from thence at the first.

Now concerning Samothres, for his excellent wisedome surnamed Dia, whom Annius makes the Brother of Gomer and Tubal, (which Brother Moses neuer heard of, who spake his knowledge of Taphets sonnes they must find him in some olde Poet: for Euclides, a great Berosian, confesseth: Quis hic SAMOTHES fuerit incertum est; quod hic SAMOTHES sit, ut incertum est; neither is there any prooffe that he was that same Dia, whom Cesar saith the Gauls suppose to bee their Ancestor; yea, and Vignier confesseth with FVNCTIVS: Mais on ne sçait qu'il estoit; No man knows who he was.

§. V.

Against the fabulous BEROSVS his fiction, That the Italian IANVS was NOAH.

BVt before I goe on with Noah his Sonnes, I thinke it necessarie to disproue the fiction which Annius hath of Noah himselfe: an inuention (indeed) very ridiculous, though warranted (as hee hath wrested) by those Authours of whom him-himselfe hath Commented: as the Fragment of Berosus, Fabius, Pictor, Cato, Laetinius, and others. For Annius seeks to perfwade vs, that Noah (surnamed Ianus) was the same which founded Genoa, with other Cities in Italie, wherein he liued 92. yeeres. This to disproue, by Moses silence, is a sufficient argument to mee, if there were nothing else to disproue it. For if he vouchsafed to remember the building of Babel, Erec, Abel, Chalme and Nineue by Nimrod, Noah was a man of too great marke to be forgotten, with all the acts he did in 92. yeeres. But it were a needlesse labour for me to disproue the authoritie of that Berosus, on whom Annius groundeth, seeing so many learned men haue so demonstratiuely proued that Fragment to be counterfeit. Besides that, Tatianus the Assyrian in his Oration against the Greekes, auoweth, that the ancient and true Berosus wrote onely three Bookes, dedicated to Antiochus the successor of Seleucus Nicator: but Annius hath deuised fine Bookes, wherewith he honoureth Berosus. And whereas Berosus handled onely the estate of the Chaldeans and Assyrians, Annius hath filled this Fragment with the businesse of all the World. And if wee may beleuee Eufebius better than Annius, then all the Kings of the Latines (before Æneas) consumed but 150. yeeres: whereas no man hath doubted, but that from Noah to Æneas arrival into Italy there past 1126. (after the least rate of the Hebrew account) and (after Codoman) 1291. For Ianus (who was the first of their Kings) liued at once with Ruth, who married Booz, in the Worlds yeere (as some reckon) 2717. after the Flood 1064. and Noah dyed 350. yeeres after the Flood: and so there past betwene Ianus of Italie and Noah surnamed Ianus 704. yeeres. For Saturnus succeeded Ianus, Picus after Saturnus, Fannus after Picus, and Latinus followed Fannus: which Latinus liued at once with Tutanes the 27. King of Assyria; with Pelasgus of Peloponnesus; with Demophoon of Athens; and Sampson Iudge of Israel. Now all these fine Kings of the Latines hauing consumed but one hundred and fiftie yeeres; and the last of them in the time of Sampson: then reckoning vpwards for one hundred and fiftie yeeres, and it reacheth Ruth, with whom Ianus liued.

True it is, that the Greekes had their Ianus; but this was not Noah: so had they Iou the sonne of Xuthus, the sonne of Deucalion, from whom they draw the Iones, who were indeed the children of Iauan, the fourth sonne of Tapheth. For the vulgar Translation (where the Hebrew word is Iauan) writes Greece, and the Septuagint, itellus; which is the same. So had they Medus the son of Maeda, whom they make the Parent of the Modes, though they were descended of a far more ancient Father (to wit) Madai the third sonne of Tapheth.

Lastly, we see by a true experience, that the Brittish Language hath remayned among vs about 2000. yeeres, and the English speech euer since the inuasion of the Angles, and the same continuance haue all Nations obserued among themselves, though with some corruption and alteration. Therefore, it is strange if either Noah (by them called Ianus) had left in Italie his grand-child Gomer after him, or Tubal in Spain, that no plaine resemblance of the Hebrew, Syrian, or Seythian (which no time could haue quite extinguished) should haue bene found in the Languages of those Countries. For which reasons we doubt not but these personall Plantations of Ianus, Gomer, Tubal, &c. in Italie, Spain, or France, are merely fabulous. Let the Italians therefore content themselves with the Gracian Ianus, which commanded them and planted them, and who preceded the fall of Troy but 150. yeeres (saith Eusebius) which was in the time of Latinus, the fift King: which also Saint Augustine and Iustine confirme: and this agreeth with reason, time, and possibilitie. And if this be not sufficient to disproue this vanitie, I may out of themselves adde thus much: That whereas some of them make Vesla (others Camafena) the wife of this Ianus, who instituted the holy Fire of the Vesal Virgins in Rome (the Latines and Romans taking from Ianus all their Idolatrous and Heathenish Ceremonies) there is no man so impious, as to beleuee that Noah himselfe (who is said by Moses to haue walked with God, to be a iust man, and whom God of all Mankind made choice of) could be either ignorant of the true and only God, or so wicked and vngratefully, to set vp or deuise any Heathen, Saluage, or Idolatrous adoration, or haue instituted any Ceremony, contrarieto that which he knew best pleasing to God himselfe.

§. VI.

That GOMER also and his sonne TOGORMA of the Posteritie of IAPHETH, were first seated about Asia the lesse: and that from thence they spread westward into Europe, and Northward into Sarmatia.

TO turne now to the sons of Noah, and the Worlds Plantation after the Flood: therein I obserue, that as both reason and necessitie taught them; so, when they multiplied in great numbers, and dispersed themselves into the next Countries bordering to their first habitations, and from thence sent forth Colonies elsewhere; it was in such a manner as that they might repayre to each other, and keepe intelligence by Riuer: because the Land was yet Defart, and ouer-prest with Woods, Reeds, Bogs, & rotten Marishes. As when Nimrod seated in Babylonia, Chus took the South part of Chaldea, down the Riuer of Gehon, by which he might passe to & fro from Babylon to his own Plantation: those also, which were of the Race of Shem, inhabiting at Vr or Orchoe neere the Lakes of Chaldea, might by the same Riuer get vp to Babylon, and receiue succour from thence. All which Tract of Land vpon Gehon Southward, Moses in the description of Paradise calleth the Land of Chus: because the Dominion and Empire was then in the hands of Nimrod a Chusite, by whom the children of Shem (which came into that Valley and stayed not in the East) were for a while oppressed, till God afterward by the seed of Abraham made them his owne Nation and victorious. Hamilah, the brother of Nimrod, and sonne of Chus, tooke both bankes of Tygris, especially on the East side of the Riuer: by which Riuer his people might also passe to and fro to Babel.

The Imperiall seat of which Region of Hamilah or Sufian, was anciently called Chusan or Chusan, after ward Sufa. Chus himself tooke the Bankes of Gehon, and planted those Countries Westward, and South-west ward towards Arabia the Stony, and the Defart, where Ptolomie placeth the Citie of Chusida, first Chusia.

Seba, and Sheba, with the rest that planted Arabia felix, had Tygru to conuey them into the Persian gulfe, which washeth the bankes of Arabia felix on the East side: so as those sons of Chus might take Land downe the Riuer as they pleased. Also the Citie of Nineue was by Nimrod founded on the said Riuer of Tygris; and from thence a Colony past to Charran, standing also vpon a nauigable branch of Euphrates. In like manner did Iapheths sonnes settle themselves together, and tooke their seates in Asia the lesse: from whence they might indifferently stretch themselves Northward, and Westward, into the next parts of Europe, called the Isles of the Gentiles. And it seemeth very agreeable to reason, that both Gomer, Magog, and Tubal, late downe first of all in that part of Syria, to the North of Palestina and Phœnicia: and from thence Gomer or his children past on into Asia the lesse, as those of Magog and Tubal did; from whence the Tubalines spread themselves into Iberia: and the Magogians more Northerly into Sarmatian. The first Gomerians, and first Planters in Asia the lesse, held the Country of the Cimmerians (witnesseth Herodotus) the same Region which was afterward by the Gallo-Greeks called Galatia, to whom Saint Paul wrote his Epistle fo intituled. This Nation of the Cimmerians (whom the inuincible Scythians afterwards dispersed, and forced from their first Plantations) gaue names to diuers places, as to the Mountaines about Albania (called Cimmerium) and to the Citie of Cimmeris in Phrygia: also Paphlagonia Cimmerius tooke appellation from this Nation, in the out-let whereof was also a Citie of that name, called Cimmerium: which Plinie saith (mistaking the place) had sometime the name of Cerberus; but Cerberus was a Towne in Campania, so called of the vnhealthfull waters, fauouring of Brimstone, which Augustus caused to be cleansed by letting in the water of the Lake Lucrinus.

The children of Tubal ranged as farre as Iberia, to whom the Moschici were Neighbours, which others write Meshech. The Prophet Ezechiel (coupling them together) calleth Gog the Prince of Meshech and Tubal. For these Meschi (which Ptolomie calleth Moschi) inhabit Syracena a Province of Armenia, directly South from the Mountaines Moschici, in the Valley betwene the Mountaines Moschici, and the Mountaines Paryarac: out of whose North part springeth the Riuer Phasis; from the East part Araxii; and from the West Euphrates: and of this Meshech are descended also the Mosconians (saith Melanchton) and it may bee, that in proceffe of time some of them inhabited those Regions also: For Meshech (saith Melanchton) signifieth extendens, enlarging or stretching forth.

forth. Togorma also at first did inhabit amongst his parents and kinned. The Togormians were also called Giblei, a people neighbouring the Sydonians in Gabala, a Tetrarchie of Phœnicia, the same which Plinie calleth Gaben: from whence Salomon had his most excellent Masons, which hewed stones for the Temple of Hierusalem. Thence the Togormians stretched into the lesse Armenia, whose Kings were hence called Tigranes, and their Cities Tigranokarte: of which Cities Tigranes, subdued by Lucullus the Roman, built one. Hierosolymitanus hath planted the Togormians in Barbary, forgetting the prophesie of Ezekiel against the Tyrians. They of the house of Togorma, brought to thy Faures horses, and horse-men, and mules; which could not well bee driuen ouer the whole length of the Mediterranean Sea, but from the neighbour Countries by land. But Iosephus takes them for the parents of the Phrygians; which I doe not deny, but they might be in the ensuing ages: and so might the Tubalines be of the Spaniards; but it was from Iberia, and many hundred years after the twelfth of Nimrods reigne. The Iewes conceiue that the Turkes came of those Togormians, because their Emperor is called Tigor. The Chaldeans make them the Fathers of the Germanes. But Laonicus affirmes, that the Turkes descended of the Crim Tartar, which borders Muscacia. But for these subderiuations it were infinit to examine them. Only of the first and second plantation, and of the first Nations after the flood, is the matter which I labour to discouer; and therein to open the ignorance of some, and the corruption of other fabulous Writers. And this we must Note, that those grand-children of Noah which were of a more quiet, or (perchance) of lesse vnderstanding, & had not therefore the leading of Colonies sent out, their proper habitations could bee hardly knowne: onely reason hath taught vs, that they dwelt among the rest, and were couered with the fame of others, who tooke on them the Conduction and Dominion ouer the rest.

From Madai the third sonne of Iapheth, were the Medes. The Grecians bring them (as before) from Medus the sonne of Medea.

§. VII.

Of Iauan the fourth son of Iapheth: and of Mesch, of Aram, and Meshech of Iapheth.

OF Iauan the fourth sonne of Iapheth came the Iones, which were afterwards called the Greekes: and so the Latine and Greek Interpreters for Iauan write Greece, as in Esay: Et mittam ex his qui saluati fuerint ad gentes, in mare, in Italian, & Graeciam: And I will send those that escape of them to Nations in the Sea, in Italy and in Greece. The Geneus here vseth the word (Tarsibib) for Tarsus, a City in Cilicia, though Tarsis in many places be taken for the Sea. The Tigurine and the Geneus vse the names Tubal and Iauan, and not Italy and Greece: keeping the same Hebrew words. Of the Iones were the Athenians, though themselves dreame that they were Aborigines, or men without Ancesters, and growing (as it were) out of the soile it selfe: who abounding in people, sent Colonies into Asia the lesse, of whom came the Iones of those parts. Others deriue the Athenians from Ion the sonne of Xuthus, the son of Deucalion; but the antiquity of Iauan marres the fashon of that supposition, who so many years preceded Xuthus, Ion, or Deucalion. Pausanias tels vs that Xuthus stole out of Theffaly with all his Fathers treasure, and his Brothers portions, and arriuing at Athens, hee was graciously receiued by Erichon, who gaue him his Daughter in marriage; of whom hee receiued two sonnes, Ion and Achæus, the supposed Ancesters of the Athenians: (For Attica was called Ionia, saith Plutarch in the life of Theseus) who, when hee had ioined Megara to Attica, erected a pillar in that Isthmos or Strait, which fastneth Peloponnesus to the other part of Greece: writing on that part which looketh towards the East, these words: Hac non sunt Peloponnesus, qd 30 Ionia; These Countries are not of Peloponnesus, but of Ionia: and on the other side which looked towards the South, and into Peloponnesus, this: These parts are Peloponnesus, and not Ionia.

Strabo out of Hecataus affirmeth, that the Iones came out of Asia into Greece; which is contrary to the former opinion: That the Iones of Greece transporting certain companies into Asia the lesse, the name of Iones was thereby therein retained. And though Strabo knew no more thereof than hee learned of the Greeks themselves, yet I finde this coniecture of Hecataus reasonable enough. For though it were to him vnknowne, yet sure I am that Asia the lesse had people before Greece had any: and that Iauan did not flie from Babylonia into Greece, but tooke Asia the lesse in his passage; and from thence past over the nearest way, leaving his owne name to some maritime Province on that side, as hee did to that part of Greece so called. But yet Strabo himselfe beleueed, that Ionia took the name from Iou the son of Xanthus: for so much he had learned from themselves, which was also the opinion of Pausanias. True it is, that the Greekes in after-times cast themselves into that part of Asia the lesse, opposite vnto them, which they held for diuers years. And howsoever the Greekes vaunt themselves to be Fathers of Nations, & the most ancient; yet all approved Historians (not their owne) deride and disproue their pride, and vanity therein. For this dispute of Antiquity (among prophane Writers) rested betwene the Scythians and the Egyptians, as Inslime out of Troguus, in the warre betwene Vexors of Egypt, and Tanaus of Scythia, witnesseth: which preceded farre the reigne of Nimrod, and was long before the name of Greece was euer heard of. And it is also manifest, that in Cecrops time the Greekes were all saluages, without law or religion, living like brute beasts in all respects; and Cecrops (saith Saint Augustine) liued together with Moses.

Lib. 18. de Civ.
Dei. c. 10.

The sixth sonne of Iapheth was Meshech, whom the Septuagint call Mosech: (a part of those Nations commanded by Gog the chiefe Prince of Meshech and Tubal.) But this we must remember, that betwene Mesech the sonne of Aram, and Meshech (or Mosech), the sonne of Iapheth, there is little difference in name, and both by diuers Interpreters diuersly written. Montanus with the Vulgar writeth Mesech, the sonne of Aram, Mes; the Genea, Masb, Iunius, Meshech. But it may be gathered out of the 120. Psalm, that eyther Meshech the sonne of Iapheth, was the parent of those people, or gaue name to that Province wherein David hid himselfe: or else (vvhich may rather seeme) that it tooke name from Mesech the sonne of Aram. For David bewailing his exile (while he liued among a barbarous and irreligious People) yseth these words: Vocis mei sicut I remaine in Meshech, and dwell in the Tentis of Kedar: vvich Iunius conuerteth thus: Hei mihi quia peregrinor tam diu: habitum anquam Scenite Kedareni. The Septuagint giues it this sense: Vocis mei because my habitation (or abode) is prolonged, who dwell with the Inhabitants of Kedar: vvich vvith this of the Latine agreeth: Hei mihi, quia inculatus meus prolongatus est, habitum cum habitantibus Kedar: The Chaldean otherwise, and in these vvords: O me miserum, quia peregrinatus sum Asiam, habitum cum tabernaculis Arabum; O wretch, that I am, for I haue trauailed among those of Asia: I haue dwelt in the Tabernacles of the Arabians. But howsoever or which soeuer conseruacion be taken for the best, yet all make mention of Kedar: which is a Province of Arabia Petraea; and the Chaldean putteth Asia in stead of Mesech, but the Hebrew it self hath Mesech. And if it be to be taken for a Nation, (as it is most likely, because it answers to Kedar, the name of a Nation) seeing Mesech the sonne of Aram, 1. Chron. 17. is called Mesech, it is indifferent whether this Nation tooke name from Mesech or Meshech, both bordering Iudea, and like enough to be commanded by one Prince; for so Ezechiel makes Mesech and Tubal. But as for those that take Mesech out of the word Mosech (giuen by the Septuagint) to be the Musconian: sure they presume much vpon the affinity of names, as aforesaid. And sure I am that David neuer trauelled so farre North; (for to him Musconia was vtterly vnkown) but about the border of Kedar (it may be) he was often in all the time of his persecution: the same being a City on the Mountains of Samir or Galaad. And yet Arias Montanus makes Mosech the Father of the Musconians: and herein also Melanchton runnes with the tide of common opinion, and sets Mesech in Musconia, though with some better aduice of iudgement; as, first scard in Cappadocia, and from thence travelling Northward: expounding the places of the 120. Psalm, (Hei mihi quod exulo in Meshech) to signifie, Gentis eius feritatem insignem esse; That the ferity of that Nation exceeded: which fiercenesse or brutality of the Musconians, David neuer produced, (or perchance) neuer heard of. But the same ferity or cruelty which those Northern Musconians had, may as well be ascribed to the Arabians and Kedarens. For this Country tooke name of Kedar the second sonne of Ismael, of whom a people of equall fiercenesse to any of the world were begotten, both in those times and long after, euen to this day (if the Arabians, Ismaelites, and Saracens, may be accounted one people): the same being forthewed by the speech of the Angell to Hagar, Gen. 16. v. 12. And he shall be a wilde man: his hand shall be against every man, and every mans hand against him. Now Arabia the Desart (saith Pliny) confronteth the Arabians Cochlei on the East, and the Cedrei Southward, both which ioine together vpon the Nabathai. So it appeareth (as before before) that Mesech, Tubal, Gomer, Togorma, and Mazog, neighboured Canaan and Israel, and that Kedar also did ioine to Mesech: all which vvere Regions of Syria, or of Asia the lesse, commanded by the Successors of Selencus, enemies of the re-establisment of Israel and Iuda. But (as I haue already said) it might well bee, that long after the first plantation the issue of Mesech (or Mosech) might passe into Cappadocia, and thence into Hyrcania, and giue names, both to Mazga in the one, and to the Mountaines Moschici in the other, and from thence might send people more Northerly into Musconia, & so all opinions fauld. But all salvage Nations ouer-grown and vncultivated, doe (for the most part) shew a late plantation, euen as Ciuitie, Letters, and magnificent Building, witnesseth antiquity.

2. Lib. 110. v. 5.

Gen. 15. 13.

10 Tiras, the seventh sonne of Iapheth, vvich Montanus reckons among the sonnes of Gomer, was the Father of the Thracians, as all Authors (worthy the examination) affirme. Iosephus vv as the first that determined hereof; and because the Scriptures are altogether silent, what part of the world Tiras peopled, the coniectures are indifferent, and giue no ground at all of dispute. It followeth now to speake of the sonnes of Gomer, vvich vv ere three, Ascanes, Riphath, and Togorma.

§. VIII.

Of Ascanes and Riphath, the two elder sonnes of Gomer.

20 Ascanes vv as the Father of those which the Greekes call Regini, (saith Iosephus) but he giues no reason vvhy.

Eufebius makes Ascanes the Father of the Goths. The Iewes in their Thargum make him the roote of the Germane Nation, but their exposition is commonly very idle. Pliny findeth Ascania in Phrygia, neere the Riuer of Hilis and Cis: Melanchton being of the same opinion, that the Tuiscanes vv ere descended of the Ascanes: (for Tuiscanes, saith he, is as much to say, as of the Ascanes, proposito articulo die Ascanes) and that the word signifieth a Religious Keeper of fire: it being an ancient superstition to pray at the fire of Sacrifices, as afterwards at the Tombes of Martyrs. Not faue from Phrygia the lake Ascania, knowne by that name in the Romanes time. And among the Kings which came to the succour of Troy, was Ascanius (Deo simili, saith Homer) like vnto God: because he was beautifull and strong: for in the same manner doth Virgil grace Aeneas, Os humerosq; Deo simili in face and body like one of the Gods: Virgil also remembereth such a Riuer, together with the Hils Gargara: as, Illes ducit amor trans Gargara, transq; sonantem Ascanium; Appetite leads them both ouer the Mountaine Gargara, and the roaring Ascanium. But this Pliny maketh more plaine in the description of Phrygia. For he placeth the City of Brillion vpon the Riuer Ascanius, which is adioyning to Mysia, and is neere the border of the Troian Empire: and the Lake Ascanes he directes vs to finde by the description 40 of Prusia, founded by Hannibal at the foot of Olympus, which lieth far within the Countries of Bithynia: and then from Prusia to Nicea are accounted 25. miles, in which vvay this Lake lyeth, euen betwene Prusia and Nicea. And so Iunius (as I conceiue him) takes them of Ascanes, to be the Inhabitants of Pontus, and Bithynia, and those North parts of Asia. Stephanus de Urbibus makes it a City of Troas, built by Ascanius the son of Eneus: saying, that there vv as another of that name in Mysia. Of Ascania a Lake of Bithynia, Ptolomy witnesseth: and Strabo giueth Ascania both a Lake, a Riuer, and a Towne in Mysia, neere vnto Cis; which also agreeth vvith Pliny. For Pliny findeth Prusia (before spoken of) neere Cis, and calleth the Islands before Troy Ascanes.

Now, vv whether these places tooke name of Ascanes the son of Gomer, or of Ascanius the sonne of Eneus, it might be questioned: sure it is, that Ascanius which brought succour to the Troians, could not take his name from Eneus son, who vv as then either exceeding young, or rather vnborne: and it seemeth that the Countries vvhen those succours came, vv ere not out of any part of Phrygia or Mysia, but farther off, and from the North parts of all Asia the lesse, vvich by Hieremy is called Ascanes, by the figure Synecdoche, as Iunius thinketh. Out of those testimonies therefore vvich decciue not, we may confidently determine. For of the Prophet Hieremy vv ee shall learne of vvhat Nation the Ascanes vv ere, vv hose vvords are these: Set up a Standard in the Land, blow the Trumpet among the Nations against her, call up the Kings of Ararat, Minni, and Ascanes. c. 21. v. 27.

against her, &c. meaning against the Babylonians. Ararat was Armenia the greater, as most Interpreters consent, fo called of the Mountaines of Ararat vvhich runne through it: Minni the lesser Armenia: Armenia being compounded of Aram and Minni. For Minni was the ancient name: (saith Iunius and others before him, and Aram anciently taken for Syria, vvhich contained all that Tract from Euphrates to the Sea-coasts of Phenicia, and Palestina; and therefore Mesopotamia being in elder times but a Prouince of Syria, the Scriptures difference it in the story of Iacob and Esau, and call it Aram-padan. Then if these two Nations were of the Armenians and Afcanes joined with them (who altogether vnto Cyrus and Darius, came to the spoyle of the Babylonian Empire) we shall erre much to call Afkenaz Germany or Almaine: for we heare of no swart Rutters at that siege. But the Afkenaz were of those Nations which were either subiect or allied to the Medes: of which if any of them came afterward into Phrygia, I know not: for the dispersion of Nations was in aftertimes without account. But for the opinion of Ensebius, who makes them to be Goths; or that of Iosephus, who calls them Rheginior or of the Iewes, who will haue them to be Almaines, when they confirme it either by Scriptures or Reason, I will thinke as they doe.

Of Riphat the second sonne of Gomer there is mention in the first of Chronicles. Berosus and Pererius thinke that he wandered farre off from the rest of his Brothers, and therefore no memory of his plantation. But I see nothing to the contrary, but that hee might seate himselfe with the rest of his Family: for there wanted no roome or soyle in those dayes for all the sonnes and Grand-children of Noah. Therefore I take it to be well understood, that the Riphei were of Riphat, vvhich the Greeks afterwards (according to Iosephus) called the Paphlagonians: and Riphei (saith Melanchton) signifieth Gyants. These people were very famous in the North parts, and in Sarmatia: the most of number and power among them, Sarmatarum gens maxima Heneti, The greatest number of the Sarmatians were the Heneti; who spake the ancient Polac: which being first called Riphei (for the loue of some of their Leaders or Kings) changed their names and became Heneti, (a custome exceeding common in those times) and dwelt first in Paphlagonia, as Homer witnesseth, and so doth Apollonius in his Argonauticks: Now, when these Riphei (afterward Heneti) sought new Regions, they came along the shores of Euxinus, and filled the North-part of Europe, containing Russia, Lithuania, and Polonia. From thence they croft thwart the Land, and peopled Ilyria, desirous (saith Melanchton) of a warmer soile of Fruit and Wine. These Heneti or Veneti, whom Melanchton taketh to be one people, filled all that Land betweene the Baltick and Adriaticke Seas; and to this day the name of the Gulfe Penninus is found in Russia. This Nation, after they were possesse of Lithuania and Polonia, distubed the plantation of the Boij and Hermundurij. Therefore, it seemeth to me, that of Riphat, came the Riphei afterward Heneti, and so thinketh Arius Montanus first seated in Paphlagonia, but in course of time Lords of Sarmatia; and those other parts before remembered, chiefly betweene the Rivers of Vistula and Albu. The name (saith Melanchton) signifieth Wandering or Wanderers, or Nomades: a people which liued by Whitemeat and fruits, as (indeed) all Nations did in the first Ages.

Of the third sonne of Gomer, Targoma, I haue spoken already; now therefore of Iauan children, vvhich were foure:

Elisa, Tharsis, Cethim, Dodanim.

Of some sonnes of Iauan: and of the double signification of Tharsis, either for a proper name, or for the Sea.

Of Elisa or Elphaz, came the Aeoles: and of this Elisa, all the Greekes were called Heliones, saith Montanus. Melanchton makes Elisa the Father of the Aeoles in Argolis side: others of Elis in Peloponnus; or of both. And seeing the Greekes were defended in generall of Iauan, it is probable that the Aeoles & the Elis, tooke name of Elisa, his eldest Sonne. Ezechiel in the 27. speaking of Tyre, nameth the Isles of Elisa. Pliny vvhich & parvula de insulis Elisa facta sunt overimuntum: Blue silke and Purple, brown, &c. from the Isles of Elisa, was it thence coming: The Chaldeans for Elisa write Italia: but the Pulgar, the Tigurine, the Genewa, and Iunius, keep the vvorde Elisa: and so I thinke they might doe vvvith reason. For there was not found any such Purple Dye in Italia in those dayes, nor since, that I can read of: but those Isles of Elisa, were by a better conjecture the Isles of Greece; and the best Purple was found afterward at Tyre it selfe: & before that, among the Cyclades, and on the coast of Gerulia.

Tharsis, the second Sonne of Iauan, inhabited Cilicia, of which Tharsis is the Metropolis. Montanus for Tharsis in Cilicia, vnderstands Carthage in Africa; but (referring the respect due to fo learned a man) he vvvas much mistaken in that conjecture. The Chaldean Paraphrast puts Carthage for Tharsis, but it hath no authority nor warrant of reason therein. So likewise, where it is vvritten, that the Ships of Salomon went euery three yeares to Tharsis, and brought thence Gold, Siluer, Elephants teeth, &c. the Chaldean Paraphrast translates Tharsis (Africa.) But Salomons Ships were prepared in the Red Sea at Esfon-Gaber, in the Bay of Blana, nere vnto Madian, vvhich Iethro (Moses Father in Law) inhabited; a Prouince of Arabia Petraea, Idumea, or of the Chusites; and they sayled to the higher part of the East India. For it had bene a strange Nauigation to haue spent three yeares in the passage betweene Iudea and Carthage, or any other part of Africa, vvhich might haue bene sayled in fixe or ten daies. And if so great riches might haue bin found within the bounds of the Mediterran Sea, all the other neighbouring Princes would soon haue entertained that Trade also. But this enterprize of Salomon is in this sort vvritten of in the first of Kings: Also King Salomon made a Naue of Ships in Esfon-Gaber, which is beside Elath and the brinke of the Red Sea in the Land of Edom: and Hyram sent with the Naue his seruants, that were Mariners, and had knowledge of the Sea, with the seruants of Salomon: and they came to Ophir, and fet from thence 420. Talents of Gold, &c. But as the Nations about Pontus thought no Sea in the vvorld like vnto their owne, and doubted whether there were any other Sea but that onely: (whereof it came, that Pontus was a word vsed for the Sea in generall) so, because the Israelites and the Phenicians knew no other Sea than that of the Mediterran in the beginning; and that the people of Tharsis had the greatest Shippes, and were the first Nauigators in those parts vvith such Vessels, they were therefore called men of the Sea: and the word Tharsis vsed often for the Sea. And vvhereas it is said that the Shippes of Salomon went euery three yeares to Tharsis, that phrase is not strange at all; for vve vse it ordinarily vvherefoeuer vve nauigate, (namely) that the Kings Ships are gone to the Sea, or that they are set out euery yeare, or euery three yeares to the Sea, and therefore Tharsis was not therein named, either for Carthage, Africa, or India, but vsed for the Sea it selfe. But in this place Tharsis is thaily taken for Tharsis, the chiefe City in Cilicia, founded by Tharsis the second sonne of Iauan, or by his Successors in memory of their first parent. To this City arriued Alex. Macedon, before he gaue the first ouerthrow to Darius, and casting himselfe into the Riuier to bathe and vvash his body, hee fell into an extreame Feuer, and great danger of death: and in this City of Tharsis was S. Paul borne. Now this agreeth with the reason and nature of a Plantation. For Gomer and his other sonnes inhabiting Asia the lesse, and that part of Syria adioyning) Iauan, who vvvas to passe ouer the Sea into Greece, tooke the edge of the same Coast, and first planted the Iones on that shore: gaue the Islands betweene Asia the lesse and Greece, to Elisa, and left Tharsis vpon the Sea-side in Cilicia; of vvhom that City tooke name.

The third sonne of Iauan vvvas Cethim, of vvhom were the Romanes and Italians, saith Berosus; but I allow better of Melanchtons opinion, vvho makes Cethim the Father of the Macedonians. Cethim is a voice plurall (saith he) and signifieth percussores, though in that respect it may be meant by either. But it seemeth more probable, that the place of Efay 23. (according to Melanchton) had relation to Alexander and the Macedonians: Hee calamitas ab Elai predicta est, qui capite vicesimo tertio inquit, venturos esse eneriores Tyri ex terra Cittim: This calamity (saith Melanchton) was foreboded by Elai the Prophet, vvho in the three and twentieth Chapter pronounced, that the Destroyers of Tyre were come out of Cittim. And although the children of Israel esteemed all men Islanders, vvvhich came to them by Sea, and separate from that Continent; (and so also Cittim might be taken for Italy, saith Berosus) yet wee must take the first performance of the former Prophecie, which tooke effect by the destruction of the Tyrians by Alexander, vvho after 7. Moneths siege, entred that proud City, and cut in pieces seuen thousand principall Citizens; strangled two thousand, & changed the freedom of 13. thousand otheys into bondage and slavery. Now, that Macedon vvvas taken for Cethim, it doth appeare plainly in the first of the Maschabees; in these vvordes: After that Alexander the Macedonian, the the sonne of Philip, went forth of the Land of Cethim, and slew Darius King of the Persians, and Medes. Iosephus sets Cethim in the Isle of Cyprus, in which (saith hee) there remaineth the Citie Citium, the Countrey of Zeno the Philosopher (witnesseth Laertius,) which City Ptolemy vpon Ezechiel affirmeth, that it stood in Saint Hieromes time. So it may be that all the Islands in ancient times by the Hebrewes were called the Islands of Cethim: and in that sense might Cyprus be so called also, & yet because Tharbis was the very next Port to Cyprus, and directly our against it, it is also very probable, that Cethim dwelt by his brother Tharbis: and finding that Island too streight for his people after they were increased, & that the rest of the Coasts, both on Asia side and Greece were inhabited by his Father and Brothers, he sent Colonies over the Aegean Sea, and inhabited Macedonia.

Dodanim the fourth sonne of Ianan, and the youngest Brother (by the most opinions) fate downe at Rhodes, as nere Cethim, Tharbis, and Elisa, as hee could. For Dodanim and Rhodanim are vsed indifferently by many Translators: the Hebrew (D) and the Hebrew (R) are so like, as the one may easily be taken for the other, as all Hebrewists affirm. There is also found in Epirus the City of Dodona, in the Prouince of Molossia. And as Cethim, when he wanted soyle in Cyprus: so Dodanim (seated in a far lesse Island) did of necessity send his people farther off; and keeping alongst the Coast, and finding Peloponnesus in the possession of Elisa, he passed a little further on the Westward, and planted in Epirus. And though the City of Dodona, was not then built, or (perchance) not so ancient as Dodanim himselfe, yet his Posterity might giue it that name in the memory of their first parent, as it hapned all the World ouer. For names were giuen to Cities, Mountaines, Riuer, and Prouinces, after the names of Noahs children and grand-children; not in all places by themselves, but by their successors many yeares after: euery of their Families being desirous to retain among them by those memories, out of what branch themselves were taken, and grafted elsewhere. And because great Kingdomes were often by new Conquerors newly named, and the greatest Cities often fired and demolished, therefore those that hoped better to perpetuate their memories, gaue their own names, or the names of their Ancestors, to Mountaines and Riuer, as to things (after their iudgements) freeest from any alteration.

Thus then did Ianan settle himselfe and his children, in the edge and frontier of Asia the lesse, towards the Sea-shore: and afterward in Greece, and the Islands and neighbour Prouinces thereof, as Iapheth their Father had done in the body of the lesser Asia, together with Ianan's brethren, Gomer, Magog, Madai, Tubal, Mesech, and the rest round about him. And in like sort did Chus (the sonne of Cham) people Babylonian, Chaldaea, and the borders thereof towards the West and South-west: and the Sonnes of Chus (all but Nimrod, who held Babylon it selfe) travelled Southward in Arabia felix, and South-westward into Arabia petraea: the rest of his children holding the Regions adioyning to Nimrod. Mizraim the brother of Chus in like manner tooke the vway of Egypt: and his brother Canaan the Region of Palestina adioyning. The sonnes of Canaan had their portions in Canaan, of whom all those Nations came, which were afterward the Enemies both to the Hebrews, and to those of the sons of Shem, which spread themselves towards the West, and the borders of the Mediterranean Sea: of which I shall speake hereafter. But first of the sons of Cham or Ham, which were foure:

Chus, Mizraim, Phut, and Canaan.

That the seat of Chus the eldest son of Ham, was in Arabia, not in Aethiopia: and of strange Fables, and ill Translations of Scripture, grounded on the mistaking of this point.

†. I.

Of Iosephus his Tale of an Aethiopses wife of Moses, grounded on the mistaking of the seats of Chus.

THat Ham was the Father of the Egyptians, it is made manifest in many Scriptures, as in the 105. Psalm, verse 51. Then Israel came to Egypt, and Jacob was a stranger in the land of Ham: and in the 78. Psalm, Hee slew all the first-borne in Egypt, even the beginning of their strength, in the Tabernacles of Ham. There is also also found a great City in Thebaida, called Cheramis: (as it were the City of Ham) of which name Herodotus also discouers an Island in the same Region. But because Chus is the elder sonne of Ham, it agreeth with order to speake first of him. Now though I haue already in the description of Paradise handled this question, and (I hope) proued that Chus could not be Aethiopia: yet seeing it cometh now to his turne to speake for himselfe, I will adde some farther prooffe to the former. For, the manifestation hereof sets many things straight, which had otherwise very crooked constructions, and senseless interpretations. Surely, howsoever the Septuagint and Iosephus haue herein failed, that Chus could not be Aethiopia, but Arabia: (to wit) both that Arabia called Petraea, and a part of Arabia the Happy and the Desert: which Regions Chus and the Chusites presently planted, after they left Babylon to Nimrod, wherein they first fate down altogether. And there is nothing which so well cleareth this Controuersie, as the true interpretation of the place, Num. 12. v. 1. where Moses his Wife is called a Chusite; together with some places which speake of Nabuchodonosors Conquests. For whereas Iosephus and the Septuagint in the place, Num. 12. v. 1. as also elsewhere, vnderstand Chus for Aethiopia, we must giue credit to Moses himselfe herein; and then it will appeare that Iosephus was grossly mistaken, or vainly led by his owne inuention. For Iosephus presuming that Chus was Aethiopia, and therefore that the Wife of Moses (which in Scripture, Num. 12. ver. 1. is called a woman of Chus) was a woman of the land of Aethiopia, saith that Tharbis the Daughter of the King of Aethiopia, fell in loue with the person and fame of Moses, while he besieged Saba her Fathers City: and to the end, to obtaine Moses for her Husband, she practised to betray both her Parents, Country, and Friends, with the City it selfe, and to deliuer it into Moses hands. The Tale (if it bee worth the reciting) lyeth thus in Iosephus. After he hath described the strength of the Aethiopian City Meroe, which he saith at length Cambyfes called so from the name of his Sister, (the old name being Saba) he goeth on in these words: His cum Moses desiderare exercitum otiosum egre ferres, hoste non audiente manus conferre, tale quiddam accidit. Erat Aethiopum Regi filia nomine Tharbis, &c. vvhich tale hath this sense in English: When Moses was grieved that his Army lay idle, because the Enemy besieged, durst not ally and come to handy strokes, there happened this accident in the meane while. The Aethiopian King had a Daughter called Tharbis, who at some assaults giuen, beheld the person of Moses, and withall admired his valour: And knowing that Moses had not only upheld and restored the falling estate of the Egyptians, but had also brought the conquering Aethiopians to the very brink of subuersion: these things working in her thoughts, together with her owne affection, which daily increased, she made meanes to send vnto him by one of her trustiest seruants, to offer her selfe vnto him, and become his wife; which Moses on this condition entertained, that she should first deliuer the City into his possession, whereunto she condescending, and Moses hauing taken oath to performe this contract, both the one and the other were instantly performed.

†. II.

A dispute against the tale of Iosephus.

THIS Tale (whereof Moses hath not a word) hath Iosephus fashioned, and therein also vterly mistaken himselfe, in naming a City of Arabia for a City of Aethiopia: as he names Aethiopia it selfe to haue bene the Countrey of Moses his Wife, when (indeede) it was Arabia. For Saba is not in Aethiopia, but in Arabia, as both Strabo and all other Geographers, ancient and moderne, teach vs, saying, that the Sabaeans are Arabians and not Aethiopians; except Iosephus can perswade vs, that the Queene of Saba which came from the South to heare the wisdom of Salomon, were a Negro, or Blacke-Moore. And though Damianus a Goet speake of certaine Letters to the King of Portugall from Prester Iohn, of the Abissines: wherein that Aethiopian King would perswade the Portugals that he was descended of the Queene of Saba and of Salomon; yet it doth no where appeare in the Scriptures, that Salomon had any Son by that great Princeesse: which had it bene true, it is likely that when Sissac King of Egypt invaded Roboam, and sacke Hierusalem, his Brother (the Sonne of Saba and Salomon) who ioyned vpon Egypt, would both haue impeached that enterprize, as also giuen aide and succour to Roboam against Ieroboam, who drew from him ten of the twelue Tribes to his owne obedience. Neither is it any thing against our opinion of Moses his Wife, to haue been an Arabian, that the Scriptures teach vs, that Moses married the daughter of Iethro Priest of Midian or Madian: which standing on the North Coast of the Red Sea, ouer against the body of Egypt, and nere Eston-Gaber, where Salomon prouided his Fleet for India, in the Region of Edom, may well be reckoned as a part of Arabia, as the Red Sea is called Sinu Arabicus. For Eunnea ioyneth to the Tribe of Juda by the North, to Arabia Petraea by the East, to the Mediterran by the West, and to the Red Sea by the South-east. And if wee marke the way which Moses tooke when he left Egypt, and conducted Israel thence, it will appeare that he was no stranger in Arabia: in the border whereof, and in Arabia it selfe, hee had formerly liued fortie yeeres; where it seemeth, that besides his carefull bringing vp in Egypt, he was instructed by Iethro in the Egyptians learning. For Iosephus consetleth, and Saint Stephen confirmeth, that he was learned in all the wisdome of the Egyptians. But on the other side this Text makes much against Iosephus, where it is written in Exodus the second Therefore Moses fled from Pharaon, and dwelt in the Land of Madian or Midian, and not in Aethiopia. And in the third Chapter it is as plaine as words can expresse, in what Region Madian was, where it is written, when Moses kept the sheepe of Iethro his Father in Law Priest of Madian, & drave the Flocke to the Desert, and came to the Mountaine of God in Horeb. Now that Mount Horeb is not in Aethiopia, euery Infant knoweth. And if we may beleue Moses himselfe, then was not the Wife of Moses purchased in that manner which Iosephus reporteth (which was for betraying her Country and Friends) neither had shee the name of Tharbis, but of Sippora, or Zippora: neither was shee a Negro, but a Madianitisse. And as God worketh the greatest things by the simplest means: so it pleased him from a Shepherd to call Moses, and after him Dauid, and by them to deliuer his people first and last. For Moses, sitting by a Well (as disconsolate and a stranger) defended the daughters of Reguel from the other shepherds, and drew them Water to water their sheepe: vpon which occasion, by God ordained) he was entertained by Iethro, whose Daughter he married: and not for any betraying of Townes or Countries.

Exod. 2.

From hence also came Iethro to Moses at Rehdim, not farre from Idumaea, and finding the insupportable gouernment of such a multitude, hee aduised him to distribute this weightie charge, and to make Gouernours and Iudges of euery Tribe and Familie. And if Iethro had beene an Aethiopian, it had beene a farre progresse for him to haue passed through all Egypt with the Wife and Children of Moses, and to haue found Moses in the border of Idumaea: the Egyptians hating Moses and all that fauoured him. But the passing of Moses through Arabia Petraea (which ioyneth to Madian) proueth that Moses was well acquainted in those parts, in which the second time he wandred forty yeeres, and did by these late traualles of his, seeke to instruct the children of Israel in the knowledge of one true God, before he brought them to the Land of plenty & rest. For he found them nourished vp with the milke of Idolatry, and obstinate in the Religion of the Heathens, & finding that those stiffe plants could not be bowed or declined, either by perswasion or by miracle, he ware them out in the Deserts, as God directed, and grafted their branches anew, that from those hee might receiue fruit, agreeable to his owne desire, and Gods Commandements.

Sicut Senen- Bild.

Lastly, this opinion of Iosephus is condemned by Augustinus Chrysostomus, where also he reprehendeth Apollinaris, who auowed that Moses had married both Tharbis and Sephora: His owne words haue this beginning: Mentitur etiam Apollinaris dum uxores babuisse Moses, &c. Apollinaris also lyeth, in affirming that Moses had two wives: and who doth not perceiue these things faimed by them: for it is manifest that the Wife of Moses was Zephora, Daughter to the Priest or President of Madian: and that Madian cannot be taken for Aethiopia beyond Egypt, being the same that ioyneth to Arabia: so farre Chrysostomus.

†. III.

Chus ill expounded for Aethiopia. Ezech. 29. 10.

Ezech. 29. 10.

Now as Chus is by the Septuagint conuerted Aethiopia, and the wife of Moses therefore called Aethiopia: so in the conquest of Nabuchodonosor is Aethiopia written for Arabia. For by the words of Ezechiel, it is manifest that Nabuchodonosor was neuer in Aethiopia, bebold (saith Ezechiel, speaking of the person of this great Assyrian) I come vpon vpon thee and vpon thy Rivers, and I will make the Land of Egypt utterly waste and desolate, from the Towre of Senenb, euen to the borders of the blacke Moores: vvhich last words should haue beene thus conuerted: From the Towre of Senenb to the borders of the Chusites or Arabians: betwene which two is situated all Egypt. For to say, from the borders of Senenb to the Aethiopians, hath no sense at all. Senenb it selfe being the border of Egypt, confronting and ioyning to Aethiopia, or the Land of the blacke Moores. So as if Nabuchodonosor conquest had beene but betwene Senenb and the border of Aethiopia, it were as much to say, and did expresse no other victory than the conquest of all that Land and Countrey, lying betwene Middlesex and Buckingham, where both the Countreies ioyn together; or all the North parts of England, betwene Barwick and Scotland: for this hath the same sense with the former, if any man sought to expresse by these two bounds, the Conquest of England: Barwick being the North border of England, as Senenb or Syene is the South bound of Egypt, seated in Thebaida which toucheth Aethiopia. But by the words of Ezechiel it appeareth, that Nabuchodonosor neuer entered into any part of Aethiopia, although the Septuagint, the Vulgar, the Geneua, and all other (in effect) haue written Aethiopia for Chus.

†. IIII.

Another place of Ezechiel, cap. 30. vers. 9. in the like manner mistaken.

And as the former, so is this place of Ezechiel mistaken, by being in this sort conuerted: In die illa egredientur nuncij a facie mea in triebus ad conuerendam Aethiopia confidentiam: Which place is thus turned in English by the Geneuans: In that day shall there Messengers goe forth from me in ships to make the carelesse Moores afraid. Now the Latine for (ships) hath the Greeke word Trieres for Tiremes which are Gallies of three banks, and not ships. But that in this place the Translation should haue beene (as in the former) amended by vsing the word Chus or Arabia for Aethiopia or the blacke Moores, euery man may see which meanly vnderstandeth the Geography of the World, knowing, that to passe out of Egypt into Aethiopia there neede no Gallies nor Ships, no more than to passe out of Northampton in Leicestershire: Aethiopia being the conterminat Region with Egypt, and not diuided so much as by a Riuer. Therefore in this place of Ezechiel it was meant, that from Egypt, Nabuchodonosor should fend Gallies alongst the coast of the Red Sea, by vvhich an Army might be transported into Arabia the Happy and the Stony (sparing the long wearisome march ouer all Egypt, and the Desert of Pharan vvhich Army might thereby surprise them vnwares in their security and confidence. For vvhen Nabuchodonosor was at Senenb within a mile of Aethiopia, he neede neither Gallies nor Ship to passe into it: being all one large and firme Land with Egypt, and no otherwise parted from it, than one In-land shire is parted from another; and if hee had a fancy to haue rowed vpon the Riuer but for pleasure, hee could not haue done it: for the fall of Nilus (tumbling ouer high and steepy Mountaines) called Catadupa Nili, were at hand.

Lastly, as I haue already obserued, the sonnes of euery father seated themselves as neer together as possibly they could, Gomer and his sonnes in Asia the lesse, Iaman and his sons in Greece, and the Ilands adioyning, Shem in Persia and Eastward. So the Sons & Grandchildren of Chus from the Riuer of Gebon (their Fathers first seate) inhabited vpon the same, or vpon some other contiguous vnto it, as Nimrod and Hauilah on the one side, and Saba, Sheba, and Sabtecha (with the rest) did on the other side. And to conclude in a word, the Hebrews had neuer any acquaintance or fellowship, any war, treaty of peace, or other intelligence with the Aethiopian black Moores, as is already remembered in the Chapter of Paradise.

†. V.

A place, Esay 18. v. 1. in like manner corrupted, by taking Chus for Aethiopia.

And as in these places before remembered, so in diuers other is the vvord Aethiopia put for Arabia or Chus, which puts the story (vvhere it is so vnderstood) quite out of square; one Kingdome thereby being taken for another. For vvhat sense hath this part of of Scripture, Esay 18. Va terra Cymbalorum alarum que est trans flumina Aethiopia, or according to the Septuagint in these words: Va terra nauium alarum qua est trans flumina Aethiopia; vva: to the land shadowing with wings, which is beyond the Riuer of Aethiopia, sending Embassadors by sea, such the vessels of reeds upon the waters. Va terra vmbrosae ora; vva: to the Land of the shady coast, faith Iunius. The former Translators vnderstand it in this sense; that the waters are shadowed with the sails, which are significantly called the wings of the ships, the other, that the coast of the Sea was shadowed by the height of the Land.

But to the purpose: That this Land here spoken of by the Prophet Esay, is Egypt, no Interpreter hath doubted. For they were the Egyptians that sent this message to the Israelites which Esay repeateth, & by the former translation euery man may see the transposition of Kingdomes: for hereby Egypt is transported vnto the other side of Aethiopia, and Aethiopia set next vnto Iuda, when it is the Land of Chus and Arabia indeed that lyeth betwene Iuda and Egypt, and not Aethiopia, which is seated vnder the Equinoctiall Line. And of this Berosus asketh a materiall question, (to wit) what Region that should be, of which the Prophet speaketh, and placeth it beyond the Riuer of Aethiopia. Nam de ignota agi regione dici nequit; For it cannot be said that he treateth of an unknowne Region. Now if Aethiopia it selfe be vnder the Equinoctiall line, with whom the Jewes had neuer any acquaintance, why should any man dream that they had knowledge of Nations far beyond it againe, and beyond the Riuer of Aethiopia? except we shall impiously thinke that the Prophet spake hee knew not what, or vfed an impertinent discourse of those Nations, which were not discovered in 2000. yeares after, inhabiting as far South as the Cape of good Hope, commonly knowne by the name of Bona esperanza.

f. VI.

That upon the like mistaking, both Terrah in the story of Senacherib, and Zera in the story of Asa are vnderstandedly made Aethiopians.

And by this translation is the Pory of Senacherib vterly mistaken in the cause of his retreat. For Senacherib vvas first repulsed at Pelusium, at the very entrance of Egypt from Iuda: when hauing certaine knowledge that Thirrhakeh, (which all the Interpreters call King of Iuda) was on the way to set on him, hee began to with-draw himselfe: And fearing to leaue his Army in two parts, hee sent threatening Messengers to Ezechia King of Iuda, perswading him to submit himselfe: the Tenor whereof is set down in the second of Kings in these words: I haue any of the gods of the Nations deliuered his Land out of the hands of the King of Assur? where is the god of Hamath, &c. By vvhich proud Embassage, if he had obtained entrance into Ierusalem, he then meant to haue vntied that great Army before Ierusalem, commanded by Rabshakeh, with the other which lay before Pelusium, a great City vpon the branch of Nilus next Arabia. For Senacherib had already mastered the most part of all those Cities in Iuda and Beniamin vvvith a third Army, (which himselfe commanded) being then at the siege of Lebna. But vpon the rumor of that Arabian Army led by their King Thirrhakeh (whom Iosephus calls Tharaces) Rabshakeh halted from the siege of Ierusalem, and found Senacherib departed from Lachis, and set downe before Lebna, which was afterwards called Eleuthropolis, as some haue supposed. But while he had ill successe at Pelusium and feared Thirrhakeh, God himselfe whom he least feared, brook his Army before Ierusalem by the Angel of his power, so as 158000. were found dead in the place, as in the life of Ezechias is hereafter more largely written. And that this Army of Tirrah was from Arabia, Iosephus himselfe maketh plain. For he confesseth in the tenth Book, the first Chapter of the Jewes Antiquities, that it vvas come to Senacherib's knowledge, that the Army which was a foote (both to relieue the Egyptians and the Jewes) marched towards him by the vvay of the Desert: Now the Desert vvhich lay indifferent betwene Ierusalem and Pelusium, vvas that of Pharan or Sar, which also toucheth on the three Arabias, to wit, the Stony, of which it is a part: the Desert, and the Itappy; and by no other vvay indeed could the Arabians come on to succour either Pelusium or Ierusalem. But that there is any Desert betwene Pelusium and the South part of Egypt, hath neuer yet bene heard of, or described by any Cosmographer or Itinerary. So then this description of the second of Kings, vers. the ninth, hath the same mistaking as the rest. For here the word (Chus) is also translated Aethiopia; and in this sense haue all the Interpreters, (but Iunius) expressed the beginning of the ninth Verse:

He

He heard also men say of Thirrhakeh King of Aethiopia, &c. whereas it should haue bene thus conuerted with Iunius: Audimus autem de Thirrhakeh Rege Chusii; Hee heard also of Thirrhakeh King of the Chusites. For they were the Chusites and Arabians, whose Houses and Cities were next the fire, and vpon whom the very smoke of Iuda flaming was blowne, being their nearest Neighbours: and so were not the Aethiopian black-Moores vnder the Equinoctiall, whom neither war nor peace (which discovereth all Regions) euer found out, faith Pliny. For this King was no more King of Aethiopia than Zerah was, who invaded Asa King of Iuda, with an Army of a Million, and three thousand Chariots. Indeed, how such an Army & those Chariots should passe through all Egypt (the Kings of Egypt being mighty Kings) let all men that know how these Regions are seated, and how farre distant, judge. For Princes doe not easily permit Armies of a Million to run through them; neither was there euer such strength of Black-Moores heard of in that part of the World, or elsewhere. Neither are these Aethiopians such traualers or Conquerors; and yet is this King Zerah also called King of Aethiopia. But the vvord Chus being first so conuerted for Aethiopia, the rest of the Interpreters (not looking into the seates of Kingdomes, or the possibilities of attempts, or inuasions) followed one another in the former mistakings.

A farther exposition of the place, Esay 18. 1.

Concerning these words in that eighteenth Chapter of Esay, Nauium alarum; winged ships, (so the Septuagint turne it) or Cymbalorum alarum (according to the Latine) sayles whistling in the windes, or terra vmbrosae ora (after Iunius) the Land of a shadowed coast, or the Land shadowing with wings, as our English Geneua hath it. The two first interpretations of the Septuagint and S. Hierome, haue one sense in effect. For the sailes are commonly called the wings of a ship, & we vse to lay ordinarily when our ships saile slowly, that the wanteth wings: (that is) when her sailes are either worne or too narrow: and we also vse the same phrase of the winde whistling in the sailes. And it may be that the Egyptians employed so many of those smal ships, as their sailes were said to giue a shadow ouer the Red Sea. But to make both interpretations good, Pintus (vpon Esay) affirmeth, that the vvord (Sabat) doth signifie both to shadow and to gingle (vvhich is) to make a kinde of Cymbaline sound: so as the meaning of this place (faith Pintus) is this: Vae to thee, O Egypt, which dost promise to others safeguard, vnder the shadow of thy wings; vvhich (indeede) seemeth to agree with the argument of the eighteenth Chapter of Esay; and this phrase is often elsewhere vsed, as in the sixteenth Psalm: Sub vmbra alarum tuarum protegeme; Defend me vnder the shadow of thy wings. The Boates of reede spoken of are of two kinds; either of basket-willow couered with hides (as anciently in Brittain) or a Tree made hollow in the bottome, and built vpon both sides with Canes. Of the one sort I haue scene in Ireland, of the other in the Indies.

§. XI.

Of the plantation and antiquities of Egypt.

f. I.

That Mizraim the chiefe planter of Egypt: and the rest of the sonnes of Ham, were seated in order, one by another.

The second sonne of Ham was Mizraim, (who according to the place of a second brother) was sent somewhat farther off to inhabite. For Chus first posselt Chaldea on the West side of Gebon chiefly: and from thence, as hee increased in people, so hee entered Arabia, and by time came to the border of the Red Sea, & to the South-east-side of Iuda. Mizraim his brother (with Phut) past ouer into Africa. Mizraim held Egypt: and Phut (as a third brother) was thrust farther off into Mauritania. Canaan tooke the Sea-coast, and held the side of Palestina: and these foure brothers posselt all that Tract of Land, from Gebon in Chaldea, as farre to the West as the Mediterrane Sea: comprehending all Arabia Deserta, and Petra, all Canaan which embraceth Galilea, Samarria, and and Judea; with the two *Egypt*s, wherof the neather is bounded by Memphis on the South, and by the Mediterrane Sea on the North; and Thebaide (called the vpper Egypt) stretcheth it self toward the South as far as Syene, the border of the *Aethiopi*ans or black-*Moo*ns. All the rest of the coast of Africa Westward, Phut peopled; which brothers had not any other Nation or Family that dwelt between them. And in the same manner did all their sons againe, and all the sons of the rest of *Noah*s children, fort themselves.

†. II.

Of the time about which the name of Egypt began to be knowne: and of the Egyptians Lunary yeeres, which made their antiquities seeme more fabulous.

THis flourishing Kingdome posselt by Mizraim, changed her ancient name, and became Egypt, as such time as Egyptus (otherwise Rameffes, as some thinke) the sonne of Belus, chased thence his elder brother *Danau*s, shifting him into that part of Greece now called Morcia, by whom the Argines were made *Dana*i, abandoning their proper names: which happened 877. yeeres after the Flood, in the time of Iofua, as St. Augustine coniectureth out of Eusebius. But in *Homer*s Odyffes it appeareth that the Egyptians were so called at the time of the Troian Warre. And before this, Egypt was knowne by diuers other names, as Oceana, Aria, Osiriana, &c. And Manethon (whom Iosephus citeth in his first booke against Appion) numbrellth all the Kings of Egypt after Moses departure, who continued 393. yeeres. By which other men coniecture, that the Egyptians tooke on them that name 330. yeeres after Iofua, and about 1000. yeeres after the Flood. But where Iosephus in the same booke taketh Israel to be those Hysos, which he also calleth Pastores or Shepherds, which are said to haue reigned in Egypt 511. yeeres: whom also he calleth his Ancestors, (meaning the Ancestors of the Iewes) in this I am sure he was grossly deceiued, or that he vainly boasted: for the Israelites had no such Dominion as Manethon saith, nor abode in Egypt so long a time by many yeeres.

Of the Egyptian Antiquities there are many fancies in Trogus, Herodotus, Plato, Diod. Siculus, Mela, and others. For they affirme (saith Pomp. Mela) that there had reigned in Egypt 330. Kings before Amasis, who was contemporary with Cyrus; and that they had memory and story of 13000. yeeres; and that the Stars had foure times changed their course, and the Sunne twice set in the East. These Riddles are also rise among the Abenians and Arcadians, vvhoe dare affirme, that they are more ancient than Iupiter and the Moone; vvhich Ouid:

Arcades: & Luna gens prior illa fuit.*

The Arcadians the earth inhabited Ere yet the Moone did shine, or Ioue was bred.

But for those 13000. yeeres it may well be true; seeing it is certaine that the Egyptians reckon their yeeres by Moneths, which makes after that account not about 1000. or 1100. yeeres, whether we take their Moneths or Lunary yeeres to haue bene of the first kind of 27. dayes and eight houres; or otherwise 29. dayes and twelue houres; or after any other of those fve diuersities of their Lunary yeeres.

†. III.

Of certaine vaine assertions of the Antiquity of the Egyptians.

Eradus Mercator in his Chronology, reasoneth for the Egyptians Antiquity in this manner: That the sixteenth Dynasty (where Eusebius begins to reckon the Egyptians times) had beginning with the generall Flood; and that therefore the first of the other fteene reached the Creation, or soone after it. To which coniecture of Mercator, Pererius maketh this answer; That therein Mercator was first deceiued, because he taketh it for granted, that the beginning of the sixteenth Dynasty was at once with the generall Flood; which Eusebius maketh 292. yeeres after, and in the time of Abraham. Secondly, Mercator maketh the beginning of the shepherds Dynasty (being in number 17.) in the time of their first King, Saltis, to haue bene in the yeere of the Word 1846. which

Enst-

Eusebius findeth in the Worlds age 2140. For the 16. Dynasty was begun but in the 292. yeeres after the Flood, as they account, and continued 190. yeeres. Thirdly, whereas Mercator maketh euery Dynasty to endure 115. yeeres, Eusebius reckoneth many of them at lesse than 100. yeeres: for the 28. had but fixe yeeres, the 29. but 20. and the 30. but 18. yeeres.

Now Annius in his Supplement of Manethon affirmeth, That all these 15. Dynasties lasted but 162. yeeres: and that the first of the 15. began but in the 131. yeere after the flood: so as where Mercator makes all the 15. to precede the flood, and the 16. to haue bene then in being at the time of the flood, Annius makes them all after it. But the contrariety of fallhood cannot be hidden, though disguised. For Annius had forgotten his former Opinion and Assertion, that it was in the 131. yeere that Nimrod, with the sons of Noah, came into the Valley of Shinaar: so he forgets the time which was consumed in the building of Babel: & that before the confusion of Speech there was no dispersion, nor far-off plantation at all. And though he hastily conueyed Gomer into Italy, and Tubal into Spain, in the tenth yeere of *Nimrod*s reigne: (which was ten yeeres after his arrival into Babylonia) yet herein he is more vnuadvised. For he makes Egypt posselt, & a gouernment established in the very first yeere of the arrival of Nimrod into Shinaar, before all partition, or any expedition farre off or neer in question: for from thence (that is, from Babel) did the Lord scatter them upon all the earth.

Against Pererius: that it is not unlikely, but that Egypt was peopled within 200. yeeres after the Creation; at lesst, that both it, and the most parts of the World were peopled before the Flood.

But whereas Pererius seeketh to ouerthrow this Antiquity of the Egyptians touching their Dynasties, (which Eusebius doth not altogether destroy, but lessen) I do not find any great strength in this opinion of Pererius, (to wit) that it was either vnlikely or impossible that Egypt should bee peopled within 100. or 200. yeeres after Adam, in the first Age. And whereas he supposeth that it was not inhabited at all before the generall Flood, I doe verily beleue the contrary: and that not onely of Egypt, but the better part of all the World was then peopled: Pererius his words are these: Quomodo enim primos mundi ducentos, vel etiam centum annos Adami proles adeo multiplicari potuit, ut ad Egyptum usque habitandum & complendum propagata sit, &c. For how could the children of Adam be so multiplied in the first two hundred, or in the first hundred yeeres of the world, and so propagated as to inhabit and fill Egypt? for allowing this (saith Pererius) wee must also confesse, that there were then both the Assyrians and other Nations.

Now seeing that the Scriptures are silent herein, and that it is no point of our sauing beleefe, it is lawfull for euery man to be guided in this and the like questions by the best reason, circumstance, and likelihood; and herein, as in the rest, I protest that I doe not gainsay any mans opinion out of any crossing or cauilling humour: for I thinke it the part of euery Christian, rather to reconcile differences, where there is possibility of vni-on, than out of froward subtilty, and preiudicate resolucess, to maintaine factious needlesse, and dangerous contentions.

First therefore, to this opinion, that Egypt was not planted so soone after Adam; no, not at all before the Flood, I say, that there is no reason why wee should giue a lesse increase to the sonnes of Adam, than to the sonnes of Noah. For their length of life, which exceeded those which came after the Flood double, & (after a few yeeres) treble, is an infallible proofe of their strength and ability, to beget many Children: & at that time they obserued no degrees of kindred, nor consanguinity. And that there was a speedy increase of people, and in great numbers, it may in some sort appeare by this, that Cain, who (being fearefull that the death of Abel would haue bene reuenged on him) withdrew himselfe from the rest, which were afterward begotten, and dwelt in the Land of Nod, and there, by the helpe of his owne issues built a City, (called Enoch) after the name of his first-borne. Now if it be gathered that Nimrod came into the Valley of Shinaar with so many multitudes, as sufficed to build the City and Towre of Babel: and that to this increase there was giuen but 130. yeeres by Berosus, and after the account of the Scriptures (reckoning, as it is commonly vnderstood, by the birth of Arphaxad, Selah, Heber, and Phalegh) but one hundred and one yeere: I see no cause to doubt, but that in the infancy of the first age, when the bodies of men were most perfect, even within 130. yeeres, the same (if not a greater) number might be increased; and so within 70. yeeres after (that is, by such time as the World had stood 200. yeeres) as well Affrya, Syria, and Egypt might bee posselt before the Flood, as they were within the same or lesse time after it. Neither doth it agree with the circumstance or true Story of the Babylonian and Assyrian Empire, that all those people, which were increased in the first hundred or 130. yeeres after the Flood, came into Shinaar and Babylonia. For that euer Noah himselfe came out of the East, as there is no Scripture or Authority to proue it, so all probable coniecture and reason it selfe denies it. Again, those multitudes, and powerfull numbers, which Semiramis (but the third from Nimrod) found in India, considered with her owne Army of three Millions, (and she left not all her Kingdomes empty) doe well proue, that if the World had such plenty of people in so few yeeres after the Flood, it might also be as plentifully filled in like time before it. For after their owne account Ninus gouerned Babylonia and Affrya but 292. yeeres after the Flood of Noah. And these Troupes of Semiramis were gathered out of all those Easterne Kingdomes, from Media to the Mediterran Sea; when there had now past from the Flood to the time of this her inuasion, somewhat lesse or more than 360. yeeres: for much more time the true Chronology cannot allow; though I confesse, that in respect of the strange greatness of Semiramis Army, and the incredible multitudes gathered, this is as short, a time as can well be given. And if but one halfe bee true of that which is said, That her Army consisted of 1300000. Footmen, and 500000. Horsemen, it must needs bee, that long before Semiramis Reigne, the greatest part of Asia (whence her huge Armie was gathered) was full of people: yea Arabia it selfe (much part whereof is barren) must long before this time of Semiramis haue bene plentifully peopled; when Ninus hauing a determination to make himselfe Master of all Nations, entred (notwithstanding) in League with the King thereof: whom therefore hee either feared, or sought his assistance. And if Arabia were then so well replenished, I see no cause but Egypt might also bee peopled. Now if wee may beleue Trogus Pompeius (Epitomis by Iustin) Egypt was a most flourishing and magnificent Nation before Ninus was borne. For these bee his ownewords, speaking of Ninus. Euere quidem temporibus antiquioribus Vexoris Rex Aegypti, &c. But there were in times more ancient Vexoris King of Egypt, and Tanais King of the Scythians: of which the one invaded Pontus, the other Egypt. And how full of people all that part of the World was, the Conquests of Ninus witness, who subdued with no small force the Armenians, the Medes, and afterwards the Babrians; yea, all that whole body of Asia on this side India. For Diodorus out of Ctesias numbred the Armies wherewith Ninus invaded Zoroaster, at 1700000. Footmen, and 200000. Horsemen: and the Stories generally shew, that though Zoroaster Armie was farre short of this, yet it was greater than any that those parts of the World euer since beheld. But to what end should I seeke for foreigne authority? for no man doubteth but that Egypt was posselt by Atteraim, the sonne of Ham; and that it was an established Kingdome, filled with many Cities in Abrahams time, the Scriptures tell vs. And sure, to prepare and cultiue a desolate and ouergrown ground, to beautifie it with many Cities, Lawes, and Policies, cannot bee esteemed a labour of a few dayes: and therefore it must be inhabited in a lesse time than 200. yeeres after the Flood; and in the same time (if not in a shorter) before the Flood. For if so many Millions of men were found within 300. yeeres after the generall Flood; so as not onely Babylon and Affrya, Bactria, Armenia, Media, Arabia, Egypt, Palestina, yea, the faire-off Lybia on the one side, and India on the other, and Scythia (inferiour to neither) were all filled: into what small corners could then all those Nations be comprest, which 1656. yeeres brought forth before the Flood? euen necessity, which cannot be resisted, cast the abundance of mens bodies into all parts of the knowne World; especially where Death forbore the Father, and made no place for the Sonne, till hee had beheld liuing Nations of his owne body.

M

Selah,

t. V.

t. V.

Of some other reasons against the opinion of Paterius.

For what a strange increase did the long liues of the first Age make, when they continued 800. or 900. yeeres? Surely, we haue reason to doubt, that the World could not containe them, rather than that they were not spread ouer the World. For let vs now reckon the date of our liues in this Age of the World: wherein if one exceede 50. yeeres, ten for one are cut off in that passage, and yet wee finde no want of people; nay we know the multitude such, as if by warres or pestilence they were not sometimes taken off by many thousands, the earth with all the industry of man could not giue them food. What strange heapes then of foules had the first Ages, who enioyed 800. or 900. yeeres, as aforesaid? These numbers, I say, cannot be counted nor conceived. For it would come to the same reckoning in effect, as if all those which haue bene borne in Brittaine since 3. or 4. hundred yeeres before the Norman Conquest (sauiug such as by accident or by violence were cut off) were now alive; and if to these there were added as many as by Polygamy might haue bene increased. For (to omit, that the Gyants and mighty ones of the first Age obserued no law of Matrimony) it is to bee thought that those Louers of the world and of pleasure, when they knew the long and liberall time that those Nature had giuen them, would not willingly or hastily present themselves to any danger which they could flye from or eschew. For what humane argument hath better perswasion to make men careless of life, and fearelesse of death, than the little time which keeps them asunder, and that short time also accompanied with so many paines and diseases, which this eniuous old Age of the World minglenth together, and soweth with the seedes of Mankind?

Now if that Berosus or Annius may be alledged for sufficient Authours, whom Paterius himselfe in this question citeth, then is it by them affirmed, and by Iosephus confirmed, that the City of Enoch was seated neere Zybarus in Syria: and if other parts of Syria were peopled in Cains time; I see no cause why Palestina (which is also a Prouince of Syria) and Egypt (which neighboureth it) could be left desolate both all the life time of Cain, and all those times betwene his death and the Flood, which were by estimation 700. or 800. yeeres. And sure though this Fragment of Berosus with Annius his Comment be very ridiculous in many places (the ancient Copies being corrupted or lost) yet all things in Berosus are not to be reiected. Therefore Saint Hierome for such Authours giues a good rule: Bona eorum eligamus, vitemus contraria; Let vs choose what is good in them, and reiect the rest. And certainly in the very beginning of the first Booke, Berosus agreeth (in effect) with Moses, touching the generall Flood: and in that first part Berosus affirmeth, that those mighty men and Gyants which inhabited Enoch, commanded ouer all Nations, and subiected the vniuersall World: and though that phrase (of all the World) be often vsed in the Scriptures for a part thereof as in the second of the Acts, that there were dwelling at Hierusalem Iewes men that feared God of every Nation vnder Heauen: yet by words which follow in Berosus, it is plaine, that his words and sense were the same: for he addeth, from the Sunnes rising to the Sunnes setting which cannot be taken for any small part thereof. Again, we may safely coniecture, that Noah did not part and proportion the World among his sonnes at aduenture, or left them as Discoverers, but directed them to those Regions which he formerly knew had been inhabited. And it cannot be denied that the earth was more passable and easie to trauiell ouer before the Flood, than after it. For Paterius himselfe confesseth, that Africa (by reason of mud and slime which the water left vpon the Earth) was uninhabited 200. yeeres after Ogyges Flood; whereby we may gather, that there was no great pleasure in passing into faire Countries, after the generall Deluge, when the earth lay (as it were) comprest for 100. or 130. yeeres together. And therefore was the face thereof in all coniecture more beautifull, and lesse cumberfome to walke ouer, in the first Age, than after the generall ouerflowing.

§. VI.

Of the words of Moses, Gen. 10. v. ultimo, wherein Pererius grounded his opinion.

lib. 1.

LAstly, whereas Pererius draws this Argument out of the last Verse of the tenth of Genesis, And out of these were the Nations divided after the flood: Quo significatur salem divisum non fuisse ante diluvium; By which it appeareth (saith Pererius) that there was no such division before the Flood; which he also seeketh to confirme out of the eleventh of Genesis, because the division of tongues was the cause of the dispersion of the people. This consequence, quo significatur, &c. seemeth to me very weake: The Text it selfe rather teacheth the contrary: For out of these (saith Moses) were the Nations divided in the earth, after the Flood; inferring, that before the Flood the Nations were divided out of others, though after the Flood out of these onely. But whatsoever sense may be gathered from this place, yet it can no way be drawne to the times before the Flood, or to any Plantation or division in that age: for if there were none else among whom the earth could be divided after the Flood, but Noahs Sonnes, wherein doth that necessary division controule the planting of the World before it? And whereas it is alleged that the confusion of speech was the cause of this dispersion; it is true, that it was so for that present; but if Babel had never beene built, nor any confusion of Languages at all, yet increase of people and time would have enforced a farther-off and generall Plantation: as Berosus sayes well, that when Mankind were exceedingly multiplied, Ad comparandum novum sedes necessitas compellebat, They were driven by necessitie to seek new Habitations. For we finde (as it is before said) that within 300. yeeres after the Flood, there were gathered together into two Armies, such multitudes as the Valley about Babylon could not have sustained those numbers, with their increase, for any long time; all Asia the greater and the lesser; all Scythia, Arabia, Palestina, and Egypt, with Greece and the Islands thereof; Mauritania and Libya, being also at that time fully peopled. And if wee beleue Berosus, then not onely those parts of the World, but within 140. yeeres after the Flood, Spaine, Italie and France were also planted: much more then may we thinke, that within 1656. yeeres before the Flood, in the time of the chiefe strength of Mankind, they were replenished with people. And certainly seeing all the World was overspawne, there were people in all the World which offended.

†. VII.

A conclusion, refusing of that which is most likely, touching the Egyptian Antiquities: with somewhat of Phut (another Sonne of Ham) which peopled Libya.

Therefore, for the Antiquitie of the Egyptians, as I doe not agree with Mercator, nor iudge with the Vulgar, which give too much credit to the Egyptians Antiquities: so I doe not thinke the report of their Antiquities so fabulous, as either Pererius or other men conceiue it. But I rather incline to this, that Egypt being peopled before the Flood, and 200. or 300. yeeres, more or lesse after Adam, there might remaine vnto the Sonnes of Mizraim some Monuments in Pillars or Altars (of stone or metall) of their former Kings or Gouvernours: which the Egyptians having added to the List and Roll of their Kings after the Flood, in succeeding time out of the vanitie of glory, or by some corruption in their Priests something beyong the truth might be inserted. And that the memory of Antiquitie was in such sort preferred, Berosus affirmeth it of the Chaldeans, and so doth Epigenes. For they both write, that the use of Letters and the Art of Astronomie was knowne to the Babylonians 3634. yeeres before Alexanders Conquest: and this report Annim findeth to agree and reach to the time of Enoch, who was borne 1034. yeeres before the Flood, and wrote of the Worlds destruction, both by Water and Fire; as also of Christs coming in iudgement, as Saint Iude hath witnessed. But leaving these Antiquities to other mens iudgements, and every man to his owne reason, I will conclude this Plantation of Egypt. It is agreed by all, that it was peopled by Mizraim, and that it tooke the name of Egypt from Egyptus the Sonne of Belas, as aforesaid. Being divided into two Regions, that part from Memphis or Nicopolis to the Mediterranean Sea, was called the inferiour Egypt; surname also Delta: because the severall branches of Nilus breaking asunder from one body of the River, gave it the forme

of the Greeke letter Delta, which is the forme of a Triangle. That branch, which ran toward the North-east and embraced the Sea, next vnto the Desarts of Sur and Pharan, had on it the City of Pelusium, where Senacherib was repulsed: The other branch, which yielded it selfe to the Salt-water towards the North-east, is beautified by that famous City of Alexandria: The vpper part of Egypt is bounded betwene Memphis and Syene neere Ethiopia, and had the name of Thebaide, of that ancient City of Thebes, which according to Homer was adorned with 100. Gates: and therefore called Civitas centum portarum, and by the Greeks Diopolis; in the Scriptures No-bamon, which signifieth multitudes of Inhabitants, exceeding beliefe. Ioseph calls Egypt Merisim of Mizraim: and Herodotus affirmes that it had once the name of Thebaui.

16. l. 1. Ant. 17. Hiero. Euseb. p.

Phut the third sonne of Ham tooke the next portion of Land to his brother Mizraim, and inhabited Libya: whose people were anciently called Phutici, (saith Iosephus) and Pliny mentioneth the River Phut in Mauritania: which River from the Mountain Atlas (known to the Inhabitants by the name of Dyris) he maketh to be distant the space of two hundred miles. It also appeareth in the thirtieth Chapter of Ezechiel, that Phut, Chush & Lud were contermini and Associates with the Egyptians.

§. XII.

Of the eleuen sonnes of Canaan, the fourth sonne of Ham.

10

Of the bounds of the Land of Canaan: with the names of his eleuen sonnes.

Canaan (the fourth sonne of Ham) possesse all that Region called by the Romane Palestine; in the Scriptures Galilee, Samaria, and Iudea; in the latter times known by the name of the Holy Land and Iurie: the limits whereof are precisely set downe by Moses, Genesis the tenth, Then the border of the Canaanites was from Zidon as thou goest to Gerar vntill Azzah, and as thou goest vnto Sodome and Gomorrhah, and Admah, and Zeboim, even vnto Lasba. Now howsoever these words of the Hebrew Text (as thou goest) be converted, Moses meaning was that Gerar was the South bound of Canaan, and Zidon the North, Sodome & Gomorrhah the East, and the other Cities named Rood on the Frontiers thereof. For Gerar standeth in a right Line from Gaza in the way of Egypt, the vttermost Territory of Canaan Southward: and this was properly the Land of Canaan.

Now the sons of Canaan which posselt this Country, and inhabited some part of the borders thereof, were in number eleuen:

1. Zidon.
2. Heth or Chethus.
3. Jebusi or Jebusens.
4. Emori or Emarens, or Amorens.
5. Girgissir or Girgeseus.
6. Hethi or Chiuens.
7. Arki or Harkens.
8. Seni or Sinaus.
9. Araadi or Aruadens.
10. Zemari or Samarens, or Tzemarens.
11. Hamathi or Hamathens, or Chamathaus.

Of which the most renowned were the Hethites, Girgessites, Amorites, Henuites, Jebussites, and Perizzites: which Perizzites were descended of Zamari or Samarens, or from some 30 of his.

†. II.

Of the portions of Zidon and Heth.

Zidon the first borne of Canaan, built the famous City of Zidon in Phénicia, which afterward fell in partition to the Tribe of Affer: for Affer, Zabulon, and Nephthali had a great part of the ancient Phénicia distributed among them; but the Afferites could neuer obtaine Zidon it selfe.

The second sonne of Canaan was Heth or Cethus: of whom came the Hethites, or Hittites, one of those feuen principall Nations (Commanders of Canaan) appointed by God to be rooted out; namely, the Gergesites, the Amorites, the Canaanites, the Perizzites, the Hittites, and the Iebusites. The Hittites inhabited about Bersabe, and towards Hobron neere the Torrent Befor, and about Gerar, which Moses maketh the vtermost limit of Canaan, hauing the Defart of Pharan to the South: for about Bersabe (otherwise Puteus inuolumentis) foure miles from Gaza dwelt Heth and his Posterity, as far to the Northeast as Hebron, & Mamre, and of Ephraim the Hittite did Abraham buy the field of Sarahs buriall. Of which Nation Rebecca bewailed her selfe to Isaac, saying, That she was weary of her life for the Daughters of Heth. The Giants Anakim were of these Hittites, a strong & fierce Nation, whose entertainment by the kings of Israel against them the Syrians greatly feared: as in the fourth of the Kings; Israel hath hired against vs the Kings of the Hittites.

†. III.
Of the Iebusites and Amorites.

Iebusius, the third sonne of Canaan, of whom came the Iebusites, and whose principall seat was Iebus, (afterward Iherusalem) were also a valiant and stubborne Nation, and held their City and the Country neere it, till such time as Dauid by Gods assistance recovered both: yet were not the Iebusites extinguished, but were Tributaries to Salomon. Amoreus was the fourth sonne of Canaan, of whom the Amorites tooke name, who inhabited that Land to the East of Jordan below the Sea of Galilee, hauing Arnon and the Mountaines of Galaad on the East, and Jordan on the West: of whom Og (King of Basjan) and Sihon (ouerthrowne by Moses) were Princes.

The Amorites had also many other habitations disperfed within the bounds of Canaan: as behinde Libanus in the edge of Calefyria, or Syria Libanica. They had also their being in the Mountaines of Iuda, and in Idumea neere the Metropolis thereof, called Duma. And hereof it came that all the Canaanites were sometime called Amorites: as in Genesis the fifteenth: For the wickednesse of the Amorites is not yet full. And that this was also a powerfull Nation, wee finde in the Prophet Amos: Yet destroyed I the Amorite before them, whose height was like the height of a Cedar, and he was strong as the Oake.

†. IIII.
Of the Gergesites, Hittites, and Harkites.

The fifth sonne of Canaan was Gergesew or Gergesim, (otherwise Girgasi) who inhabited on the East side of the Lake of Tiberias, or the Sea of Galilee, where Protolmy sets the City Gerasa, which Iosephus calls Gefera, in the Territory of Decapolis. Here it was that Christ dispossest the possessed with Diuels; and the Gergesites desired him to depart their Coasts: because their Swine, filled with the euill spirits, drowned themselves in the Sea of Galilee. Gergesew also built Beitum (sometime Geri) afterward Felix Iulia, three miles from the Riuer Adonis in Phoenicia: in which the Romans held a Garrison: and to which Augustus gaue many large priuiledges.

Heuen the sixth sonne, and Father of the Hittites, inhabited vnder Libanus neere Emath. These Hittites, howeouer the Caphthorim expelled a good part of them (as in Deuteronomy the second is remembered) yet many of them remained all the warre of Iosua, and afterward to the time of Salomon. For God was not pleased vterly to root out these Nations, but they were sometimes made Tributaries to the Israelites, and at other times serued (in their falling away from the true worship of God) to assist them: for as it is written, Iudges the third: They remained to prone Israel by them, whether they would obey the Commandements of God.

The seuenth sonne was Aracens or Harki, who between the foote of Libanus and the Mediterran Sea, (ouer against Tripolis) built the City of Archa, Arce, or Arca, afterwards Arachis.

†. V.

†. V.
Of Sini and Arudi.

Sineus the eight son, Hierosolymitanus sets at Caparofa, which Protolmy findes in Iudea, not farre from Iebus: to the South thereof, saith Iunius. But it is more probable, that Sineus founded Sim, which S. Hierome calls Sim: Protolmy, Simyra: Mela and Pliny, Simyris: Brachard, Syon, (called Synochus) neere Arca. Pererius thinks that Sineus inhabited the Defarts of Sinai, or thereabout; but hereof there is no other certainty than the report of Brachard, who tooke view of all these places, affirming, that Sineus built Synochus, as Zidon built Zidon. There is also another Nation of Cini (written with the letter C. otherwise Kenzi) who descended of Hobab the son of Raguel the Madianite, who assisted the Israelites in their conduction through the Wildernes of Pharan. But these Cinai were admitted among the Israelites, and had a portion of Land with the Nephthalims, beside their habitations with the Amalekites: against these Cinai, Balaam prophced, that they should be destroyed by the Affyrans.

The ninth sonne was Aradus or Arnadus, who in the Ile of Aradus built the City Arados: opposite against which Iland on the Maine of Phenicia, they founded another City of that name, which for opposition was afterwards called Antaradus. To this City came S. Peter (saith Clement) & in this Ile preached the Gospell, and founded a Church in honour of our Lady: but wee finde no such worke of his in the Acts of the Apostles. Both these two were very famous, and places of skilfull Sea-men: whom Ezechiel remembreth in his prophecies against the Tyrians: The inhabitants of Zidon and Arad were they Mariners.

†. VI.
Of Zemari.

Of Samarus, or Zemari, the tenth sonne, there are diuers opinions. Some think that he inhabited in Calefyria at Edeffa, and founded Samaraim, which in Iosua is placed in the Tribe of Beniamin. There is also Samarajm (of the same Orthography) vpon the Mountaines of Ephraim (saith Beroaldus) mentioned in the second of Chronicles, c. 13. v. 4. which the Latins conuerteth amisse (saith he) by Semerom. The Hierosolymitan Paraphrast makes Samarus (of whom were the Perizzites) the parent of the Emissani, which Pliny calls the Hemisseni, in Calefyria; and it may be that it was their first habitation, and that they afterwards inhabited those other places before remembred. But that they founded Samarina, both the Hebrew Orthographie, and this place in the first of Kings (speaking of Omri) disproueth: And he bought the Mountaine Samaria or Shemerion of one Shemer, for two talents of silver, and built in the Mountaine; and called the name of the City which hee built, after the name of Shemer, Lord of the Mountaine, Samaria. But of all these places I shall speake more at large in the conquest of the holy Land, by the children of Israel. Of whomsoever the Samaritanes were descended, sure I am, that they were euer a perfidious Nation, and base: for as long as the state of the Iewes stood vp, they alwaies called themselves Iewes: when it suffered or sank, they then vterly denied to be of that Nation or Family; for at such time as they were returned from their first captiuitie, they became a mixt Nation; partly of the Colonies of the Affyrans, and partly of the Naturalls.

†. VII.
Of Hamathi.

The last of *Canaan*s sonnes was Hamathus, or (according to the Hebrew) Hamathi, of Hamath, (saith Beroaldus): of which (the aspiration taken away) the same is pronounced Emath, whereof Hamathus was present. Iosephus & Saint Hierome confound Emath with Antioch: not that Antioch which standeth on the Riuer Orontes, on the frontier of Comagena, betwene the Mountaine Cassius and the Prouince of Pieria, and Selencia, of which Saint Peter was Bishop, and in which Saint Luke and Ignatius were borne; but Antioch, surnamed Epiphania, as Beroaldus supposeth, which standeth betwene

Apamea and Emefa in Cassiotu. Yet, indeed, Emath cannot be taken for either: for both that Antioch vpon Orentes, and that which neighboureth Emefa, are farther off seated from Canaan, than euer any of those Nations straggled. And whereas S. Hierome setteth Emath, which he confoundeth with Epiphania, in the Tribe of Nephthali; it is manifest, that Epiphania, which standeth to the North of Emefa, hath all the Prouince of Laodicea betwene it and any part of the Land diuided. And if Libanon it selfe were not shared among the Tribes, then could not Epiphania belong vnto them: for both the Prouinces Laodicea and Libanica, are betwene Epiphania and any part of the holy Land: & therefore Emath so taken could not be a part of Nephthalis, as in the thirteenth of Iosua is directly proued. For Iosua counting the lands that remained vnposselt, reckoneth all Mount Libanon towards the Sunne-rising, from Baalgad vnder Mount Herman, vntill we come to Hamath. And this reason (among others) is vied, that Emath was not in Nephthalim, or any way belonging to the children of Israel: becaufe Dauid accepted the presents of Tob King of Emath, and (therewithall) conditions of peace: which hee would not haue done, if that Territory had euer belonged to the children of Israel, but would haue recovered it without composition, and by strong hand, as he did the rest. But this Argument (as I take it) hath no great weight. For if the promise which God made, be considered, as it is written in Deuteronomy, then might Emath bee comprehended, though seated altogether without the bounds of the Land promised, according to the description of Moses and Iosua: for Emath is indeede situate on the other side of the Mountaine of Herman,²⁰ which ioyneth to Libanus: and is otherwise called Iturea. But whereas Hamath is named in Iosua the 19.^{v.35}. and written in the Latine conuersion Emath, therein (saith Beralaw) was S. Hierome mistaken. Emath or Iturea is that ouer the Mountaines, and the City in Nephthalim should be written Hamath: and so the Septuagint (vnderstanding the difference) write it Ammath and not Emath, the same which indeede belonged to the Nephthalims, seated on the South side of Libanus, to the East of Alejdin: which City S. Hierome writes Emath; Iosephus Hamath; others, Emathin, or Amathicoz, and the people Amathin, of which (as I take it) Rab Jaceb vaunteth in the second of Kings: where is the god of Hamath?

Of the sonnes of Chush (excepting Nimrod,) of whom hereafter.

That most of the fountes of Chush were seated in Arabia the Happy: and of the Sabaeans that robbed Iob: and of the Queene that came to Salomon.

Seba or Sabas was the eldest sonne of Chusb, the eldest sonne of Ham; to make a difference between Him and his Nephew Sheba, the sonne of his brother Raama, or Regma (or Regma after Montanus: his name is written with a single (S) Samuech, and Sheba the sonne of Regma with an (S) asperate, which is the Hebrew Schin. Seba the eldest sonne of Chusb, Regma his brother, and Sheba the sonne of Regma, possit both the shores of Arabia Felix. Sabas took that part toward the Red Sea, as next to his Father Chusb, and the Land of the Chusites: Regma and Sheba the East coast of the same Arabia, which looketh into the Gulfe of Persia, of which Pliny: Sabas Arabum populi, propter thura clarissimi ad vitra, maria porrectis gentibus habitans; The Sabaeans people of Arabia, famous for their Frankincense, extending their Nations, dwell along both the Seas, (to wit) the Persian, and the Arabian, or Red Sea. This Countrey was afterwards called Arabia, a populi mixtionis, faith Poplicus. To this agreeeth Ptolomy, who setteth the City of Seba towards the Arabian or Red Sea, and the City Rhegama towards the Persian, with whom also we may leaue Sabas: for so much Montanus gathereth out of Ptolomy, because because he remembreth a (Nation called Stabei) neere the Persian Sea; and Massabthe which defended the same. But Montanus hath sent Regma, or (as he calls him) Rhama into Carmathia, for which I see no reason. Iosephus, who's only attended his owne fancies, hath banished Saba or Seba to the border of Ethiopia. But Beroaldus thinks it strange, that the Sabei, which stole away Iobs Cattel, should runne through all Egypt, and all Arabia Petrea, and finde out Iob in Tracomon, betwene Palafinā and Caele Syria 1200 miles off. Now, as this coniecture was more than ridiculous, so do I thinke, that neither the Sabei on the Red Sea, nor those toward the Persian Sea, could by any meanes execute the Reaith vpon Iob, which fouer Beroaldus shall take for necesse. But these were the Sabei of Arabia the Defart, where Gaillardinus Melchior affirmeth out of his owne experience, that the Citie Saba is feated: the same which Ptolomeus calls Saur, now Semifacsa; and from this Saba in Arabia the Defart, came those Magi, or Wise men which worshipped Chrijf, faith Melchior, whose words are these: The Magi came neither out of Mesopotamia (as Chrysostomus, Hierome, and Ambrose supposed) nor out of Arabia the Happie, as many wise men doe beleene, but out of Saba in Arabia the Defart: which Citie when my selfe was there, was (as Tinedy yet) called Semifacsa. And to approve this opinion of Gaillardinus, it appeareth that these Sabei were neighbours to Iob, and lay fit to invade and rob him. For both the other Nations (as well those on the Persian Sea, as those on the Red Sea) are so dis-ioyned with large Defarts, as there is no possibilitie for strangers to passe them, especially with any numbers of Cattell, both in respect of the Mountaines, of the sands; and of the extreme want of water in those parts: Vbi nec homines, nec bestia videntur, nec aënes, imò nec arbores, nec gramen aliquod, sed non nisi montes saxosi, altissimi, asperimus; Where there are found neither men, nor beasts, no not so much as birds, or trees, nor any pasture or grasse, but only sterpe, and high stonie, and craggy mountaines: Beroaldus and Peterius conceiue, that the Queene of Saba which came to visit Salomon, was of the Sabei on the East side of Arabia Felix; but the contrarie seemeth more probable, and that she was Queene of Saba towardes the Red Sea: for Salomon at that time commanding all that part of Arabia Petrea, twist Idamia and the Red Sea, as farre downe as Midian or Madian, and Ezian Gaber: and this Queene of Saba which inhabited the West part of Arabia Felix, being his neighbour, might without any farre trouble enter his Territories, free from all danger of surpris by any other Prince or Nation.

30 But to avoid tediousnesse, it is manifest that Seba or Saba, Saba, Raama, or Rezma, with his Sonnes Sheba and Dedan, and Sabteca, were all the possellers of Arabia the Happy, & the Defart: onely Hauilah & Nimrod dwelt together on the East side of Chubis, who held Arabia Petraea. Now for Saba, there is found of his name the Citie of Sabbatha or Sabota in the fame Arabia of which both Plinie and Ptolomie, who withall nameth Sabotale, Plin. l. vi. c. 14.

ly repeated in the Chapter of Paradise. For Iosephus his fancies, that Saba was the parent of the *Ethiopi*ans about Meroe, and Sabta of the *Ethiopi*ans Assabari, they be not worthie any farther answer than hath already beene giuen: especially seeing these Citie s, preferring the memorie of the names of Saba, & of Sabain Arabia, were yet remaining in Ptolomies time, though in some letters changed. As also in the coasts adioyning, the names of other of the brethren of the familie of Cush, with little alterations are preferued. In Arabia the Defart is found the Citie Saba or Saua, (now Semifacac) with the Citie of Rhegana for Rhegma; & the Nation by Ptolomie himselfe called Raabei or Raa- mab. In Arabia the Happie is found the Citie of Rhegama, and Rabana; which also keep-eth the sound of Rhegma, the Citie of Saptha or Saptab, not farre from the East-coast of Arabia: as also the Metropolis and chiefe Citie in the bodie of the South part of Arabia, called without difference or alteration Sabbatha; and to the West of Sabbatha towards the 50 Red Sea the great Citie of Saba; and the Nation adioyning, Sabai: and to the South thereof againe toward the straight entrance of the Red Sea, the Region of Saba. To all these his Brothers and Nephewes which were seated on the East side of Arabia, Hauilah by the passage of Tioris was a neighbour, to whom hee might passe by Boate euen vnto Rhegma the Citie of Raama, or Rhegma, let were the Riuer of Lar towards the mouth of the Persian Sea, which stood in Ptolomies time.

Ioſephus his opinion of Dedan, one of the iſſue of Chufb, to haue been ſeated in the Weſt Aethiopia, diſſonant out of Ezechiel and Hieremie.

And whereas Ioſephus (whom in this S. Hierome followeth, as not curious herein) ſent Dedan the ſon of Raamah into Weſt Aethiopia, it is ſtrange that Ezechiel ſhould couple Sheba, Raamah, and Dedan together; Dedan in the 15. Verſe, and Sheba, and Raamah in the 22. Verſe, to be the Merchants of Tyre, if Dedan had dwelt in Weſt Aethiopia, which is diſtant from Raamah (the habitation of his father and brother) about foure thouſand miles. Beſides which, the merchandiſe that the Dedanites brought to Tyre doth not make them naked Blacke-moorees. For they of Dedan (ſaith Ezechiel) were they Merchants in precious clothes for thy Chariots; and theſe Weſterne Aethiopians neuer ſaw cloth, till the Portugals, ſeeking thoſe Coaſts, traded with them: the merchandiſe of the Countrey being Hides, Elephants teeth, ſome Gold and Amber, Ciuet Cats, and Rice, but nothing at all of any manufacture: and all theſe they exchanged for linnen, or yron chiefly.

But in thoſe dayes the Weſt part of Africa within the body of the land was knowne onely by imagination: and, being vnder the burnt Zone, was held vninhabitable. And therefore that the Negroes of the Weſt Aethiopia, which inhabit about Serra Liona, or Niger, could either paſſe by Sea or Land to Tyre, in the bottome of the Mediterranean Sea, 20 were a ſtrange, or rather a fooliſh fancy. Now to put it out of diſpute that Dedan alſo dwelt by the reſt of the children of Chufb, which ſeates they held by that name in the time of Hieremy the Prophet, let vs heare Hieremy his owne words: Fly, ye Inhabitants of Dedan, for I haue brought the deſtruction of Eſau vpon him. Heereby it appeareth, that Dedan was a Neighbour to the Idumeans: and Idumea is a Province of Arabia Petrea: and Dedan which dwelt on the North part of Arabia felix, ioyned in that part to Petrea, the ſeat of his Grand-father Chufb; which neighbourhood and fellowſhip of Dedan and the Idumeans, is alſo confirmed by Ezechiel: I will ſtretch out my hand vpon Edom, and deſtroy Man and Beaſt out of it, and I will make it deſolate from Teman: and they of Dedan ſhall fall by the ſword.

§. XIII.

Of the iſſue of Mizraim: and of the place of Hieremie, Chap. 9. Verſ. 7.

The termination in the Hebrew, is commonly a ſigne of the plural number, as in the dual.

Ezech. 16. 29.

After Chufb it followeth to ſpeake of Mizraims ſonnes, whoſe names (ſaith Saint Auguſtine) were plural, to ſignifie the Nations, which came of them. Ludim, the elder ſonne of Mizraim, was the Father of the Lybians in Africa: and the reſt of his Brothers diſperſed themſelues into all the Regions adioyning. Among the ſons of Shem there is alſo Lud; but hee is diſſerenced from Lud the ſonne of Mizraim by the ſingular number: the ſonne of Shem being written Lud, the ſonne of Mizraim, Ludim; and yet theſe Names and Nations are often confounded, notwithstanding the apparent difference both of Names and Nations. For that Ludim the ſonne of Mizraim was the parent of the Lybians in Africa, and that he was ſeated not farre from Mizraim his father, appeareth by the Prophet Hieremy, who ioyneth them in this ſort together: Come ye ſee Horſes, and ſee ye Chariots, and let the valiant men ſo forth, the black-moorees, and the Lybians which beare the ſhield: for thoſe Nations aſſiſted the Egyptians, being of one parent deſcended. And in Ezechiel, Phut & Lud are ioyned together: Aethiopia (or Chufb) ſaith Ezechiel, 6. 30. v. 3. and Phut and Lud, and all the common people, and the men of the Land that are in league ſhall fall with them by the ſword: which is as much to ſay, as the ſons of Chufb, (which were the Chufites) the ſonnes of Mizraim, (which were the Egyptians) and the Lybians (deſcended of his ſonne Lud) with other the inhabitants of Egypt and Africa, ſhall fall together. Hieroſolymitanus finds alſo in Africa a Nation of the Lydians, and I beſeech it: becauſe Hieremy ioyneth the Lybians, and Lydians together in the place before remembred. But Libya in Africa is by the Hebrewes called Ludim (ſaith Arius Montanus) though 2. Chron. 12. 3. they ſeeme to be called Lubim or Lubei, a name ſomewhat neerer the word Lybies, and by which it may ſeeme that the true writing is, not Lybies, but Lybies. Neither is it here to be omitted, that Pintus (vpon the thirtieth of Ezechiel) vnderſtandeth that which is ſpoken in the third Verſe of Lud, not to be meant of the Lybians at all: for he will haue this threatening to be meant againſt the people of Lyda, a City (ſaith he) between Egypt and Paleſtina, which opinion I could not miſlike if the City of Lyda were ſo ſeated. But Lyda (which ſhould be written Lydda with a double D, and is the ſame City which was afterward Doſpolis, in which S. Peter cured Enias of the palsy) ſtandeth neere the Torrent Gaas, not farre from Iſſeppe the Port of Hieruſalem. Yet it is not impoſſible but that this City might haue Lud for the Founder. For there are many Cities of one name founded in all the Regions of the World, and farre aſunder; as after the names of Alexander, Seleucus, and Antiochus, many Cities called Alexandria, Selencia, and Antiochia, ſo of diuers others. St. Hierome maketh Lehabim to be the Father of Libya, who was the third ſonne of Mizraim: and ſo doth Poſtellus; and either opinion may be true.

The reſt of Mizraims ſonnes haue no proper Countries giuen them in the Scriptures, ſauiug Caſubim and Caphtorim, of whom came the Philiftins, whom the Scriptures call Peleſet.

Theſe Caſubim inhabited Caſiotia, a Region lying in the entrance of Egypt from Paleſtina, in which the Lake Sirbonis, and the Mountaine Caſius are found: not farre from whence Pompey was buried.

Caphtorim ſeated neere Caſubim in that Tract of Egypt called Sethrois, not farre from Peluſium. Strabo calls it Sethrois, Stephanus, and Pliny, Sethroitis, of the City Sethron: which Ortelius takes to be the ſame which Ptolemy calls Hierocles parua. Of the Caſubim and Caphtorim came the Philiftins, which are called by the Septuaginta Allophyli (which is) Alienigenae, Strangers, or of a ſtrange kindred. Theſe Philiftins inhabited the South part of the holy Land towards Egypt, of whom Paleſtina tooke name. For the Hebrewes (ſaith Iſidore) doe not vſe the letter (P) but in ſtead of it (ph) Their principall Cities were Gaza, Aſcalon, Azotus, Geth, and Accaron: and the people of them called Gaſai, Aſcalonites, Azotij, Gethai, and Accaronites: Iſidore affirms, that Aſcalon was firſt called Philiftim; and of that City the Country adioyning. But where Iſidore had it, I know not.

The firſt knowne King of the Philiftins was that Abimelech, who had a liking to Abrahams wife: with whom Abraham made a couenant and league. This Abimelech dwelt indeed at this time in Gerar; but it is written that hee was alſo King of the Philiftins, in theſe words: Wherefore Isaac went to Abimelech King of the Philiftins vnto Gerar. Now in reſpect that this or ſome ancienter Abimelech gouerned the commonwealth greatly to his glory, the reſt of his ſucceſſors called themſelues by the ſame name. The Philiftins commanded that Tract of land vpon the Mediterranean Sea to the Northward, from the Caſtle of Pilgrims (otherwiſe Caſarea Paleſtina, or Stratons Towre) which was the South-border of Phenicia, to Gaza, or to the Riuer of Egypt. The Anakims or ſtrong Gyants were of theſe Philiftins: & Goliath was of Geth, one of the five Cities aboue named. They had ſometimes ſue Kings, ſaith Lyranus. They maſtered the Iſraelites at ſeueral times about 150. yeeres, and kept them Tributaries, till they were weakened by Sampſon and Samuel; but in the end this yoke was taken off by David, and laid on themſelues.

It is objected, that becauſe theſe Cities & the Countries adioyning, were held by the ſonnes of Mizraim, therefore did the Iſraelites diſpoſſeſſe the ſonnes of Mizraim, and not of Canaan, by forcing thoſe places.

To this faith Pererius, that although the Paleſtines or Philiftins held it in the time of Deuteronomy. The Heuites dwell in the Villages vnto Gaza. And what maruaile, if the Canaanites being the greater part, the denomination were from them? For that the Philiftins were of Caphtor, and ſo of Mizraim and not of Canaan, beſides Moſes, the Prophet Hieremy witneſſeth: The Lord will deſtroy the Philiftins: the remnant of the iſſue of Caphtor: and in like manner in the ninth of Amos, the Philiftins are ſaid to be the reliques of Caphtorim: Hane not I brought up Iſrael out of the land of Egypt, and the Philiftins from Caphtor, and Aram from Kir? ſo I read this place with diuers of the learned. For where as the Vulgar hath, & Paleſtines de Cappadocia, & Syros de Cyrene, this conuerſion Berochus condemneth, where Caphtor is taken for Cappadocia, and Cyrene for Kir. For Cyrene is a City directly Weſt from Egypt, betwene Ptolemais on Barce and Apollonia: but Kir in Aſia vnder the Affyrians; Iſidorus hath it Kir, and not Cyrene: and ſo hath the Geneus.

cap. 16. v. 9.

But Pererius calls Caphtorim Cappadocia, according to the Vulgar translation, to which he is bound: & yet it is not altogether improbable if he mean Cappadocia in Palästina, and not that Cappadocia by the Sea Pontus in the North of Asia the lesse. For whether they inhabited Sethreites, or Cappadocia of Palästina, it is not certainly knowne. And sure in this manner he may expound Cappadocia to be ambiguous, as well as he doth Cyrene: taking it here not for Cyrene in Africa, but for a place in Media. For it is written in the second of Kings, that Teglatphalaser king of the Assyrians carried away the Inhabitants of Damascus into Kir: and so Iosephus seemes to vnderstand this Kir for Cyrene in Media, calling this Cyrene, Media Superior: for it was the manner and policy of the Assyrians to transplant the people conquered by them, as they did the Samaritans or Israelites, and other Nations. And hereof it came that Kir was called Syro-Media: because the Syrians by the Assyrians were therein captiued.

§. X V.
Of the issue of SEM.

†. I.
Of Elim, Assur, Arphaxad, and Lud.

It remaineth lastly to speake of the Sons of Sem, who are these:

1. Alam, or Elam,
2. Assur,
3. Arphaxad,
4. Lud, and
5. Aram.

THe posterity of Sem, Moses recounteth after the rest: because from them he proceedeth in order with the Genealogie and Story of the Hebrewes: (For of Sem was Abraham descended.)

Of these five sonnes, the Scriptures remember the length of the life of Arphaxad only, and only the children of him & Aram, the rest are barely spoken of by rehearfall of their names, sauing that it may be gathered, that Assur (who was supposed to found Nineue) was also said to be the Father of the Assyrians, whose issues, and the issues of Cham, instantly contended for the Empire of the East: which sometimes the Assyrians, sometimes the Babylonians obtained, according to the vertue of their Princes. This is the common opinion, which also teacheth vs, that all the East parts of the World were peopled by Assur, Elam, and Lud (sauiing India) which I beleue Noah himselfe first inhabited: and to whom Ophir and Hanilah the sons of Isdan afterward repaired. His filij Sem ab Eufrate flumio partem Asiæ vsq; ad Oceanum Indicum tenuerunt: The sons of Sem (saith S. Hierome) held all these Regions from Euphrates to the Indian Ocean.

Of Elam came the Elamites, remembered, Acts 2. vers. 9. and the Princes of Persia; which name then began to be out of vse and lost, when the Persians became Masters of Babylonia: the East Monarchy being established in them. Some prophane Writers distinguish Elam from Persia, and make the Elamites a people apart. But Susa (which the Scriptures call Susan) in Elam was the kings seat of Persia (witnesseth Daniel.) And I saw (saith he) in a vision, and when I saw it, I was in the Palace of Susa, which is in the Province of Elam: This City is embraced by the Riuer Eulæus (according to Ptolomy) in Daniel, Malai: and seated in the border of Susiana.

Assur (as most Historians beleue) the second son of Sem, was Father of the Assyrians, who disdaining the pride of Nimrod, parted from Babel, and built Nineue, of equal beauty and magnitude with Babylon, or exceeding it. But we shall in due place disprove that opinion: Every mans hand hath bene in this Story, and therefore I shall not need herein to speake much: For the Assyrians so often invaded and spoiled the Israelites, destroyed their Cities, and led them Captiues, as both in Divine & Humane letters there is large and often mention of this Nation.

But howbeit Herodotus and D. Siculus extend this Empire, and honour this Nation with with ample Dominion; yet was not the state of the Assyrians of any such power, after such time as Sardanapalus lost the Empire. For Senacherib who was one of the powerfullest Princes among them, had yet the Mountain Taurus for the utmost of his Dominion toward the North-east, and Syria bounded him toward the West, notwithstanding these vaunts of Senacherib in Esay the 37. Have the gods of the Nations delivered them? whom my Fathers have destroyed? as Gozan, and Haran, and Reseph, and the children of Eden which were at Telaasar? Where is the King of Hamath, and the King of Arphad, and the King of the City Sepharuaim, Hema and Inab? All these were indeede but petty Kings of Cities, and small Countries, as Haran in Mesopotamia: Reseph in Palmyrena: Hamath or Emath in Itura, vnder Libanus: the Isle of Eden: Sepher, and others of this sort. Yea, Nabuchodonosor, who was most powerfull, before the conquest of Egypt, had but Chaldea, Mesopotamia, and Syria, with Palästina and Phenicia parts thereof. But in this question of Assur, I will speake my opinion freely when I come to Nimrod, whose plantation I haue omitted among the rest of the Chusites, because hee established the first Empire: from whom the most memorable story of the World taketh beginning.

Of Arphaxad came the Chaldeans, saith Saint Hierome, and Iosephus; but it must be those Chaldeans about Vr: for the sonnes of Cham posselt the rest. It is true that he was the Father of the Hebrewes: for Arphaxad begat Shela, and Shela, Heber: of whom hereafter.

And that Lud, the fourth son of Sem, gaue name to the Lydians in Asia the lesse, is the common opinion, taken from Iosephus and S. Hierome; but I see not by what reason he was moued to straggle thither from his friends.

†. II.
Of Aram, and his Sonnes.

Aram the fifth and last Son of Sem was the parent of the Syrians: of which Damascus was head. Their name was changed from Aram or Aramites by Syrus (saith Eusebius out of Iosephus) which Syrus liued before Moses was borne; the same which others call the sonne of Apollo. Mesopotamia also being but a Province of Syria, had the name of Aram Naharajim, which is as much to say; as Syria duorum fluminum, Syria compassed with two Riues, (to wit) Tigris and Euphrates. The Scriptures call it Mesopotamia, Syria, and Padan Aram: and the Greekes Mesopotamia simply.

Arise and get thee to Padan Aram (saith Isaac to Jacob) to the house of Bethuel thy mothers father, and thence take thee a wife. Strabo also remembereth it by the ancient name of Aram or Aramea, as these his owne words conuerted witness: Quos nos Syros vocamus, ipsi Syri Aramensis & Arameos vocant; Those which we call Syrians (saith hee) themselves call Arameni and Arameans.

Against this opinion, that Aram the sonne of Sem was the Father and Denominator of the Syrians in generally, (and not onely of those in Syria Inter-amnis, which is Mesopotamia) some reade, Gen. 2. 21. Kemuel, the Father of the Syrians: where other out of the originall read Kemuel, the sonne of Aram. Neither is it any inconuenience for vs to vnderstand the word (Aram) here, not for the Nation, but for the name of some one of note; the rather, because in the History of Abraham and Isaac (which was in time long before Kemuel's Posterity could be famous) we finde Mesopotamia called Aram; and that with an addition: sometimes with Naharajim, and sometimes of Padan, to distinguish it from another Aram, which (as it seemes) then also was called Aram. For whereas Iunius thinks in his notes vpon Gen. 25. 20. that Padan Aram ought to be restrained to some part of Mesopotamia, (to wit) to that part which Ptolomy calls Ancobanitis (so called from the Riuer Chaboras, which diuiding it, runneth into Euphrates) the promiscuous vse of Padan Aram, and Aram Naharajim (which latter appellation questionlesse comprehendeth the whole Mesopotamia) may seem to refute this opinion: especially seeing the signification of this appellation agreeth with the whole Region. For it signifieth as much as the yoke of Syria, which name agrees with this Region: because the two Riues, (as it were) yoked together goe along it. The Reliques of the name Padan appeare in the name of two Cities in Ptolomy, called Aphadana: (as Iunius hath well noted) the one vpon Chaboras, the other vpon Euphrates.

The Sonnes of Aram were,

Vz or Hus,
Hul, Gether, and Mefch or Mes.

Hierom in trad. Vz or Hus inhabited about Damascus, and built that City; saith Iosephus and St. Hierom. But Tollarius mistaking this opinion, both in them and in Lyra, who also followeth Iosephus, affirmeth that Abrahams Steward Eliezer was the Pounder thereof; though it were likely that Hus the eldest son of Aram dwelt neare vnto his father, who inhabited the body of Syria. For Hus was a Region of the same, adioyning to Arabia the Desert, & to Balanea or Tracanis: whereof the Prophet Hieremy: Reioyce and be glad O Daughter of Edom that dwellest in the Land of Hus. Hus therefore is seated beyond Jordan, in the East Region of Tracanis, adioyning to Basan, hauing Balanea Gaulonitis, and the Mountaine Serr to the East, Edrai to the South, Damascus North, and Jordan West: hauing in it many Cities and people, as may also be gathered out of Hieremy: And all sorts of people: and all the kings of the Land of Hus. In this Region dwelt Ieb, descended of Hus, the son of Nahor, the brother of Abraham (saith S. Hierome) and married Dina the Daughter of Iacob, saith Philo.

cap. 4. ver. 21.

cap. 25. ver. 10.

Hul the second son of Aram, S. Hierome makes the Father of the Armenians: and Gether the third son, parent to the Acarnanians or Carians: which opinion, (because I finde not where to set him) I do not disproue, though I see no reason why Gether should leaue the fellowship of his owne brethren, and dwell among Strangers in Asia the lesse. Iunius giues Hul (whom he writes Chul) the Desert of Palmyrena, as far as Euphrates, where Ptolomy setteth the City of Chelle.

Gether (saith Iosephus) founded the Bactrians: but Iosephus gaue all Noahs children feathers, to carry them far away in all haste. For mine own opinion, I alwaies keep the rule of Neighbourhood, and thinke with Iunius (to wit) That Gether seated himselfe neare his brothers, in the body of Syria, and in the Prouince of Cassitis, and Selencis, where Ptolomy placeth Gindarus, and the Nation by Pliny called Gindareni.

Iunius also giueth to Mes or Mefch the North part of Syria, betwene Cilicia and Mesopotamia, neare the Mountaine Mafius. The certainty of those Plantations can no otherwise be knowne than by this probability, that Aram the father, (of whom that great Region took name) planted his sons in the same Land about him: for he wanted no scope of Territory for himselfe and them; neither then when the World was newly planted, nor in many hundred yeares after: and therefore there is no reason to cast them in the Desert parts of the World, so far asunder. And as necessity and policy held them together for a while: so Ambition (which began together with Angels and Men) inhabiting the hearts of their children, set them asunder. For although these sons of Aram, and the sons of the rest of Noahs children, kept themselves within the bounds of some one large Kingdome, yet therein euery one also sought a Prouince apart, & to themselves; giuing to the Cities therein built their own names, thereby to leaue their memory to their Posterity: the vse of Letters being then rare, and knowne to few.

In this sort did the pride of the Spaniards in America cast them into so many Prouinces: euery one emulating and disdainning the greatnesse of other, as they are thereby to this day subiect to inuasion, expulsion, and destruction: so as Noua Hispania and Peru excepted, because those Countries are vnaccessible to Strangers) an easie force will cast them out of all the rest.

Chap. 8. §. 7.

Mes the fourth son is made the parent of the Mæonians: of whom something hath bin spoken already. Arphaxad the third son of Shem, begat Shelah, and Heber. Heber had two sons, Phaleg and Iofan: and in Phalegs time was the Earth diuided.

f. III.

Of the diuision of the Earth in the time of Phaleg, one of the sonnes of Heber, of the issue of Sem.

THE many people which at the diuision (at Phalegs birth) were then liuing, and the through Plantation of all the East part of the World (at his death) hath made a doubt, whether the Earth were diuided at eyther. The Hebrewes (saith Pererius out of Sedar Holam, one of their Chronicles) affirm that this partition happened at the death of Phaleg: and Phaleg was borne in the yeare after the Flood, 1011, and liued in all 239. yeares, which numbers added makes 340. And therefore was it so many yeares after the Flood, ere the children of Noah seuered themselves. But to this opinion of the Hebrewes, and the doubt they make how in so few yeares as 1011. (the time of Phalegs birth) so many people could be increased, Pererius giues this answer, That if 70. persons of the Family of Iacob increased to 600000. fighting men in 215. yeares, (besides women, children, and impotent persons) how much more is it likely, that so soone after the Flood the children of Noah might in a shorter time bring forth many multitudes, hauing receiued the blessing of God, Increase and multiply, and fill the earth? What strength this answer hath, let others iudge: for the children of Israel were 70. and had 215. yeares time: and the sons of Noah were but three, and had but 1011. yeares of time, to the birth of Phaleg.

Others conceiue that Phaleg tooke that name after the diuision, in memory thereof: as Iosephus and Saint Augustine, who reason in this manner. If the diuision were at Phalegs death (which hapned in the yeare, which is commonly held to be the 48. of Abraham, but was by more likely computation 12 yeares before his birth) then was the diuision 38. yeares after Ninus, who gouerned 52. yeares: in the 43. yeare of whose reigne Abraham was borne. But when Ninus began to rule the Assyrians, 80. yeares before this diuision (as this diuision is placed by the Hebrewes, Hierome and Chrysostome) then was the earth so peopled in all the East and Northerne parts, as greater numbers haue not bene found at any time since. For Ninus associating to himselfe Aricus King of Arabia, a people who at that time (saith Diod. Siculus) plurimum opibus atq; armis præstabant, Excecdæ both in riches and bodies of men, subdued many Cities in Armenia; receiued Barzani into grace; then invaded Media, and crucified Pharnus the King thereof, with his Wife and seuen Children; vanquished all those Regions between Nilus and Tanau, the Egyptians, Phœnicians, the Kingdoms of Syria, and all the Nations of Persia, to the Hyrcanian Sea. For the numbers which followed Ninus (already remembered out of Ctesias) against Zoroaster and others: and Zoroaster on the other side, who made resistance with 400000. proue it sufficiently, that if the diuision had not happened before the death of Phaleg, there had needed no diuision at that time at all. For some of them were so ill satisfied with their partitions, as they fought to be masters of all, and greater Armies were there neuer gathered than by Ninus and Semiramis: wherefore in this opinion there is little appearance of the truth.

But for that conceit that if the diuision had bene made at the birth of Phaleg, there were not then sufficient numbers borne to fill the earth: It was neuer meant that the earth could be filled euery where at the very instant, but by times and degrees. And surely whatsoever mens opinions haue bene heerein, yet it is certaine, that the diuision of tongues and of men must goe neere together with the ceasing of the worke at Babel: and that the enterprize of Babel was left off instantly vpon the confusion of Languages, where followed the execution of the diuision; and so neyther at the birth nor death of Phaleg: for Phaleg was borne in the yeare 1011. after the Flood, which was the yeare that Nimrod came into Shinar, or ten yeares after he arriued, saith Berosus.

Now if it be objected that Phaleg (the Etymologie of whose name signifieth diuision) must haue liued without a name, except the name had bene giuen him at the time of this confusion and partition: to this objection it may be answered, That the change of names vpon diuers accidents is not rare in the Scriptures: for Iacob was called Israel after he had wrestled with the Angel; Abraham was first Abram; and Edom Esau; and that Phaleg being a principall man in this diuision had his first name vpon this accident changed, it is most probable.

And lastly, whereas the Hebrewes, Saint Hierome and Chrysostome account Heber for a great Prophet, if that by giuing his sonne the name of Phaleg, hee fore-told the diuision which followed: to this I say, I doe not finde that Heber deserued any such honour, if hee had thereupon so called his sonne: for diuision and disperfion followeth increase of people of necessity; and this Prophecie (if any such had bene) might also haue reference to the diuision, which afterwards fell amongst the Hebrewes themselves.

But if we giue a reasonable time to the building of the Towre and City of Babel, in which time many people (by reason and by demonstratiue prooffe) might be increased; and that vpon the fall thereof the confusion and diuision followed (whereupon Phelag tooke name) then in this opinion there is nothing either curious or monstrous.

†. IV.

Of the sonnes of Ioctan, the other sonne of Heber.

1. Elmodad.
2. Salaph, or Salap, or Sheleph.
3. Asmath, or Chatzar.
4. Iare, or Iaraab, or Ierath.
5. Hadoram.
6. Vzal, or Vzal.
7. Dicklach, or Diela.
8. Obal, or Ebal, or Hobal.
9. Abimael.
10. Sheba, or Seba.
11. Ophir, or Opir.
12. Hauilah, or Chauila, and 13. Iobab.

The sons of Ioctan were

ALL those sons of Ioctan (according to Saint Hierome) dwelled in the East parts of the world, or India, euen from the Riuer Copie or Chons, which is one of the branches or heads of Indus.

GEN. 10. 30.

But the certaine places of those thirteene Sons cannot be gathered out of the Scriptures, the words of Moses being generall: And their dwelling was from Mesba as thou goest vnto Separ a Mount in the East. Of all these thirteene Sons, there were onely three memorable, (to wit) Sheba, Ophir, and Hauilah. Concerning whose names, to auoid confusion, it is to be obserued, that among the sons of Chus, two of them had also the names of Sheba and Hauilah. Abraham had also a third Saba or Sheba, his grand-child by his wife Ketura. But Seba the sonne of Chus, and Sheba the sonne of Rhegma his Nephew, we haue left in Arabia Felix: and Hauilah the son of Chus vpon Tigris. Saba the grand-child of Abraham was (as some haue thought) the Father of the Sabeans in Persia: of which Nations Dionysius de Orbis situ, maketh mention. Primum Sabes; post hos sunt Passagarde; prope vero hos sunt Tasci: The first are Sabeans: after these be Passagarde; and neere these the Tasci. And whereas it is written: But vnto the Sonnes of the Concubines which Abraham had, Abraham gaue gifts, and sent them away from Iaac his sonne (while he yet liued) Eastward to the East-Country: hereupon it is supposed, that this Saba the sonne of Abraham, wandered into Persia: for Persia was accounted the furthermost East-Country in respect of Iudra; which also Ouid setteth vnder the Sun-rising. Yet seeing the rest of Abraham's sons leaied themselves on the borders of Iudra, I rather choofe to leaue Saba the son of Abraham in Arabia the Defart, where Ptolomy setteth a City of that name.

τὸν δὲ μέγαν

καὶ ταξίδιον
ἀνέβη.

But Saba the sonne of Ioctan, the son of Heber, (as I conceiue) inhabited India it selfe. For Dionysius Afer in his Periegesis, (or description of the World) which hee wrote in Greeke Verse, among the Regions of India findeth a Nation called the Sabei. Taxilis has inter medios habitat; Sabaum; In the middle of these dwell the Sabei, and the Taxilis, saith this Dionysius.

†. V.

Of Ophir one of Ioctan's sonnes, and of Peru, and of that voyage of Salomon.

Ophir also was an Inhabitant of the East India, and (as S. Hierome vnderstandsit) in one of the Ilands plentifull with gold, which are now known by the name of Moluccae. Iosephus vnderstandsit Ophir to be one of those great head-lands in India, which by a generall name are called Chersonesi, or Peninsula: of which there are two very notorious; Calicut and Malacon. Pererius takes it rightly for an Iland, as Saint Hierome doth, but but he sets it at the head-land of Malacca. But Ophir is found among the Moluccae farther East.

Aries Montanus out of the second of Chronicles, the third Chapter and sixth Verse, gathers that Ophir was Peru in America, looking into the West Ocean, commonly called Maare del Sur, or the South Sea; by others Mare pacificum. The words in the second of the Chronicles are these: And hee ouer-layed the house with precious stones for beantie; and the gold was gold of Paruaim. Iunius takes this gold to bee the gold of Hauilah, remembered by Moses in the description of Paradise: And the gold of that Land is good: finding a Towne in Characene a Province of Susiana called Barbatia; so called (as he thinks) by corruption for Paruaim: from whence those Kings subiected by Dauid, brought this gold, with which they presented him; and which Dauid preferred for the enriching of the Temple.

GEN. 11. 6.
¶ 11. 6. c. 18.

But this fancy of Peru hath deceiued many men, before Montanus, and Plesius, who also tooke Ophir for Peru. And that this question may be a subiect of no further dispute, it is very true that there is no Region in the World of that name: sure I am, that at least America hath none, no not any City, Village, or Mountain so called. But when Franciscus Pizarro first discovered those Lands to the South of Panama, arriuing in that Region which Arabaliba commanded (a Prince of magnificence, Riches and Dominion inferior to none) some of the Spaniards vtterly ignorant of that language, demanding by signes (as they could) the name of the Country, and pointing with their hand athwart a Riuer, or Torrent, or Brooke that ranne by, the Indians answered Peru, which was either the name of that Brooke, or of water in general. The Spaniards thereupon conceiuing that the people had rightly vnderstood them, set it downe in the Diurnall of their enterprise, and so in the first description made, and sent ouer to Charles the Emperour, all that West part of America to the South of Panama had the name of Peru, which hath continued euer since, as diuers Spaniards in the Indies assured me; which also Acosta the Iesuite in his naturall and morall History of the Indies confirmeth. And whereas Montanus also findeth that a part of the Indies (called Iucatan) tooke that name of Ioctan, who as hee supposed navigated from the vtmost East of India to America: it is most true, that Iucatan is nothing else in the language of that Countrey, but [what is that] or [what say you?] For when the Spaniards ask'd the name of that place (no man conceiuing their meaning) one of the Saluages answered Iucatan (which is) What ake you, or What say you? The like hapned touching Paria, a mountainous Country on the South side of Trinidad & Margarita: for when the Spaniards inquiring (as all men doe) the names of those new Regions which they discovered, pointed to the Hills a farre off, one of the people answered, Paria, which is as much to say, as, high Hills or Mountaines. For at Paria begins that maruailous ledge of Mountaines, which from thence are continued to the Strait of Magellan, from eight degrees of North latitude to the 52. of South: and so hath that Countrey euer since retained the name of Paria.

The same hapned among the English, which I sent vnder Sir Richard Greeneuille to Inhabite Virginia. For when some of my people asked the name of that Country, one of the Saluages answered, Wingandacon, which is as much to say, as, You wear good clothes, or gay clothes. The same hapned to the Spaniard in asking the name of the Iland Trinidad for a Spaniard demanding the name of that selfe place which the Sea incompassed, they answered, Caeri, which signifieth an Iland. And in this manner haue many places newly discovered bene intitled, of which Peru is one. And therefore wee must leaue Ophir among the Moluccae, whereabout such an Iland is credibly affirmed to be.

Now although there may be found gold in Arabia it selfe (towards Persia) in Hauilah, now Susiana, and all alongst that East Indian shore; yet the greatest plenty is taken vp at the Philippines, certaine Ilands planted by the Spaniards, from the East India. And by the length of the passage which Salomons ships made from the red Sea, (which was three yeares in going and comming) it seemeth they went to the vtmost East, as the Moluccae or Philippines. Indeece thesethat now goe from Portugal, or from hence, finish that nauigation in two yeares, and sometimes lesse: and Salomons ships went not about a tenth part of this our course from hence. But wee must consider, that they cuermore kept the coast, and crept by the shores, which made the way exceeding long. For before the vse of the Compass was knowne, it was impossible to navigate athwart the Ocean; and therefore Salomons ships could not finde Peru in America. Neither was it needfull for the Spaniards themselves (had it not bene for the plenty of gold in the East India Ilands, farre about the mines of any one place of America) to faile euery year from the West part of America thither, and there to haue strongly planted, & inhabited the richest of those Ilands: wherein they haue built a City called Manila. Salomon therefore needed not to haue gone farther off than Ophir in the East, to haue spced worke: neither could he nauigate from the East to the West in those dayes, whereas he had no coast to haue guided him.

Tostatus also gathereth a fantastick opinion out of Rabanus, who makes Ophir to be a Country, whose Mountaines of gold are kept by Griffins: which Mountaines Salinus affirmeth to bee in Scythia Asiatice, in these words: Nam cum auro & gemmis affluant, Griffes tenent uniuersa, alites ferocissima, Arimaspi cum his dimicant, &c. For whereas these 10 Countries abound in gold, and rich stones, the Griffins defend the one and the other: a kinde of Fowle the fiercest of all other; with which Griffins a Nation of people called Arimaspi make warre. These Arimaspi are said to haue bene men with one eye onely, like vnto the Cyclopes of Sicilia: of which Cyclopes, Herodotus and Aristeus make mention: and so doth Lucan in his third Booke: and Valerius Flaccus: & D. Scitulus in the story of Alexander Macedon. But (for mine owne opinion) I beleue none of them. And for these Arimaspi, I take it that this name signifying One-eyed, was first giuen them by reason that they vsed to wear a vizzard of defence, with one sight in the middle to serue both eies; & not that they had by nature any such defect. But Salinus borroweth these things out of Pliny, 20 who speaks of such a Nation in the extreame North, at a place called Gisfildron, or the Cause of the Northeast winde. For the rest, as all fables were commonly grounded vpon some true stories or other things done: so might these tales of the Griffins receiue this Morall: That if those men which fight against so many dangerous passages for gold, or other riches of this World, had their perfect senses, and were not deprived of halfe their eye-sight (at least of the eye of right reason & vnderstanding) they would content themselves with a quiet and moderate estate; and not subiect themselves to famine, corrupt aire, violent heate, and cold, and to all sorts of miserable diseases. And though this fable be fained in this place, yet if such a tale were told of some other places of the World, where wilde Beasts or Serpents defend Mountaines of gold, it might bee auowed. For 30 there are in many places of the world, especially in America, many high and impassable Mountains which are very rich & full of gold, inhabited onely with Tygres, Lions, and other rauinous and cruell beasts: vnto which if any man ascend (except his strength be very great) he shall be fure to finde the same warre, which the Arimaspi make against the Griffins: not that the one or other had any sense of the gold, or seek to defend that metall, but being disquieted, or made afraid of themselves or their young-ones, they grow enraged and aduenturous. In like sort it may be said that the Alegartos, (which the Egyptians call the Crocodyles) defend those Pearles which lye in the Lakes of the Inland: for many times the poore Indians are eaten vp by them, when they dige for the pearle. And though the Alegartos know not the pearle, yet they finde fauour in the flesh and blood of 40 the Indians, whom they deuoure.

†. VI.

Of Hauilah the sonne of Ioctan, who also passed into the East Indies: and of Mesha and Sepher named in the bordering of the Families of Ioctan: with a Conclusion of this discourse touching the plantation of the world.

OF Hauilah the sonne of Ioctan, there is nothing else to be said, but that the generall opinion is, that he also inhabited in the East India in the Continent, from which Ophir past into the Ilands adioyning. And whereas Ganges is said to water Hauilah, it is 50 meant by Hauilah in the East India, which tooke name of Hauilah the son of Ioctan: but Hauilah, which Pison compasseth, was so called of Hauilah, the sonne of Chub, as is formerly proued by this place of Scripture: Saul smote the Amalekites from Hauilah, as thou comest to Shur, which is before Egypt. But that Saul ever made Warre in the East India, no man hath suspected. For an end we may conclude, that of the thirteene sonnes of Ioctan, these three, Saba, Hauilah, & Ophir; though at the first seized by their brethren about the hill Mafius or Mesb, Gen. 10. 30. (to wit) betwene Elisia and Mesopotamia; yet at length either themselves or their issues remoued into the East India, leaving the 40 other other Families of Ioctan, to fill the Countries of their first plantation, which the Scripture defines to haue bene from Mesb vnto Sepher. And although S. Hierome take Mesb to be a Region of the East India, and Sepher a Mountaine of the same (which Mountain, Montanus would haue to be the Andes in America) those fancies are farre beyond my vnderstanding. For the word (East) in the Scriptures, where it hath reference to Iudea, is neuer farther extended than into Persia. But Mesb is that part of the Mountaine of Mafius in the North of Mesopotamia, out of which the Riuer Chaboras springeth which runneth by Charan; and in the same Region we also finde for Sepher (remembred by Moses, Sipphar by Ptolomy, standing to the East of the Mountaine Mafius; from whence Ioctan hauing many sonnes, some of them might passe into India, hearing of the beauty and riches thereof. But this was in proceffe of time.

The other fashon of planting I vnderstand not, being grounded but vpon mens imaginations, contrary to reason and possibility. And that this Mountaine in the East was no farther off than in those Regions before remembred, it appeareth by many places of the Scripture where the same phrase is vsed: as in Numbers 23. Balaam the King of Moab 10 bath brought me from Aram, out of the Mountaine of the East; which was from the East part of Mesopotamia. For Balaam brought Balaam out of Mesopotamia, (witnesseth this place of Deuteronomie: 1) Because they hired Balaam the sonne of Beor, of Pethor in Aram Nabarajm, to curse thee: for Aram Nabarajm was Syria flumiarum, which is Mesopotamia, as 20 aforesaid.

This plantation of the World after the flood doth best agree (as to me it seems) with all the places of Scripture compared together. And these be the reports of Reason and probable coniecture, the Guides which I haue followed herein, and which I haue chosen to goe after; making no valuation of the opinions of men, conducted by their owne fancies, be they ancient or moderne. Neither haue I any end herein, priuate, or publike, other than the discouery of truth. For as the partiality of man to himselfe hath disguised all things: so the factious and hirling Historians of all Ages (especially of these latter times) haue by their many Volumes of vntre reports left Honor without a Monument; and Virtue without Memory: and (in stead thereof) haue erected Statues and Trophies 30 to those, whom the darke forgetfulness ought to haue buried, and covered ouer for euernmore. And although the length and dissolving Nature of Time, hath worne out or changed the Names and Memory of the Worlds first planters after the flood (I mean the greatest number and most part of them) yet all the foot-steps of Antiquity (as appeares by that which hath bene spoken) are not quite worne out nor ouer-grown: for Babylon hath to this day the found of Babel; Phenicia hath Zidon, to which City the eldest Son of Canaan gaue name; (so hath Cilicia, Theris; and the Armenians, Medes, Hibernians, Cappadocians, Phrygians, the Syrians, Idumians, Libyans, Moors, and other Nations, haue preferred from the death of forgetfulness some signes of their first Founders and true Parents.

CHAP. IX.

Of the beginning and establishing of Government.

§. 1.

Of the proceeding from the first Government under the eldest of Families to Regall, and from Regall absolute, to Regall tempered with Lawes.

IT followeth now to entreate how the World began to receiue Rule and Government, which (while it had scarcity of People) vnder-went no other Dominion than Paternity and Eldership. For the Fathers of Nations were then as Kings, and the eldest of Families as Princes. Hereof it came, that the word (Elder) was 50 was alwayes vsed both for the Magistrate, and for those of Age and Grauity: the same bearing one signification almost in all Languages. For in the eleventh of Numbers God commanded Moses to gather together 70, of the Elders of the people, and Gouer-

Gouernour ouer them: the Hebrew bearing the same sense, which the Latine word Senes or Seniores doth. So it is written in Susanna, Then the Assembly belerued them as those that were the Elders and Iudges of the People. And so in the words of those false Iudges and witnesses to Daniel, Show it vnto vs, seeing God hath giuen thee the office of an Elder. Demophilus vseth the same word for the Magistrate among the Grecians. Cicero in Cato giueth two other reasons for this appellation: Apud Lacedamonios qui amplissimum Magistratum gerunt, ut sunt, sic etiam appellantur Senes; Among the Lacedamonians the chiefe Magistrates, as they were so are they called Eldermen: and againe: Ratio & prudentia nisi essent in senibus, non summum Concilium Maiores nostri appellassent Senatum; If reason and aduise-ment were not in old men, our Ancestors had neuer called the highest Councell by the name of a Senate.

But though these reasons may well be giuen, yet wee doubt not but in this name of (Elders) for Gouernours or Counsaillers of State, there is a signe that the first Gouernours were the Fathers of Families; and vnder them the eldest Sons. And from thence did the French, Italian, and Spaniard take the word (Signor) and out of it (Seignourie) for Lordship and Dominion: signifying (according to Loyseau) puissance in propriety, or proper power. The kindes of this Seignourie, Seneca makes two: the one, Potestas aut imperium; power or command; the other, Proprietas aut dominium; Propriety or Mastership: the correlative of the one is the subiect, of the other the slaue. Ad Cesarem (saith he) potestas omnium pertinet, ad singulos proprietas; Cesar hath power ouer all, and euery man propriety in his owne: and againe, Cesar omnia imperio possidet, singuli dominio; Cesar holdeth all in his power, and euery man possesseth his owne. But as men and vice began abundantly to increase: so obedience, (the fruit of naturall reuerence, which but from excellent seed seldome ripeneth) being exceedingly ouer-shadowed with pride, and ill examples, vnto this withered and fell away. And the soft weapons of paternall perswasions (after mankind began to neglect and forget the originall and first giuer of life) became in all ouer-weak, either to resist the first inclination of euill, or after (when it became habitual) to constraîne it. So that now, when the hearts of men were onely guided & steered by their owne fancies, & toft to and fro on the tempestuous Seas of the world, while wisdom was feuered from power, and strength from charity: Necessity (which bindeth euery nature but the immortal) made both the Wife & Foolish vnderstand at once, that the estate of reasonable men would become far more miserable than that of beasts, and that a generall flood of confusion would a second time ouer-flow them, did they not by a generall obedience to order and dominion preuent it. For the mighty, who trusted in their owne strengths, found others againe (by interchange of times) more mighty than themselves: the feeble fell vnder the forcible; and the equall from equall receiued equall harmes. In somuch that licentious disorder (which seemed to promise a liberty vpon the first acquaintance) proued vpon a better triall, no lesse perillous than an vni-durable bondage.

These Arguments by Necessity propounded, and by Reason maintained and confirmed, perswaded all Nations which the Heauens couer, to subiect themselves to a Master, and to Magistracy in some degree. Vnder which Gouernment, as the change (which brought with it lesse euill, than the former mischiefes) was generally pleasing: so time (making all men wise that obserue it) found some imperfection & corrosiue in this cure. And therefore the same Necessity which inuented, and the same Reason which appro-ued soueraign power, bethought it selfe of certaine equall rules, in which Dominion (in the beginning boundlesse) might also discern her own limits. For before the inuention of Lawes, priuate affections in supreme Rulers made their own fancies both their Treasures and Hangmen: measuring by this yard, and waighing in this ballance, both good and euill.

For as wisdom in Eldership preceded the rule of Kings, so the will of Kings forewent the inuentions of Lawes. Populus nullis legibus tenebatur: archetia principum pro legibus erant; The people were not gouerned by any other lawes than the wills of Princes. Hereof it followed, that when Kings left to be good, neither did those mens vertues value them which were not fancied by their Kings, nor those mens vices deforme them that were. Amar interdum nimis videt, interdum nihil videt; Loue seex one while too much, another while sharke nothing. Hence it came to passe, that after a few years (for duration and restraint of Royall power) Lawes were established: and that gouernment which had this mixture of equality (holding in an even ballance supreme power and common right) acquired the title of Regall : the other (which had it not) was knowne for Tyrannicall : the one God established in fauour of his people : the other he permitted for their affliction.

In the infancy of this Regall authority, Princes as they were chosen for their vertues onely, so did they measure their powers by a great deale of moderation. And therefore (saith Fabius Piclor) Principes, quia iustiterant, & religionibus dediti, iure habiti Dij & diis inuenio scilicet Part. 1.
Princes, because they were iust and religious, were rightly accounted and called gods.

And though (speaking humanely) the beginning of Empire may be ascribed to Reason and Necessity ; yet it was God himselfe that first kindled this light in the mindes of men, whereby they saw that they could not liue and bee preferred without a Ruler and Conductor : God himselfe by his eternall prouidence hauing ordained Kings ; and the law of Nature Leaders, and Rulers ouer others. For the very Bees haue their Prince, the Deere their Leaders ; and Cranes (by order imposed) watch for their owne safety. The most High beareth rule ouer the Kingdomes of Men ; and appointeth ouer it whomsoever hee pleaseth. By me (saith wisdom, spoken by the Son of God) Kings reigne ; by me Princes rule ; and it is God (saith Daniel) that setteth up Kings , and taketh away Kings. And that this power is giuen from God, Christ himselfe witnesseth, speaking to Pilate ; Thou couldest haue no power at all against me, except it were giuen thee from above. John 5. 21. Psal. 8. 15. Dan. 2. 21. 10. 19. 21.

It was therefore by a threefold Iustice that the World hath beene gouerned from the beginning, (to wit) by a Iustice naturall : by which the Parents and Elders of Families gouerned their Children, and Nephewes, and Families ; in which gouernment the Obedience was called naturall Piety : Again, by a Iustice diuine, drawne from the Lawes and Ordinances of God ; and the Obedience hereunto was called Conscience : And lastly, by a Iustice ciuill, begotten by both the former ; & the Obedience to this we call Duty. That by these three those of the eldest times were commanded, and that the rule in generall was Paternall, it is most euident : for Adam being Lord ouer his owne Children, instructed them in the seruice of God his Creatour ; as wee reade, Cain and Abel brought Oblations before God, as they had beene taught by their Parent, the Father of 30 Mankind.

§. II.

Of the three commendable sorts of Government with their opposites : and of the degrees of humane society.

What other Policy was exercised, or State founded after such time as mankind was greatly multiplied before the Flood, it cannot bee certainly knowne, though it seeme by probable coniecture, that the same was not without Kings in that first Age: it being possible that many Princes of the Egyptians (remembered among their antiquities) were before the generall Flood: and very likely, that the cruell Oppressions in that Age proceeded from some tyranny in Government, or from some rougher forme of Rule, than the Paternall.

Berosus ascribeth the rule of the World in those dayes to the Gyants of Libanus, who mastered (saith he) all Nations from the Sun-rising to the Sun-set. But in the second Age of the World, and after such time as the rule of Eldership failed, three severall sorts of Government were in severall times established among men, according to the diuers natures of Places and People.

The first, the most ancient, most generall, and most approued, was the Gouernment of one, ruling by iust Lawes, called Monarchy: to which Tyranny is opposed, being also a sole and absolute Rule, exercised according to the will of the Commander, without respect or obseruation of the Lawes of God, or Men. For a lawfull Prince or Magistrate (saith Aristotle) is the Keeper of Right & Equity: and of this condition, ought euery Magistrate to be, according to the rule of Gods word: Iudges and Officers shall thou make thee in thy Cities : And these shall iudge the people with righteous iudgement. Deut. 16. 18.

The second Gouernment is of diuers principall Persons established by order, and ruling by Lawes, called Aristocracy, or Optimum potestas ; to which Oligarchia (or the particular faction and vsurpation of a few great-ones) is opposed : as the Decem viri, or Triumviri, and the like.

The third is a State popular, (or Government of the people) called Democratie, to which is opposed Ochlocratia, or the turbulent vniust ruling of the confused multitude, seditiously (wraying) the State, contrary to their own Lawes & Ordinances. These three kinds of Government are briefly exprest by Tholomæus; genuis, paucorum, & multorum. Of one of few, of many.

Now as touching the beginning and order of policy since the second increase of Mankind, the same grew in this sort: First of all, euery Father, or eldest of the Family, gaue Lawes to his owne issues, and to the people from him and them increased. These as they were multiplied into many Households (man by nature louing society) ioynd their Cottages together in one common Field or Village, which the Latins call Vicius, of the Greeke οἶκος, which signifieth a House, or of the word (Vici) because it hath diuers waies & paths leading to it. And as the first House grew into a Village, so the Village into that which is called Pagus, (being a society of diuers Villages) so called of the Greeke πῶς, which signifieth a Fountain: because many people (having their habitations not far asunder) drank of one Spring or Streame of water: To this word the English Hundreds, or (as some think) Shires answereth not vnsafely.

But as men and impiety began to gather strength, and as emulation & pride between the Races of the one and the other daily increased: so both to defend themselves from out-rage, and to preferre such goods as they had gathered, they began to ioyne and set together diuers of their Villages, inuironing them first with banks and ditches, and afterwards with wals: which being so compassed were then called Oppida; either ab opponendo se hostibus, because wals were opposed against Enemies, or ab opibus, because thither they gathered their riches for safety and defence: as also they were called Urbes, ab urbe, because when they were to build a City, they made a Circle with a Plough (saith Varro) therewith measuring and compassing the ground which they went to inclose or fortifie. And although Urbs and Civitas be often confounded, yet the difference was anciently in this, that Urbs signified no other than the very wals and buildings, and Civitas was taken for the Citizens, inhabiting therein: so called of Civis, and that, ab eo quod multitudo ciuium, of coming together. But all inhabitants within these wals are not properly Citizens, but onely such as are called Free-men: who bearing proportionably the charge of the City, may by turnes become Officers and Magistrates thereof: the rest goe vnder the name of Subjects, though Citizens by the same generall name of Subjects are also knowne. For euery Citizen is also a Subject, but not euery Subject a Citizen: perhaps also some Citizen, as the chiefe Magistrate, if he be to be termed one of the Citizens is no Subject, but of this we need not stand to inquire. The word (Magistrate) is taken a Magistro, from a Master, and the word (Master) from the Aduerbe Magis (as also Magisteria, Precepts of Art) or else from the Greeke word (Μαγιστρος;) and so the Greekes call them Magistranes, whom the Latines call Magnates, or Magistratus.

The office and duty of euery Magistrate Aristotle hath written in few words. A Magistrate or Prince (saith hee) is the keeper of right and equity; but the same is best taught by Saint Paul, who expresth both the cause efficient, and finally, (that is) by whom Magistrates and Princes are ordained, together with their duties and offices. A Magistrate is the Minister of God for thy wealth, but if thou doe euill, feare: for he beareth not the sword for naught. For he is the Minister of God, to take vengeance on him that doth euill. Hee also teacheth in the same place; That euery soule ought to be subiect to the higher powers, because they are by God ordained; and that whosoever resisteth that power, resisteth God, the giuer and fountaine thereof: and shall not onely be therefore subiect to the iudgement and condemnation of Man, but of God: For ye must be subiect (saith he) not because of wrath onely, but also for conscience sake.

The examples are not to be numbred of Gods punishments vpon those that haue resisted Authority, by God ordained and established. Neither ought any Subject therefore to resist the power of Kings, because they may be taxed with iniustice or cruelty: for it pleaseth God sometimes to punish his people by a tyrannous hand: and the Commandment of obedience is without distinction. The Prophets and Christ himselfe subiected themselves to the power of Magistracy. Christ commanded that all due to Cæsar should be giuen vnto him: and he payed Tribute for himselfe and Peter. Hieremy commanded the Israhelites; even those that were Captiues vnder Heathen Kings) to pray for them, and for the peace of Babylon. So Abraham prayed for Abimelech, and Iacob blessed the King of Egypt: And it is acceptable in the sight of our Saviour (saith Paul) that ye make Supplications and Prayers for Kings, and for all that are in authority: and if for such Kings as were Idolatrous, much more for Christian Kings and Magistrates. And so much did Saint Chrysostome in his Homily to the people preferre Monarchicall Government, as he rather commended the rule of Kings (though Tyrants) than that they should be wanting: Prestat Regem tyrannum habere, quam nullum; Better a tyrannous King, than no King: to which also Tacitus subseribeth: Prestat (saith Tacitus in the first of his History) sub malo principe esse quam nullo; It is better to haue a bad Prince than none at all. And be they good Kings (which is generally presupposed) then is there no liberty more safe, than to serue them: Neg. enim libertas tutor vbi est (saith Claudian) quam Dominus seruire bono: No liberty (saith he) more safe for vs than to be seruants to the vertuous. And certainly howsoeuer it may be disputed, yet is it safer to liue vnder one Tyrant, than vnder 100000. Tyrants: vnder a wife man that is cruell, than vnder the foolish and barbarous cruelty of the multitude. For as Agellius answered a Citizen of Sparta that desired an alteration of the Government, That kinde of rule which a man would disdain in his owne house, were very vnfit to gouerne great Regions by.

Lastly, as many Fathers erected many Cottages for their many children: and as (for the reason before remembred) many Households ioynd themselves together, and made Villages; many Villages made Cities: so when these Cities and Citizens ioynd together, and established Lawes by consent, associating themselves vnder one Governour, and Government; they so ioynd, were called a Commonwealth: the same being sometimes gouerned by Kings; sometimes by Magistrates; sometimes by the people themselves.

§. III.

Of the good Government of the first Kings.

Now this first Age after the Flood, and after such time as the people were increased, and the Families became strong and dispersed into severall parts of the World, was by ancient Historians called Golden: Ambition and Couetousnesse being as then but greene, and newly growne vp, the seeds and effects wherof were as yet but potentiall, and in the blowth and bud. For while the Law of Nature was the rule of mans life, they then sought for no larger Territory than themselves could compass and manure: they erected no other magnificent buildings, than sufficient to defend them from cold and tempest: they cared for no other delicacy of fare, or curiosity of dyet, than to maintaine life: nor for any other apparell, than to couer them from the cold, the Raine and the Sun.

And sure if wee vnderstand by that Age (which was called Golden) the ancient simplicity of our Fore-fathers, this name may then truly be cast vpon those elder times: but if it be taken otherwise, then, whether the same may be attributed more to any one time than to another, (I meane to one limited time and none else) it may bee doubted. For good and Golden Kings make good and Golden Ages: and all times haue brought forth of both sorts. And as the infancy of Empire, (when Princes plaied their Prizes, & did then only woo men to obedience) might be called the Golden Age: so may the beginning of all Princes times be truly called Golden. For be it that men affect honour, it is then best purchased; or if honour affect men, it is then that good deferuings haue commonly the least impediments: and if euery Liberality overflow her banks & bounds, the same is then best warranted both by policy and example. But Age and Time doe not onely harden and shrink the openest and most sociall hearts, but the experience which it bringeth with it, layeth Princes some estates before their eyes, and (withall) perswadeth them to compassionate themselves. And although there be no Kings vnder the Sun whose meanes are answerable vnto other mens desires; yet such as value all things by their owne respects, doe no sooner finde their appetites vnanswered, but they complaine of alteration, and account the times iniurious and yron. And as this falleth out in the Reigne of euery King, so doth it in the life of euery man, if his dayes be many: for our younger yeares are our Golden Age; which being eaten vp by time, we praise those seasons which our youth accompanied: and (indeed) the grieuous alterations in our selues, and the paines and diseases which neuer part from vs but at the graue, make make the times seem so differing and displeasing: especially the quality of mans nature being also such, as it adareth and extollet the passages of the former, and condemneth the present state how iust focuer: Fit humana malignitatis vitio, ut semper vetera in laude, presentia in fastidio sint; It comes to passe (saith Tacitus) by the vice of our malignity, that we alwaies extoll the time past, and hold the present fastidious: For it is one of the errors of wayward Age: Quod sint laudatores temporis alii; That they are praisers of fore-past times, forgetting this aduice of Salomon: Say not then, why is it that the former dayes were better than these? for thou dost not inquire wisely of this thing: to which purpose Seneca; Maiores nostri quesiti sunt, & nos quærimur, postea quærentur, curis esse inores, regnare nequitiam, in deterius res hominum & in omne seculi labi: Our Ancesters haue complained, we doe complaine, our children will complaine, that good manners are gone, that wickednesse doth reigne, and all things grow worse and worse, and fall into all euill. There are the vttall discourses of Age and misfortune. But hereof what can we adde to this of Arnobius? Noua res quædam, vetus facta, & vetus temporibus: quibus cepit noua fuit & repetita: what neuer is new, in time shall be made old: and the ancientest things when they tooke beginning were also new and sodaine. Wherefore not to stand in much admiration of these first times, which the discontentments of present times haue made Golden, this we may set down for certaine, That as it was the vertue of the first Kings, which (after God) gaue them Crowns: so the loue of their people thereby purchased, held the same Crownes on their heads. And as God gaue the obedience of Subjects to Princes: so (relatiuely) he gaue the care and iustice of Kings to the Subjects; hauing respect, not onely to the Kings themselves, but euen to the meanest of his Creatures: Nunquam particulari bono seruit omne bonum; The infinite goodnesse of God doth not attend anyone onely: for he that made the small and great, careth for all alike: and it is the care which Kings haue of all theirs, which makes them beloued of all theirs; and by a general loue it is, that Princes hold a general obedience: For, Poteit as humana radicator in voluntatiis hominum: All humane power is rooted in the will or dispositions of men.

§. IV.

Of the beginning of Nobility: and of the vaine want thereof without vertue.

Vetus nobilitas
nonne citius
sed fit.

AND with this Supreme Rule and Kingly authority began also other degrees and differences among Subjects. For Princes made election of others by the same Rule, by which themselves were chosen; vnto whom they gaue place, trust, and power. From which employments and Offices sprang those Titles, and those degrees of Honour, which haue continued from Age to Age to these dayes. But this Nobility, or difference from the Vulgar, was not in the beginning giuen to the Succession of Blood, but to Succession of Vertue, as hereafter may be proved. Though at length it was sufficient for those whose Parents were aduanced, to be knowne for the Sonnes of such Fathers: and so there needed then no endeavour of well-doing at all, or any contention for them to excell, vpon whom glory or worldly Nobility necessarily descended. Yet hereof had Nobility denomination in the beginning, That such as excelled others in vertue, were so called: Hinc dictus Nobilis, quasi virtute præ alijs notabilis. But after such time as the descended Honour of the Father was giuen in reward to his Posterity, Saint Hierome iudged of the Succession in this manner: Nihil aliud video in Nobilitate appetendum, nisi quod Nobiles quadam necessitate constringantur, ne ab antiquorum probitate degenerent; I see no other thing to be affected in Nobility, than that Noblemen are by a kinde of necessity bound, not to degenerate from the vertue of their Ancesters. For if Nobility be Virtus & antiqua diuinitas; Vertue and ancient riches, then to exceede in all those things which are extra hominem, as riches, power, glory, and the like, doe no otherwise define Nobility, than the word (animal) alone doth define a reasonable man. Or if honour (according to L. Vines) bee a witness of vertue and well-doing: and Nobility (after Plutarch) the continuance of vertue in a Race or Linage: then are those in whom Vertue is extinguished, but like vnto painted and printed Papers, which ignorant men worship in stead of Christ, our Lady, and other Saints: men, in whom there remaine but the dregs and vices of ancient Vertue: Flowers, and Herbes, which by change of soile and want of manuring are turned to Weedes. For what is found praise-worthy in those waters, which had their beginning out of pure Fountains,

if in all the rest of their course they run foule, filthy, and defiled: *Ex terra fertilis produrunt aliquid Cicuta venenosa, & ex terra sterili pretiosum aurum, Ous of fruitfull ground ariseth sometimes poisoning Henbane, and out of barren soile precious Gold. For as all things consist of matter and forme, so doth Charrou (in his Chapter of Nobilitie) call the Race and Linage but the matter of Nobilitie: the forme (which giues life and perfect being) he maketh to be Vertue, and Qualitie, profitable to the Common-weale. For he is truly and entirely Noble, who maketh a singular profession of publicke Vertue, seruing his Prince and Countrey; and being defended of Parents and Ancesters that haue done the like. And although that Nobilitie, which the same Authour calleth personall, (the same which our felues acquire by our Vertue and well deservings) cannot be ballanced with that which is both naturall, by Descent, and also personall, yet if Vertue bee wanting to the naturall, then is the personall and acquired Nobilitie by many degrees to be preferred: For (saith Charrou) this Honour (to wit) by Descent, may light vpon such a one, as in his owne nature is a true Villaine. There is also a third Nobilitie which he calleth Nobilitie in Parchment, bought with Siluer or Fauour: and these be indeede but Honours of affection, which Kings with the change of their fancies with they knew wel how to wipe off againe. But surely, if we had as much sense of our degenerating in worthinesse, as we haue of vanitie in deriuing our felues of such and such Parents, we should rather know such Nobilitie (without Vertue) to be shame and dishonour than Noblesse, and glory to vaunt thereof. *What calamitie is wanting (saith Bernard) to him that is borne in sinne, of a Posbare body and barren minde? for (according to the same Father) Dele sucum fugacis honoris huius, & male coronate nitorem gloria, &c. wipe away the painting of this fleeting honour, & the glittering of the ill-crowned glory, that then thou maiest consider thy selfe naked; for thou camest naked out of thy Mothers wombe. Camest thou thence with thy Myrr, or glistering with Jewels, or garnished with Silkes, or adorned with Feathers, or suffed with Gold? If thou scatter and blow away all these by thy consideration as certaine morning cloudes, which doe or will soone passe over, thou shalt meet with a naked, and poore, and wretched and miserable man, and blaspheming, because he is naked, and weeping because he is borne, and repining, because he is borne to labour, and not to honour.

30 For, as touching the matter of all men, there is no difference betweene it and dust: which it thou dost not beleue (saith S. Chrysostome) look into the Sepulchres & Adornments of thy Ancesters, and they shall easily persuade thee by their owne example, that thou art dust, and diuine, and diuine, so that if man seeme more Noble and beautiful than dust, this proceedeth not from the diuinitie of his Nature, but from the cunning of his Creatour.

For true Nobilitie standeth in the Trade
Of vertuous life; not in the fleshy Line:
For blood is brute, but Gentrie is Diuine.

40 And how focuer the custome of the World haue made it good, that Honors be cast by birth vpon unworthy Issues: yet Salomon (as wise as any King) reprehended the same in his Fellow-Princes: There is an euill (saith he) that I haue scene vnder the Sun, as an error, your that proceedeth from the face of him that rulerh: folly is set in great excellencie.

CHAP. X.

Of Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus: and of memorable things about those times.

§. I.

30 That Nimrod was the first after the Flood that reigned like a Soueraigne Lord: and that his beginning seemeth to haue bene of iust authoritie.

THE first of all that reigned as Soueraigne Lord after the Flood was Nimrod, the Sonne of Chush, distinguished by Moses from the rest (according to Saint Augustine) in one of these two respects: either for his eminencie, and because hee was the first of fame, and that tooke on him to command others: or else in that hee was begotten by by Chus, after his other children were also become Fathers; and of a later time than some of his Grand-children & Nephews. Howsoever, seeing Moses in expresse words calleth Nimrod the Sonne of Chus, other mens coniectures to the contrary ought to haue no respect.

This Empire of Nimrod, both the Fathers and many later Writers call tyrannicall: the same beginning in Babel, (which is) confusion. But it seemeth to mee that Me-lanchton conceived not amiss hereof: the same exposition being also made by the Author of that worke called Onomasticum Theologicum, who affirms that Nimrod was therefore called Amarus Dominator, Abster or seuer Gouverneur, because his forme of rule seemed at first farre more terrible than Paternall authority. And therefore is hee in this respect also called a mightie Hunter: because he tooke and destroyed both Beasts & Theeues. But Saint Augustine vnderstands it otherwise, and conuerts the word (ante) by (contra) affirming therein, that Nimrod was a mightie Hunter against God: Sic ergo intelligendus est Gigas ille, Venator contra Dominum; So is that Giant to be vnderstood, a Hunter against the Lord.

But howsoeuer this word (a mightie Hunter) be vnderstood; yet it rather appeareth, that as Nimrod had the command of all those, which went with him from the East into Shinaar: so, this charge was rather giuen him, than by him vsurped. For it no where is found, that Noah himselfe, or any of the Sonnes of his owne body came with this troupe into Babylon: no mention at all being made of Noah (the yeeres of his life excepted) in the succeeding Story of the Hebrews; nor that Sem was in this disobedient troupe or among the builders of Babel.

The same is also confirmed by diuers ancient Historians, that Nimrod, Suphine, and Is-tan were the Captaines and Leaders of all those which came from the East. And though Sem came not himselfe so farre West as Shinaar (his lot being cast on the East parts) yet from his Sonnes Nephew Heber, the name and Nation of the Hebrewes (according to the general opinion) tooke beginning, who inhabited the Southermost parts of Chaldea about the Citie of Ur, from whence Abraham was by God called into Char-ran, and thence into Canaan.

And because those of the Race of Sem which came into Chaldea, were no partners in 30 the vnblesseing worke of the Towre: therefore (as many of the Fathers coniecture) did they retaine the first and most ancient language, which the Fathers of the first Age had left to Noah; and Noah to Sem and his Issues: In familia Heber remansit hac lingua; In the Family of Heber this Language remained (saith Saint Augustine out of Epiphanius;) and this Language Abraham vsed; yea, it was anciently and before the Flood the generall speech: and therefore first called (saith Cassiodorus) lingua humana: the humane tongue.

We know that Coropius Becanus following Theodoret, Rabbi Moses, Aegyptius, Pergara, and others, is of another opinion; but howsoeuer we determine of this point, we may with good probability resolue, that none of the godly seed of Sem were the chiefe Lea-40 ders of this presumptuous multitude. And seeing it is not likely but that some one was by order appointed for this charge, we may imagine that Nimrod rather had it by iust authoritie, than violence of vsurpation.

§. II.

That Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus, were three distinct persons.

BEnzo, and out of him Nauclerus with others, make many Nimrods, Enschins confounds him with Belus, and so doth Saint Hierome vpon Ose; and these words of S. Augustine seeme to make him of the same opinion: Ibi autem Ninus regnauit post mortem patris sui Belii, qui primus illic regnauerat 65. annos; There did Ninus reigne after the death of his Father Belus, who first gouerned in Babylon sixty five yeeres. But it could not be vnknowne to Saint Augustine, that Nimrod was the establishr of that Empire; Moses being plaine and direct therein. For the beginning of *Nimrod*s Kingdome (saith he) was Babel, Erec, Accad, and Chalne, in the Land of Shinaar; wherefore Nimrod was the first King of Babel. And certainly it best agreeth with reason, that Ninus was the third, and not one with Nimrod, as Mercator (led by Clement) supposed: for in Ninus time the World was maruailously replenished. And if S. Augustine had vndoubtedly taken Belus for Nimrod, he would haue giuen him the name which the Scriptures giue him, rather than haue borrowed any thing out of prophane Authors. And for those words of S. Augustine (qui primus illic regnauerat; who was the first that reigned there) supposed to be meant by Belus: those words do not disprove that Nimrod was the Founder of the Babylonian Empire. For although Iulius Caesar ouerthrew the liberty of the Roman Common-wealth, making himselfe perpetuall Dictator, yet Augustus was the first established Em-10 peror: and the first that reigned absolutely by soueraigne authority ouer the Romans, as an Emperour.

The like may be said of Nimrod; that he first brake the rule of Eldership and Paternitie, laying the foundation of soueraigne Rule, as Casir did; and yet Belus was the first, who peaceably, and with a generall allowance exercised such a power. Pererius is of opinion, that Belus and Nimrod were the same, because many things are said of them both agreeing in time: for it was about 200. yeeres after the flood (as they account) that Belus reigned; but such agreement of times proueth it not. For so Edward the third, and his grand-child Richard the second, were kings both in one yeere: the one dyed; the other 20 in the same yeere was crowned King.

And yet the opinion (that Nimrod and Belus were one) is far more probable than that of Mercator, who makes Ninus and Nimrod to be the same. For it is plaine that the beginning of *Nimrod*s Kingdome was Babel, and the Towne adioyning: but the first and most famous worke of Ninus was the Citie of Tenne.

Now whereas D. Sculus affirmeth, that Ninus ouercame and suppressed the Babylonians, the same rather proueth the contrarie, than that Ninus and Nimrod were one person. For Ninus established the seat of his Empire at Tenne in Assyria, whence the Babylonians might (perchance) in disdain thereof fall from his obedience, whom he recovered againe by strong hand, which was easie: Babylon being not walled till Semir- amitic.

—Dicitur aliam

Colubis muris cinxisse Semiramis Pyram.

Semiramis with wals of bricke the Citie did inclose.

Further, where it is alleaged, that as the Scriptures call Nimrod mightie: so Iustine call-49 the same of Ninus, which is one of *Mercator*s arguments; It may be answered, that such an addition might haue beene giuen to many other Kings as well. For if wee may be- lieue Iustine, then were Vexar King of Egypt, and Tam of Syria mighty Kings: be- fore Ninus was borne. And if we may compare the words of Moses (touching Nim- rod) with the vndertakings of Ninus, there will be found great difference betwene them.

For whereas Mercator conceiueth, that it was too early for any that liued about the time of the confusion of languages, to haue intruded and mastered those Cities so farre removed from Babel, namely; Erec, Accad, and Chalne; which worke he therefore ascribeth to Ninus, as a man of the greatest vndertaking, & consequently would haue Nimrod to haue beene long after the time, in which we suppose he flourished; and both those 30 names of Nimrod and Ninus to belong to one person, to wit, to Ninus: to these things to make some answer. First, I doe not finde that supposition true. That euer Nimrod intruded any of these Cities, but that he founded them and built them from the ground, being the first after the flood, that conducted the children of Noah into those parts: and therefore had nothing built or erected to his hands.

Besides, whereas these Cities in many mens opinions are found to stand far away from Babylon, I finde no reason to bring me to that beliefe. The Citie of Accad which the Sep- tucians call Anshard, and Epiphanius, Arphalitanus takes to be Nisibis in Mesopotamia: for this Region thereabout the Cosmographers (saith he) call Acadene for Accadene: Others vndervnderstand Nisibu and Nimene to bee one City: so do Strabo and Stephanus confound it with Charran, but all mistaken. For Nisibu, Accad, & Charran are distinct places. Though I cannot deny Accade to bee a Region of Mesopotamia, the same which Arim Moutanum out of S. Hierome calls Achad: and so doe the Hebrewes also call Nisibu, which seemeth to be the cause of this mistaking. As for the City of Erec, which the Sepuagins call Orech, S. Augustine, Orey, and Pagninus, Erec, this place Iunius vnderstands for Aracca in Susiana: but there is also a City in Comagena called Arace: and indeede likelihood of name is no certaine prooffe, without the assistance of other circumstances.

Concerning the third City (called Chaluch) some take it for Calinistis: of which Am. Marcellinus. Saint Hierome takes it for Selenicia; Hieronymus for Ctesiphon: others doe thinke it to be the Agram vpon Euphrates, destroyed and razed by the Persians. But let Moses be the Moderator and Iudge of this dispute, who teacheth vs directly, that these Cities are not seated in so diuers and distant Regions; for these be his words: And the beginning of his Kingdome (speaking of Nimrod) was Babel, Erec, Accad, and Chaluch, in the Land of Shinaar: so as in this Valley of Shinaar, or Babylonia, or Chaldea (being all one) we must finde them. And therefore I could (rather of the two) thinke with Pieribienus, that these four made but one Babylon, than that they were Cities farre removed; and in severall Provinces, did not the Prophet Amos precisely distinguish Chalme from Babylon. Gae yon (saith Amos) to Chalme, and from thence go you to Hamath, and then to Gath of the Philistims. The Grecians translation fauouring the former opinion, to set these Cities out of Shinaar, hath a marginall note expressing that Shinaar was here named: not that all these Cities were therein seated, but to distinguish Babylon of Chaldea, from Babylon in Egypt: but I finde little substance in that conceit. For sure I am, that in the beginning of Nimrod's Empire there was no such Babylon, nor any City at all to be found in Egypt: Babylon of Egypt being all one with the great City of Cairo, which was built long after, not farre from the place where stood Memphis the ancient City, but not so ancient as Babylon vpon Euphrates. Now that Chalme is situate in the Valley of Shinaar, it hath bene formerly proued in the Chapter of Paradise. So as for any argument that may be brought to the contrary, from the remote situation of these three Cities from Babylon, wee may continue in our opinion, That Nimrod, Belus, and Ninus, were distinct and successiue Kings.

§. III.

That Nimrod, not Assur, built Nimene: and that it is probable out of Esay 23. 13. that Assur built it for the Chaldees.

Now as of Nimrod: so are the opinions of Writers different touching Assur, and touching the beginning of that great state of Babylon and Assyria: a controwersie vvarisomely disputed without any direct prooffe, conclusion, or certainty. But to me (of whom) where the Scriptures are silent; the voyce of Reason hath the best hearing; the interpretation of Nimrod is most agreeable; who besides all necessary consequence doth not disioyne the sense of the Scriptures therein, nor confound the vnderstanding thereof. For in this sort hee converteth the Hebrew Text: Erat enim principium regni eius Babel, & Erec, & Accad, & Chaluch, in terra Shinaar: i. de terra hac processit in Assyriam, ubi edificauit Nimrod: (which is) For the beginning of his Kingdome was Babel, and Erech, and Accad, and Chaluch, in the land of Shinaar: and hee went forth of this land into Assyria, and built Nimene. So as Iunius takes Assur in this place, not for any person, but for the Region of Assyria: the land being so called in Moses time, & before it. For certainly, the other construction; (where the word Assur is taken for Assur the sonne of Sem) doth not answer the order which Moses obserueth through all the Bookes of Genesis, but is quite contrary vnto it. For in the beginning of the tenth Chapter hee setteth downe the sonnes of Noah, in these words: Now these are the Generations of the Sonnes of Noah: Sem, Ham, and Iapheth, vnto whom sonnes were borne after the flood: then it followeth immediately: These sonnes of Iapheth were Gomer, &c. so as Iapheth is last named among Noah's sonnes, hee eldest of youngest: because hee was first to be spoken of: vnto whom (having last named him) hee proceeds and sets downe his issue, and then the issue of his sonnes: first the issue of Gomer, Iapheth's eldest sonne; and then speaks of Javan and his sonnes: for of the rest of that Familie he is silent. Anon after he numbrell the sonnes of Ham, of which Chub was the eldest: and then the sons of Chub and Mizraim; and afterward of Canaan, leauing Shem for the last, because he would not disioyne the storie of Hebrewes. But after he beginneth with Sem, he continueth from thence by Arphaxad, Shela, and Heber, vnto Abraham, and so to Jacob, and the Fathers of that Nation. But to haue brought in one of the sonnes of Shem in the middle of the generations of Ham, had bene against order: neither would Moses haue past over so lightly the erection of the Assyrian Empire, in one of the sonnes of Shem, if he had had any such meaning: it being the storie of Shem's sonnes which he most attended. For he nameth Nimrod apart, after the rest of the sonnes of Chub, because he founded the Chaldeen and Assyrian Empires; and in the eleventh Chapter he returneth to speak of the building of Babel in particular, hauing formerly named it in the tenth Chapter with those other Cities which Nimrod founded in Shinaar. And as hee is in the tenth Chapter, so also in the eleventh hee maketh no report of Shem, till such time as hee had finished so much of Nimrod as he meant to touch: and then hee beginneth with the issue of Shem, which hee connecteth to Abraham and Isaac. And of Iunius opinion touching Assur, says Caluinus: to which I conieure that P. Commestor, in his Historia Scholastica, gaues an entrance, who after hee had deliuered this place in some other sense, hath these words: Reluctandum non est. de Assur, filio Sem, esse Assur (id est, Regem Assyriorum) inde effluens est, quod tempore Saragi prouti Abrahami successit, (which is) Or else it is not, to bee vnder stood of Assur the sonne of Sem; Assur but Assur (that is, the Kingdome of the Assyrians) came from thence (videlicet, from Babylon) or was made out of it, which happened in the time of Sarag, the great grandfather of Abraham. After which he reconcileth the difference in this sort: If you take the ancient Belus (meaning Nimrod) to be the first Erector of the Assyrian Empire, or the first Founder thereof, it is true, Quantum ad initium, Respecting the beginning; but others conieure that it had beginning from Ninus, which is also true, Quantum ad regni ampliationem; Regarding the enlargement of the Empire. To this I may adde the opinion of Epiphanius, confirmed by Codrenus, who takes Assur to bee the sonne of Nimrod: and so doth Methodius, and Pieribienus, Saint Hierome, and Cyrillus, and now lastly Tornilius: who (saith hee)ooke vpon him that name of Assur after hee had beaten the Assyrians, as Iact. in Gen. 10. Scipio did of Africanus, after his conquest in Africa: and that Assur was a common name to the Kings of Assyria, as it appeareth by many Scriptures, as Psalm 81. Esay 10. Isa. 5. &c. but to helpe the matter, hee makes Nimrod of the race of Shem, and the sonne of Irari. But Rabanus Maurus, who was Arch-bishop of Metz in the yeere of Christ 854, an ancient and learned Writer, vnderstands this place with Commestor, or Commestor with him, agreeing in substance with that translation of Iunius: to which words of Moses he giueth this sense: De hac terra Assyriorum pullulauit imperium, qui ex nomine Nini, Bel filij, Ninum condiderunt, urbem magnam, &c. Out of this land grew the Empire of the Assyrians, who built Ninus the great City, so named of Ninus the sonne of Belus. On the contrarie Caluinus obiectioneth this place of Esay: Behold the land of the Chaldeans, this was no people, Assur founded it by the inhabitants of the wilderness; than which there is no one place in the Scriptures, that hath a greater diuersitie in the translation and vnderstanding; in so much as Michael de Palatio vpon Esay (though in all else very diligent) passeth it ouer. But Caluinus seemeth hereby to inferre, that because Assur founded the state of the Chaldeans, therefore also Assur rather than Nimrod established the Assyrian Empire, and built Nimene: contrary to the former translation of Iunius, and to his owne opinion. Now out of the Vulgar (called Hieromes translation) it may be gathered that Assur both founded & ruined this Estate or Citie of the Chaldeans, by Esay remembered: vnto which Citie, People, or State, he plainly telleth the Tyrrians that they cannot trust, or hope for reliefe thence. Or rather it may be taken, that the Prophet maketh this Citie of Chaldea, and that Estate, an example vnto those Phenicians, whom in this place hee fore-telleth of their ruine: which Citie of Chaldea being of strength, and carefully defended, was (notwithstanding) by the Assyrians utterly wasted and destroyed: whereby he giueth them knowledge, and foretelleth them, that their owne Citie of Tyre (invincible, as themselves thought) should also sooner after be ouerturned by the same Assyrians: as (indeed) it was by Nabuchodonosor. And these be the words after Hierome: Ecce terra Chaldaeorum, talis populus non fuit, Assur fundauit eam, in captiuitatem traduxerunt robustos eius, suffoderunt domos eius, posuerunt eam in ruinam, (which is)

Behold the Land of the Chaldeans, such a people there were not (or, this was no people, after the Genes) Affur (or the Affyrans) founded it, they carried away their strange men captives, they undermined their houses, and ruined their Citie. The Septuagint expresse it but in a part of another Verse, in these words: Et in terra Chaldeorum, & hec desolata est ab Affyris, quoniam murum eius corruit, making the sense perfect by the preceding Verse, which all together may be thus understood: If thou goe over to Chittim (which is Alcedon or Greece) yet thou shalt not rest (speaking to the Tyrians) neither in the Land of the Chaldeans, for this is made desolate by the Affyrans, because their walls fell together to the ground. Pagninus and Yatablus conuert it thus: Ecce terra Chasdim, & populus non erat illic olim; nam Affur fundauit dam nauibus, excreuit arces illius; contriuerunt ades eius, posuit eam in ruinam: which may be thus Englished: Behold the Land of the Chaldeans, this people was not once therein inhabiting: for Affur built it a harbour for ships, they erected the Towers thereof, and againe brake downe the houses thereof, and ruinated it. Ianinus in the place of ships sets the word (pro Barbaris) that is, for the Barbarians: and the Genes, by the Barbarians. But this is vnderstood that the Prophet Esay, as may be gathered by all the sense of the Chapter, did therein assure the Tyrians of their future destruction, which (accordingly) fell on them: wherein (for the more terrour) he maketh choice to note the calamities of those Places, Cities, and Regions, by whose Trade the state and greatnesse of the Tyrians was maintained; as by the Citizens from Tharsis, from the Macedonians, and other Gracians vnder the name of Cittim; also by the Egyptians, the Chaldeans, and the rest. For Tyre was then the Mart Town of the World most renowned. And (as it appears in our discourse of Paradise) not the least part of her chiefe merchandize came in by the Citie Vr or Vrchoa in Chaldea, where the body or chiefe streame of Euphrates (cuen that streame which runneth through Babylon & Orra, which now falleth into Tygris) had his passage into the Persian Gulfe: though now it be stopped vp. For (as we haue heretofore noted) the Arabians (that descended from Sheba and kaamah) dwelling on the east banks of the Persian Gulfe, trading with the Tyrians (as thofe of Eden, Charran, and Chalne did) transported their merchandize by the mouth of Tygris, that is, from Teredon, & of Euphrates, that is, from Vr or Vrchoa: and then by Babylon, and thence by Riuer and ouer Land they conueyed it into Syria, and so to Tyre: as they doe this day to Aleppo. So then Vr of the Chaldees was a Port Towne, and one of those Cities which had Intelligence, Trade, and Exchange with the Tyrians: for it stood by the great Lakes of Chaldea, through which that part of Euphrates ran, which passage is now flopt vp. Eius cursum vetulus aboleuit (saith Niger). And Plinie: Locus ubi Euphratis ostium fuit, flumen salsum: Time hath worne away the channell of Euphrates: the place where the mouth thereof was, is a Bay of salt water. These things being thus, certainly (not without good probabilitie) we may expound the Citie of the Chaldees, whose calamities Esay here noteth for terror of the Tyrians, to be the Citie anciently called Vr; and (by Hecataeus) Camerina; by Ptolomie, Vrchoa: and by the Greekes, Chaldeopolis, The Citie of Chaldea: which the sonnes of Shem, vntill Abrahams time inhabited. And whereas in all the Translations it is said, that Affur both founded it and ruined it: it may be vnderstood, that Affur the Founder was the sonne of Shem; and Affur the destroyers were the Affyrans, by whom those that inhabited Vr of Chaldea, were at length oppressed and brought to ruine: which thing God foreseeing, commanded Abraham thence to Carran, and so into Canaan. And if the Hebrew word by Yatablus and Pagninus conuerted (by ships) doe beare that sense, the same may be the better approued; because it was a Port Towne: and the Riuer so farre vp as this Citie of Vr was in ancient time nauigable, as both by Plinie and Niger appeareth. And if the word (for the Barbarians) or (by the Barbarians) be also in the Hebrew Text, it is no lesse manifest, that the most barbarous Arabians of the Desart were and are the confronting, and next people of all other vnto it. For Chaldea is now called Arachaladar, which significth desart Lands, because it ioyneth to that part of Arabia so called: and Cicero (calling those Arabians by the name of Isuraens) addeth, that they are of all other people the most saluage; calling them, Homines omnium maxime

So as this place of Esay, which breedeth some doubt in Caluin, proueth in nothing the contrarie opinion, nor in any part weakeneth the former translation of Ianinus, nor the interpretation of Comestor and Rabanus. For though other men haue not conceiued (for any thing that I haue read) that Affur is in this place diuersly taken (as for the sonne of Shem, when he is spoken of as a Builder of Vr; and when as a Destroyer thereof, then for the Affyrans Nation yet certainly the euidence of the truth, and agreement of circumstances (seem to enforce it. And so this Founding of the Citie of the Chaldees by Affur (into which the most of the posteritie of Shem that came into Shinaar, and were separate for the Idolatrie of the Chusites and Nimrodians, retired themselves) hath nothing in it to prode that the same Affur built Nineue, or that the same Affur was all one with Ninus, except we will make Affur, who was the sonne of Shem, both an Idolater, and the sonne of Belus. For (out of doubt) Ninus was the first notorious Sacrificer to Idols, and the first that set vp a Statue of Image to be honoured as god. Now if Affur must be of that Race, and not of the Familie of Shem, as he must be if he founded Nineue, then all those which seeke to giue him the honour thereof, doe him by a thousand parts more iniurie, by taking from him his true Parent and Religion.

Besides, if it is supposed Affur whom they make the Founder of Nineue (and so the sonne of Belus) were any other, and not the same with Ninus, then what became of him? Certainly he was very vnworthy and obscure, & not like to be the Founder of such an Empire and such a Citie, if no man haue vouchsafed to leaue to posteritie his expulsiō thence, and how he lost that Empire againe or quitted it to Ninus: whose acts and conquests are so largely written, and (according to my apprehension) farre differing from truth. It will therefore be found best agreeing to Scripture and to Reason, and best agreeing with the storie of that age written by prophane Authors, that Nimrod founded Babel, Erech, and Accad, and Chalne, the first workes and beginnings of his Empire, according to Moses; and that these workes being finished within the Valley of Shinaar, he looked farther abroad, and set in hand the worke of Ninus, lying neere vnto the same streame that Babel & Chalne did: which work his grand-child Ninus afterward amplified and finished, as Semiramis (this Ninus his wife) did Babylon. Hence it came to passe, that as Semiramis was counted the Foundresse of the Citie which she onely finished: so also Ninus of Nineue: Quam quidem Babylonem posuit instaurare, She mox reparare & reuere Babylon, saith S. Augustine. For so did Nabuchodonosor vaunt himselfe to bee the Founder of Babylon also, because he built vp againe some part of the wall, ouer-borne by the furie of the Riuer: which worke of his stood till Alexanders time, whereupon hee

Of the Acts of Nimrod and Belus, as farre as now they are knowne.

But to returne to the Storie, it is plain in Moses, that Nimrod (whom Philo interpreteth transfugium; and Iulius Africanus surnamed Saturne) was the establisher of the Babylonian Monarchie, of whom there is no other thing written, than that his Empire in the beginning consisted of those 4. Cities before remembered, Babel, Erech, Accad, and Chalne: and that from hence he propagated his Empire into Affyria, and in Affyria built four more Cities (to wit) Nineue, Rebath, Celab, and Resen. And seeing that hee spent much time in building Babel it selfe and those adioyning, and that his trauailes were many ere he came into Shinaar: that worke of Babel (such as it was) with the other three Cities, and the large foundation of Nineue, and the other Cities of Affyria which he builded (considered with the want of materials, and with other impediments) were of greater difficultie than any thing performed by his Successors in many yeeres after: to whose vndertakings time had giuen so great an increase of people, and the examples and patternes of his beginning so great an aduancement and encouragement: in whose time (saith Glycas) all these Nations were called Merores, à sermonis linguarum terrarū diuisione; by reason that the earth and the speech were then diuided.

Belus, or Bel, or Jupiter Belus, succeeded Nimrod, after he had reigned 114. yeeres, of whose acts and vndertakings there is little written. For it is thought that he spent much of his time in dis-burdening the low Lands of Babylon and drying and making firme ground of all those great Fennes & ouer-flowne Marishes which adioyned vnto it. For any of his Warres or conquests there is no report, other than of his begun enterprise against Sabatus King of Armenia, and those parts of Syria which Berosus calleth Syria Seta, whose sonne and successor Barzanes became subiect and Tributary to Ninus, that followed the warre to effect, which was by his Father Belus begunne.

§. V.

§. V.

That we are not to marvaile how so many Kingdomes should be erected about these times: and of Vexoris of Egypt, and Tanais of Scythia.

That so many Kingdomes were erected in all those Easterne parts of the World so soon after Nimrod, (as by the storie of Nimrod is made manifest) the causes were threefold (namely) Opportunitie, Example, and Necessitie. For Opportunitie being a Prince, liberal and powerfull, bestoweth on her first Entertainers many times more benefits, than either Fortune can, or Wisdom ought, by whose presence alone the vnderstanding mindes of men receive all those helps and supplies, which they either want or wish for: so as every Leader of a troupe (after the division of tongues and dispersion of People) finding these faire offers made vnto them, held the power which they possesse, and governed by discretion all those people, whom they conducted to their destined places. For it cannot be conceived, that when the Earth was first divided, mankind straggled abroad like beasts in a Desert; but that by agreement they disposed themselves, & vnder-tooke to inhabit all the known parts of the world, and by distinct Families and Nations; otherwise, those remote Regions from Babylon and Shinar, which had Kings, and were peopled in Nimrod time, would not have bene possible in many hundreds of yeeres after, as then they were, neither did those that were sent, and travelled far off order being the true parent of prosperous success, vnder take so difficult enterprizes without a Conduer or Gouernander. Secondly, the Example of Nimrod with whom it succeeded well, strengthened every humor that aspired. Thirdly, Necessitie resolved all men by the arguments of common miseries, that without a Commander and Magistrate, neither could those that were laborious, & of honest dispositions, enjoy the harvest of their owne Trauailes: nor those which were of little strength, secure themselves against forcible violence: nor those which sought after any proportion of greatness, either possesse the same in quiet, or rule and order their owne Ministers and Attendants.

That these causes had wrought these effects, the vnder takings & Conquests of Nimrod (the son of Belus) made it apparant: for hee found euery where Kings and Monarchies, what way soeuer his Ambition led him in the Warres.

But Nimrod (his Grand-father) had no companion King, to vsknown, when he first tooke on him Soueraigntie and sole commandement of all those the children of Noah, which came from the East into Babylonia; though in his life time others also raised themselves to the same estate; of which hereafter, Belus (his sonne and Successor) found Sabatus King of Armenia and Scythia, sufficiently powerfull to resist his attempts: which Sabatus I take to be the same, which Iustine calls Tanais; and should coniecture, that Mizraim had bene his Vexoris, were it not that I vehemently suspect some error, (as Iustine placeth him) in the time of that Vexoris, who by many circumstances seemes to me, rightly accounted by the Iudicious and Learned Reineccius, all one with the great Sesoftris, that liued certaine Ages after Nimrod. This Belus, the second King of Babylon, reigned 65. yeeres, according to the common account.

§. VI.

Of the name of Belus, and other names asfine vnto it.

Hence this second King and Successor of Nimrod had the name of Bel, or Belus question hath bene made: for it seemeth rather a name imposed, or (of addition) given by Nimrod, than assumed by Belus himselfe.

Cyrollus against Iulian calls the Father of Nimrod Arbelus, affirming that he was the first of all men that caused himselfe to be called a god: which were it so, then might the name of Belus be thence deriued. But Bel, as many Learned Writers have obserued, signifieth the Sunne in the Chaldean Tongue, and therefore did Nimrod, and Semiramis giue that name to their Father, that he might be honoured as the Sun, which the Babylonians worshipped as a god. And as this Title was assumed in after-times by diuers others of the Chaldean Princes, and Babylonian Satrapes: so was it vied (in imitation) by the chiefe of the Carthaginians and other Nations, as some Historians haue conceiued.

To

To this Bel, or Belus, pertaine (as in affinitie) those voyces of Bael, Baelim, Belphegor, Belphegor, Belschub, and Belshephon. Those that haue learned in the Hebrew and Chaldean conuert the word Bael by the Latine, Principis militie, Chiefe in the warre; though Daniel was so called (saith Saides) Ob honorem explanationis arcanae rerum, in honour of his expounding secrets. Saint Hierome makes Bel, Bael, and Bael, to haue the same signification: and saith, that the Idoll of Babylon was so called, which Nimrod in memorie of his father set vp to be worshipped: to which that he might adde the more honour and reuerence, he made it a Sanctuarie and refuge for all offenders. Hence (saith Lyranus) came Idolatry, and the first vie of Images into the World. Affidore doth interpret Bel by Vetus, old or ancient; adding, that as among the Affyrians it is taken for Saturne and the Sunne: so in the Punike or Carthaginian Language it signifieth God, Glycal makes it an Affyrian name properly; and Iosephus a Tyrian. He also affirmeth that the Idoll which the Moabites worshipped (by them erected on the Mountaine Phegor, or Pear, and called Bael) is the same which the Latines call Prisapus, the god of Gardens; which also was the opinion of S. Hierome. But that the word Bel, or Bael, was as much to say as God, appeareth by the word Belschub, the Idoll of Assarum. For Bel, or Bael foundeth (God) and Schub (Flies or Hornets); by which name (notwithstanding) the Irms expresse the Prince of Devils. But the Prophet Ose teacheth vs the proper signification of this word from the voice of God himselfe, and at that day (saith the Lord) thou shalt call me Ishti, and shalt call me no more Baalim: for I will take away the name of Baalim out of their mouths. For although the name of Bael, or Babel, be iustly to be vied towards God; yet in respect that the same was giuen to Idols, God both hated it & forbad it. And the vying of the word Bel among the Chaldeans of the Sunne, was not because it properly signifieth the Sun, but because the Sunne there was worshipped as a God: as also the Fire was, quoniam Salus particula. As for the words compounded (before remembred) as Belphegor, and Belshephon, Belshephon is expounded out of Eusius, Dominus speculæ vel custodia: The Lord of the Watch-Tower, or of the Guard: the other word noteth the Idoll, and the place wherein it was worshipped. It is also written Belphegor, or Baelpeor; and Peor (they say) it as much as Demoniacus; and therefore the word ioynd expresseth a naked Image. Some there are that call this Belus the sonne of Saturne: for it was vied among the Ancients to name the Father Saturne, the sonne Iupiter, and the Grand-child Hercules. Saturni discipulus familiarum Nobilium, Regumq; qui urbes considerant sensissimis spiritibus corum. Ioues & Iunones; Hercules vero nepotes eorum fortissimi: The ancientest of Noble Families and Kings which founded Cities, are called Saturnines; their first borne Iupiters and Iunoes; their valliant; Nepewes Hercules. But this Belus (saith L. Viner) was famous by reason of his warlike sonne Nimrod, who caused his father to be worshipped as a God by the name of Iupiter Babylonius, whom the Egyptians (transported by the Dreams of their Antiquitie) make one of theirs. For Nephtune (say they) vpon Libye the Daughter of Epaphus begat this Iupiter Belus, who was father to Aegyptus. They adde, that this Belus carrying a Colonie to the Riuer of Euphrates, there built a Citie, in which he ordained Priests after the Egyptian manner. But were there any Belus the sonne of Epaphus and Isis, or of Nephtune and Libye, or (with Euscius) of Telephus, who after the death of Apu married Isis, (Cecrops then reigning in Athenes) the same was not this Babylonian Belus of whom wee speake, but rather some other Belus, of whom the Egyptians so much vaunted.

§. VII.

Of the worshipping of Images begun from Belus in Babel.

AS for the Babylonian Belus, hee was the most ancient Belus, and the Inuentor of Astronomie, if Plinie say true: from whence the Egyptians might borrow both the name and the Doctrine. Some part of the Temple, in which his Statue or Image was honoured as a God, the same Author affirmeth that it did remaine in his time.

Of the Sepulchre of Belus, Strabo writeth thus. Over the Riuer. (saith he) there are Gardens, where they say the ashes of Belus his Tomb, which Xerxes brake up, are yet remaining. It was a square Pyramid made of Bricke, a furlong high, and on euery side it had a furlong in breadth. It appeareth, by Cyrollus against Iulian, that hee obtained diuine worship yet liuing:

living: for so he writes of him (calling him Arbelus). Arbelus, vir superbus & arrogans, primus hominum dicitur à subditis Deitatis nomen accepisse: Perseueranti igitur Assyrj, & finitimi illi gentes sacrificantes ei: Arbelus, a man very proud and arrogant, is accounted to be the first of all men that was ever honoured by their subjects with title of Deitie, or with the name of God. The Assyrians therefore, and the bordering nations have perfected, sacrificing to him. Euen Arius also, whom Suidas calls Thurax, who succeeded next after Ninus, was made an Idoll of among them, if we credit Suidas.

After Ninus (that is, after Ninyas) Thurax reigned (saith Suidas) whom they called after the name of the Planet Mars, a man of sharpe and fierce disposition, who bidding battaile to Caucasus of the stocke of Iapheth, slue him. The Assyrians worshipped him for their God, and called him Baal (that is) Mars; thus saith Suidas. Neither is it unlikely but that many among Idolatrous nations were Deified in their life-times, or soon after: though I denie not but that the most of their Images and Statues were first erected without diuine worship, onely in memorie of the glorious acts of Benefactors, as Glycas rightly conceiue, and so afterward the Deuill crept into those wooden and brazen carcases, when Posteritie had lost the memorie of their first inuention. Hereof Isidore speaketh in this manner: Quos autem Pagani Deus asserunt homines fuerant, & pro uini uisus, uisæ meritis uel magnificentiæ, soli apud suos post mortem imperant: sed Demoniabus persuadentibus, quas illi pro sua memoriâ honorauerunt, minores Deos exilluminant: id est ista uerba excolenda acceperunt Poetarum figmenta; They were men (saith he) whom the Pagans ascribed to be gods: and every one for his merits or magnificence began after his death to be honoured of his owne. But as length (the Devils perswading) they accounted them lesser gods, whose memories they honoured: and the Fictions of the Poets made the opinions concerning the honour of the dead much more superstitious.

And that the worshipping of Images was brought in by the Pagans, and Heathen Nations, it is not Isidore alone that witnesseth; but Gregorie: Gentilium autem heu inuentrix & caput est imaginum, Gentilismum est the inuentresse and ground of Images: and Ambrose. Gentes lignum adorant, sanguinem imaginem Dei: The Gentiles adore wood, as it were the Image of God. Euclides also affirmeth as much, and calleth the worshipping of Images a custome borrowed of the Heathen. The like hath Saint Augustine against Adamantius. Et ueretur (saith Lactantius) ne religio uana sit, si nihil uideant quod adoret, They feare their Religion would be vaine, should they not see that which they worship.

And (out of doubt) the Schoolemen shifft this fearefull custome very strangely. For seeing the very workmanship is forbidden, how can the heart of a wise Christian satisfie it selfe with the distinction of Dontia and Hyperdonta, which can imply nothing but some difference of worshipping of those Images after they are made: And it is of all things the most strange, why religious and learned men should straine their wits to defend the vse of those things, which the Scriptures haue not onely nowhere warranted, but expressly in many places forbidden, and cursed the Practisers thereof. Yet this doctrine of the Deuill was so strongly & subtilly rooted, as neither the expresse Commandement of God himselfe, Thou shalt not make any grauen image, nor all the threatnings of Moses and the Prophets after him could remove, weed nor by feare, or by perswasions leade the hearts of men from it. For where shall we find words of greater weight, or of plainer instruction than these? Take therefore good heed to your felues (for yet saw no Image in the day that the Lord spake vnto you in Horeb out of the midst of the fire) that ye corrupt not your selues, & make you a grauen Image or representation of any Figure, whether it be the likenesse of Male or Female.

And besides the expresse Commandement, Thou shalt not make any grauen Image, and the prohibition in many Scriptures, so it is written in the Booke of wisdom, That the inuention of Idols was the beginning of whoredome: and the finding of them the corruption of life: for they were not from the beginning, neither shall they continue for ever.

And whereas the Schoolemen affirme, that the Prophets spake against the Worshipping of the Heathen Idols, it is manifest that Moses spake of Images of the liuing God, and not of Baal and the rest of that nature, For you saw no Image (saith Moses) that day that the Lord spake vnto you in Horeb. Surely it was excellently said of Basil, Noli aliquam in illa forma imaginari, ne circumferas in mente tua: Doe not imagine any forme to be in God, lest thou limit or circumscribe him in thy minde thou. Now, if the great Basil thought it a presumption vnlawfull to represent a pattern of the infinite God to our own thoughts, and mides how farre doe those men presume that put him vnder the greazie Penzell of a Painter, or the rustie Axe or other Instrument of a Carpenter or Caruer?

For as this dishonor to the infinite and incomprehensible God beganne in Babel: so did the Deuill transport and spread this inuention into all the Regions adioyning, and into Egypt and Greece.

The Romans for a while resisted the creation of these Idols and Images, refusing to set them in their Temples for 70. yeeres, observing the Law of Numa, who thought it impie to resemble things most beautifull, by things most base. But Tarquinius Priscus afterwards preuailing, and following the vanitie of the Gracians (a Nation of all others vnder the Sunne most deluded by Satan) set vp the Images of their gods; which (as S. Augustine witnesseth) that Learned Varro both bewailed, and vterly condemned: and which Seneca thus derideth: *Simulachra deorum venerantur, illis supplicat, genus posito illa adorant, & cum hac suspiciant, fabres qui illa fecere contemunt; The Images of the gods are worshipped, those they pray vnto, with bearded knees those they adore; and while they so greatly admire them they contemne the Handicraftsmen that made them: which alio Sedulius the Poet in this sort scoffed at:*

*Hæu miseri qui uana colunt, qui uide sinistro
Religio sibi sculptunt simulachra, suumq;
Factorem fingunt, & qua fecere uerentur.
Quis uisus est? quæ tanta animos dementia ludis?
P' volucrem, turpemq; bouem, torumq; Draconem;
Semi-hominemq; canem supplex homo prout adorat.*

Al! wretched they that worship vanities,
And consecrate dumbe Idols in their heart,
Who their owne Maker (God on high) dispise,
And feare the worke of their owne hands and art.
What furie! what great madnesse doth beguile
Mens mindes: that man should vgly fables adore,
Of Birds, or Bulls, or Dragons, or the vile Halfe-dogge-halfe-man on knees for aide implore.

And though this deuice was barbarous, and first, and many yeeres practised by Heathen Nations only, till the Jewes were corrupted in Egypt, yet it is not Seneca alone that laugheth to scorn the ignorant stupiditie of his Nation: but Iustin Martyr remembereth how the Sylis inueighed against Images: and Hospinian, how Sophocles taught, that it was pernicious to the soules of men to erect and adore those Babels. Strabo and Hecataeus witnesseth, that the Persians did not erect or set vp any Statues of their Gods. Augustine neuer taught it the Lacedæmonian, but thought it impie to represent immortal natures by mortall Figures. Augustine also witnesseth in his first Booke de preparatione Evangelice that it was forbidden by a Law in Serica, or among the Brachmans in India, that Images should be worshipped. The same doe Tacitus and Crinetius report of the ancient Germans. Many other Authois might be remembered that witnesseth the disdaine which the Heathen themselves had of this childish Idolatrie: of which Hospinian hath written at large in his Traict de origine imaginum: in which it was truly sayd, Omnia mala exempla hominibus ista sunt, Alii exemplis hanc spem frangunt a good beginnings. The Heathen at first made these Statues and Images, but in memorie of such remarkable men, as had deserved best of their Countries & Common wealthes: Effigies hominum (saith Pliny) non solabant exprimi, nisi aliquis illis causa perperam autem meritis: Admiratione uero non uoluit Plinius, prout of men which merited for some notable cause in their perpetually remembered. And though of the more ancient Papists some haue borrowed of the Gentiles (as appears in Lactantius) that defence for Images: That Simulachra and pro elementis literarum uerba different homines Deum inuisibilem cognoscere: Images (say they, and so before them the Heathen said) are in stead of Letters, whereby men might learne to know the inuisible God: in which vnderstanding perhaps they no otherwise esteemed them than pictures indeed; yet as that of Baal or Bel set vp in memory of Bel the Babylonian became afterward the most frequented Idoll of the World, by which so many Nations (and they which were appropriate to God himselfe) were misled, and cast away to those very stocks and stones, and

and painted Canuaſes (called the pictures of Chriſt, our Ladie, and others) were by thouſands of ignorant people, not onely adored, but eſteemed to haue life, motion, and vnderſtanding. On theſe ſtacks we call (ſaith the Booke of Wiſedome) which were paſſe through the raging waues, and theſe ſtacks were rotten than the ſhip that carrieth them.

This Heathen inuention of Images became ſo fruitfull in after-times, breeding an infinite multitude of gods, that they were forced to diſtinguiſh them into degrees and orders; as Dij conſentes, ſeu maiorum gentium; ſelecti, Patrii, inferiores, dij medi; Conſell, gods, or gods of the mightieſt Nobilitie; ſelecti gods; Patrii, gods of marke, and communi gods (which the Romans called Medioximi) dij inferi, and terreſtriall Heres, and multitudes of other gods: of which Saint Auguſtine hath made large mention in his Booke de Ciuitate Dei. But (ſaith Laſtantiu) among all theſe miſerable ſoules and rotten bodies, worſhipped by men more like to their Idols, did Epimeides Cretenſis (by what good Angell moued I know not) erect in the Athenian Fields; Altar to the ynknowne God, which ſtood with the ſame title and dedication euen to the times of S. Paul: who made them firſt know to whom theſe Altars belonged, and opened their eyes which were capable of grace, that they might diſcerne the difference betwixt that light which lighteneth every man, and the obſcure and ſinking miſt wherein the Deuill had ſo manie yeeres led and miſ-led them. And it ſufficed not that the multitude of theſe gods was ſo great in generall, or that every Nation had ſome one which tooke particular and ſingular care of them, as Iupiter in Creete, Iſis in Egypt, in Athens Minerua, in Samos Iuno, in Paphos Venus, and ſo of all other parts; but every Citie, and almoſt every Family had a god a-part. For, as it is written in the ſecond of Kings, the men of Babel, made Succoth Benoth, and the men of Cath made Nergal, and the men of Hamath made Albima, and the Auites made Nibbaz and Tartak, and the Sephernims burnt their children in the fire to Adramelech. All which how plainly hath the Prophet Eſay derided: Mencut downe Trees, yinde them, burne a part of them, make readie their meate, and warme themſelues by the fire thereof, and of the reſidue he maketh a god; an Idol, and prayeth vnto it: but God hath ſhut their eyes from ſight, and their heart from vnderſtanding. It is therefore ſafeſt for a Chriſtian to beleene the Commandements of God ſo diſcreetly againſt Idolatrie, to beleene the Prophets, and to beleene S. Paul: who ſpeaketh thus plainly and feelingly, My beloved, flye from Idolatrie, I ſpeake as vnto them which haue vnderſtanding, iudge ye what I ſay.

§. VIII.

Of the warres of Ninus: and laſtly of his warre againſt Zoroaſter.

Vnto this Belus ſucceeded Ninus, the firſt that commanded the exerciſe of Idolatrie, the firſt that inuirtuouſly inuaded his Neighbour Princes, and the firſt that without ſhame or feare committed adulterie in publique. But as of Belus there is no certaine memorie (as touching particulars:) ſo of this Ninus (whoſe ſtorie is gathered out of Prophane Authors) I find nothing ſo warrantable, but that the ſame may be diſputed, and in the greateſt part doubted. For although that piece of Berosus ſet out and commented vpon by Amnius, hath many good things in it, and giueth great light (as Chryſoſtome noteth) to the vnderſtanding of Diodorus Siculus, Dion, Helicarnasſus, and others: yet Lodonicus Viner, B. Rhemans, and others after them, haue layed open the imperfection and defects of the Fragment, prouing directly that it cannot be the ſame Berosus which lived in Alexanders time, cited by Athenius and Iosephus: and whoſe Strabo the Athenienſis erected, ſaith Plinie. Yet it is from him chiefly, that many haue gathered the ſucceſſion of the Babylonian & Aſſyrian Princes, euen from Nimrod to the eighteenth King Aſtades, and to the times of Ieſus. For of Metaſthenes an Hiſtorian, of the Race of the Persian Priests, there are found but certaine Papers, or ſome few lines of the Chaldean and Aſſyrian Monarchie; but he after wards in the collection of the Persian Kings is not without his errors.

Cteſias of Chius Ya Citie adioyning to Halicarnasſus who lived together with Cyrus the younger, and with Alexander Mnemor, gathered his Hiſtorie out of the Persian Records, & reacheth as farre vpwarts as Nimrod and Semiramis, and though in the ſtorie of Cyrus the younger, Xenophon approoueth him in ſome things, and Athenius, Paulinias and Tertullian cite him; yet to be ſure and apparant are his flatteries of the times and Princes with whom he lived, & ſo incredible are the numbers which he finds in the Armies of Ninus, and eſpecially of Semiramis; as whatſoeuer his reports were, times haue conſumed his workes, ſauing ſome very few exceptions lately publiſhed.

And therefore in things vncertaine, ſeeing a long diſcourſe cannot be pleaſing to men of iudgement, I wil paſſe over the acts of this third Aſſyrian, in as few words as I can expreſſe them. S. Auguſtine affirms that Ninus mastered all Aſia, India excepted. Others ſay that he wanne it all, ſaue India, Bactria, and Arabia. For he made Aricus of Arabia the companion of his Conqueſts, with whom he entred into a ſtraight leagne of amitie, becauſe he commanded many people, and was his kinfman, and a Chuſite, and the neereſt Prince confronting Babylonia. His firſt enterprize was vpon Syria, which he might eaſily ſubdue, both becauſe he inuaded it on the ſodaine, and becauſe it lay next him: and alſo becauſe the Arabians and their king Aricus (which bordered Syria) aſſiſted him in the Conqueſt thereof.

The king of Armenia, Barzanes, he forced to acknowledge him, and to aide him in his Warre againſt Zoroaſter: for from Armenia he bent himſelfe that way toward the Eaſt; but that euer he commanded the leſſer Aſia, I doe not beleue, for none of his Succelſors had any poſſeſſion therein.

His third Warre was againſt Pharnus, king of the Medes, whom it is ſayd that he ouerthrew, and cruelly murdered with his ſeuē Children, though others affirme, that they all died in one battaile againſt him. Whether he inuaded Zoroaſter before the building or amplying of Nineue, or after, it is vncertaine. It is ſayd that he made two expeditions into Bactria; and that finding little or ill ſucceſſe in the firſt, he returned, and ſet the worke of Nineue forward: and then a ſecond time entred Bactria with 1700000. Foot, and 200000. Horſe, and 10000. fixe hundred Chariots: being encountered by Zoroaſter with foure hundred thouſand. But Ninus preauyng, and Zoroaſter being ſlaine, Aug. de Ciuit. he entred farther into the Countrey, and beſieged the chiefe Citie thereof, called Bactra or Bactrian (ſaith Stephanus:) which by a paſſage found, and an aſſault given by Semiramis (the wife of Menon) he entred and poſſeſt. Vpon this occaſion Ninus both admiring her iudgement and valour, together with her perſon and externall beautie, fancied her ſo ſtrongly, as (neglecting all Princely reſpects) he tooke her from her husband, whoſe eyes he threatned to thruſt out if he reſuſed to conſent. He therefore yeelding to the paſſion of loue in Ninus, and to the paſſion of ſorrow in himſelfe, by the ſtrong perſwaſions of ſhame and diſhonour, caſt himſelfe head-long into the water, and died.

CHAP. XI.

Of ZOROASTER, ſuppoſed to haue bene the chiefe Author of Magick Arts: and of the diuers kinds of Magicke.

§. I.

That Zoroaſter was not Cham, nor the firſt Inuener of Aſtrologic, or of Magicke: and that there were diuers great Magicians of this name.

Zoroaſter King of the Bactrians, Vincetius ſuppoſeth to be Cham the ſonne of Noah: A ſanie of little probability. For Cham was the Paternall Anceſter of Ninus, the Father of Chus, the Grand-father of Nimrod, whoſe ſonne was Belus, the Father of Ninus. It may be that Vincetius had heard of that booke which was called Scriptura Cham, deuſed by ſome wicked Knaue, and ſo intituled: of which Sextus Senenſis hath made the due mention.

It is reported by Casſianus, that Serenus Abbas gaue the inuention of Magicke to Cham the ſonne of Noah: ſo did Cameſter in his Scholaſticall Hiſtorie: which Art (ſaith he) vvith the 7. liberall Sciences he writ in 14. Pillers: ſeuē of which were made of braſſe, to reſiſt the defacing by the waters of the Flood; and 7. of bricke againſt the iniurie of fire. There was alſo another deuſed diſcourſe, which went vnder the

the title of Prophetia Cham. Cassianus out of Serenus hath somewhat like to this of Comellor. These be Cassianus words: Cham (filius Noah) qui superstitionibus istis & sacilegis suit artibus infectus, sciens nullum se posse super hys memorialium librum in Arcam prorsus inferre, in qua erat cum patre iussu, &c. Cham (the sonne of Noah) who was infected with these superstitions, and sacrilegious Arts, knowing that he could not bring any booke or memoriall of that nature into the Arke, wherein he was to remaine with his godly Father, cast the precepts and Rules thereof to be grauen in metall and hard stone.

S. Augustine noteth that Zoroaster was said to haue laught at his birth, when all other children weepe, which prefiged the great knowledge which afterward he attained vnto: being taken for the Inuenter of naturall Magicke and other Arts; for the Corrupter, the faith Plinie and Iustine. But I doe not thinke that Zoroaster inuented the doctrine of the Horoscopes or Natiuities: or first found out the nature of herbs, stones, and minerals, or their Sympathicall or Antipatheticall workings; of which, I know not what King of Chaldea is also made the Inuenter. I rather thinke that these knowledges were far more ancient, and left by Nosch to his sons. For Abraham who had not any acquaintance with Zoroaster, (as Iosephus reporteth) was no lesse learned herein than any other in that age, if he exceeded not all men then liuing: differing from the wisdome of after-times in this, that he knew and acknowledged the true cause, and giuer of life and vertue to Nature and all Naturall things; whereas others (forgetting Gods infinite, dispersed, and vniuersall power) admired the instruments, and did attribute proper strength to the things themselves, (from which the effects were sensible) which belonged to that wisdome, which being ouer, and remaining in it selfe, can doe all things, and reneweth all.

Now whether this Zoroaster (ouer-throwne by Ninus) were the same which was so excellent a Naturalist, it is doubted. For Zoroaster the Magician, Ctesius calls Oxyartes, whom Plinie finds of a later time. And if Zoroaster were taken away by a Spirit (being in the midst of his Disciples) as some Authors report, then Zoroaster, slaine by Ninus, was not the Magician: which is also the opinion of Scaliger.

Again, Iosephus and Cedrenus affirme, that Seth first found out the Planets, or wandering Starrs, and other Motions of the Heauens: for if this Art had beene inuented by Zoroaster, he could not haue attained to any such excellencie therein, in his owne lifetime; but being a man (as it seemeth) of singular iudgement, he might adde somewhat to this kind of knowledge, and leaue it by writing to posteritie.

But of this Zoroaster there is much dispute: and no lesse iangling about the word & art of Magicke. Arnobius remembreth foure, to whom the name of Zoroaster, or Zoroastres was giuen: which by Hermadorus & Dion seemeth to be but a cognomen, or name of art, and was as much to say, as astrorum cultor. The first, Arnobius calleth the Bactrian, which may be the same that Ninus ouerthroweth: the second, a Chaldean, and the Astronomer of Ninus: the third was Zoroaster Pamphylius, who liued in the time of Cyrus and his familiar: the fourth, Zoroaster Armenius, the Nephew of Hofianes, which followed Xerxes into Greece: between whom and Cyrus there past threecore & eightene yeares. Suidas remembreth a fifth, called Perfomedus sapiens: and Plato speaketh of Zoroaster the son of Oramades, vvhich Picus Mirandula confirmeth.

Now of what Nation the first and chiefe Zoroaster was, it is doubted. Plinie and Laertius make him a Persian. Gemisthius or Pleibo, Ficinus and Steuchius, make him a Chaldean. But by those booke of one Zoroaster, found by Picus Mirandula, it appeareth plainly, that the Author of them was a Chaldean by Nation, though the word (Chaldean) was as often giuen to the learned Priests peculiarly, as for any distinguishingment of Nations. Porphyrius makes the Chaldean and Magi diuers; Picus the same. But that this Zoroaster was a Chaldean both by Nation and Profession, it appeareth by his Bookes, which (saith Picus) were written in the Chaldean tongue; and the Comment in the same language. Now that the Magi & they were not differing, it may be iudged by the name of those booke of Zoroaster, which in an Epistle of Mirandula to Ficinus, he saith, to be intituled, Patris Ezre Zoroastris, & Melchior magorum oracula.

S. II.

Of the name of Magia: and that it was anciently farre diuers from Coniuring and Witchcraft.

Now for Magicke it selfe; which Art (saith Mirandula) pauci intelligent, multi reprehendant; Few vnderstand, and many reprehend; Et sicut Canes ignotos semper allatrant; As Dogs barke at those they know not: so they condemne and hate the things they vnderstand not: I thinke it not amisse (leaving Ninus for a while) to speake somewhat thereof.

It is true that many men abhorre the very name and word (Magos) because of Simon Magus, who being indeed, not Magus, but Goes, (that is) familiar with euill spirits, vnderprent that title. For Magicke, Coniuring, and Witchery, are far differing Arts, whercof Plinie being ignorant scoffeth therat. For Nero (saith Plinie) who had the most excellent Magicians of the East sent him by Tyridates King of Armenia, who held that Kingdom by his grace, found the art after long study and labour altogether ridiculous.

Magus is a Persian word primitiue, whereby is exprest such a one as is altogether conuerfant in things diuine. And (as Plato affirmeth) the Art of Magicke is the Art of worshipping God. To which effect Apollonius in his Epistles expounding the Word (μαγος) saith, that the Persians called their gods μαγες; whence he addeeth that Magus is either θεοτακτος φύσις θεός or θεοειδέντης θεός (that is) that Magus is a name sometime of him that is a God by nature, sometimes of him that is in the seruice of God: in which latter sense it is taken, Math. 2. v. 1. And this is the first and highest kind: which Piccolomine calleth diuine Magicke: and these did the Latines newly intitle Sapientes or Wise men: For, the feare & worship of God is the beginning of knowledge. These Wise men the Greeks call Philosophers: the Indians, Brachmans: which name they somewhat neerely retaine to this day, calling their Priests Bramines; among the Egyptians they were termed Priests; with the Hebrewes they were called Cabalists, Prophets, Scribes, and Pharisees; amongst the Babylonians they were differenced by the name of Chaldeans: & among the Persians Magicians: of whom Arnobius (speaking of Hofianes, one of the ancient Magicians) vseth these words: Et verum Deum merita maiestate profecutus, & Angelos ministros Dei, sed verius venerationi mouit asistere. Idem demonas prout terrenos, magos humanitatis inimicos; Sothones (for so M. Felix calleth him, not Hofianes) ascribeth the due maiestie to the true God, and acknowledgeth that his Angels are ministers and messengers which attend the worship of the true God. He also hath delineated that there are Devils carthly and wandering, and enemies to mankind.

His Maiestie also in his first Booke of Demonologie c. 3. acknowledgeth, that in the Persian tongue the word (Magos) imports as much as a contemplator of diuine and heauenlie sciences; but vniuistly so called, because the Chaldeans were ignorant of the true diuinitie. And it is also right which His Maiestie auoweth, that vnder the name of Magicke all other vnlawfull Arts are comprehended, & yet doth His Maiestie distinguish it from Necromancie, Witchcraft, and the rest: of all which he hath written largely and most learnedly. For the Magicke which His Maiestie condemneth, is of that kinde whereof the Diuelli is a partie. Daniel in his second chapter nameth foure kinds of those Wise men: Arioli, Magi, Malefici, and Chaldei. Arioli the old Latine translation calleth Sophists: Patablus and Pagninus, Genethliacos, or Physicos, or Philosophers, or (according to the note of Patablus) Naturalists: Nempe sunt Magi apud Barbaros, quod Philosophi apud Graecos (scilicet) diuinarum humanarumq; rerum scientiam proficentes. For the Magi are the same with the Barbarians, as the Philosophers are with the Greeks (that is) men that professe the knowledge of things both diuine and humane. The Greeke & the English call them Enchanters, Iunius, Magicians, Castilian, Conielluers: in the Syrian they are all foure by one name called Sapientes Babylonis; The wise men of Babel.

The second sort Patablus, Pagnin, Iunius, and our English, call Astrologers, Hierome and the Septuagint, Magicians.

The third kind are Malefici, or Venefici; in Hierom, Pagnin, and the Septuagint, Witches or Poysoners; in Iunius, Præfugatores or Sorcerers, as in English.

That Witches are also rightly so called Venefici, or Poysoners, and that indeed there is a kinde of Malefici, which without any Art of Magicke or Necromancie vse the helpe of the Deuill to doe mischief, His Maiesie confirmeth in the first Chapter of his second Booke: speaking also in the fifth Chapter of their practice, to mixe the powder of dead bodies with other things by the Deuill prepared; and at other times to make pictures of Waxe, or Clay, or otherwise (as it were Sacramentaliter) to effect those things, which the Deuill by other means bringeth to passe.

The fourth, all Translators call Chaldeans: who tooke vpon them to foretell all things to come, as well naturall as humane, & their euents: and this they vauited to performe by the influences of the Starres by them obserued, and vnderstood.

Such were, and to this day partly (if not altogether) are the corruptions, which haue made odious the very name of Magick, hauing chiefly fought (as is the manner of all impostures) to counterfeite the highest and most noblest part of it, yet so as they haue all crept into the inferior degrees.

A second kind of Magick was that part of Astrologie, which had respect to sowing and planting, & all kinds of agriculture and husbandrie: which was a knowledge of the motions and influences of the Starres into those lower Elements.

Philo Indus goeth farther, affirming, that by this part of Magick or Astrologie, together with the motions of the Starres and other heavenly bodies, Abraham found out the knowledge of the true God, while he liued in Chaldea: Qui contemplatione creaturarum cognovit Creatorem, (saith Is. Damasceus) who knew the Creator by the contemplation of the creature. Iosaphus reporteth of Abraham, that he instructed the Egyptians in Arithmetick and Astronomie, who before Abraham comming vnto them knew none of these sciences.

And so doth Archangelus de Burgo, in defence of Mirandula against Garfias: Alexander & Eupolemon dicunt, quod Abraham sanctitate & sapientia omnium prestantissimus Chaldeus primus, deinde Phœnicus, deum Egyptius sacerdos Astrologiam & diuina docuerit. Alexander (saith he, meaning Alexander Polyhistor) and Eupolemon affirme, that Abraham the holiest and wisest of men, did first teach the Chaldeans, then the Phœnicians, lastly, the Egyptian Priests, Astrologie and diuine knowledge.

The third kind of Magick containeth the whole Philosophie of nature, not the brabblings of the Aristotelians, but that which bringeth to light the inmost vertues, and draweth them out of Natures hidden bosome to humane vse, Virutes in centro centri latentes; Virutes hidden in the center of the center, according to the Chymists. Of this sort were Allertus, Arnoldus de villa noua, Raymond, Bacon, and many others: and before these in elder times, and who better vnderstood the power of Nature, & how to apply things that worke to things that suffer, were Zoroaster before spoken of: Apollonius Tyaneus remembered by S. Hierome to Paulinus; in some mens opinion Numa Pompilius among the Romans; among the Indians, Thespius: among the Egyptians, Hermes: among the Babylonians, Budda: the Thracians had Lamolxis: the Hyperboreans (as is supposed) Abbaris: and the Italians, Petrus Aponeusis. The Magick which these men profest, is thus defined: Magia est conuexio a viro sapiente agentium per naturam cum patientibus sibi congruentibus respondentibus; ut inde opera prodant non sine cura admiratione quicquam ignorant: Magicke is the conuexion of naturall agents and patients, answerable each to other, wrought by a wise man to the bringing forth of such effects, as are wonderfull to those that know not their causes. In all these three kinds, which other men diuide into foure, it seemeth that Zoroaster was exceedingly learned: especially in the first and highest. For in his Oracles he confest the God to be the creator of the Vniuersall: he belceueth of the Trinity, which he could not inuigate by any naturall knowledge: he speaketh of Angels, and of Paradise: approacheth the immortalitye of the soule: teacheth Truth, Faith, Hope, and Love, discoursing of the Abstinence and Charitie of the Magi: Which Oracles of his, Pyellus, Ficinus, Patritius, and others haue gathered and translated.

Of this Zoroaster, Eusebius in the Theologie of the Phœnicians, vsing Zoroasters owne words: Hæc ad verbum scribit (saith Eusebius) Deus primus incorruptibilis, sempiternus, ingenuus, exers partium, sibi ipsi similis, bonorum omnium auctor, munera non expectans, optimus, prudentissimus, pater iuris, sine doctrina iustitiam perdoctus, natura perfectus, sapiens, sacra natura vnicus inuentor &c. Thus writeth Zoroaster word for word. God the first incorruptible, euerglasting, unbegotten, without parts, most like himselfe, the guide of all good, expecting no reward, the best, the wisest, the father of right, hauing learned iustice without teaching, perfect wise by nature, the only inuentor thereof.

Sixtus Senensis speaking of the wisdom of the Chaldeans, doth distinguish those wise

men into five orders, (to wit) Chascedim, or Chaldeans: Asaphim, or Magicians: Chartumim; (which he translates Arlotie, or Sophists) Mechasphim, or Malefici, or Venefici, Witches, or Posioners; and Gazarim Augures, or Auspices, or Diminers.

Chascedim were those which had the name of Chaldeans; which were Astronomers: Hic scolorum motus diligentissime spectarunt; These did most diligently contemplate the motions of the heauens: whom Philo in the life of Abraham describeth.

Asaphim were in the old Latine translation called Philosophers: of the Septuagint and of Hierome, Magicians: Quide omnium tam diuinarum quam humanarum rerum causis Philosophati sunt; who discoursed of the causes of all things, as well diuine as humane: of whom Origen makes Balaam (the son of Beer) to be the first: but Laertius ascribeth the inuention of this art to Zoroastres the Persian.

Chartumim, or Inchanters, the Disciples (saith Saint Augustine, Plinie, and Iustine) of another Zoroastres: who corrupted the admirable wisdom of the Magi, which he receiued from his Ancesters.

Mechasphim, or Venefici, or Witches, are those which we haue spoken already out of His Maiesies booke of Demonologie.

Gazarim, or Auspices (after Saint Hierome) which diuine from the entrailes of beasts slaine for sacrifices: or by Gazarim others vnderstand Augures, who diuine by the flying, singing, or feeding of birds.

By this distinction we may perceiue the difference betweene those wise men which the kings of Babylon entertained; and that the name and profession of the Magi among the ancient Persians was most honest. For as Peucer truly obserueth, Præerat religioni Persæ, ut in populo Dei Leuitæ, studij, vera Philosophia dediti erant: nec quisquam Rex magis Persarum paterat esse, qui non antea Magorum disciplinam scientiamq; perciperet: The Magi (saith he) were the chiefe Ministers of the Persian Religion, as the Leuites among Gods people, and they were giuen to the studies of true Philosophie: neither could any be King of the Persians, who had not first bene exercised in the mysteries and knowledge of the Magi. Sixtus Senensis in the defence of Origen against Polychronius and Theophilus, hath two kinds of Magick, his owne words are these: Et ne quem moueat premissa Polychronij & Theophilij testimonia, Sciendum est duplicem esse Magiam, alteram vrbij, ab Origine damnatam, que per se auctera cum demonibus iniuncta verè aut apparenter operatur; alteram ab Origine laudatam, que ad praticam naturalis philosophia pertinet, docens admirabiles res operari ex applicatione mutua naturalium virtutum ad inuicem agentium ac patientium; That the testimonies of Theophilus and Polychronius (saith he) may not moue any man, it is to be understood that Magick is of two sorts, the one euery where condemned by Origen; which worketh (whether truly or seemingly) by conuents made with Deuills; the other commended by Origen; which appertaineth to the practice part of naturall Philosophie, teaching to worke admirable things by the mutuall application of naturall vertues, agent and suffering reciprocally.

This partition Hierome doth embrace in the first of his Commentaries vpon Daniel: where considering of the difference which Daniel makes betweene these foure kinds of wise Men formerly remembered, he vseth this distinction: Quos nos haricolas; cateris uero asidæ est incantatores interpretati sunt, videntur mihi esse qui verbis rem peragunt; Magi, qui de singulis philosophantur, malefici, qui sanguine vtuntur & villionis, & sepe contingunt corpora mortuorum: porro in Chaldea Genethliacos significari puto, quos vulgo Mathematicos vocant. Confectu autem communis Magos pro malefici accipit, qui aliter habentur apud gentem suam, eo quod sint Philosophi Chaldeorum: & ad artis huius scientiam Reges quos & Principes eiusdem gentis omnia faciunt; unde & in nativitate Domini Saluatoris ipsi primum ortum eius intellexerunt, & venientes sanctam Bethlehem adauerunt puerum, stella desuper ostendente; They whom we call Sorcerers, and others interpret Inchanters, seeme to mee such as performe things by words; Magicians, such as handle euery thing philosophically; Witches, that use blood and sacrifices, and often lay hands on the body of the dead: further, among the Chaldeans I take them to be signified by the name of Coniurers upon nativities, whom the vulgar call Mathematicians. But common custome takes Magicians for Witches, who are otherwise reputed in their own Nation: for they are the Philosophers of the Chaldeans; yea Kings and Princes of that Nation doe all that they doe according to the knowledge of this Art: whence at the nativite of the Lord our Saviour they first of all vnderstood his birth, and comming vnto holy Bethlehem did worship the Child: the Starre from above beweing him vnto them. By this therefore it appeareth that there is great difference between the doctrine of a Magician, and the abuse of the word. For though some Writers affirme, that Magus hodie dicitur, qui ex facere facto vitior diabolica opera ad rem quamcumq; That he is called a Magician now-a-days, who having entred league with the Devill, useth his helps to any matter: yet (as our Saviour said of Dioures) it was not so from the beginning. For the Art of Magick is of the wisdom of Nature, other Arts which vndergoe that title, were inuented by the fallhood, subtilty, & enuy of the Devill. In the latter there is no other doctrine, than the vse of certaine ceremonies, Per malā fidem; by an euill faith: in the former no other ill, than the inuigilation of those vertues and hidden properties which God hath giuen to his creatures, and how fitly to apply things that worke to things that suffer. And though by the Iewes those excellent Magicians, Philosophers, & Diuines, which came to worship our Saviour Christ, were termed Mecchasephem, or Mecaphsim; yet had they no other reason than common custome therein. Consuetudo autem communis Magos pro maleficis accipit; Common custome (saith S. Hierome) vnderstandeth Witches vnder the name of Magicians: And antiquitie (saith Peter Martyr) by the word (Magi) vnderstood good and wise men. Quid igitur exapaeis Magi nomen formidolose, nomen Euangelio gratissimum, quod non maleficum & veneficum, sed sapientem sonat & Sacerdotem? O thou fearefull one (saith Ecclus) why doubtst thou to resse the name of Magus, a name gracious in the Gospel, which doth not signifie a Witch or Coniurer, but a wise man and a Priest? For what brought this slander to that study and profession, but onely idle ignorance: the parent of causelesse admiration? *Causa fuit miris fecit quorundam operum, quae (re vera) opera naturalia sunt: verumtamen quia procuracione demonum, naturae ipsae vel coniungentium, vel commissentium, vel aliter ad operandum expeditum, facta sunt, opera demonum credebantur ab ignorantibus hac. De operibus huiusmodi est Magia naturalis, quam Necromantiam multi improprè vocant: The marvel-lousnesse of some workes, which (indeed) are natural, hath bene the cause of this slander: but because these workes have bene due by procurement of Devills, ioyning the natures together or mingling them, or howsoever fitting the natures to their working, they were thought the workes of the Devills by the ignorant. Among these workes is natural Magick, which men call very improperly Necromantie.*

Mirandula in his Apologie goeth further: For by vnderstanding (saith he) the uttermost actiuitie of naturall agents we are assised to know the Diuinitie of Christ: for otherwise (to vse his owne words) ignorant is terminus potentiae & virtutis rerum naturalium stat nos dubitare illa eadem opera, quae fecit Christus, posse fieri per media naturalia: The termes or limits of naturall power and vertue not vnderstood, wee must needs doubt whether those very workes which Christ did, may not be done by naturall meanes: after which he goeth on in this sort: *Ideo non heretice, non superstitiosè dixi, sed verissimè & Catholicè per salem Magiam adiuuari nos in cognoscenda diuinitatè Christi: Therefore I sayd not heretically, not superstitiously, but most truly and Catholically, that by such Magick wee are furthered in knowing the Diuinitie of Christ. And seeing the Iewes and others the enemies of Christian Religion, doe impudently and impiously obiekt, that those Miracles which Christ wrought were not aboue Nature, but by the exquisite knowledge thereof performed: Mirandula a man for his years fuller of knowledge than any that this latter Age hath brought forth, might with good reason arow, that the vttermost of Natures workes being knowne, the workes which Christ did, and which (as himselfe witnesseth) no man could doe, doe manifestly testifie of themselves, that they were performed by that hand which held Nature herein but as a Pencil, and by a power infinitely supreme & diuine; and thereby those that were faithlesse, were either conuerted or put to silence.*

§. III.

That the good knowledge in the ancient Magick is not to be condemned: though the Devill here, as in other kindes hath sought to abridge euill things, vnder the name and colour of good things.

Seeing therefore it is confessed by all of vnderstanding, that a Magician (according to the Persian word) is no other than, Diuinarum cultor & interpret: A studious obseruer & expounder of diuine things: and the Art of it selfe (I meane the Art of natural Magick) no other, Quam naturalis Philosophiae absoluta consummatio; Than the absolute perfection of natural Philosophie: Certainly then it proceeds from ignorance, and no way forthwith with wife & learned men, promiscue & without difference and distinction, to confound lawfull & praise-worthy knowledge with that impious, and (to vse S. Pauls words) with those beggerly rudiments, which the Devill hath shuffled in, & by them bewitcheth and befooleth gracelesse men. For if we condemne naturall Magick, or the wisdom of Nature, because the Devill (who knoweth more than any man) doth also teach Witches and Poysoners the harmefull parts of Herbes, Drugges, Minerals, & Excrements: then may we by the same rule condemne the Physician, and the Art of healing. For the Devill also in the Oracles of Amphiarus, Amphilochus, Trophanus, and the like, taught men in Dreames what Herbes and Drugges were proper for such and such diseases. Now no man of iudgement is ignorant, that the Devill from the beginning hath fought to thrust himselfe into the same employment among the Ministers and Seruants of God, changing himselfe for that purpose into an Angell of Light. He hath led men to Idolatry as a Doctrine of Religion; he hath thrust in his Prophets among those of the true God; he hath corrupted the Art of Astrologie, by giuing a diuine power to the Starrs, teaching men to esteeme them as gods, and not as instruments. And (as Bunting obserueth) it is true, that iudiciall Astrologie is corrupted with many superstitions: but the abuse of the thing takes not away the Art, considering that heauenly bodiest as euen general experience sheweth haue and exercise their operation vpon the inferiour. For the Sunne, and the Starrs of Atars doe drie the Moone doth moisten, and gouerne the Tides of the Sea. Again, the Planets, as they haue seuerall and proper names, so haue they seuerall and proper vertues: the Starrs doe also differ in beautie & in magnitude, and to all the Starrs hath God giuen also their proper names, which (had they not influences and vertues different) needed not: He counteth the number of the Stars, and calleth them by their names. But into the good and profitable knowledge of the celestiall influences, the Devill ceaseth not to shuffle in his Superstitions: and so to the knowledge of the secret vertues of Nature hath he fastened his doctrine of Characters, Numbers, & Incantations; and taught men to beleeue in the strength of Words and Letters: (which without Faith in God are but Inke or common breath) thereby either to equall his own with the Al-powerful Word of God, or to diminish the glory of Gods creating Word, by whom are all things.

Moreover, he was neuer ignorant, that both the wife & the simple obserue when the Sea-birds forsake the shores and flye into the Land, that commonly some great storme followeth, that the high flying of the Kite and the Swallow betoken faire weather; that the crying of Crows and bating of Ducks foreshew raine: for they feele the Ayre moistened in their Quills. And it is written in Hieremie the Prophet, Euen the Starke in the ayre knoweth her appointed times, and the Turtle, and the Crane, & the Swallow. Hereupon, this enemie of Mankind, working vpon these as vpon the rest of Gods creatures, long time abused the Heathen by teaching them to obserue the flying of Fowles, and thereby to iudge of good or ill successe in the War: & (withall) to look into their entrails for the same, as if God had written the secrets of vnsearchable providence in the liuers and bowels of birds and beasts. Again, because it pleased God sometimes by Dreames, not onely to warne and teach his Prophets and Apostles, but Heathen Princes also; as Abimelech to restore Sara to Abraham; because he admonished Ioseph, and by Dream informed Isaac, Isaac, Pharao, Salomon, Paul, Ananias, the Magi of the East, and others. For as it is remembered in Iob: In Dreames and Visions of the night when sleepe fallerh vpon men, &c. then God openeth the eares, that he might cause man to retorne from his enterprise: therefore, I say, both the Devill also praefise his Diuinations by Dreames, or (after Parisien) diuinitatis imitationes, his mocke-diuitie. This in the end grew so common, as Aristides compiled an Ephemerides of his owne Dreames: Mithridates of those of his Concubines. Yet the Romans finding the inconuenience hereof, because all dreams (without distinction of cases) were drawn to Diuination, forbid the same by a Law, as by the words of prohibition (aut narrandi somniis occultam aliquam artem diuinandi) it may appeare. Likewise by the Law of God in Deuteronomie, cap. 13. seducing Dreamers were ordered to be slaine. Yet it is to be contemned, not that Mareus Antonius was told a remedy in his Dream for two grievous diseases that opprest him; nor that of Alexander Macedon for the cure of Phalomyes poisoned wound; nor that which Saint Augustine reporteth of a Millanoise, whose son (the Father dead) being demanded a debt already paid, was told by his Father in a dream where the Acquittance lay to discharge it: nor that that of Aslyages of his Daughter, and many others of like nature. Of the reason of all vvhich, forasmuch as the cause is not in our selues, this place denieth dispute.

§. IIII.

That Daniels mistaking Nabuchodonosors condemning of the Magicians, doth not iustifie all their practises.

DEUT. 12. 6. 8.
LEUIT. 20.

BVt it may be objected, that if such Diuinations as the Heathens commonly vsed were to be condemned in them, who tooke on them very many & strange Reuelations; how came it to passe that Daniel both condemned the hastic sentence of Nabuchodonosor against the Magicians of Chaldaea, and in a sort forbid it? especially considering that such kind of people God himself commanded to be flaine. To this, diuers answers many be giuen. First, it seemeth that Daniel had respect to those Chaldaes, because they acknowledged that the Dreame of the king, which himself had forgotten, could not be knowne to any man by any Art either Naturall or Diabollicall: For there is none other (saide the Chaldaes) that can declare it before the king, except the Gods, whose dwelling is not with flesh: and herein they confessed the power of the Euer-liuing God.

Secondly, it may be conjectured (and that with good reason) that among so many learned men, some of them did not exorcise themselves in any euill or vnlawfull Arts, but were merely Magicians and Naturalists: & therefore when the king commanded to kill all, Daniel perswaded the contrary, & called it a hasty iudgement, which proceeded with furie without examination. And that some of those mens studies and professions were lawfull, it may be gathered by Daniels instruction: for himself had bin taught by them, and was called chiefe of the Inchanters: of which some were termed Sooth-sayers, others Astrologians, others Chaldeans, others Magi or Wise-men: and therefore of distinct professions.

Thirdly, Daniel misliked and forbad the execution of that iudgement, because it was vnjust. For howsoeuer those men might deferue punishment for the practice of vnlawfull Arts (though not vnlawfull according to the Law of that State) yet herein they were altogether guiltlesse. For it exceeded humane power to pierce the Kings thought, which the Diuell himselfe could not know. So then in Daniels dislike, and hindring of the execution of sentence of death pronounced against the Magicians, there is no absolute iustifying of their practice and profession.

§. V.

The abuse of things which may be found in all kinds, is not to condemn the right use of them.

NOtwithstanding this mixture euery where, of good with euil, of falf-hood with truth, of corruption with cleanness and purity : The good, The truth, The purity in euery kind may well be embraced : As in the ancient whorshipping of ⁴⁰ God by Sacrifice, there was no man knowing God among the Elders, that therefore forbore to offer Sacrifice to the God of all power, because the Diuell in the Image of Baal Astaroth, Chemosh, Isupier, Apollo, and the like was so odored.

Εὐσεβ. καὶ Ἀν-δρ. ὁ Πρωτ.

Neither did the abuse of Astrologie terrifie Abraham (if we may beleue the most ancient and religious Historians) from obseruing the motions and natures of heavenly bodies: neither can it deliort wise and learned men in these dayes from attributing those vertues, influences, and inclinations to the Starrs and other lights of Heauen, which God hath giuen to those his glorious creatures.

The Sympatheticall and Antipatheticall working of Herbes, Plants, Stones, Minerals with their other vnmort vertues, sometimes taught by the Diuell, and applyed by his Mis-niflers to harmefull and vncharitable ends, can neuer terrifie the honest & learned Physician or Magician from the vifing of them to the helpe & comfort of Mankind: neither can the illufions, whereby the Diuell betrayeth fuch men as are fallen from God, make other men receiue the obferuations of Dreames; fo farre as vvith a good Faith and a Religious caution they may make vfe of them.

Deut. 18. 20.

Lastly, the prohibition to make flying of Fowles (as signes of good or euill successe) hath no reference at all to the crying of Crowes against Ruine, or to any obseruation not superstitious, and whereof a reason or cause may be giuen. For if we confound Arts with the abuse of them, we shall not only condemn all honest Trades and entercarge among men (for there are that deceiue in all professions) but we shall in a short time bury in forgetfulness all excellent knowledge and all learning, or obscure & couer it ouer with a most scornfull and beggarly ignorance & as Plinie teacheth we should shew our selues ingratos erga eos, qui laborem curag, lucem nobis aperuerunt in hac luce: Vntankefull we should shew our selues towards those, who with paines and care haue discovered vnto vs light in this light.

Indeed not only these naturall knowledges are condemned by those that are ignorant, but the Mathematicks also and Professers thereof : though those that are excellently learned iudge of it in this sort : In speculo Mathematico verum illud, quod in omni (sibi)li quæritur, elucet : non modo remotæ similitudine, sed suis quædam propinquitatibus. Crisp. comp. Theol. c. 1. In the Glasse of the Mathematicks that Truth doth shine, which is sought in every kinde of Knowledge : not in an obscuring image, but in a cleere and manifest representation.

§. VI.

Of the diuers kindes of unlawfull Magicke.

IT is true that there are many Arts, if we may so call them, which are covered with the name of Magicke: and esteemed absurdly to bee as branches of that Tree, on whose root they neuer grew. The first of these hath the name of Necromancy or Goetia: and of this again there are diuers kinds. The one is an Inuocation at the graues of the dead, to whom the Diuell himselfe giues answer in stead of those that seeme to appeare. For certaintie it, that the immortall soules of men doe not inhabit the dust and dead bodies, but they giue motion and vnderstanding to the liuing: death being nothing elsse but a separation of the body and soule: and therefore the soule is not to be found in the Graues.

A second practice of those men, who pay Tribute or are in league with Satan, is that of coniuring or of raising vp Diuels, of whom they hope to learne what they list. These men are so distract, as they beleue that by terrible words they make the Diuell to tremble; that being once impaled in a Circle (a Circle which cannot keep out a Mouſe) they therein (as they suppose) inſconce themselves against that great Monster. Doubtlesſe, they forget that the Diuell is not terrified from doing ill, and all that is contrary to God and goodnesſe, no, not by the fearefull word of the Almighty: and that hee feared not to offer to sit in Gods ſeate, that he made no ſcruple to tempt our Saviour Chriſt, whom himſelfe called the Sonne of God. So, forgetting theſe proud parts of his, an vnworthy wretch will yet reſolue himſelf, that he can draw the Diuell out of Hell, and terrifie him with a Phraſe: whereas in very truth, the obedience which the Diuels ſeeme to vie, is but thereby to poſſeſſe themſelves of the bodies and ſoules of thoſe which raiſe them vp; as His Maieſtie in his Booke aforenamed hath excellently taught: That the Diuels obedience is only, ſecundum quid, ſcilicet ex paillo; reſpectiue, that is, upon bargain.

I cannot tell what they can doe upon those fimple and ignorant Diuels, which inhibit Tamblicke imagination; but sure I am the rest are apt enough to come vncalled: and alwaies attending the cogitations of their seruants and vassalls, do no way need any such enforcement.

Or it may be that these Coniurers deale altogether with Cardans mortal Diuels, following the opinion of Rabbi Ananathan and of Porphyrius, who taught that these kinde of Diuels liued not aboue a thousand yeares: which Plutarch in his Treatise de Oraculorum defectu confirmeth, making example of the great god Pan. For were it true that the Diuels were in awe of wicked men, or could be compelled by them, then would they alwayes feare those words and threats, by which at other times they are willingly mastered. But the Familiar of Simon Magus when hee had lifted him vp in the Ayre, cast him headlong out of his clawes, when hee was sure he should perish with the fall. If this perhaps were done by S. Peters Prayers (of which S. Peter no where vaunteth) yet the same prankce at other times vpon his owne accord the Diuell played with Theodotus: who tranported (as Simon Magus was supposed to haue been) had the fame mortall fall that he had. The like successe had Budas, a principall pillar of the Manichee Heresie.

every day; that the Diuell leaves all Witches and Sorcerers at the Gallows, for whom at other times he maketh himselfe a Pegasus, to conueigh them in haste to places far distant, or at least makes them so thinke: For to those that receiued not the truth (saith Saint Paul, God shall send them strong illusions. Of these their supposed transporations (yet agreeing with their confessions) His Maiesie in the second Booke & the fourth Chapter of the Demonologie, hath confirmed by vnanswerable reasons, that they are merely illusive. Another sort there are who take on them to include Spirits in Glasses & Crytalls, of whom Cusanus: Falsi sunt incantatores, qui in uestigio & vitro volunt spiritum includere; quia Spiritus non clauditur corpore. They are foolish Inchanters, which will shut up their spirits within their nailes or in Glasse for a Spirit cannot be inclosed by a body.

There is also another Art besides the afore-mentioned, which they call Theurgia, or white Magicke; a pretended conference with good Spirits or Angels, whom by Sacrifice and Inuocation they draw out of Heauen, and communicate withall. But the administering Spirits of God, as they require not any kind of adoration due vnto their Creator, so seeing they are most free Spirits, there is no man to absurd to thinke (except the diuell haue corrupted his vnderstanding) that they can be constrained or commanded out of Heauen by threats. Wherefore let the professors thereof couer themselves how they please by a professed puritie of life, by the ministerie of Infants, by fasting & abstinence in generally, yet all those that tamper with immateriall substances and abstract natures, either by Sacrifice, Vow, or Inforcement, are men of euill faith, and in the power of Satan. For good Spirits or Angels cannot be constrained; and the rest are Diuels, which willingly obey.

Other sorts there are of wicked Diuinations: as by fire, called Pyromantia; by water, called Hydromantia; by the ayre, called Meteoromantia, and the like.

The last, and (indeed) the worst of all other is Falsination or Witchcraft: the Practisers whereof are no lesse enuious and cruell, reuengefull & bloody, than the Diuell himselfe. And these accursed creatures haue sold their foules to the Diuell, worke two wayes; either by the Diuell immediately, or by the art of poysoning. The difference betwene Necromancers and Witches, His Maiesie hath excellently taught in a word: that the one (in a sort) commandeth; the other obey the Diuell.

There is another kind of petty Witchery (if it be not altogether deceit) which they call charming of Beasts and Birds, of which Pythagoras was accused, because an Eagle lighted on his shoulder in the Olympian fields. But if the same exceeded the Art of Falsination, yet was it no more to be admired then *Mahomet*s Doue, vvhich he had vsed to feed with Wheate out of his care: which Doue, when it was hungrie, lighted on *Mahomet*s shoulder, and thrust his Bill therein to finde his breake-fast: Mahomet perswading the rude and simple Arabians, that it was the Holy Ghost that gaue him aduice. And certainly if Banks had liued in elder times, he would haue shamed all the Inchanters of the World: for whoeuer was most famous among them, could neuer master or influe any beast as he did his Horse.

For the drawing of Serpents out of their Dens, or killing of them in the holes by Inchantments (which the Marisians a people of Italie practised: Colubros disrumpit Maris cantu: inchanting Maris makes the snakes to burst.) That it hath bene vsed it appears, Psalm 58. 6. though I doubt not, but that many Impostures may be in this kinde; and such by naturall causes it may be done. For there are many Fumes that will either draw them out or destroy them; as womens haire burnt, and the like. So many things may be layed in the entrance of their holes that will allure them: and therein I find no other Magick or Inchantments than to draw out a Moufe with a piece of tosted Cheefe.

Of diuers wayes by which the Diuell seemeth to worke his wonders.

BVt to the end that we may not dote with the Manichees, who make two powers of gods: that we doe not giue to the Diuell any other dominion than he hath (not to speake of his abilitie, when he is the Minister of Gods vengeance; as when Egypt, according to Daniel, was destroyed by euill Angels) he otherwise worketh but three wayes. The first is by mouing the cogitations and affections of men: The second

second by the exquisite knowledge of Nature: and the third by deceit, illusion, and false semblance. And that they cannot worke what they would, G. Parisiensis giueth three causes: the first, a naturall impotency: the second, their owne reason diffusing them from daring ouermuch, or indeed (and that which is the only certaine cause) the great mercy of the Creator, Tenens obligatus (saith the same Author) velut inmanissimas bel- Sial. parisi. de luis. S. Auguſtine vvas of opinion that the Froegges which *Pharaoh*s Sorcerers produ- uenerunt. p. 2.
ced were not naturall, but that the Diuell (by betraying of their senses that looked on) made them appeare to be such. For as Airius obserueth, those Froegges of the Inchanters were not found corrupted as those of Moses were, vvhich might argue that they were not creatures indeed. Hereof saith Saint Augustine: Nec sancti Demones naturas creant, sed que a Deo creatæ sunt commutant, ut videantur esse quod non sunt: The Diuels create not any Maxima: in est
phantasia ad
natures, but so change those that are created by God, as they seeme to be that which they be not: of which in the 83. question he giueth the reason. Demon quibusdam nebulis implet omnes creatas intelligentias, per quos aperire lumen rationis radius uicinis solet, (that is) The Diuell fills with certaine clouds all passages of the vnderstanding, by which the beame of the minde is wont to open the light of reason.

And as Tertulian in his Booke de anima rightly conceiueth, if the Diuell can possesse himselfe of the eyes of our mindes, and blindethem, it is not hard for him to dazell those of the body. For (out of doubt) by the same way that God passeth out, the Diuell entereh in, beginning with the fantastic, by which he doth more easily betray the other faculties of the soule: for the fantastic is most apt to be abused by vaine apprehensions.

Aquinas on the contrary held that those Froegges were not imaginarie, but such indeed as they seemed: not made Magice artis ludibrio, which indeed agreeth not with the Art, but (according to Thomas) Per aptam & idoneam agentium & patientium applicationem: By an apt and fit applying of agents and patients. And this I take to be more probable. For Moses could not be deceived by that sleight of false semblance; and Saint Auguſtine in another case like vnto this (to wit) of the turning of Dionedes his companions into Birds, per aliam cum passiuum, inclineth rather to this opinion: though I am not perwaded that Saint Auguſtine beleueed that of Dionedes. And this opinion of Thomas, G. Parisiensis a man very learned aldo confirmeth. For speaking of natural Magick he vseth these words De his quodam autem operibus est subita generatio ranarum, & pedicularum, & vermium, aliorumque animalium quorundam: in quibus omnibus sola natura operatur, verum adhibitis adiutoribus, quibus ipsa sensu natura conſortant & accunt, ita ut eorum generationis tantum accelerent, ut eis qui hoc nesciunt non opus natura videatur (que tardius talia efficere conſuevit) sed potentia Daemonum, &c. to which he addeth: Qui autem in his deſci sunt, talia non mirantur, sed solum Creatorem in his glorificant: In such workes (saith he) the sodaine generation of Froegges and Lice, and Wormes, and some other creatures is: in all which Nature alone worketh, but by meanes strengthening the Seeds of Nature, and quickning them, in such wise that they so hasten the works of generation, that it seemeth to the ignorant not to be the works of Nature, which usually worketh more leifurely, but they thinke it is done by the powers of Diuels. But they who are learned in these Arts, maruaile not at such working, but glorifie the Creator. Now by these two wayes the Diuels doe must frequently worke, (to wit) by knowing the secretmost of nature; and by illusion: for their is no incomprehensible or vnsearchable power, but of God onely.

For shall we say, he causeth sometimes thunders, lightnings, and tempests, and can infect the ayre, as well as moue it or compress it; who knows not that these things are also naturall? Or may it be objected that he fore-telleth things before they happen, which exceedeth nature, and is no illusion. It is true, that he sometimes doth it; but howe
In elder ages he stole his knowledge out of the predictions of the Prophets: & he fore-told the death of Saul, at such time as he vvas in his own possession & power to dispose of. And he that hath liued from the infancie of the world to this day, and obserued the successe of euery counsaile: he that by reason of his swift motions can informe himselfe of all places, and preparations; he that is of counsaile with all those that studie & practise subuersion and destruction: he that is Prince of the ayre, and can thence better iudge, than those that inhabite the earth: if he should not, sometimes, yea if he should not very oftentimes gueſſe rightly of things to come (where God pleaseh not to giue impediment) it were very strange. For we see that wife and learned men doe oftentimes oftentimes by comparing like causes conceiue rightly of like effects, before they happen: and yet where the Diuell doubteth and would willingly keepe his credit, he euer more answereth by Riddles: as Croesus Halym penetrans magnam subuertit opum vim;

If Croesus ouer Halys goe,
Great Kingdome he shall ouerthrow.

Which answer may be taken either vway: either for the ouerthrow of his own Kingdome, or of his Enemies. And thus far we grant the Diuell may proceed in predictions, which (otherwise) belong to God onely; as it is in Esay: Show the things that are to come hereafter, that we may know that ye are Gods; shew vs at all times and certainly what is to come. Solius enim diuina intelligentia sapientia est, occulta nosse & reuelare; it is only proper to Gods understanding and wisdom, to know and reueale hidden things.

§. VIII.

That none was euer raised from the dead by the power of the Diuell: and that it was not the true Samuel which appeared to Saul.

TO conclude, it may be objected that the Diuell hath raised from the dead: and that others by his power haue done the like, as in the example giuen of Samuel raised by the Witch of Endor: which were it true, then might it indeed be affirmed, that some of the Diuels acts exceeded all the powers of nature, false semblance, & other illusions. In fine Martyr was sometime of the opinion, that it was Samuel indeed; and so was Ambrose, Lyra, and Burgensis; from vvhich authorities those men borrow strength vvhich so beleue. But Martyr changed his opinion, & so did S. Augustine, who at first seemed to be indifferent: For in his questions vpon the Old and New Testament, he accounteth it detestable to thinke that it was Samuel which appeared: & these be his vvords elsewhere to the same effect: In requie sunt animae piorum à corpore separate, impiorum autem penas lunt, donec istarum ad vitam aeternam, illarum vero ad aeternam mortem que secunda dicitur corpora reuiuiscant; The soules of the goodly separated from their bodies are at rest, but those of the wicked suffer punishment, till the bodies of the iust rise to eternall life, and of the wicked to an eternall and second death.

And (besides S. Augustine) In fine Martyr, Helarius, Tertullian, Athanasius, Chrysostome, and others, beleueed firmly, and taught it: that the soules of men being once separate from their bodies, did not wander on the earth at all: Credere debemus (saith Cyril) quum à corporibus sanctorum animae abierint, tanquam in manus charissimi patris Bonitati diuinae commendari; we must beleue when the soules of holy men are departed from their bodies, that they be commended to the diuine Goodnesse, as into the hands of a most deare Father. If then they be in Heauen, the power of the Diuell cannot stretch so high: if in Hell, Ab inferno nulla est redemptio; From hell there is no redemption. For there are but two habitations after death: Pnum (saith Augustine) in igne aeterno; alterum in regno aeterno; The one in eternall fire, the other in Gods eternall Kingdome. And though it be written in Iure Pontificis, that many there are who beleue that the dead haue againe appeared to the liuing; yet the Glosse vpon the same Text findes it ridiculous: Credunt & male quia sunt Phantasmas (saith the Glosse) They beleue, and they beleue amisse, because they be but Phantasmes, or Apparitions. For whereas any such voice hath bene heard, saying, I am the Soule of such a one: Hec oratio à fraude atq. deceptione diabolica est; That speech is framed by the fraud and deception of the Diuell, saith Chrysostome. Likewise of the same, saith Tertullian: Ab sit ut animam cuiuslibet sancti, nedum Propheta, à demonio credamus extrahi; God forbid that we should thinke that the soule of any holy man, much lesse of a Prophet, should be drawn up againe by a Diuell.

It is true that the Scriptures call that apparition Samuel; so doe they the wooden images Cherubim: and false brazen gods are gods, and the like. And whereas these of the contrary opinion build vpon that place of the 26. of Ecclesiasticus (a booke not numbered among the Canonical Scriptures, as S. Augustine himselfe in his Treatise, if it be his, De cura promouenda agenda, confesseth) yet Siracides following the literall sense and phrase of the Scriptures, proueth nothing at all: For though the Diuell would willingly per-

swade, that the soules (yea euen of iust men) were in his power; yet so farre is it from the promises of the Scriptures, and from Gods iust and mercifull nature, and so contrary to all diuine reason, as Saint Augustine (for whose euer wrote that booke before cited) might rightly terme it a detestable opinion so to thinke. For if God had so absolutely forsaken Saul, that he refused to answer him either by Dreames, by Vision, or by his Prophets: it were foolish to conceiue, that he would permit the Diuell, or a wicked Witch, to raise a Prophet from the dead in Sauls respect: it being also contrary to his own diuine Law to aske counsaile of the dead; as in Deuteronomie 18. and elsewhere. Therefore it vvast the Diuell, and not the soule of a dead body, that gaue answer and aduice.

But because Helios and Helizem had raised some from the dead by the power of God, those Diuels which S. Augustine calleth Indicantes animantium sibi subiectorum, Mockers of their owne vassals, casting before their eyes a semblance of humane bodies, and framing sounds to their eares like the voyces of men, do also perwade their gracelesse and accursed attendants, that themselves both possesse, and haue power ouer the soules of men. Indit Diabolus aciem tum spectantium, tum etiam cogitantium, saith L. Vives; The Devil beguileth the sense both of the beholders, and of those that so imagine. These then are the bounds of the Diuels power, whom if we will not feare, we must feare to sinne. For when hee is not the instrument of Gods vengeance, he can touch no man that makes not himself his voluntary vassall: Potest ad malum inuicare, non potest trahere, saith S. Augustine, he can allure, but he cannot inforce to euill. Such as thinke otherwife, may goe into the number remembered by Lucretius:

In tenebris metuant: sic nos in luce timemus.*

We feare by light, as children in the darke.

CHAP. XII.

Of the memorable buildings of Ninus, and of his Wife Semiramis, and of other of her Acts.

§. I.

Of the magnificent building of Nineue by Ninus: and of Babylon by Semiramis.

BVt to come backe to Ninus the amplifier and finisher of Nineue: whether he performed it before or after the ouerthrow of Zoroaster, it is vncertaine. As for the City it selfe, it is agreed by all prophane Writers, and confirmed by the Scriptures, that it exceeded all other in circuit, and answerable magnificence. For it had in compass 440. stadia, or furlongs: the vvalls whereof vvcre an hundred foot vpright, and had such a breadth as three Chariots might passe on the Rampire in front: these vvalls were garnished with 1500. Towers vvvhich gaue exceeding beauty to the rest, and strength, no lesse admirable for the nature of those times.

But this City (built in the Plaines of Assyria, and on the banks of Tygris, and in the Region of Eden) was founded long before Ninus time; and (as ancient Historians report, & more lately Naclerus) had the name of Campfor, at such time as Ninus amplified the same, and gaue it a wall, and called it after his owne name.

For these vvorkes of Babylon and Nineue begun by Nimrod in Chaldea, and in Assyria, Ninus and Semiramis made perfect. Ninus finished Nineue, Semiramis Babylon: vvherein she sought to exceede her husband by furre. Indeed in the first Age when Princes were moderate, they neither thought how to inuade others, nor feared to be inuaded: labouring to build Townes and Villages for the vse of themselves and their people, without either Walls or Towers; and how they might discharge the earth of Woods, Byrars, Bushments, and Waters, to make it more habitable and fertile. But Semiramis liuing in that Age, when Ambition was in strong youth: and purposing to follow the conquest which her husband had vnder-taken, gaue that beauty and strength to Babylon which it had.

§. II.

Of the end of Ninus: and beginning of Semiramis reigne.

This shee did after the death of her husband Ninus: vho after hee had mastered Babylonia, and subiected vnto his Empire all those Regions betwene it and the Mediterranean Sea and Hellepont (Asia the lesse excepted) and finished the vvorke of Nineue, he left the World in the yeare thereof 2019. after he had reigned 52. yeares. Plutarch reporteth that Semiramis desired her husband Ninus, that he vould grant vnto her the absolute soueraigne power for one day. Diod. Siculus out of Athenæus, and others, speakes of five dayes. In which time (moued either with desire of rule, or licentious liberty, or with the memory of her husband Menon, who perished for her) shee caused Ninus her husband to be slaine. But this seemeth rather a scandall cast on her by the Greeks, than that it had any truth.

Luce.

Howsoever Ninus came to his end, Semiramis took on her after his death the sole rule of the Assyrian Empire: of which, Ninus was said to be the first Monarch, because hee changed his seat from Babylonia in Chaldea, to Nineue in Assyria. Iustin reports, that Semiramis (the better to inuict her selfe, and in her beginning without murmur or offence to take on her so great a charge) presented her selfe to the people in the person of her son Ninias or Zameis, who bare her externall forme and proportion without any sensible difference.

This report I take also to be fained, for which many arguments might be made. But as she ruled long, so she performed all those memorable acts which are written of her by the name of Semiramis, and subscribed that letter which she sent to the King of India (her last challenge and vnder-taken conquest) by her owne name. And were it true that her sonne Ninias had such a stature at his Fathers death, as that Semiramis (vho vvas very performable) could be taken for him; yet it is very unlikely that she could haue held the Empire from him 42. yeares after by any such subtilty: (for so long shee reigned after the death of her husband:) but it may be true that Ninias or Zameis (being wholly giuen to his pleasures, as it is written of him) was well pleased with his Mothers prosperous government and vnder-takings.

§. III.

Of Semiramis parentage and education, and Metamorphosis of her Mother.

Some Writers (of which Plutarch is one) make this famous woman to haue beene of base parentage, calling her after the name of her Country, a Syrian. Verofus calls her after the name of her City wherein shee was borne, Semiramis Ascalonitis; of Ascalon, the ancient City and Metropolis of the Philistines. Others report her to be the daughter of Derceta, a Curtizan of Ascalon, exceeding beautifull. Others say that this Derceta or Dercetis, the Mother of Semiramis, was sometimes a Recluse, and had professed a holy and religious life; to whom there was a Temple dedicated, seated on the bankes of a Lake adioyning to Ascalon; and afterward falling in loue with a goodly young man, she was by him made with child, which (for feare of extreme punishment) shee conueyed away, and caused the same to be hidden among the high reedes which grew on the bankes of the Lake: in vvhich (while the child was left to the mercy of vvilde beasts) the same was fed by certaine birds, which vsed to feed vpon or nere those waters. But I take this tale to be like that of Lupa the Harlot that fostered Romulus. For some one or other adioyning to this Lake, had the charge and fosteridge of this child, who being per chance but some base and obscure creature, the mother might thereby hope the better to couer her dishonor and breach of vow; notwithstanding vvhich she was cast from the top of her Temple into the Lake adioyning, & (as the Poets haue fained) changed by Venus into a Fish, all but her face, which still held the same beauty & humane shape. It is thought that from this Derceta the inuention of that Idoll of the Philistines (called Dagon) was taken: for it is true, that Dagon had a mans face, and a fishes body:

into whole Temple when the Gifts of God was brought, this Idoll fell twice to the ground: and at the second fall there remained onely the Trunke of Dagon, the head being broken off: For so Semiramis hath converted that place to Ascalon, Tyrus, and Vania, written by Dagon only, which signifieth a fish; and to Ascalon appeared: the head thereof by the second fall being fained from the body.

For my selfe I rather think, that this Dagon of the Philistines was an Idoll representing Tristram, one of those imaginary Sea-gods vnder Ascalon North City being marititime (as all those of the Philistines were, and so were the best of Phoenicia), vvhich all their deuotions to Nephtune and the rest of the petty gods which attended him, was equiualed.

10 Plutarch reporteth that Semiramis was the first that vnder her name began the conquest of her Expedition into India, and death after a discomfiture with the King of India, the probability of her death.

But for her Pedigree, I leave it to the Assyrians themselves, and for her vicious life I ascribe the report thereof to the enuious and lying Cyprians. For delicacy and ease doe more often accompany licentious life in men and women, than labour and hazzard doe. And if the truth be as it is reported of this Lady, then there neuer liued any Prince or Princess more worthy of famous punishment, was both for the woes shee did at Babylon and India, and for the waues shee made with glorious success: all but her last enterprise of India, from whence both Strabo and Arianus report that shee returned: and that of all her most powerfull Army there furnished but onely twenty persons: the rest being either drowned in the Riuer of Indus, dead of the famine, or slaine by the sword of Staurobarus. But as the multitude which vvent out are more than reason hath numbred: so were those that returned lesse than could haue escaped of such an Army, as consisted of foure millions and vpwards. For these numbers which shee leuied by her Lieutenant Dercetus (saith Suidas) did consist of Foot-men three millions; of Horse-men one million; of Chariots armed with hooles on each side, one hundred thousand; of those which brought Arabs Camels as many; of Camels for burden two hundred thousand; of raw Hides for all vices three hundred thousand; of Gallies vvhich brazen heads three thousand, by which shee might transport ouer Indus at once three hundred thousand Souldiers: which Gallies were furnished with Syrians, Phenicians, Cilicians, and men of Cyprus. These incredible and impossible numbers, vvhich no one place of the earth was able to nourish had cury man and beast but fed vpon grasse) are taken from the authority of Ctesius whom Diodorus followeth. But as the one may be taxed with many frivolous reports: so Diodorus himselfe hath nothing of certainty, but from Xerxes expedition into Greece and afterwards: whose Army (though the same was farre inferior to that of Semiramis) yet had it weight enough to ouerleade the belief of any reasonable man. For all Authors consent, that Xerxes transported into Greece an Army of 1700000. and gathered together (therein to passe the Hellepont) three thousand Gallies, as Herodotus out of the severall Prouinces whence those Gallies were taken hath collected the number.

But of what multitude soeuer the Army of Semiramis consisted: the same being broken and ouerthrowne by Staurobarus vpon the bankes of Indus, can scarce containe extremum: shee sang her last song; and (as Antiquity hath fained) was changed by the gods into a Dove (the bird of Io, whence it came that the Babylonians gaue a Dove in their ensignes).

50 Of the Temple of Bel in Babylon, and of the Pyramides of Egypt.

Among all her other memorable and magnificent vvorke (besides the vvall of the City of Babylon) the Temple of Bel, erected in the middle of this City, in the midst of the square, which carried four-square of great height and beauty, hauing on the top thereof a Brazen Gates curiously engrauen. In the Core of the square shee raised a Towre of a furlong high, which is halfe a quarter of a mile; and vpon it againe (taking a Basis of a lesse circuit) shee set a second Towre; and so eight in all, one aboue another: vpon the top whereof the Chaldeans Priests Priests made the oblation of the statues, because this Tower out-topped the extraordinary clouds, we get to know that the Babylonians had the Tower built.

By beholding the ruins of this Tower, haue many Trauellers haue deceiued, who suppose that they haue seen a part of Nimrod's Tower, when it was but the foundation of this Temple of Bel: (except this of Bel, which was founded on that of Nimrod.) There were burnt in this Temple one hundred thousand talents of frankincense every year (saith Herodotus.) This Temple did not stand for adorne with the spoiles of Hierusalem, and of the Temple of Solomon, all which vessels and ornaments Cyrus redelivered. This Temple Xerxes adorned with the spoils, which Alexander is said to haue repaired by the persuasions of the Chaldeans. I deny not that it might haue beene in his desire, so to do; but he enioyed but a few yeares after Babylon taken, and therefore could not performe any such worke. The Egyptians (saith Proclus) inhabiting a low and leuell ground, and given to the same superstition of the Stars that the Chaldeans were, erected in imitation, and for the same seruice and vse, the Pyramides by Memphis, which were

THE FIRST PART OF THE HISTORIE OF THE WORLD:

INTREATING OF THE TIMES FROM the birth of ABRAHAM to the destruction of the Temple of Salomon.

THE SECOND BOOKE.

CHAP. I.

Of the time of the birth of Abraham: and of the vse of this question, for the ordering of the Story of the Assyrian Empire.

Of some of the successors of Semiramis: with a briefe transiion to the question, about the time of the birth of Abraham.

After the death of Semiramis, Ninias or Zameis, succeeded her in the Empire, on whom Berosus Ammianus bestowes the conquest of Bactria, and the overthrow of Zoroaster; contrary to Diodorus, Iustine, Orosius, and all other approved Writers. For Ninias being esteemed no man of vvarre at all, but altogether feminine, and subiect to ease and delicacy, there is no probability in that opinion. Now because there was nothing performed by this Ninias of any moment, other than that out of ieaousie hee every yeare changed his Princiouall Gouernors, and built Colledges for the Chaldean Priests, his Astronomers: nor by Arius his successor, whom Suidas calleth Thuras; but that he reduced againe the Bactrians & Caspians, revolted (as it seemeth) in Ninias his time: nor of Aralins, the successor of Arius; but that he added sumptuosity, invented iewels of gold and stone, and some engines for the warre: I will for this present passe them ouer, and a while follow Abraham, whose vvaies are vvarrantable, (till wee meete these Assyrians againe in this story) by whom and by whose issues wee shall best giue date to the Kings of Babylon: Abraham liuing at once with Nimis, Semiramis, Arius, Aralins, and Xerxes of Babilonis. For otherwise if we seeke to proue things certain by the vncertaine, and iudge of those times, which the Scriptures let vs downe without error, by the reignes of the Assyrian Princes: we shall but patch vp the story, at adventure, and leaue it in the same confusion, in which to this day it hath remained. For where the Scriptures doe not helpe vs, Miram non est inueniendus antiqui Babilonis non constare, Nil Plinius Trofus mutare si in rebus uery ancient, History want assistance.

The better therefore to finde out, in what age of the World, and how long these Assyrian kings reigned, as also for other good causes, we must first assure the time of Abrahams birth, and in what yeare the same happed after the flood. Now since all agree, that the fortieth

fortieth three yeare of Ninim was the birth-year of Abraham; by prouing directly out of the Scriptures, in what yeare after the flood the birth of Abraham hapned, we shall thereby set all the rest in square and order. But of this time there is much iangling between those Chronologers, which follow the Hebrew account, and others: the most part making 292. or 293. yeares; others 352. yeares betweene Abrahams birth and the flood: a matter often disputed, but neuer concluded.

Archibechus de temporibus (as we finde him in Annini) makes but 250. yeares from the flood to Ninim: then seeing that Abraham was borne in the fortieth three yeare of Ninim, according to Eusebius and S. Augustine, it followeth by the addition of those two numbers, that the yeare of Abrahams birth was in the yeare after the flood 293. or as the most part of all Chronologers gather, the yeare 292.

Now, since I doe here enter into that neuer-resolved question, & Labyrinth of times, it behoueth me to giue reason for my own opinion: and with so much the greater care and circumspection, because I walk aside, and in a way apart from the multitude, yet not alone, & without companions, though the fewer in number: with whom I rather choose to endure the wounds of those darts, which Enuie casteth at nouely, than to go on safely and sleepily in the easie waies of ancient mistakings: seeing to be learned in many errors, or to be ignorant in all things, hath little diuerfity.

§. II.

A proposall of reasons or arguments, that are brought to proue Abraham was borne in the yeare 292. after the flood, and not in the yeare 352.

THose which seeke to proue this account of 292. yeares, betweene the generall flood and Abrahams birth, ground themselves, first on these words of the Scriptures: So Terah liued 70. yeares, and begot Abraham, Nahor, and Haran: secondly, vpon the opinion of Iosephus, S. Augustine, Beza, Isidore, & many of the ancient Hebrewes before them: authorities (while they are slightly lookt ouer) seeming of great weight.

From the place of Scripture last remembered, the later Chronologers gather these arguments. First out of the words as they lie; That Terah at 70. yeares begot Abraham, Nahor, and Haran: and that Abraham being the first named, Abraham being the worthiest, Abraham being the son of the promise, ought in this respect to be accounted the eldest sonne of Terah, and so necessarily borne in the seuentieth yeare of his life. Secondly, it was of Abraham that Moses had respect, in whom the Church of God was continued, who was heire of the blessing; and not of Nahor and Haran: for the scope of this Chapter was to set downe the Genealogy of Christ, from Adam to Abraham, without all regard of Nahor, and Haran.

It is thirdly objected, that if Abraham were not the eldest sonne, then there can be no certainty of his age, and so are all future times made doubtfull. For it cannot then bee proued, that Abraham was borne more assuredly in the 130. yeare of Terah his age, than 40. in the 131. 132. &c. Moses hauing no where set downe precisely that Abraham went into Canaan that very yeare, in which his Father died.

Fourthly, it is thought improbable, that Terah begot Abraham at 130. yeares: seeing Abraham himselfe thought it a wonder to be made a Father at 100. yeares:

§. III.

The answer to one of the objections proposed, shewing that Abraham made but one journey out of Mesopotamia into Canaan: and is, after his Fathers death.

TO answer all which objections, it is very easie, the way being prepared thereto by diuers learned Diuines: long since; and to which I will adde somewhat of mine owne, according to the small talent which God hath giuen me. Now forasmuch as the state of the question cannot well be scanned, vnlesse the time of Abrahams journey into Canaan be first considered; before I descend vnto the particular examination of these arguments, I will make bold with order and method to shew, as to search into a strange tradition concerning his trauiels; that serueth as a ground for this opinion: and a bulwarke against all that can be said to the contrary.

But it is conceived that Abraham made two journeys into Canaan; the latter after his Fathers Fathers death, the former presently vpon his calling; which hee performed: without delay, not staying for his fathers death at Haran: a coniecture, drawn from a place in the Epistle to the Hebreues, where it is written, By faith Abraham (when he was called) obeyed God, to goe out into a place which he should afterward receiue for inheritance: and hee went out, not knowing whither he went. This supposition (if it be granted) serueth very well to vphold the opinion, that can ill stand without it. Let vs therefore see whether we may giue credit to the supposition it selfe.

Surely, that Abraham first departed Charran or Haran after the death of Terah his Father, the same is proued, without the admission of any distinction, by these words of St. Stephen: And after his Father was dead, God brought him into this Land, where ye now dwell, that was, out of Haran into Canaan. Against which place so direct, & plaine, what force hath any mans fancy or supposition, perfwading, that Abraham made two iournies into Canaan; one before Terah's death, & another after: no such thing being found in Scriptures, nor any circumstance, probability, or reason to induce it? For if any man out of this place before alledged can pick any argument, prouing, or affording any strong presumption, that Abraham past into Canaan, and then returned vnto Haran, from whence he departed a second time: then I thinke it reason, that hee be beleued in the rest. But that hee performed the commendement of God after his Fathers death, leauing Ur and Haran for Canaan, it is as true as the Scriptures themselves are true. For after his Father was dead, (saith Martyr Stephen) God brought him into this Land. And, as Beza noteth, if Abraham made a double iourney into Canaan, then must it be inferred, that Moses omitted the one, and Stephen afterwards remembered the other: and whence had Stephen, saith Beza, the knowledge of Abrahams coming into Canaan, but out of Moses? For if Stephen had spoken any thing of those times, differing from Moses, he had offered the Iewes, his aduersaries, too great an occasion both of scandalizing himselfe, & the Gospell of Christ. Indeed we shall finde small reason to make vs thinke that Abraham passed and repassed those wayes, more often than he was enforced so to doe, if we consider, that he had no other guide or comforter in this long and wearisome iourney, than the strength of his faith in Gods promise: in which if any thing would haue brought him to despair, he had more cause than euer man had to fall into it. For he came into a Region of strong and stubborne nations: a nation of valiant and resolute Idolaters. Hee was besieged with famine at his first arriual, and driuen to flee into Egypt for reliefe. His wife was old, and hee had no sonne to inherit the promise. And when God had giuen him Isaac, he commanded him to offer him vp to himself for sacrifice: all which discomforts he patiently and constantly vnderwent.

Secondly, let vs consider the wayes themselves, which Abraham had to passe ouer, the length whereof was 300. English miles; and through Countries of which hee had no manner of experience. He was to transport himselfe ouer the great riuer of Euphrates, to trauell through the dangerous and barren Deserts of Palmyrena, and to climbe ouer the great and high mountaines of Libanus, Hermom or Gilead: and whether these were easie walks for Abraham to march twice ouer, containing, as aforesaid, 300. miles in length, let euery reasonable man iudge. For if he trauelled it twice; then was his iourney in all 1800. miles from Ur to Haran: and from Haran twice into Canaan. But were there no other argument to disproue this fancy; the manner of Abrahams departing from Haran hath more proofe (that hee had not animus reuertendi, nor any thought of looking backe-ward) than any mans bare coniecture, be hee of what antiquity or authority foucer. For thus it is written of him, Then Abraham tooke Sara his wife, and Lot his brothers son, and all their substance that they possessed, and the soules that they had gotten in Haran: and they departed to go to the land of Canaan. & to the land of Canaan they came. Now if Abraham brought all with him that was deare vnto him, his wife, and kinsmen, and his, & their goods: it is not probable that he meant to walke it backe againe for his pleasure, in so warm, dangerous, and barren a Country as that was: or if hee could haue borne thereto moued, it is more likely that he would haue then returned, when he was yet vnsettled, and prest with extreme famine at his first arriual. For had his Father beene then alive, he might haue hoped from him to receiue more assured comfort and reliefe, than among the Egyptians, to whom he was a mere stranger both in religion and Nation.

What the cause might bee of Abrahams returne to Haran, as I will not enquire of them, that without warrant from the Scriptures haue sent him backe thither, about the

the time of his fathers death: so they perhaps, if they were vrged, could say little else, than that without such a second voyage their opinion were not maintainable. One thing in good reason they should do well to make plaine, if it be not ouer-troublesome. They say that Abraham was in Haran at his Fathers death, or some time after, being then by their account 135. yeares old, or a little more. How then did it happen, that hee left quite vndone the businesse, which, as we reade, was within foure or five yeares after that time his greatest, or (as may seeme) his onely care? Did not he binde with a very solemne oath his principall seruant, in whom he reposed most confidence, to trauaile into those parts, and seeke out a Wife for Isaac his sonne? and doth it not appeare by all circumstances, that neither hee nor his seruant were so well acquainted in Mesopotamia, that they could particularly designe any one woman, as a fit match for Isaac? Surely if Abraham had beene there in person so lately, as vvithin foure or five yeares before, hee would not haue forgotten a matter of such importance; but would haue trusted his own iudgement, in choosing a woman, fit for her piety, vertue, and other desirable qualities, to be linked in marriage with his onely sonne, who was then five and thirty yeares old; before which age most of the Patriarches after the Flood had begotten children: rather than haue left all at random to the consideration of a seruant, that neither knew any, nor vv as knowne of any in that Country. But let it be supposed (if it may be beleued) that either Abraham forgot his businesse when he was there, or that somewhat hapned which no man can deuile; What might bee the reason, that Abrahams man, in doing his Masters errand, vv as faine to lay open the whole story of his masters prosperity, telling it as newes, that Sarah had borne to him a sonne in her old age? If Abraham himselfe, a more certaine Author, had so lately bene among them, vvould not all this haue bene an idle tale? It were needlesse to stand long vpon a thing so euident. Whether it were lawfull for Abraham to haue returned backe to Haran, would perhaps bee a question hardly answerable: considering how auerfe hee was from permitting his sonne to be carried thither, euen though a wife of his owne kinned could not haue bene obtained without his personall presence. Jacob indeed was sent thither by his parents, to take a Wife of his owne lineage: nor without Gods especiall approbation, by whose blessing he prospered in that iourney; yet he liued there as a seruant; suffered many iniuries; and finally was druen to conuey himselfe away from thence by flight. For although it bee not a sentence vvritten, yet out of all vvritten examples it may bee obserued, that God alloweth not in his seruants any desire of returning to the place, from whence he hath taken, and transplanted them. That brieft saying, Remember Lots Wife, contains much matter. Let vs consider Mesopotamia from vv whence Abraham was taken, and Egypt, out of which the whole Nation of the Israelites were deliuered: we shall find, that no blessing issued from either of them, to the posterity of the Hebrewes. When Ezechias was visited with an honourable Embassie from Babel, it seemes that he conceiued great pleasure in his minde, and thought it a piece of his prosperity; but the prophesie which there-upon hee heard by Esay, made him to know, that the counsaile of God was not agreeable to such thoughts: which more plainly appeared in a following generation, when by the waters of Babylon they fate downe and vvept. Concerning Egypt vve reade, that Sesac and Neco Kings of Egypt brought calamity vpon Israel: also that their confidence in the Egyptian succours vv as the cause of their destruction. Where they were forbidden to returne into Egypt I doe not remember, nor can readily finde; but it is found in Denteronomy, that God had said, They should no more returne that way; which is giuen, as the reason, why their King might not cause the people to returne to Egypt, for the multiplying of his Horfes. Whether the Lord had laied any such iniunction vpon Abraham of not returning to Mesopotamia, I cannot say; many things do argue it probably: That he neuer returned, all circumstances do (to my vnderstanding) both strongly and necessarily conclude.

But because this double passage of Abraham is but an imagination; and that imaginations of men are rather valuable among children, than that they can perswade those of iudgement or vnderstanding: I take it sufficient, that S. Stephen hath directly taught vs, that Abraham left Haran, his Father being dead. And for the rest, when they shew any one Scripture to proue it, I will beleue as they doe. For all the trauailes of Abraham are precisely set downe in the Scriptures: as first from Ur or Caldeia in Chaldea to Haran or Charan; and then from Haran (after his Fathers death) to Sichem; from Sichem

therewoed to a mountaine betwene Bethel and Hai: thence into Egypt; from Egypt he returned thither againe, where hee and he parted, because their flockes and herds of Cattle were more than could be fed in that part: from thence the second time hee removed to Mamre; adore Hebron: and thence hauing pursued Amraphel, and rescued Lot, hee after inhabited at Gerar, in the border of Idumea, vnder Abimeles: and after neede was at Berfabe, at which time hee was ready to offer vp his sonne Isaac on the mountaine Moriah. But this fiction of his retreat to Haran or Charan, appeareth not in any one story, either diuine or humane. Now, if it may be supposed, that Abraham had made any former iourney into Canaan, as Leuita his Cabala hath faigned, it should in reason be therewithall beleued, that hee would in those his first trauailes haue provided himselfe of some certaine seat, or place of abiding: and not haue come a second time, vvith his wife, kinsmen, family, goods and cattle, not knowing vvhercon to rest himselfe. But Abraham when hee came from Charan, past through the North part of Canaan, thence to Sichem, and the Plaine of Moriah: where, finding no place to inhabit, hee departed thence to Bethel and Hai: and so from Nation to Nation, to discouer and find out some fit habitation: from vv whence againe, as it is vvritten in Genesis the eleuenth, He went forth, going and journeying towards the South: and alwaies vvistled. By occasion of vv which vvinding to and fro, some say, the Egyptians gaue him and his the name of Hebrai: Further, to proue that hee had not formerly bene in the Country, we may note, that ere he came vnto Bethel and Hai, and at his first entrance into Canaan, God appeared vnto him, saying, Vnto thy seede will I giue this Land, shewing it him as vnto a stranger therein, and as a Land to him vvknowne. For Abraham vvithout any other prouident care for himselfe, beleued in the Word of the liuing God: neither sending before, nor comming first to discouer it; but being arriued, hee receiued a second promise from God, that he would giue those Countiees vnto him and his seede to inhabit and inherit.

Lastly, what should moue any man to thinke, that Moses would haue omitted any such double iourney of Abrahams, feeling hee setteth downe all his passages else-where long and short? as when hee moved from Sichem, and feared betwene Hai and Bethel, the distance being but 20. miles: and when hee moued thence to the valley of Mamre, being but 24. miles; and when he left Mamre, and fate downe at Gerar, being lesse than fixe miles; No, Moses past ouer all the times of the first age with the greater breuity; to hasten him to the story of Abraham: shutting vp all betwene the Creation & the Flood in fixe chapters; which age lasted 1656. yeares: but he bestoweth on the story of Abraham foureteen chapters, beginning with his birth in the eleuenth, and ending with his death in the five and twentieth; and this time endured but 175. yeares. It hath therefore no face of truth, that Moses forgot or neglected any thing concerning Abrahams trauels, or other actions: or that he would set downe those small remooues of fixe miles, and omit those of three hundred. For such a iourney in going and comming would haue ministred some variety of matter, or accident, vvorthy the inserting and adding to Abrahams storie.

§. I V.

The answer to another of the obiections proposed, shewing that it was not unlikely, that Terah should beget Abraham in his hundred and thirty yeere.

NOW touching the obiection, where it is said, that it was very vv unlikely that Terah should beget Abraham in his 130. yeare, seeing Abraham himselfe thought it a vvonder to haue a son at an hundred: this is hardly worth the answering. This wonder is indeede mis-cast, and mistaken: Abraham hauing respect onely to Sarah his wife, when he spake of their many yeares. For when the Angel said vnto Abraham in his Tent doore at Mamre, Loe Sarah thy wife shall haue a Son, it followeth in the next verse, Now Abraham and Sarah were old and stricken in age, and it ceased to be vvith Sarah after the manner of women: therefore Sarah laughed, &c.

So then in that it is said, it ceased to be vvith Sarah after the manner of women, it appeareth that the wonder was vvrought on her, and not on Abraham. For Abraham by his second wife Keturah had many sonnes after Sarahs death, as Zimron, Isobab, Medan, Mishan, Ishbak, and Shuah: and the eldest of these was borne 37. yeares after Isaac: and the youngest youngest 40. yeeres after. What strangenesse then, that Terah being 130. yeeres old should beget Abraham, will they say, may be gathered from this supposed despaire of Abraham at one hundred yeeres: For Sarah died in the year of the world 2145. and Isaac was borne in the year 2109; and Abraham did not marry Sarah till Sarah was buried. So if we deduct the number of 2109 out of 2145. there remaineth 36. And therefore if Abraham begot 5. sons 36. yeeres after this supposed wonder, & when Abraham was 137. yeeres old: it is not strange that his Father Terah should beget Abraham at 130. And if Isaac, Obad, and Jesse, who lived so many yeeres and ages after Abraham, begot sonnes at 100. yeeres, or neere it, it cannot be manialed at that Terah begot Abraham at 130; and Abraham others at the same age and seven yeeres after.

§. V.

The answer to two more of the obiections: shewing that wee may haue certaintie of Abrahams age from the Scripture, though we make not Abraham the eldest Sonne; and that there was great cause, why in the story of Abraham his two brethren should be respected.

It followeth now to speake something to the obiection, which brings Abrahams age altogether in doubt, except wee allow him to be the eldest son of Terah, and borne when Terah was 70. yeeres old. For Abrahams age being made vncertaine, all succeeding times are thereby without any perfect rule or knowledge.

But this proposition, That we cannot be certaine of Abrahams age, vnlesse we make him the eldest sonne, is false. For it is plaine in the Scriptures, that when Terah was 205. which was the year of his death, then was Abraham 75. And if you aske, how I can iudge of times, either preceding or succeeding, by knowing that Abraham departed Haran at that age: I answer, That Saint Stephen hath told vs, that Abrahams departure followed the death of his Father Terah: and Terah died at 205. so as the 75. yeere of Abraham was the 205. yeere of Terah: which knowne, there can be no error in the account of times succeeding. Now to come to the obiection, where it is said, That Moses had no respect vnto Nahor and Haran, because they were out of the Church, but to Abraham only, with whom God established the Couenant, and of whom Christ descended according to the flesh, &c. I answer, that Moses for many great and necessary causes had respect of Nahor and Haran. For the succession of Gods Church is not witnessed by Abraham alone, but by the issues of Nahor and Haran, where they Idolaters or otherwise. For Nahor was the Father of Bethuel, & Bethuel of Rebecca, the mother of Israel: and Haran was the parent of Lot, Sarah, and Milcah: and Sarah was mother to Isaac, and grandmother to Jacob: Milcah also the wife of Nahor, and mother of Bethuel, was Jacobs great grandmother: and the age of Sarah the daughter of Haran is especially noted, in that it pleased God to giue her a son at 90. yeeres, and when by nature she could not haue conceived. And therefore, though it were not in regard of themselves, yet because both Nahor and Abraham married the daughters of their brother Haran; and because Isaac married Rebecca the grand-child of Nahor; and Jacob, Lea, and Rachel, the daughters of Laban, the grand-child also of Nahor: it was not superfluous in Moses to giue light of these mens times and ages. And though sometime they worshipped strange gods, as it is 10f. 24. yet I see no cause to thinke, that they still continued Idolaters. For they beleueed and obeyed the calling of Abraham, leauing their naturall Countrey, and City of Ur in Chaldaea, as Abraham did, and remoued thence all, except Haran, who died before his Father Terah, ere they left Chaldaea; but Lot, his sonne, followed Abraham into Canaan; and Sarah, the sister of Lot, Abraham married. Nahor also, who remained at Charan, gaue his sonnes daughters to Isaac, and Isaac, his owne kinsmen: hee himselfe hauing also married in his owne Family, not thinking it pleasing vnto God to mixe themselves with strangers and Idolaters. And that these men at length beleueed in the God of Abraham, it can no way be doubted. For when Laban had seene the seruant of Abraham standing at the Wel beside Charan, he inuited him to his Fathers house in this manner: Come in, thou blessed of Iehouah, &c. And when this seruant of Abrahams demanded an answer as touching Rebecca, then answered Laban and Bethuel, and said, This thing proceeded of Iehouah: meaning, that it was the will of the true God it should be so; wherein he acknowledged Gods providence. Likewise in the following verse it is written, Take, ye that be may be thy Masters sons wife, euen as Iehouah hath said. This their often vying

Gen. 24. 31.

of the name of Iehouah, which is the proper Name of the true God, is a signe that they had the knowledge of him.

Now although it be the opinion of S. Chrysostome, and some later Writers, as Caietan, Oleaster, Musculus, Calvin, Mercer, and others, that Laban was an Idolater, because hee retained certaine Idols, or household gods, which Rachel stole from him; yet that he beleueed in the true God it cannot be denied. For he acknowledged the God of Abraham and of Nahor, and he called Abrahams seruant, blessed of Iehouah, as afore said: So as for my selfe I dare not auow, that these men were out of the Church, who, sure I am, were not out of the faith.

§. VI.

That the naming of Abraham first of the three brethren, Gen. 11. v. 26. doth not proue that he was the eldest: together with diuers reasons prouing that Abraham was not the eldest son of Terah.

TO the maine obiection which I answer last, because it seemeth of most strength, by which, those that strue to shorten the times, endeavour to proue that Abraham was the eldest sonne of Terah, and borne in the 70. yeere of Terahs life: grounding themselves first and chiefly on this place of the Scripture; And Terah liued 70. yeeres, and begot Abraham, Nahor, and Haran: To this I say, that although Abraham in this verse be first named, yet the same is no prooue at all that he was the eldest & first-borne sonne of Terah. For it is no necessary consequence, that the first named in Scriptures was therefore eldest in blood and birth, neither doth it appeare, that it pleased God to make especiall choice of the first sonnes in nature and time: for Seth was not the first-borne of Adam; nor Isaac of Abraham; nor Jacob of Isaac; nor Iuda and Ioseph of Iacob; nor David the eldest of Jesse; nor Salomon of David: as is formerly remembered. But it is written of Noah: Noah was 500. yeeres old, and Noah begot Shem, Ham, and Iaphet: shewing that at the 500. yeere of his age hee began to beget the first of those three sonnes. For according to S. Augustine, speaking generally, Nec attendendus est in his ordo naturatus, sed significatio futura dignitatis: in qua excellit Abraham: The order of naturis is not here to be respected, but the signification of the future dignity: in which Abraham was preferred. And therefore, as in the order of the sonnes of Noah: so is it here; where it is said, that Terah liued 70. yeeres, and begot Abraham, Nahor, and Haran: For it was late ere Terah began to beget Sonnes, himselfe being begotten by his Father Nahor at 29. as other his Ancestors were at 30. The like also happened to Noah: for whereas Adam begot Seth at 130. Enosh Kenan at 90. Kenan Mahalaleel at 70. Mahalaleel tered at 60. Noah was yet 500. yeeres old when he began to beget the first of his three sonnes, as afore said. And S. Augustine in the place before cited, rather inclineth to the opinion that Abraham was the youngest of Terahs sonnes, than otherwise: though for his excellency hee was worthily named first. His owne words are these: Fieri enim potuit ut posterior sit generatus Abraham: sed merito excellentie, quia in Scripturis valde commendatur, prior fuerit nominatus. It might be, saith he, that Abraham was begotten later: but was first named in regard of his excellency, for which in Scripture hee is much commended. So as the naming first or last proueth nothing who was first or last borne: either in those issues of Noah, or in these of Terah: Neither hath God any respect of the eldest in nature, as touching his election or spirituall blessing; for Moses nameth first the children of the promise, and the eldest & first in Gods fauour. Pietas ergo vel ipsa potius electio diuina, quam comitem secum trahit pietatem, &c. Dei timorem, primas partes dat Semo in liberis Noe, &c. Abraham in liberis Thare: Piety, saith he, or rather diuine election, which doth euermore draw with it or after it, piety and the feare of God, gaue place and precedency to Sem among the children of Noah, and to Abraham among those of Thare.

For the rest it is manifest, that Abraham entred Canaan in the 75. yeere of his age. And it was in Canaan that Hagar bare him Isaac, when Abraham had liued 86. yeeres. It was Gen. 12. 4. at Gerar (the South border of Canaan) that Sarah bare Isaac, when Abraham had consumed 100. yeeres. It was from the valley of Mamre in Canaan that Abraham rose out, when he rescued Lot and ouerthrew Amraphel: and he had then but the age of 83. yeeres: and it is as manifest that hee parted from Haran after his Father Terah was dead. But if

Atti 17. 4. Terah

Gen. 14.

Terah begat Abraham at 70. year old, then must Abraham have been 135. yeeres when he first set his foote in Canaan, seeing Terah must be dead ere he parted, and so 70. added to 135. make 205. the true age of Terah: which is contrary to all those places of Scripture before remembered. For he entred at 75. he refused Lot at 83. hee had Ismael at 86. he had Isaac at 100. proued by the former places.

Moreover, if Abraham were the eldest sonne of Terah, and borne in the 70. yeere of his age: then had Terah liued till Isaac had bene 35. yeeres old, and Ismael, 49. both which must then haue bene borne in Mesopotamia, and therein fostered to that age: velle we should either deny credit to S. Stephen, who saith that Abraham departed from Mesopotamia after his Fathers death: or else beleue the interpretation of Daniel Angelicrator, who in his Chronologia antoptica, saith it was about his Fathers death: because the Greek word, αὐτῷ may be transported by the Latine sub, as well as by post: which though elsewhere it may be, yet cannot it be so in this place. For it were most improperly spoken, to say that those things were done about Terahs death, which were 60. yeeres before. Wherefore supposing Abraham to haue bene borne in the seventy yeere of Terah, we must giue those times and places of birth to Abrahams children, which no authority will warrant; For Abraham had no children in Ur or Chaldea, nor in Haran, nor in ten yeeres after his arrivall into Canaan. For the yeere of Terahs death, in which Abraham left Haran, was the yeere of the World 2083. and the yeere of Ismaels birth was the Worlds yeere 2094. which maketh 10. yeeres difference. And that Isaac was borne in Canaan, and was to be offered vpon the mountaine Moriah therein, 39. miles from Bersabe, where Abraham then inhabited: and that three Angels first of all appeared to Abraham in the valley of Mamre, no man doubteth.

And therefore it cannot bee that any of Abrahams sonnes were borne in Mesopotamia: nor while Terah liued; nor in lesse than ten yeeres after Terahs death: and then consequently was not Abraham the eldest sonne of Terah, nor borne in the 70. yeere of Terahs age.

Gen. 12.

Thirdly, whereas Abraham came into Canaan at 75. if Terah had begotten him at 70. then had Terah liued but 145. for 70. and 75. make 145. which must also haue bene the full age of Terah: but Terah liued 205. yeeres; and therefore was not Abraham borne in the 70. yeere of Terah.

Fourthly, the ages of Lot and Sarah make it manifest, that Haran was the elder, if not the eldest brother of Abraham; for Sarah or Isch wanted but ten yeeres of Abrahams age: Isaac being borne when Abraham was 100. and Sarah 90. yeeres old.

It followeth then, that if Abraham had bene the elder brother of Haran, Haran must haue begotten Sarah at nine yeeres old: for granting that Haran was borne but one yeere after Abraham, and Sarah within ten yeeres as old as Abraham, then of necessity must Haran begeth her, when he had liued but nine yeeres; which were too ridiculous to imagine.

And that Isch was Sarah, Rab. Solomon affirmeth; both names, saith he, bearing the same signification, and names of principality. Again, to what end was the word Isch or Ischah inserted in this place, if Sarah were not meant thereby? For to speake of any thing superfluous, it is not vsed in Gods Booke: and if Isch had not belonged to the story, it had bene but an idle name to no purpose remembered.

Now if it had bene true (as those of the contrary opinion affirme) that Moses had no respect of Nabor and Haran, who were notwithstanding the parents of Rehuel and Rebecca, the mother of Israel, and of Christ: what regard then had Moses of Isch in this place, were shee not Sarah; but otherwise an idle name of whom there is nothing else first or last?

The age also of Lot disproueth the eldership of Abraham: for Lot was called an old man when Abraham was but 83. yeeres old: And if Lot were of a greater age than Abraham, and Haran were Father to Lot, Sarah, and Milcah, Abraham marrying one of *Haran*s daughters, and Nabor the other, Sarah also being within ten yeeres as old as Abraham: it may appeare to euery reasonable man (not obstinate and preiudicate) that Haran was the eldest sonne of Terah, and not Abraham: who also died first and before his Father left Ur in Chaldea: Also Lyra reasoneth against the opinion of Abrahams eldership, vpon the same place of Genesis: drawing argument from the age of Sarah, who was but 10. yeeres younger than Abraham him selfe. Lyra his words are these: Si igitur Haran fuit iunior ipso

Abraham,

*Abraham, sequitur quod non habebat decem annos quando genuit Sarah: imò nec octo, &c. and afterwards, & ideo melius videtur dicendum, quod Abraham fuit vltimò natus de tribus filiis Thare, tamen nominatur primò, propter eius dignitatem: & quia ponendum erat caput stirpis & generationis sequentis: & quia primò facta est ei repositio expressa de Christo, sicut supra dictum est de Sem, &c. If therefore (saith Lyra) Haran was younger than Abraham him selfe, it followeth that he was not ten yeeres old when he begat Sarah: And therefore it seemeth better to be said, that Abraham was the last borne of the three sonnes of Thare, neuertheless he is named first for his dignitie, both because hee was to be ordained head of the stocke and generation following, and because the promise of Christ was first made unto him, 10. as before it is said of Sem.*

§. VII.

A conclusion of this dispute, noting the Authors on both sides: with an admonition, that they which shorten the times make all ancient stories the more vnprouable.

IT therefore agreeth with the Scriptures, with Nature, Time, and Reason, that Haran was the eldest sonne of Terah, and not Abraham: and that Abraham was borne in the 130. yeere of Terahs life, and not in the 70. yeere: For Abraham departing Charran after Terah died, according to S. Stephen, and that journey by Abraham performed when he was 75. yeeres old; these two numbers added make 205. yeeres the full age of Terah: seeing that when Terah died, then Abraham entred Canaan. For my selfe, I haue no other end herein than to manifest the truth of the Worlds Story. I reuerence the iudgements of the Fathers: but I know they were mistaken in particulars: Saint Augline was doubtfull, and could not determine this controuersie. For whatsoever is borrowed from him out of his sixteenth Booke de Ciuitate Dei, cap. 15. the same may be answered out of him selfe in his sue and twentieth question vpon Gen. But Saint Augline herein followed Iosephus and Isidor: and Beda followed S. Augline. And it was out of a foolish pride and vanitie, that the Hebrewes and Iosephus sought to make Abraham the first borne: as if God had had respect to the eldest in nature. So did Iosephus together with Nicholus Damascenus (thinking thereby to glorifie the Iewish Nation) make Abraham a king, entitling Sarah by the name of Queene Sarah: and said that Abraham was followed with 318. Captaines, of which euery one had an infinite multitude vnder him, trecentos & octodecem praefectus habuit: quorum singulis infinita multitudo parebat. And that Ishraa invading him with a great Armie, tooke from him his Wife Sarah: Such fables argue that Iosephus is not to bee beleueed, but with discrete referuations.

This account of times, allowing no more than 292. yeeres from the Flood to Abraham, is vpheld by many of the Hebrewes. But how should we value the opinion of such Chronologers, as take Amraphel for Nimrod? Surely, if their iudgement in such matters were worthy to be regarded, it would haue appeared in setting downe the succession of the Persian Kings, vnder whom they liued, whose Historie was not so farre remote in time, as these antiquities, nor wanting the light of many good writers. Yet grossly haue they erred therein, & so familiar are their mistakings in all things of like nature, that we seldom find their opinion rehcarded without the confusion treading on the heels of it. They of the Romane religion are also generally on the same side: it being a thing vniuersall among them, to maintaine whatsoever they haue bene formerly knowne to hold and beleue. Contrariwise, of the more ancient, Theodor, and some following him: of later times Beraaldus, Codoman, Pencer, Caluin, Iunius, Beza, Broughton, Doct. Gibbons, and Moore, with diuers of the Protestants hold Abraham to haue bene borne in the 130. yeere of his Father Terah. From these (as in a case not concerning any point in Religion) diuers of the same Religion, and those neuertheless good Authors, as Bucholcerus, Chiracius, Funtinus and others, are very averse heerein, especially Iosephus Scaliger with his Serhus Catulinius, proclaiming Beraaldus an Arch-heretike in Chronologie, and condemning this opinion of his as poysonous. Contrariwise, Aequitinus Tornilius a Priest of the Congregation of Saint Paul, a iudicious, diligent, and free writer, whose Annales are newly set forth, very earnestly defends the opinion, which haue already deliuered, not alleading Beraaldus, nor any Protestant writer, as being perhaps vnwilling to owe thanks to heretikes. For my selfe I doe neither mislike the contrary opinion, because commonly those of the Romish Religion labour to uphold it; nor favour this larger account of times, because many notable men of the Protestant writers have approved it; but for the truth it selfe. To strengthen which, after all these former reasons, and testimonies of Scripture, I will add thus much more to the rest. First, it is apparant to all men of iudgement, that the best approved Historians, Diuine and Prophane, labour to inuestigate the truth of times, thereby to approue the stories, & forepast actions of the world: and not the truth of histories to approue the times by. Let vs then make iudgement to our selues, which of those two accounts giue the best reputation to the story of the Scriptures; teaching the Worlds new plantation, and the continuance of Gods Church: either that of Iosephus, & those which follow him; who makes but 292. yeares, or thereabouts, betwene the flood and birth of Abraham: or this other account, which makes 352. yeares betwene the one and the other: the one taking Abraham to be the first borne of Thare, in the 70. yeare of his life: the other a younger sonne of Thare, and borne when he had liued 130. yeares. And if we looke ouer all, and do not hastily satisfie our vnderstanding with the first things offered, and thereby being fatiated doe slothfully and drowsily sit downe; we shall find it more agreeable rather to allow the reckoning of the Septuagint, who, according to some editions, make it about 1072. yeares betwene the Flood and Abrahams birth: than to take away any part of those 352. yeares giuen. For if we aduisedly consider the state and countenance of the world, such as it was in Abrahams time, yea before Abraham was borne, we shall finde that it were very ill done of vs by following opinion without the guide of reason, to pare the times ouer-deeply betwene Abraham and the Flood: because in cutting them too neere the quick, the reputation of the whole storie might perchance bleed thereby, were not the testimonie of the Scriptures supreme, so as no obiection can approach it: and that wee did not follow withall this precept of S. Augustine. That wheresoeuer any one place in the Scriptures may be conceived disagreeing to the whole, the same is by ignorance of interpretation mis-vnderstood. For in Abrahams time all the then knowne parts of the World were peopled: all Regions and Countries had their Kings. Egypt had many magnificent Cities: and so had Palestina, and all the bordering Countries, yea, all that part of the World besides, as farre as India: and those not built with flickes, but of heuene stones, and defended with walls and rampiers: which magnificence needed a parent of more antiquitie, than those other men haue supposed. And therefore, where the Scriptures are plainest and best agreeing with reason and nature, to what end should we labour to beget doubts and scruples, or draw all things into wonders and maruailes: giuing also strength thereby to common cauiliers, and to those mens apish braines, who only bend their wits to find impossibilities, and monsters in the story of the World and Mankind.

§. VII.

A computation of the times of the Affryians, and others, grounded upon the times noted in the storie of Abraham.

IN this fort therefore for the reasons before alleadged, I conclude, that from the general Flood, to the birth of Abraham, 352. yeares were consumed: and taking the Affryian History with vs, the same number of yeares were spent from the Flood to the 43. yeere of Ninus: in which 43. yeere of Ninus Abraham was borne: which happened in the yeare of the world, 2009.

Now of this time of 352. yeares, we must giue one part as well to the increase of those people which came into Shinaar, as to those that stayed in the East, to wit, 30. yeares to Chus, ere he begat Seba: of which, though the Scriptures are silent, yet because those of the same time had that age when they begat their first sonnes, wee may the more safely giue the like allowance to these. For Eber begat Peleg at 34. Peleg begat Regu at 30. Regu begat Sera at 32. Now after Seba, Chus begat Hauila, Sabta, Raama and Sabtecha: and Raama begat Sheba and Dedan, before Nimrod was borne, as it appeareth Gen. 10. which S. Augustine approacheth. Giuing then 30. yeares more to Raama ere he begat Sheba, and five yeares to the five elder brothers of Nimrod, it may be gathered that 65. yeares were consumed ere Nimrod himselfe was borne: and that Raamah had that age before any of his sonnes were begotten, it may be gathered, by example and comparifon: for Peleg the fourth from Noah, as Raamah was, begat Kew in the same yeere of his life.

Let vs then allow 60. yeeres more after the birth of Nimrod, for two other generations to be brought forth, or else we shall hardly finde people to build Babel: for sure we are, that it was done by hands, and not by miracle: because it displeased God. These two numbers of 65. and 60. make 125. The rest of the time of 131. (in which yeere they arrived in Shinaar, whereof there are 6. yeeres remaining) we may giue them for their travels from the East: because they were pestered with women, children and Cattell: and, as some ancient writers haue conceiued, & Beccanus of later times, they kept alwaies the mountaine sides, for feare of a second Flood. Now, if we take this number of 131. out of 352. there remains 221. of which number Berosus bestoweth 65. on Belus, and 42. on Ninus before Abraham borne: both which S. Augustine approacheth; which two numbers taken againe out of 221. there remaineth 114. yeeres of the 352. from the Flood to Abrahams birth: which number of 114. necessitie bestoweth on Nimrod.

And if it be obiected that this time giuen to Nimrod, is ouer-long: sure if we compare the age of Nimrod with the rest of the same descent from Noah, it will rather appeare ouer-short. For Nimrod, by this accompt, liued in all but one hundred seventy nine yeeres: whereof he reigned one hundred and twelue: whereas Sale who was the sonne of Arphaxad the sonne of Sem, liued four hundred thirty yeeres: and of the same age of the World was Nimrod the sonne of Chus, the sonne of Cham.

Now after Abraham was borne, Ninus reigned 9. yeeres: which added to 43. make Ninus dieth and leaueth Semiramis his Succesor.

Semiramis gouerned the Empire of Babylonia and Affryia 42. yeeres, and died in the 52. yeere complet of Abrahams life.

Ninias or Zameis succeeded Semiramis, and ruled 38. yeeres, in the second yeere of whose reigne Abraham left Mesopotamia.

When Abraham was 85. yeeres old, he rescued his nephew Lot, and ouerthrew by surprise Amraphel King of Shinaar, or Babylonia. Ninias reigned 38. yeeres, and Abraham came into Canaan but 23. yeeres after Semiramis died: which was the 75. yeere of his age: so that Amraphel may seeme to haue bene this Ninias the sonne of Ninus, and Semiramis, whose 23. yeeres, as afore said, being the 75. yeere of Abraham, he and his fellow-kings might haue receiued this ouerthrow in the 85. yeere of Abraham; and the 33. yeere of his owne reigne: after which hee reigned five yeeres: which make in all 38. But the truth is, that the reasons to the contrary, vrging that this Amraphel could not be Ninias, are not easily answered. Howbeit for the times of the Affryian Kings, that they are to be ordered as we haue set downe, according to the times noted by Moses, in the storie of Abraham, it is most certaine; vnlesse we will either derogate from the truth of Moses his computation, which were impiecit, or account the whole Historie of Ninus and Semiramis to bee but a fiction; which were to condmne all ancient Historians for fablers.

That Amraphel, one of the some Kings whom Abraham ouerthrew, Gen. 14. may probably be thought to haue bene Ninias the sonne of Ninus.

AND now touching this Amraphel, whom Moses makes King of Shinaar or Babylonia, in the 85. yeere of Abrahams life, that is, in the 33. yeere of the raigne of Ninias Zameis the king of the Affryians, the sonne of Ninus and Semiramis, it is hard to affirme what he was, and how he could beat this time King of Babylonia: Ninias Zameis then reigning there. To this doubt the answer which first offereth it selfe as most probable, is that which hath bene already noted, that this Ninias or Zameis, was no other than our Amraphel: who invaded Traconitis or Basan, and ouerthrew those five kings of Pentapolis, or the valley of Siddim. For the Scriptures tell vs, that Amraphel was King of Shinaar, which is Babylonia: and the times before accounted make him to be the succesor of Ninus and Semiramis: and it falleth out with the 85. yeere of Abrahams life: wherein he rescued Lot, slew Chedorlaomer, and ouerthrew the rest. True it is, that this Amraphel was not at this time the greatest Monarke: for Chedorlaomer commanded in chiefe, though Amraphel be first named by Moses in the first verse of the 14. Chapter of Genesis. For the Kings of the valley of Siddim, or of Pentapolis, or the five Cities, were the vassalls of Chedorlaomer, and not of Amraphel: as it is writtē, Twelve yeeres were they subiect to Chedorlaomer, but in the 13. yeere they rebelled, and in the 14. yeere came Chedorlaomer and the Kings that were with him: and therefore was Chedorlaomer the principall in this enterprife, who was then King of Elam, which is Persia: Now Persia being seated ouer Tygrus, and to the East of Amraphels Countrie; and the other two kings, which were companions with Amraphel, being seated to the West of Shinar or Babylonia: Amraphel, who held Babylonia it selfe, seemeth at this time to haue had no great scope or large dominion. For had Amraphel beene so great a Prince as prophane Historians make Ninus or Semiramis whom he succeeded, hee should not haue needed the assistance of three other Kings for this expedition. But though Chedorlaomer were the first and greatest of those foure Kings, (as it is manifest that he was: For these little kings of Sodom, Gomorrah, &c. were his vassalls, and not Amraphels;) yet this makes not the coniecture lesse probable, but that this Amraphel might be Ninus. For it may be, that the great and potent Empire of Assyria, had now (as we shall here more plainly in that which followeth) receiued a downe-right fall, at the time of this warre: though not long before it commanded all the Kingdomes betwene India and the Phenician Sea: to wit, in the times of Ninus and Semiramis.

Of Arioch another of the foure Kings, and that Ellas, whereof he is said to haue beene King, lies betwene Cœlefyria and Arabia Petrea.

Xenophon:

Gen. 14.

Now the two other kings ioynt with Amraphel and Chedorlaomer, were Arioch and Tidal, the one king of Elbasar, the other of the Nations. For Elbasar, Aquila and Hierome write Pontus: so Tostatus thinketh that it should be Hellepont: which opinion Pererius fauoureth. But this is only to defend the Latine translation. For as Pontus, so is Hellepont farre distant, and out of the way to send any Armies into Arabia Petrea, or into Idumæa; which Countries these foure kings chiefly inuaded: Besides that, it is certaine, that the Assyrians (when they were greatest) had neuer any dominion in Asia the lesse. For at such time as the Assyrians feared the inuasion of the Medes and Persians, they sent not into Asia the lesse as commanders: but vsed all the Art they had to inuite Cæsar to their assistance: perswading him that nothing could be more dangerous for himself, and the other Kings of those parts, than the successe of the Medes against the Assyrians. But examiue the enterprife what it was. These Kings (saith the Text) made warre with Bera, King of Sodom, Birsha King of Gomorrah, Shinab King of Admath, and Shemebar King of Zebajim, and the King of Bela which is Zoar. All which five Kings had not so much ground as Middlesex: being such a kinde of Reguli, as Iosua found in the land long after: namely, Lords of Cities and small territories adioyning, of which Canaan had three and thirtie, all flaine or hanged by Iosua. Neither can the other Countries, which in the Text they are said also to haue inuaded, bee imagined to haue beene at that time of any great power: and therefore to call in Kings from Pontus or Hellepont, had manifested a great impotence and weakenesse in the Kings of Babylon and Persia.

And though it be alleadged for an example, that diuers Kings farre off, came to assist Pompey against Cæsar: yet these same examples without like occasions and circumstances, do neither leade nor teach. For there was no cause to feare the greatnesse of these pettie Kings, or of the other Countries: But the eyes of the world were fixed on Cæsar; and his vndertakings and intents were to all other Princes, no lesse doubtful than fearefull: But the whole Countrey by these foure Kings mastered in their passage, was afterward giuen to the halfe tribe of Manasse, Gad, and Reuben: a narrow valley of ground lying betwene Jordan and the mountaines of Seir: inclosed by the riuer of Arnon on the Southside, & by Lybannus on the North, consisting of the two smal Prouinces of Trachonitis or Tafan, & the Region of the Meabites: a conquest farre vnualluable, and little answering to the power of the Assyrian Empire, if the same had remained in any comparable estate with the times of Ninus & Semiramis, who subiected all the great kings of that part part of the World, without the assistance of any of the Kings of Hellepont, or any other part of Asia the lesse. But as the vulgar and Aquila conuert Elbasar by Pontus: so Symmachus makes Arioch a King of the Scythians, a King indeed, as farre fetched to ioyne with the Assyrians in this Warre, as the World had any at that time.

The Septuagint doe not change the word of Elbasar at all, but as they keepe the word Ararat on the mountaines whereof the Ake did rest, so doe they in this place retaine the Hebrew word Elbasar, being doubtfull to giue it a wrong interpretation. And Pettireus himselfe remembreth other opinions farre more probable than this of Pontus or Hellepont: yet he dares not auow his liking of them, because the Latin Translation hath it otherwise. For Stephanus de Urbibus a Græciæ Cosmographus, findeth the Citie of Ellas in the border of Cælefyria: and S. Hierome calleth Ellas the Citie of Arioch, as in truth it was. Now although the same be seated by Stephanus in Cælefyria, yet it standeth on the border of Arabia, of which Arioch was king: who formerly ioynt with Ninus in all his conquests, being of the same familie, and descended from Cham and Chus: after whom the name of Arus was by the Hebrew written Arioch: and afterward againe Aretas: as in the Maabites the kings of Arabia holding that name euen to the time of S. Paul, who was sought to be betrayed by the Lieutenant of Aretas commanding in Damascus. They were Princes for the most part confederate and depending vpon the Assyrian Empire. It is true that we find in Daniel, that in the time of Nabuchodonosor, one Arioch was General of his armie, & the principall Commander vnder him, who was a King of Kings: which makes it plaine, that Arioch here spoken of, the sonne of that Arioch confederate of Ninus, was no king of Pontus, nor of Scythia: regions farre removed from the Assyrians and Babylonians. The name also of Arioch who commanded vnder Nabuchodonosor is mentioned in Judith, by the name of King of the Elymeans: who are a Nation of Persians bordering Assyria, according to Stephanus: though Plinie sets it betwene the Sea-coast, and Media: and if any brother of the Arabian Kings or other of that house (known by the name of Arius, Arioch, Aretas, or Aretas) had the gouernment of that Persian Province called Elymaus (as it seemeth they had by the places of Daniel and Judith) yet the same was in Nabuchodonosors time. But this Arioch here spoken of may with more reason bee taken for the King of Arabia, the sonne of Arius, the confederate of Ninus: whose finnes held league, as their Fathers did, being the next bordering Prince of all on that side towards the West vnto Babylonia, and Chaldea: and in amitie with them from the beginning, and of their owne house, and blood: which Diod. Siculus also confirmeth.

§. XI.

Of Tidal another of the foure Kings.

The fourth King by Abraham ouerthrowne was Tidal, King of the Nations. The Hebrew writes it Gojim, which Vatablus takes to be a proper name: Eyra of mixt people: Caluin of runnagates without habitation. Pererius out of Strabo, findes that Galilea was inhabited by diuers Nations, which were a mixt people: namely of Egyptians, Arabians, and Phenicians. Nam tales sunt qui Galileam habitant: Such Sirab. l. 16. §. 4. are the inhabitants of Galilee, saith Strabo: and therefore was Tidal called King of these Nations, as they suppose. And it may be so: but the authoritie of Strabo is nothing in this question. For Galilea was not peopled at this time, as it was in the time of Strabo. For when Abraham came into Canaan, the Canaanite was then in the Land, howeouer they might be afterwards mixt, which I know not. But there are many petty kingdoms adioyning to Phenicia, and Palastina: as Palmyrena, Batanea, Leodicene, Aphamena, Chalchide, Cassiotis, Chalibonitis, and all these doe also ioyne themselves to Mesopotamia, on the North, and to Arabia on the East. And that these Nations gathered themselves together vnder Tidal, take to be the probablest coniecture.

Gen. 11. 6.

S. XII.

That Chedorlaomer the cheife of the foure Kings was not of Assyria, but of Persia: And that the Assyrian Empire at this time was much impaired.

LASTLY, whereas it is conceiued that Chedorlaomer was the Assyrian Emperor, and that Amraphel was but a Satrape, Viceroy, or Provinciall gouernour of Babylonia, and that the other Kings named were such also, I cannot agree with Plinius in this. For Moses was too well acquainted with the names of Assur and Shinar, to call the Assyrian a king of Elam: those kings being in the Scriptures euerymore called by the name of Chaldea, Shinar, Babylonia, or Assyria: but neuer by Elam; and Chedorlaomer or Chedorlaomer was so called of Kidar, from Cidarim which in the Hebrew, significth Keale; for so Q. Curtius calleth the garment which the Persian Kings wore on their heads.

Neither doe I beleue that the Assyrian or Babylonian Empire stood in any greatnesse at the time of this inuasion; and my reasons are these: First, example and experience teach vs, that those things which are set vp hastily, or forced violently, do not long last. Alexander became Lord of all Asia, on this side of Indus, in a tyme of so short a life, as it lasted not to ouer-look what it selte had brought forth. His fortunes were violent, but not perpetuall. For his Empire died at once with himselfe: all whose chief Commanders became kings after him. Tamurlaine conquered Asia and India with a storme-like and terrible successe: but to preualent furie God hath adioyned a short life; and what-fouer things Nature her selfe worketh in haste, she taketh the least care of their continuance. The fruit of his victories perished with him, if not before.

Ninus being the first whom the madnesse of boundlesse dominion transported, invaded his neighbour Princes, and became victorious ouer them: a man violent, insolent, and cruel. Semiramis taking the opportunitee, and being more proud, aduenturous, and ambitious, than her Paramour; enlarged the Babylonian Empire, & beautified many places therein with buildings vnexampled. But her sonne hauing changed Nature and Condition with his Mother, proued no lesse feiminate than she was masculine. And as wounds and wrongs, by their continuall smart, put the Patient in minde how to cure the one, & 30 reuenge the other: so those Kings adioyning/whose subiection, & calamities incident, were but new, and therefore the more grievous) could not sleepe, when the aduantage was offered by such a successe. For, in regno Babylonic hic parum respiciunt, this King shined little (saith Nauclerus of Ninias) in the Babylonian Kingdome. And likely it is that the neckes of mortall men hauing bene neuer before galled with the yoke of forraigne dominion, nor hauing euer had experience of that most miserable and detested condition of liuing in slaerie: no long descent hauing as yet inuaded the Assyrian with a right: nor any other title being for him pretended than a strong hand: the foolish and effeminate sonne of a tyrannous and hated Father, could very ill hold so many great Princes and Nations his vassals, with a powerlesse mastering, and a minde lesse industrious than his Father and Mother had vsed before him. And hee that was so much giuen ouer to licentious idlenesse, as to suffer his Mother to reigne 42. yeares, and therefore the greatest part after he came to mans estate: witnesseth thereby to the World, that hee so much preferred ease before honour, & bodily pleasures before greatnesse, as he neither indeuoured to gaine what he could not gouerne, nor to keepe what hee could not without contentious perill enioy.

These Considerations being ioyned to the storie of Amraphel, deliuered by Moses, by which we find that Amraphel King of Shinar was rather an inferiour to the King of Persia, than either his superiour, or equal; make it seeme probable, that the Empire of Ninus and Semiramis was at that time broken asunder, & restrained againe to Babylonia. 50

For conclusion I will adde these two arguments confirming the former: First, that at such time as it pleased God to impose that great trauaile vpon Abraham, from Ur in Chaldea to Charran, and then to Canaan, a passage of 700. miles, or little lesse, with women, children, and carriages: the Countries through which he wandred were then settled, and in peace. For it was in the 23. yeere of Ninias, when Abraham obeying the voyce of God, tooke this great journey in hand: in which time of 23. yeares after the death of Semiramis, the neighbour Princes had recouered their libertie and former estates. For Semiramis Annie of foure millions, with her selfe vtterly consumed in India, & all her armies and and origins of warre, at the same time lost, gaue an occasion and opportunitie euen to the poorest soules and weakest hearted creatures of the World, to repurchase their former libertie.

Secondly, it is affirmed by the best and ancientest Historians, that Arius the sonne of Ninias, or Amraphel, invaded the Bactrians and Cassians, and againe subiected them: which needed not if they had not bin reuolted from Ninias, after Ninias death. And as Arius recovered one part, so did Baleus or Balanus, otherwise Xerxes, reduce the rest reuolted to their former obedience. Of whom it is said that he conquered from Egypte to India: and therefore was called Xerxes, id est, Victor & triumphator, a conquerour and triumpher, which vntertakings had bene no other than the effects of madnesse, had not those Countries freed themselves from the Babylonian subiection. Now if we shall make any doubt hereof, that is, of the reconquest of Arius and Xerxes, both which liued after Ninias and Ninias, we may as well thinke the rest of Ninias and Semiramis to be but fained: but if we grant this reconquest, then is it true that while Ninias or Amraphel ruled, the Assyrian Empire was torne asunder, according to that which hath bin gathered out of Moses as before remembred.

That it is not improbable that the foure Kings had no dominion in the Countries named, but that they had else-where with their colonies planted themselves: and so retained the names of the Countries whence they came: which if it be so, we neede not say that Amraphel was Ninias, nor trouble our selues with many other difficulties.

THE consent of all writers, whose workes haue come to my perusal, agreeing as they doe, that these foure Kings, Amraphel of Shinar, Chedorlaomer of Elam, and those fellows, were Lords of those Regions, whereunto they are or seeme intitled: doth almost inforce vs to thinke that the history must so be vnderstood, as I haue deliuered. But if in this place, as often else-where in the Scriptures, the names of Countries may be set for people of those lands, or if as Hierome hath it, Chedorlaomer was king of the Elamites, as Tidal was said to be of the Nations, that is, of people either wanting a fixed habitation, or gathered out of sundry regions: then may we otherwise conceiue of this Historie: remouing thereby some difficulties which men perhaps haue bin vnwilling to find, because they could not find how to resolute them. For as it had bin a strange coniecture to thinke that Arius was drawne to assist the Persian, against the Sodomites, as far as from Pentus, where it is very vnlikely that Chedorlaomer was knowne, and almost impossible that the vale of Siddim should haue bin once named: so in true estimation it is a thing of great improbabilitie, that Chedorlaomer, if he were King of Persia alone, should passe through so great a part of the World, as the Countries of Assyria, Chaldea, Meopotamia, Syria, and part of Arabia, and Canaan, to subdue those five Townes 40 whose very names how they should come to his care, being disioynd by so many great nations of different Languages, a wise man could hardly coniecture. And if all the Countries bordering Persia together with the Babylonian himselfe, yea the kingdome of Elasar & that of Tidal, so far off remoued, were become his dependants, what reason can we find that might haue induced him to hearken after Sodome and Gomorrab? and when hee should haue sought the establishment of his new gotten Empire, by rooting out the posterity of Ninus (as Ninus had dealt by Pharnus of Media, and Zoroaster of Bactria) then to employ the forces of Amraphel, & those other Kings, against five petty Townes, leauing Tyrus and Sidon, & the great Citie of Damascus, with many other places of much importance, and far neerer vnto him, vnsubdued? Now as these doubts which may be allcaded against the first conquest of the vale of Siddim, are exceeding vehemens: so are the obiections to be made against his reconquest of these five Cities, when they had reuolted, as forcible, yea and more, as being grounded partly vpon the Text it selfe. For first, what madnesse had it bene in that small Province to rebell against so powerfull a Monarch? Or if it were so that they dwelling farre from him, hoped rather to be forgotten, than that he should come or send to reclaime them: was it not more than madnesse in them, when his terrible armie approached, still to entertaine hope of euasion: yea to make resistance (being themselves a dissolute & therefore vnwarlike people) against the power of all the Nations betweene Euphrates, yea betweene themselves and the riuer of Indus.

Inuasi: Likewise on the part of Chedorlaomer we should find no great wisdom, if he knowing the weakenesse of this people, had raised such a world of men against them: whom by any Lieutenants, with small forces he might haue subdued. For the perpetual inheritance of that little Countrey, was not sufficient to counteruaile one moneths charges of so huge an armie. How small then must his valour haue bene, who with so mighty preparations effected no more than the waisting of that Valley, wherein he left the Cities standing, taking no one of them, but returned well contented with a few prisoners, and the pillage of the Countrey, although he had broken their armie in the field: Now the Scriptures doe not of this inuasion (supposed so great) make any fearful matter: but compose the two armies, as equally matcht, saying they were foure kings against five: yea, if the place be literally expounded, we shall find that Abraham slew all these kings, of which great slaughter no Historie makes mention: Neither will the reigne of Nimius, who liued foure or five yeares longer, permit that he should haue died so soone: neither would Histories haue forgotten the manner of his death, if he had so strangely perished in Syria. Whereby it appears, that these foure kings were not the same that they are commonly thought: nor their forces so great as opinion hath made them. It may therefore well be true, that these kings were such as many others, who in that age carried the same title: Lords and Commanders euery one of his owne company, which he carried forth as a Colonie, seeking place where to settle himself and them, as was the vsuall manner of those times.

Neither is it improbable, that Chedorlaomer leading a troupe of Persians, Amraphel some people out of Shinaar, and Tidal others gathered out of sundry places, might con-sort together, and make the weakest of the Countrey which lay about them, to pay them tribute. Whosoever will consider the beginning of the first booke of Thucydides, with the manner of discoueries, conquests and plantations, in the infancie of Greece; or the manner of the Saracens inuading Africa and Spaine, with almost as many kings as seuerall Armies: or the proceedings of the Spaniards in their new discoueries, passages, and conquests in the West-Indies: may easily perceiue, that it was neither vnusall, for the leaders of Colonies to receiue title from the people whom they conducted: nor to make alliances together, and breake them againe, disturbing sometimes one the other, sometimes helping in pursuit of a conquest. That Amraphel and his associates were such manner of Commanders, it may seeme the more likely, by the sloathfull qualitie of Nimius then reigning in Affrya: whose vnmanlike temper was such, as might well giue occasion to such vndertaking spirits, as wanted the imployments whereunto they were accustomed in the reigne of Semiramis, rather to seeke aduentures abroad, than to remaine at home vnregarded: whilst others more vnworthy than themselves, were aduanced. If the consent of the whole streeme of writers vpon this place make this coniecture disagreeable to the Text, to the authoritie whereof all humane reason must subscribe, then we may hold our selues to the former coniecture, that Amraphel was Nimius: & that the power of his Ancestors being by his sloath decayed, he might well be inferiour to the Persian Chedorlaomer: or if this doe not satisfie, we may say that Amraphel was an Vnder king or Satrapa of Shinaar, vnder Nimius; who may be supposed to haue had his Imperiall seat in his Fathers Citie Nineue: and to haue preferred it before Shinaar and Babylon the Citie of his Mother, whom he hated as an vsurper of his right. But if it were possible that in a case not concerning any mans Saluation, & wherein therefore none hath cared to take great paines, all might erre: then can I thinke that the opinion, That those foure Kings were leaders of Colonies, sent out of the Countries named in the Text, and not Kings of the Countries themselves, is most consonant both to the condition of those times, and to the Scripture. And hereto adde that Chedorlaomer seemes rather called a Persian king, than King of Persia: and that Arioch (whose kingdome vndoubtedly was betweene Syria and Arabia) hauing bene a man of action, or being a worthy mans sonne, was very well pleased, to giue passage and assistance, to these Captaines or petty Kings. These & such like things here to vrge, were but with circumstances to adorn a supposition, which either may stand without them, or if it must fall, is vnworthy to haue cost bestowed vpon it: especially considering, that it is not my intent to imploy any more time in making it good, but to leaue it wholly to the Readers pleasure, to follow any of these opinions, or any other, if he find any that shall seeme better than these. But of what Countries or people foure these foure were Kings, this expedition is the onely publike adition that we

Gen. 14. 17.

we know of performed by Abraham. And as for other things belonging to his Storie, and of his sonnes, and of his Nephews Esaue and Jacob, as they are registred by Moses, because it is not our purpose, either to stand vpon things generally known to all Christians, nor to repeat what hath bene elsewhere already spoken, nor to preuent our selues in things that may hereafter in due place be remembered, wee passe them here in silence. And because in this Storie of Abraham and his posteritie, there is much mention of Egypt: by which it appears that euen in the time of Abraham, it was a settled and flourishing kingdome; it will not be amisse in the next place to speake somewhat of the antiquities and first kings thereof.

20 A briefe of the names and times of the first Kings of Egypt: with a note of the causes of difficulty in resolving of the truth in these points

One after the confusion at Nabel (as it seemes) Cham with many of his issue and followers (hauing doubtlesse knowne the fertilitye of Egypt before the Eloud) came thither and tooke possession of the Countrey; in which they built many Cities: and began the kingdome one hundred nintie one yeeres after the deluge. The ancient Gouernours of this Kingdome till such time as Israel departed Egypt, are shewne in the Table following.

The Table, and especially the Chronologie, is to be confirmed by probabilities & coniectures, because in such obscurity, manifest & restless truth cannot be found. For Saint Augustine, a man of exceeding great iudgement, and incomparable diligence, who had 50 sought into all antiquities, and had read the bookes of Varro, which now are lost, yet omitted the succession of the Egyptian Kings: which he would not haue don, if they had not bene more vncertaine than the Sicyonians, whom hee remembreth, than whom doubtlesse they were more glorious. One great occasion of this obscurity in the Egyptian Story, was the ambition of the Priests: who, to magnifie their Antiquities, filled the Records (which were in their hands) with many leafings, and recounted vnto strangers the names of many Kings, that neuer reigned. What ground they had for these reports of supposed Kings, it shall appeare anon. Sure it is, that the magnificent workes and and royall buildings in Egypt, such as are neuer found but in States that haue greatly flourished, witnesseth that their Princes were of manifold greatnesse, and that the reports of the Priests were not altogether false. A second cause of our ignorance in the Egyptian History, was the too much credulity of some good Authors, who beleeuing the manifold and contrary reports of sundry Egyptians, and publishing in their owne name such as pleased them best, haue confirmed them, and as it were enforced them vpon vs by their authority. A third and generall cause of more than Egyptian darkenesse in all ancient Histories, is the edition of many Authors by Iohn Anniius, of whom (sith the censures of sundry very learned, I may adde mine) I thinke thus; That Anniius hauing seene some fragments of those writers, and added vnto them what hee would, may be credited, as an auoucher of true Histories, where approued writers confirme him: but otherwise is to be deemed fabulous. Hereupon it cometh to passe that the account of Authors, either in the Chronologie or Genealogie of the Egyptian Kings, runs three altogether different wayes. The Christian writers, such as are ancient, for the most part follow Eusebius: Many late writers follow the edition of Anniius his Authors: The prophane Histories follow Herodotus, Diodorus, and such others.

§. III.

That by the account of the Egyptian Dynasties, and otherwise, it appears that Chams reigne in Egypt began in the yeere after the Flood, 191.

TO reconcile these, or gather out of them the times of the ancient Kings, about whom is most controuersie, the best meane is by helpe of the Dynasties: of whose continuance there is little or no disagreement. The account of the Dynasties (besides the authority of approued Authors) hath this good ground, that it agreeth for the most part, if not altogether, with the Histories of the Affrians, Troians, Italians, &c. and others. The beginning of the 16. Dyn. is ioyned by generall consent, with the 43. yeere of Ninus: in which Abraham was borne. The twelue first Dynasties lasted each of them seuen yeeres, vnder the twelue, which were called the greater gods: so that all the yeeres of their continuance were 84. The thirteenth Dynastie endured fourteen yeeres: the fourteenth 26, the fifteenth 37. These three last, are said to haue bene vnder the three younger gods. So the fifteene first Dynasties lasted one hundred sixty one yeeres. As I doe not therefore beleue that the continuance of these Dyn. was such as hath been mentioned, because Anniius in such wise limits out their time: so I cannot reiect the account vpon this onely reason, that Anniius hath it so: considering that both hitherto it hath passed as currant, and is greatly strengthened by many good reasons. For, whereas Eusebius placeth the beginning of the sixteenth Dynastie, in the yeere of Abrahams birth, as aforesaid: the reckoning is easily cast, by which the summe of 161. yeeres, which according to our account were spent in the fifteene former, being subduſted out of the sum of 352. yeeres, which were between the Flood & Abrahams birth, shew that the beginning of the first Dynastie, which was the beginning of Chams reigne in Egypt, was in the yeere 191. As also by other probabilities the same may appeare. For it is generally agreed, that the multitude of mankind which came into Shinar, arrived at Babel, Anno a diluuio 131. In building the Tower were consumed fourtie yeeres, as Glycius recordeth: whose report I haue elsewhere confirmed with diuers probabilities. That Cham was long in passing with his company, their Wiues, Children, Cattell, & substance, through all Syria then desolate, and full of Bogges, Forrests, and Bryers (which the Deluge and want of culture in one hundred seentie one yeeres had brought vpon it) no reasonable man will doubt. To this his passage therefore, and the seating of himselfe in Egypt, we allow twenty yeeres: & these summes being added together, to wit, one hundred thirty one yeeres after the Flood, before they arrived at Babel, 40. yeeres for their stay there, and 20. for Chams passage into Egypt, and settling there, make vp the summe of 191. yeeres; at which time we said that Cham began his reigne in Egypt, in the beginning of the first Dynastie. And to this summe of 191. yeeres if we adde the 161. yeeres of the 15. first Dynasties, as they are numbered in common account, we shall fall right with the yeere of Abrahams birth which was An. Dil. 352. And hereto omitting many other reasons, which might be brought to proue that these first Dynasties must needs haue bene very short, and not containing in the whole summe of their severall times times about 161. yeeres: Let it suffice that had they lasted longer, then either must Egypt haue bene peopled as soone as Babel after the Flood, or the Dynasties (as Adeonator thinkes) must haue bene before the flood. That the arrivall at Babel was many yeeres before the plantation of Egypt, after the flood, enough hath bene said to proue: and that the Dynasties were not before the flood, the number of the long liu'd generations between Adam and the flood, which was lesse than the number of the Dynasties, may sufficiently witness. Or if we will thinke, that one life might (perhaps) be diuided into many Dynasties, then may this haue bene as well after the flood, as before: considering that the sonnes of Noah did not in euery Countrey erect such forme of Policie; as had bene vsed in the same ere the Deluge: but such, as the disposition of the people, the authoritie and power of the Conduſter, together with many other circumstances, did induce or enforce them to.

§. III.

That these Dynasties were not diuers families of Kings, but rather successions of Regents, of times many vnder one King.

THE short continuance of the Dynasties, doth shew that they were not severall families of Kings, as the vaunting Egyptians were wont to stile them. What they were it cannot certainly be warranted. For in reſtitutions of decayed antiquities, it is more easie to denie than to affirme. But this may be said partly vpon good circumstance, partly vpon the surest prooffe, That it was the manner of the Egyptian Kings; to put the government of the Countrey into the hands of some trustie Counsellor, only reseruing the Soueraignty to themselves, as the old Kings of France were wont to the Masters of the Palace, and as the Turke doth to the chiefe Vizier. This is confirmed, first, by the number of the Dynasties, whereof many are vnder Cham, & more than one vnder Osiris or Mizraim, and must therefore haue bene successions, not of Kings, but rather of Counſailors and Regents. Secondly, by custome of such Princes borderers to Egypt, as are mentioned in the Scriptures of whom Abimelech the Philistin in his dealing with Abraham and Isaac about confederation, did nothing without Phicol Captaine of his Hoste, though in taking Abrahams wife, and in his priuate carriage; he followed his owne pleasure. Likewise of Abimelech the sonne of Gideon it was said: it not be the sonne of Jerubbabael: and Zebul his Officer. Also Ishbosheth the sonne of Saul, feared Abner the Captaine of the Hoste. Yea, Dauid himselfe hating Isaiah for his crueltye, did not punish him in regard of his greatnesse, which was such, as was feared euen of Hadad the Edomite liuing then in Egypt. Thirdly, this is confirmed by the temper and disposition of Cham, who was lewd, as appeares by the Scriptures: therefore likely both for his owne idlenesse and pleasure, to haue laid the burden of government vpon others; and vpon ieaousie, the companion of vnworthinesse, to haue changed his Lieutenants often. About all other proofes is the aduancement of Ioseph by Pharaoh. For Pharaoh said to Ioseph; Only in the Kings throne will I be about thee: behold, I haue set thee ouer all the Land of Egypt. William Archbishop of Tyre, who flourished about the yeere of our Lord, one thousand one hundred eightie, affirmes that the like or very same forme of gouernement by Viceroyes, was in his time practised in Egypt, hauing there bene in vse (as he beleueed) euer since the time of Ioseph. He plainely shewes, that the Soldans of Egypt were not Lords of the Countrey, how euer they haue bene so deemed: but that they acknowledged and humbly performed the dutie of subiects vnto the Caliphe: who residing in a most magnificent Palace in Cairo, did commit the charge, not onely of ciuill gouernment, but the power of making warre and peace, with the whole office & authority royall into the Soldans hands. He that shall reade in William of Tyre, the state of the Caliphas or Mulene Elhadeth, with the forme of his Court, shall plainly behold the image of the ancient Pharaoh, ruling by a Lieutenant, as great in authority as Ioseph was, though farre inferiour in wisdome.

To thinke that many names of such Regents or Lieutenants as Ioseph was, haue crept into the List of the Egyptian Kings, were no strange imagination. For Iosephs brethern called him, The man that is Lord of the Land, and the Lord of the Countrey: Besides, it is not vnlikely that the vain-glorious Egyptian Priests would as easily report him a King to posterity, as ignorant men & strangers deeme him such, vnder whose hand all dispatches of importance, and royall managing of the State had passed, whilest that the King himselfe intending his quiet, had given his office to another. How strangers haue mistaken in this kinde, the example already cited of Iosephs brethren, doth sufficiently witness. The reports of Priests doe appeare in Diodorus, and Herodotus: each of whom, citing their relations, as good authority, say; Diodorus, that Sesoftris was the nineteenth King after Menas; Herodotus, that he was the 332. after Menas: which could not haue beene, if Menas had beene Adam. Therefore we may well conclude, That the Dynasties were not so many races of Kings, but successions of Regents, appointed by the kings of so many sundry linages or sorts of men. Now by whatsoeuer means a Dynastie or Regencie continued: whether in one familie, as being made an hereditary office; or in one order of men, as held by faction: sure it is that it was the Kings gift and free choyce, that gaue the office. But the Crowne royall alwayes passed by descent, & not by election: which (besides consent of Authors) the Scriptures also proue. For whereas Ioseph bought all the Land of Egypt for Pharaoh, if the Crowne had passed by election, then should Pharaohs children hereby either haue beene intralled amongst the rest of the people, to the next successor; or inioying their Fathers land, though not his estate, haue beene more mighty than the king: as Land-lords of all Egypt, and the king himselfe their Tenant. Likewise we finde in Exod. 12. that God smote the first borne of Pharaoh, that was to sit on his Throne. And in Esa it is said of Pharaoh: I am the founte of the ancient King.

§. III.

Of Cham, and his sonne Mizraim, or Ofiris.

That the succession of Kings began, and continued in such wise as the Table hath shewed from Cham to Chencres, now it followeth to shew. Egypt is called in the Scripture the Land of Ham. That this name is not given to it, because the posterity of Cham did reigne there, but for that himselfe did first plant it, we may gather by many circumstances. For I thinke it is no where found, that the Countries of Cush, Put, or Canaan, as well as Egypt, were called the Land of Ham. Further, it is found in Diodorus Siculus, that Ofiris calleth himselfe the eldest sonne of Cham, saying; Mihi pater Saturnus deorum omnium iunior: also, Sumi Saturni filius antiquior, germen ex pulchro & generoso ortum: which must needs be understood of Cham: for this Saturnus Egyptius was Cham: as it is said, that on the monument of Ninus was an inscription, wherein Cham was called Saturnus Egyptius. Likewise the Temple of Hammon, not farre from Egypt, doth testifie, that Ham resided in those parts: And S. Hierome in questionibus Hebraicis, saith, that the Egyptians themselves did in his dayes call their Countrey Ham: as in foure severall places in the Psalms this Countrey is called the land of Cham. And Ortelius, noting out of Plutarch in Ofiride, that in the sacrifices of the Egyptians this Countrey of Egypt was called Chemia, expounds it for Chamia, or pato (saith he) a Chamo Nos vocari: that Egypt vnto this day in the tongue of the Egyptians is called Kam. For the beginning and continuance of Chams reigne, the same reasons may suffice to be alleadged, which I haue already giuen in proofe of the time spent in the 15. first Dynasties: Neither is it strange that the reigne of Cham should last so long as 161. yeeres: considering that Sem liued 600: Arphachshad and Shelah each about 400. But strange it had beene, if one Salis created by Manetho, had in those long-lived generations reigned there 19. yeeres, and with Beon, Apachnas, Apochis, and others of the same brood, obscured the fame and glory of Ofiris, Orus, and Sesoftris. Reineccius in histor. Italia, placeth Mizraim next, otherwise called Ofiris according to Diodorus: who, saith he, was the sonne of Hammon: Krentzhemius saith that Mizraim and Ofiris are words of neere affinitye and found in the Hebrew tongue. Howsoever it be, we know that Mizraim the sonne of Cham, was Lord of Egypt, and Reineccius citing good authoritie in this case, affirmeth that Egypt is now called by the naturals in their owne language, Mezre. Neither doe I see cause of doubt whether Ofiris were the same with Mizraim. It is more necessary, & hard to shew manifestly, how long Mizraim or Ofiris reigned. For whereas the yeere of his death is no where precisely set downe, we must be faine to follow probabilities. That hee is not vainly said by Annius his Berosus, to haue begun his reigne at the birth of Abraham, when the Dynastie of the Thebes began, it appeareth, first, by the authoritie of Eusebius: who auoucheth as much; next by Diodorus, who saith that he inhabited Thebes: vvhich habitation of Ofiris there, that it might be cause of that Dynastie, I can well beleue; affecting so farre to Reineccius, who thinke the Dynasties were named onely, according to the severall seates of the kings.

§. V.

Of the time when Ofiris reigne ended: and that Jacob came into Egypt in the time of Orus the sonne of Ofiris.

The death of Ofiris, when it was, none can certainly affirme. The onely conjecture that I know is made thus: Lebabim the sonne of Mizraim called Hercules Lybicus, made warre in Italy, to reuenge his Fathers death, on the associates of Typhon, in the 41. yeare of Baleus King of Affrica: before vvhich yeare hee had made many great vvarres in Egypt, Phoenicia, Phrygia, Crete, Lybia, and Spaine: and hauing ended his Egyptian vvarres, left the Kingdom to Orus. Thus saith Berosus, or Authors following Berosus. That Orus last of all the gods (as they were stiled) held the Kingdom of Isis, Diodorus Siculus plainly saith: and Plutarch as much; to vvhich all Histories agree. Krentzhemius hereupon inferres, that fixe yeares may be allowed to the vvarres, vvhich Hercules made in so many Countries, after the Egyptian warres were ended: so should the death of Ofiris haue beene the 34. of Baleus, when himselfe had reigned 297. yeares. I thinke that Krentzhemius was a greater Scholler than Souldier. For surely in those dayes when commerce was not such as now, but all Navigation made by coasting; a farre longer time would haue beene required, to the subduing of so many Countries. An allowance of more time though it would alter his computation; yet would it vvell agree with his intent: which was (doubtlesse) to finde the truth: If according to his account the death of Ofiris had beene the 34. of Baleus, then must Israel haue come into Egypt but seuen yeares before the death of Ofiris: and haue liued there in the reigne of Typhon. A thing not easily beleueed. For it was the same king who aduanced Ioseph, bade him fend for his Father, and gaue him leaue to goe into Canaan, to the performance of his Fathers Funerall: as may easily be gathered out of the booke of Genesis. Whereas therefore the reigne of Ofiris cannot be extended by any possible allowance in account of times, beyond the seventh yeare of Israels coming into Egypt: we must needs cut off 23. yeares from that number, which Krentzhemius coniectures his reigne to haue continued: namely seuen vvhich hee should haue liued after Jacobs coming into Egypt; nine in which Ioseph had there flourished, ere his fathers coming; and other seuen in which Typhon and Hercules had reigned after the death of Ofiris, yet before Iosephs aduancement.

Neither will this disagree with the time of Hercules Lybicus his wars, For the war which Hercules made in Italy, is said to haue indured 10. yeares: After which proportion we may well giue not onely fixe yeares, as Krentzhemius doth, but 23. more to so many wars in so many and so far distant Countries, as are named before: ye, by this proportion we may attribute vnto Orus the 13. yeares, which passed betweene the time of Iosephs being sold into Egypt, vnto his aduancement, considering that Putiphar who bought him, & whose daughter he may seeme to haue married, continued all that while chiefe Steward vnto Pharaoh; a thing not likely to haue been, if so violent alterations had hapned the whilest in Egypt, as the tyrannous vsurpation of Typhon must needs haue brought in. If citing some fragment of a lost old Author, I should confidently say, that Putiphar for his faithfulness to Orus, the sonne of Ofiris, vvas by him in the beginning of his reigne made his chiefe Steward: at which time buying Ioseph, and finding him a fast man, & one vnder whose hand all things did prosper, he rather committed his estate into Iosephs hands, than vnto any of his Egyptian followers (many of whom he had found either falchard, or weak and vnlucky in the troublsome dayes of Typhon) I know not what could be objected against this. Perhaps I might proceed further, and say, That when the saying of Ioseph pleased Pharaoh and all his seruants, then Putiphar Priest of On, being chiefe Officer to Pharaoh, did acknowledge in Ioseph, the ancient graces of God, & his minious improvement: whereupon he gaue him his daughter to wife, and being old, reueged his office of chiefe Steward vnto him, who afterward in regard of Putiphar, did haue the Priviledge, when hee bought the lands of all other Egyptians. This might appeare to some a tale not vntlike to the Frierly book of Afinath, Puiphars daughter: but vnto such as consider that God workes vually by meanes; and that Puiphars was the Steward of that King, vnder whom Iacob died: it would seeme a matter not probable, had it an Author of sufficient credit to auouch it. Concerning the warres of Hercules, in which by this reckoning hee should haue spent 42. yeares after he left Egypt, ere he began in Italy, it is a circumstance which (the length of his Italian wars considered, and his former enterprises & achievements proportioned to them) doth not make against vs, but for vs: or if it were against vs, yet could it not so weaken our supposition, as these probabilities collected out of the vndisputable truth of Scripture do confirm it. Neuerthelesse I freely grant that all these proofes are no other, than such as may be gathered out of Authors, not vuell agreeing, nor to be reconciled in such obscurity, otherwise than by likelihoods, answerable to the holy Text.

Of Typhon, Hercules, Aegyptus, Orus, and the two Sesostres, successively reigning after Mizraim: and of diuers errors about the former Sesostres.

Concerning the reigne of Typhon, and of Hercules, I find none that precisely doth define how long either of them continued. Daniel Angelocrotator giueth three yeares to Typhon, omitting Hercules. But he is so peremptory without proofe, as if his own word were sufficient authority, in many points very questionable; all leading no vnto it, but as it were saying, Telle me ipso: yet herein wee may thinke him to speake probably, forasmuch as the learned Krentzhemius affirmeth, that Hercules did very soone vnder take his Fathers reuenge, and was not long in performing it: and that leauing Egypt to his brother, hee followed other warres, in the same quarrell, as hath bene shewed before. True it is, that I cannot collect (as Krentzhemius doth) out of Berosus, that Hercules reigned after Typhon: yet seeing Aucutinus a follower of Berosus hath it so, I will also beleue it. That in the reigne of Typhon and Hercules seven yeares were spent, howsoever diuided betweene them, I gather out of Krentzhemius only, who placeth the beginning of Orus seven yeares after the death of Osiris: forgetting to set downe his reasons, which in a matter so probable I thinke he wanted not. Now vvhether he alloweth 90. yeares of the eighteenth Dynastie to Osiris, Typhon, Hercules, and Orus: it seemes that the reigne of Orus lasted 115. yeares. From the death of Orus to the departure of Israel out of Egypt, there passed 122. yeares by our account: who (according to Berosus and others) thinke that Abraham was borne in the 130. yeare of Terah, and thereupon reckon thus. From the end of the Flood to the birth of Abraham ————— 352

From that time to the Eucocation of Abraham ————— 75
Departure out of Egypt ————— 430 Summa ————— 857:

which summe diuers other wayes may be collected. Since therefore to the departure out of Egypt, there doe remaine (as is aforesaid) onely 122. yeares from the death of Orus: we are now to consider how many of them are to be allowed vnto Sesostrius or Sesenchas: who is placed next vnto Orus, by authority of the Scholiastes Apollonius: not without good probability. For this great king or conquerour, is by many Histories recorded to haue ouer-run a great part of Asia: to haue built a fleet of ships on the red Sea: and so to haue entred into India: likewise with another fleet on the middle-earth Seas, to haue passed into Europe, and subdued many Nations. This is he (as Reineccius iudgeth) whom Musinus erring in account of his time calleth Vexoris: For Iustine placeth Vexoris in ages before Ninus: whereby it would follow that Sesostrius, if he were Vexoris, was more ancient than was Osiris (otherwise Mizraim) a thing altogether vntlikely. Certaine it is that after the departure of Israel out of Egypt, no one Pharaoh came into the land of Canaan (which lieth in the way from Egypt into Asia) till the Father in law of Salomon, Pharaoh Vaphres, tooke Gerar, and gaue it to his daughter: (as vvee may reade more at large in the holy History of the Bible) after vvhich time Sesac oppressed Rehobam, and Necho sought passage through the land of Israel, vvhich hee made his expedition against the Chaldeans. Of King Rehobam and Necho it is out of question, that neither of them was the great King Sesostrius. Of Sesac it is doubted by some, forasmuch as hee came into Indus with vwith a great armie. Reineccius propounding the doubt, leaueth it vndecided; vnlesse it be sufficient proofe of his owne opinion, that he himselfe placeth Sesostrius next to Orus: following the Scholiastes Apollonius. But further answer may be made to shew that they were not one. For, as Iustine witnesseth, Sesostrius, otherwise Vexoris, made war on people farre removed, abstaining from his neighbours. Sesac came vp purposely against Hierusalem. Sesostrius, as Diodorus witnesseth, had but 24000. horse; Sesac had 60000. Sesostrius had 8000. chariots, Sesac but 1200. Sesostrius made his expedition for no private purpose, but to get a great name: Sesac, as most agree, had no other purpose than to succour Terabam, and giue him countenance in his new reigne; whom he had fauoured long against Salomon: therefore Sesostrius must needs haue reigned whilest Israel abode in Egypt.

Whereas Krentzhemius collecteth out of Herodotus, and Diodorus, that one Menus, or Menis, was next to Orus: because those Historians affirme that he reigned next after the gods; it moueth me nothing. For Osiris did succede those fiftene gods, namely, the twelve greater, and three lesser: himselfe also (as the learned Reineccius noteth) being called Mentis. Which name, as also Menus, and Menis, were titles of dignity: though mistaken by some as proper names. Krentzhemius doth very probably gather, that Menus was Mercurius Ter-maximus; the Hebrew word Meni signifying an Arithmetician, vvhich name Ter-maximus might vuell bee attributed to Osiris, vvhich was a great Conquerour, 20 Philosopher, and Benefactor to mankind, by giuing good Lawes, and teaching profitable Arts. In proweesse and great vnder takings Sesostrius was no whit inferiour to Osiris. For he sought victory not for gaine, but for honour onely: and being vuell contented, that many Nations had acknowledged his power, and submitted themselves to his will and royall disposition, leauing them in a manner to their liberty, returned into Egypt. Soone vpon his returne he was endangered by a great Treason, the house in vvhich he was being by his owne brother purposely fired: vvhich neuerthelesse hee is said to haue escaped, and to haue reigned in all thirty three yeares: after which time he chose rather to die than to liue; because he fell blinde. Both Herodotus, and Diodorus, affirme that Sesostrius left a sonne, vvhose name was Pharon or Pharonis: who afterwards tooke the name of Sesostrius: but was nothing like to his Father in glory: for he shortly fell blinde. 30 The cause of his blindnesse Herodotus attributes to his assaulting the Riuer Nilus vwith a iaeline: which tale Diodorus hauing likewise heard, yet reports as a fable, saying that perhaps he tooke the dis ease naturally from his Father. How long this man reigned it is not where expressed: yet forasmuch as Orus the second, (otherwise Busiris) vvhich succeeded him, began 14. yeares after that this Sesostrius had bene king, it must needs bee that this reigned 14. yeares at least. That Busiris began not vntill these 14. yeares at least were expired, the very account of time from the first of Busiris, to the departure of Israel out of Egypt, plainly shewes, being almost generally agreed vpon, to haue bene 75. yeares. That none came betwene Sesostrius the second, and Busiris or Orus the second, it stands 40 onely vpon probabilities: vvhich are these. After Sesostrius had reigned some while, hee fell blinde; after certain yeares he recovered his sight, as is said: which may haue bene true, but is more like to haue bene a fable: surely the manner of his recovery as it is set downe, is very fabulous: namely, that by looking vpon a woman, or vvashing his eyes with her vvater, who had onely knowne her owne husband, hee got his sight againe. As the time of his reign, before his blindnesse, and when he was vuell againe (if euer he were) may haue taken vp a good part of 14. yeeres: so his vvorkes which vvere great, do much more strongly argue, that his reigne was not very short. His vvorkes are largely set down by Herodotus, and Diodorus: a part of vvhich may seeme to haue bene the finishing of that which his Father had begun, about the channels and sluices of Nilus: vvhom I thinke he rather frighted, (as his Father had done) with spades and shouels, than with darts, and iaelins; and by his diligent oversight of that worke, was like enough to lose both his eye-sight and his peoples loue; whom his Father had very busily employed in excessive labour about it. 50

Of Busris the first oppressor of the Israelites; and of his successor Queen Thermutis that took up Moses out of the water.

AND herein (if I may presume to coniecture) Busris, who was afterwards king, is like to have dealt with him, as Ieroboam did with the sonne of Salomon. For that Busris himselfe was much addicted to magnificent workes, it vvell appeared, by the drudgery vvhether he wearied the children of Israel in his buildings: If therefore he were employed by the great Sesostrius, as Ieroboam was by Salomon, in the oversight of those businesse, he had good opportunity to worke his greatnesse with the king by industry; and afterward with the people by incensing them against their new king, as Ieroboam did. For what the multitude will endure at one Princes hands, they will not at anothers: vnlesse hee haue either an equall spirit, or a surer foundation. If moreover he sought to deriue all the paine and labour of publique workes from the Egyptians; to the Israelites: hee surely did that which to his owne people was very plausible: who (as appears in Exodus) were nothing slack in fulfilling the kings cruelty. Now that Orus the second, or Busris, was the king that first oppressed Israel, and made the Edict of drowning the Hebrew children, which (saith Codrenus) lasted ten moneths: it is a common opinion of many great and most learned writers; who also thinke that hereupon grew the fable of Busris sacrificing strangers. It is also a common interpretation of that place, Exod. 1. that the King who knew not Ioseph, was a king of a new family. That Busris was of a new family, Reineccius doth shew; who also thinke him Author of the bloody Edict. Neuerthelesse, true it is, that Busris, according to all mens computation, began his reigne five yeares after the birth of Moses; before whose birth it is most manifest, that the Law was made, and much more that the persecution began, which Bunting thinke to haue lasted 87. yeares, ere the departure out of Egypt. Let vs therefore consider, besides the blindness of Sesostrius the second, how great the power of the Regents or Vice-Royes in Egypt was; & how great confidence the kings did put in them; seeing Ioseph ruled with such full power, that hee bought all Egypt, and all the Egyptians for bread; giuing at the same time the best of the land to his own father and brethren, for nothing; seeing also that when the Egyptians cried out vpon Pharaoh, for bread, Pharaoh said to all the Egyptians, Go to Ioseph, what he saith to you, do ye. If to a stranger borne, lately fetcht out of prison, a king well able to haue gouerned himselfe, would giue such trust, & souereign authority; it is not vnlikely that a blind Prince should do it to a man of especial reputation. For God often prospers, not only the good (such as Ioseph was) but wicked men also, as his instruments against the day of wrath. Therefore perhaps the king did (as many haue done) resigne his kingdome to him, though his reigne was not accounted to haue begun, till the death of Sesostrius. But whether Busris did vsurpe the kingdome, or protection of the land by violence: or whether the blind king resigned it, keeping the title; or whether Busris were only Regent, whilst the king liued, & afterwards (as is acknowledged by all) king himselfe: it might well be said that Pharaohs daughter tooke vp Adofes, and that Pharaoh vexed Israel, seeing he both at that time was king in effect, and shortly after king in deed and title both. It were not absurd for vs to say that the blind king Sesostrius the second oppressed Israel: but forasmuch as it may seeme that the wicked Tyrant shewed his euill nature euen when he first arose: I thinke it more likely, that Busris did it, vsing at first the power of a king, and shortly after the stile. Thus of the 122. yeares vvhich passed betwene the beginning of Sesostrius his reigne, & the departure of Israel out of Egypt, 47. being spent, the 75. which remain, are to be accounted to Busris or Orus the second, and his children. Busris himselfe reigned 30. yeares, according to Eusebius: whom very many iudicious authors herein approve. After him his daughter, who tooke Moses out of the water, is said by all that I haue read, to haue reigned 12. yeares. Her name was Thermutis Phareis, or Muthis according to Codrenus; Euseb. calls her Acencheris; and out of Artabianus his History Meris: Ioseph calls her both Acencheris, & Thermutis. Epiphanius in Panario saith that there was honoured afterward of the Egyptians, by the name of Thermutis: the daughter of Amenoph, the son of Pharaoh. Of this last title question might be made, and much spoken: for the Scriptures call her not Pharaohs sons daughter, but Pharaohs daughter. Amenophis indeed is set next before Busris or Orus the second by Eusebius & others: but but whether he were a King or onely a Regent, I cannot coniecture. For Herodotus Diodorus, and the ancient Historians name the sonne of Sesostrius, Pheron. Perhaps his name was Pharaoh Amenophis: and his daughter by the Egyptians called rather the Neece or Grand-child, than the daughter of Pharaoh because of the glory of Sesostrius, & the disreputation of his son. If so, and if that Busris or Orus the second marrying her, pretended any title by her; then is our coniecture strengthened, and then was shee both daughter, grand-child, and wife vnto Pharaoh: and summing him, Queene of the land, 12. yeares. But if he were daughter of Orus the second, and sister of Athoris, or Rathoris, as many thinke, to whose coniecture I will not oppose mine, then may it seeme, that either her brethren were degenerate, or too young to rule, when her Father died.

§. VIII.

Of the two brethren of Queen Thermutis: and what king it was, under whom Moses was borne: and who it was that perished in the red Sea.

SHEE had two brethren: the one was Rathoris or Athoris, who succeeded her; the other Telegonus, vvhich is onely named by Eusebius; but his linage and off-spring described by Reineccius. Rathoris after his sisters death reigned nine yeares: after whom Cheneres, thought to be his sonne, reigned ten yeares, and then perished in the red Sea. During the reigne of Cheneres, Eusebius saith, that Telegonus begat Epaphus vpon Isis: of which History elsewhere he reporteth otherwise. After the death of Cheneres (whom some call Acencheris: but all or most doe stile Cheneres, a fighter against God) Acherres reigned 8. yeares, and then Cherres 15. This descent seems from Father to Sonne. In the 11. yeere of Cherres it is said by Eusebius, that Epaphus reigning in the lower part of Egypt, built Memphis. This is an argument of that which otherwise was not vnlikely: viz. That Egypt was greatly brought out of order by the plagues which God had laid vpon it, and the destruction of her king and army in the red Sea: else could it not haue had two reigning in it at once; the latter of whom, or his posterity seemes to haue taken all from Cherres the grand-child of Cheneres. For whereas Armaus is said to haue reigned 30. foure yeares after Cherres: and Armesis one after Armaus: these two Kings are by Eusebius and others accounted as one, and his reigne said to haue bene five yeares. His name is called Armaus, otherwise Danaus: and his pedigree thus described by Reineccius in Historia Iulia.

Telegonus:
Epaphus:
Lybia, who had

Agenor, Belus, and Busris.

Egyptus or Ramefess who gaue name to the Country, hauing expelled his brother Danaus, reigned, and begat Lyncmus, married to Hypermetra.

Danaus or Armenus expelled by his brother Egyptus, after hee had reigned five yeares, became king of Argos in Greece: was Father to Hypermetra.

How it might come to passe that the Nephewes sons of Epaphus should haue occupied the kingdome after Cherres, it is hard to say: considering that Epaphus himself is reported by Eusebius to haue bene borne in the time of Cheneres. But forasmuch as the History of Epaphus his birth, is diuersly related by Eusebius, it may suffice, that Belus the father of Danaus & Egyptus, otherwise called Armenus and Ramefess, was equally distant from Busris or Orus the second, with Cherres the grand-child of Cheneres. And that the posterity of Telegonus did marry very yong, it appears by the History of these two brethren, Danaus

Exod. 4. 19.

and Aegyptus: of whom the former had 50. daughters, the latter 50. sonnes: perhaps, or rather questionlesse, by diuers Women: yet surely they began to beget children in their first youth: Ho wfoeuer it were, the generall consent of writers is, that Armeus or Danaus did succcede Cherres: and according to Eusebius and good Authors approving him) reigned five yeares. Rameffes followed, who reigned 68. yeares. This Rameffes or Aegyptus is that Armeffemianum or Armeffemianus, vnder whom, in the opinion of Mer- cator, and of Bunfin; that followes Atercator, Moses was borne: and the cruell Ediff made of drowning the Hebrew children. The length of his reigne seemes to me the chiefe, if not the onely ground of Merectors opinion. For whereas the Lord said to Moses, Go, returne to Egypt, for they are all dead which went agins to kill thee; Merector hereupon conceites, that it was one and the same king vnder whom Moses was born, and vnder whom he slew the Egyptian at the 40. yeare of his age; and fled into the wilderness, and there abode for feare: all which circumstances could agree with none, but this Rameffes, who reigned so long: wherefore desirous rather to hold a true Paradox, than a common error, he placeth one Alisfragmuthosis (whose name is found in the list of Egyptian kings, but the time vncertaine wherein he reigned) in an age 112. or 113. yeares more ancient than others left him in: and so continuing the Catalogue of his successors from Thomif (whom Eusebius calls Amasis) downewards with no other variation of the length of each mans reigne, than is the difference betweene Manetho and Eusebius, he findes Moses borne vnder Armeffemianum, and Israel deliuered in the days of his sonne Amenophis. The very name of Alisfragmuthosis seems to him with little alteration to sound like Pharates, of which name one was thought to haue flourished either as a king, or a wise man about the time of Naac. For (saith he) from Alisfragmuthosis to Phragmuthosis, Pharmuthosis, or Pharates, the change is not great. Atercator was a man of excellent learning and industry: and one to whom the World is bound for his many notable works: yet my assent herein is withheld from him, by these reasons. First, I see all other writers agree, that Chenires was king who was drowned in the red Sea: Secondly, the place, Exod. 4. all are dead, may better be vnderstood of Busris and all his children, than of one King alone: Thirdly, Saint Cyrill in his first booke against Julian the Apostata, saith that Dardanus built Dardania, when Moses was 120. yeares old: Rameffes, which was this Armeffemianum, being then King of Egypt. After Rameffes, Amenophis reigned 19. yeares: who is thought by Merector, and peremptorily by Bunfin pronounced, to be the King that perished in the red Sea: of which our opinion being already laied open, I thinke it most expedient to referre the kings ensuing to their owne times (which a Chronologicall Table shall lay open) and here to speake of that great deli-uerance of Israel out of Egypt: which for many great considerations depending thereupon, wee may not lightly

ouerpass.

CHAP. III.

Of the deliuey of Israel out of Egypt.

§. I.

Of the time of Moses birth, and how long the Israelites were oppressed in Egypt.

Rule it is that the History it selfe is generally and well known: yet concerning the time of Moses his birth, who was the excellent and famous instrument of this and of other great workes of the Highest, the different opinions are very neere as many, as the men that haue written of that Argument.

L. Pius in his annotations vpon Saint Augustine citeth very many of their coniectures: as that of Phyrye out of Sanchoniato, that Moses lived in the time of Semiramis: But if hee did meane the first Semiramis, it was but a fond conceit: for besides that the same is contrary to all Stories Diuine and humane, while that Semiramis liued, shee commanded Syria, and all the parts thereof absolutely: neither were the Ammonites, or Moabites, or Edomites, while she ruled, in reera matura.

A second opinion hee remembreth of Apion, taken from Ptolomy a Priest of Athenes, vho saith that Moses was borne while Inachus did rule the Argines, and Amasis in Egypt.

The third opinion is taken out of Polemon, in his Greeke History the first Booke: that Moses was borne while Apis the third King ruled Argos.

A fourth is borrowed from Tatianus Assyrius, who though hee cite some authorities, that Moses liued after the Troian war, is himselfe of opinion, that Moses was farre more ancient, prouing it by many arguments.

Fifthly, he setteth downe the testimony of Numenius the Philosopher, who tooke Museus and Moses to be one: confirming the same out of Artapanus, who confesseth that Moses was called Museus, by the Grecians: and who farther deliuereth that he was adopted by Chenephis, or Thermutis, the daughter of Egypt: the same which Eupolemus calleth Meris; others (as Rabanus Maurus) Thermuthes. Eusebius also affirmeth, that by Eupolemus in his first booke de bono, Moses, vir Deo coniu. Hysimius, is called Atuseus Iudeo. Eusebius in his Chronology, findes that Moses was borne while Amenophis ruled Egypt. The ancient Manethon calls that Pharao, which liued at Moses birth, Thumosis or Thmosis: the same perchance which Apion the Grammarians will haue to be Amosis, and elsewhere Amenophis the Father of Sethosis: to whom Lysimachus and Cornelius Tacitus gaue the name of Bocchoris. To me it seemes most probable, that while Saphrus, called also Sphernus or Iphereus, gouerned Assyria; Orthopolis, Sicronia; and Crisius the Argines; that then (Sesoftris the second ruling in Egypt) Moses was borne. For if wee beleue S. Augustine, it was about the end of Cecrops time, that Moses led Israel out of Egypt. Edixit Moses ex Aegypto populum Dei nouissimo tempore Cecropis Atheniensium Regis: Moses (saith he) led the people of God out of Egypt, about the end of Cecrops time, King of the Athenians. In this sort therefore is the time of Moses birth, and of his departure out of Egypt best proued. S. Augustine affirms (as before remembred) that Moses was borne, Saphrus gouerning Assyria; and that hee left Egypt about the end of Cecrops time. Now Saphrus ruled 20. yeares; his succesor Mamelus 30. yeares; Sparetus after him 40. yeares: in whose fourth yeare Cecrops began to gouerne in Attica: Ascatades followed Sparetus, and held the Empire 41: So as Moses being borne while Saphrus ruled Assyria; Orthopolis Sicronia; and Crisius Argos (for these three kings liued at once at his birth, saith S. Augustine, as Cecrops did when he departed Egypt) it will follow that the birth of Moses was in the nineteenth yeare of the Assyrian Saphrus: for take one yeare remaining of 20. (for so long Saphrus reigned) to which adde the thirty yeares of Mamelus, melus, and the 40. years of Spartus, these make 71. with which there were vvaisted three yeares of Cecrops his 50. yeares : then take nine yeares out of the reigne of Afcatales, who was Spartus succellour, those nine yeares added to 71. make 80. at which age Moses left Egypt : and adde these nine yeares to the three yeares of Cecrops formerly spent, there will remaine but foure yeares of Cecrops his 50. and so it fallerh right with S. Auguſtines words, affirming that towards the end of Cecrops his time, Moses led the people of Israel out of Egypt.

Now the time in which the Hebrewes were oppressed in Egypt, seemeth to haue had beginninge some eight or nine yeares before the birth of Moses, & 54. yeares; or rather more, after Ioseph : betwene vvhose death and the birth of Moses, there were consumed 64. yeates : some of vvhich time, and 80. yeares after, they liued in great semitude and plenty. For as it is written in Exodus : They ſet a ſke-maſter ouer them, to keepe them vnder with burdens : and they build the Cities, Pithom and Rameses, &c. And by cruelty they cauſed the children of Iſrael to ſerue, and made them weary of their lines, by ſore labour in clay and bricke, and in all worke of the field, with all manner of bondage. All vvhich laid vpon them by a maſtering power and ſtrong hand, they endured to the time by the vviſedome of God appointed : euen from 54. yeares, or not much more after the death of Ioseph, who left the World when it had laſted 2370. yeares, to the eightieth yeare of Moses, and vntill he vvrought his miracles in the field of Zaan, vvhich he performed in the Worlds age 2514. towards the end thereof, according to Codoman, or after our account, 2513. And because those things vvhich we deliuer of Egypt, may the better bee vnderſtood, I thinke it neceſſary to ſpeak a few words of the principall places therein named, in this diſcourſe.

§. II.

Of diuers Cities and places in Egypt, mentioned in this Story, or elsewhere in the Scripture.

THis City vvhich the Hebrewes call Zaan, was built ſeuene yeares after Hebron. Ezechiel calleth it Taphnes; and ſo doth Hieremy, the Septuagint, Tanis; Iosephus, Proteraidis after the name of an Egyptian Queene; Antonius giues it the name of 30 Thanis; Hegeſippus, Thamna; and William Tyrius, Tapus. It adioyneth to the land of Gofen, and is the ſame, wherein Hieremy the Prophet was ſtoned to death, for preaching againſt the Egyptian and Iewiſh Idolatry.

Zaan or Taphnes was in Moses time the Metropolis of the lower Egypt, in vvhich their Pharaohs then commonly reſided; & not vnlikely to be the ſame City, vvhere Abraham was his time found him. But Eusebius out of Aritapanus affirmeth, that Abraham did read Aſtronomy in Heliopolis, or On, to Pharoetes King of Egypt. Alex. Polyhiſtor, out of Eupolemus hath it otherwiſe, ſaying, that Abraham inſtructed the Egyptian Priests, and not the King; both which authorities Eusebius citeth. The Septuagint, and the Vulgar edition, for Zaan write Heliopolis. Pagnin, Vatablus, Iunius, and our Engliſh call it On; and Pro-40 long, Onium. There are two Cities of that name; the one on the frontier of the lower Egypt, towards the South; the other ſomewhat lower on the Eaſter-moſt branch of Nilus falling into the Sea at Peluſium. And it may be that Heliopolis to the South of the river Tratan, vvvas the ſame which Vatablus & our Engliſh call Auen. Of the latter it is, that the Scriptures take certaine knowledge : the ſame, which Pomp. Mela, and Pliny call Salis oppidan; Tyrius in the Holy Warre, Malbec; the Arabians, Bahalbeth; and Simon Setbi, Fans Salis. Of this Heliopolis, or On, was Putiphar Priest, or Prince, vvhoſe daughter Joseph married. In the Territory adioyning Iacob inhabited, while hee liued in Egypt. In the confines of this City, Onias, the high Priett of the Jewes, built a Temple, dedicated to the eternall God; not much inferior to that of Hieruſalem (Ptolomy Philopater then gouerning in Egypt) vvhich ſtood in the time of Veſpaſian, 333. yeares after the foundation by Onias, whom Iosephus faſtly reporteth herein to haue fulfilled a prophecy of Eſay c. 19. In die illa erit Altare Domini in medio terre Egypti; In that day ſhall the Altar of the Lord bee in the middeſt of the Land of Egypt. Antiochus Epiphanes at that time of the building tyrannizing ouer the Jewes, gaue the occaſion for the erecting of this Temple in Egypt. Laſtly, there it was that our Sauour Chriſt Ieſus remained, while Ioseph and the Virgin Mary feared the violence of Herod: neere which (ſaith Brochard) the fountain aine is ſtill found, called Ieſus well, vvhoſe ſtreames doe afterwarde water the Gardens of Balamun, no where elſe found in Egypt. And hereof ſee more in Brochard, in his deſcription of Egypt.

There is alſo the City of Noph, remembred by Eſay and Ezekiel, the ſame vvhich Hoſea the Prophet calleth Moph : which latter name it tooke from a Mountaine adioyning, ſo called; which Mountaine Herodotus remembreth. And this is that great City, which was called Memphis and ſo the Septuagint write it. It is knowne to the Arabians by the name of Mazar. The Chaldeans name it Alchabry; and Tudalenſis Mizraim.

Peluſium, which Vatablus, Pagnin, Iunius, and our Engliſh write Sin; the Septuagint call Sais; and Montanus, Lebna; is not the ſame with Damiata, as Guſt. Tyrius vvitneſſeth; for the time of Baldwin the third, Peluſium vvvas called Belbeis. Belbeis (ſaith Tyrius) quoniam dicta eſt Peluſium; Belbeis, ſhat in times paſt was called Peluſium.

The City of No, the Septuagint call Dioſpolis. Of which name there are two or three in Egypt. Hierome conuerteth it Alexandria, by anticipation, becauſe it was ſo called in the future.

Eubaitus, (for ſo Hierome and Zeigler doe write it) is the ſame which the Hebrewes call Phibeth.

To make the ſtory the more perceivable, I haue added a deſcription of the land of Gofen, in which the Iſraelites inhabited; vvith thoſe Cities and places ſo often remembred in the Scripture : as of Taphnes or Zaan, Heliopolis or Bethſemes, Balſophon, Succoth, and the reſt; together with Moses paſſage through the Deſerts of Arabia the Stony. For all ſtory without the knowledge of the places vvherein the actions were performed, as it wanteth a great part of the pleaſure; ſo it no way enricheth the knowledge and vnderſtanding of the Reader; neither doth any thing ſerue to retaine, what wee reade, in our memories, ſo well as theſe pictures and deſcriptions doe. In which reſpect I am driven to digreſſe in many places, and to interpoſe ſome ſuch diſcourſe, otherwiſe ſeeming impertinent : taking for my authority, after many others more ancient, that great learned man, Arius Montanus; vvho in his Preface to the Story of the Holy Land, hath theſe vvords : Si enim aliqua locorum obſervatione res geſta narrentur, aut ſine Topographia cognitione hiſtorie legantur, adeo conſuſa atq; perturbata erunt omnia, vt ex his nihil non obſcurum, nihil non difficile elici poſſit; ſi narratio (ſaith he) bee made of theſe things which are performed, without the obſervation of the places, wherein they were done : or if Hiſtories be read without Topographiſicall knowledge; all things will appeare ſo intricate and conſuſed, as we ſhall thereby vnderſtand nothing but obſcurely, nor draw thence any knowledge, but with the greateſt difficulty.

§. III.

Of the cruelty againſt the Iſraelites young children in Egypt: and of Moses his preferation and education.

BVt to returne to the ſtory it ſelfe. It appeareth that notwithstanding the labour and ſlauey, which the Iſraelites endured, yet they decreaſed not in numbers : inſomuch as Pharaoh conſidering the danger of diſcontented poeury, and the able bodies of an oppressed multitude, how perillous they might be to his eſtate, by ſuggeſtion of the Diuell, reſolued to ſlaughter all the male children of the Hebrewes, as ſoon as they ſhould be borne. To which end he ſent for Sephora and Thura, women the moſt famous and expert amongſt them, que praeſtant (ſaith Comellor) multitudinis obſtrictum, who had command giuen them ouer all mid-wives; by whom (as it ſeemeth) hee gaue order to all the reſt for the execution of his Ediſt. For to haue called all the Mid-wives of Egypt together, had beene a ſtrange Parliament. Now vvwhether theſe two (before named) were of the Hebrewes, or of the Egyptians, it is diuerſly diſputed. S. Auguſtine calls them Hebrewes, becauſe it is written Exodus the firſt, The King of Egypt commanded the Mid-wives of the Hebrew women. But Iosephus, Abulenſis, and Peterius beleeue them to bee Egyptians. Whoeuer they were, when it pleaſed God to fruſtrate the execution of that ſecret murder, to the end the world might vvitneſſe both the wickedneſſe of the Egyptians, and the iuſt cauſe, thereby made maniſeſt, of his future indignation and reuenge : Pharaoh finding theſe women filled with piety, & the feare of God, commanded commanded others of his people to execute his former intent; and publickly, or howsoever, to destroy all the male Hebrew children borne within his dominions.

Now besides the doubts, which Pharaoh had of the multitudes of the Hebrewes, the greatest part of whom hee might haue assured, by affording them the iustice; which euery King oweth to his vassals, and the rest hee might haue employed or sent away at his pleasure. Iosephus giueth another cause of his rage against them, namely, That it was propheticallie deliuered him by an Egyptian Priest, that among the Hebrewes there should be borne a child; who growing to mans estate, should become a plague and terror to his whole Nation. To preuent which, (and presuming that he could resist the ordinance of God, by a means, contrary to the lawes of heauen and of nature) he stretched out his bloody and mercilesse hand to the execution of his former intent. The same preuention Herod long after practised, when fearing the spirituall Kingdome of Christ, as if it should haue bene temporal, he caused all the male children at that time borne, to be slaughtered. And that Pharaoh had some kinde of foreknowledge of the future success, it may be gathered by these his owne words, in the tenth verse of the fifth of Exodus: Come, let us worke wisely with them, lest they multiply; and it come to passe, that if there be warre, they ioyne themselves also vnto our enemies, and fight against vs, and get them out of the Land. But we see, and time hath told it vs from the beginning, how God derideth the wisdom of the worldly men, when forgetting the Lord of all power, they rely on the inuentions of their owne most feeble, and altogether darkened vnderstanding. For euen by the hands of the dearely beloued daughter of this tyrant, was that great Prophet and Minister of Gods maruellous vworkes taken out of Nilus, being thereinto turned off, in an Arke of reedes, a sucking and powerlesse infant. And this Princesse hauing beheld the child his forme and beauty, though but yet in the blouth, so pierced her compassion, as shee did not onely preferue it, and cause it to be fostered, but commanded that it should be esteemed as her owne, and with equall care to the sonne of a King nourished. And for memory that it was her deede, she called the child Moses, as it were, extra dūm or eruptus, taken out, to wit, out of the vvater: or after Iosephus and Glycas, Moy, a voyce expressing vvater, and Hiser, as much to say, as that which is drawne out of vvater, or thence taken. Clement Alexandrinus vv as of opinion, that Moses vv as circumcised, before he vv as put into the Arke of Reedes, & that Amram his father had named him Isachim. In his youth he vv as carefully bred, by the care, & at the charge of Pharaohs daughter, and by men of the most vnderstanding, taught and instructed: quoniam regio more educatus, profectus ei sapientibus Aegyptiarum Magistris, à quibus eruditur, saith Basil: vnto whom hee gaue princely education, appointing ouer him wise masters of the Egyptians for his instructors. Thereby (say Iosephus and Philo) he became excellently learned in all the doctrine of the Egyptians; vv which also the Martyr Stephen in the seventh of the Acts confirmeth; And Moses vv as learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians. Which wisdom or sapience, such as it was, or atleast so much thereof as Six. Senensis hath gathered, vv ee haue added, between the death of Moses, and the reigne of Iosua.

§. IV.

Of Moses his flying out of Egypt; and the opinions of certaine ancient Historians of his warre with Aethiopia; and of his marriage there: Philo his iudgement of his Pastorall life: and that of Peterius of the Booke of Genesis and Iob.

When Moses vv as growne to mans estate, Iosephus and Eusebius, out of Artapanus, tell vs of ten yeares warre that he made against the Aethiopians: the of the besieging of Saba, afterward by Cambyes, called Neroe; and how he recovered that City by the fauour of Tharbu, a daughter of Aethiopia, whom hee took to vvife. So hath Cornelius a pretty tale of Moses. How after the end of that warre, Tharbu resisting his returne into Egypt, Moses most skilfull in Astronomy, caused two Images to be ingrauen in two precious stones, vv whereof the one increased memory, the other caused forgetfulness. These he set in two rings; vv whereof he gaue the one, to wit, that of oblivion, to his vvife Tharbu, vv preferring the other of memory for himselfe: vv which ring of forgetfulness, after shee had a vv while vvorne, she began to neglect the loue shee bare her husband: and so Moses vv without danger returned into Egypt. But leaving these fancies to the Authors of them: It is true, that about the 40. yeare of Moses age, vvhen hee beheld an Egyptian offering violence to one of the oppressed Hebrewes, moued by compassion; in respect of his brother, and stirred vp by disdain against the other, in the contention he slew the Egyptian. Soone after which fact, finding a disposition in some of his own Nation to accuse him, for whose defence he had thus greatly endangered his owne life: by the ordinance and aduice of God, vv whose chosen seruant hee was, he fled into Arabia Petraea, the next bordering Country to Egypt; vv where vvandering all alone, as a man left and forsaken, in a place vvknowne vvnto him, as among a Nation of barbarous strangers; and vv who in future times vv ere the irreconcilable enemies of the Hebrewes: it pleased God (vv working the greatest things by the weakest worldly means) to make the vv watering of a few sheep, & the assisting of the Daughters of Raguel the Madianite, an occasion vv whereby to provide him a vv wife of one of those, & a father in law, that fed him, and vv sustained him in a Country nearest Egypt, fittest to returne from: necessary to be vv knowne, because interiacent between Egypt and Iudea, through vv which hee vv was to leade the Israelites; and vv wherein God held him, till the occasion vv which God presented, best serued. And lastly, vv where the glory of the vv world shined least, amidst mountainous Deserts, there the glory of God, vv which shineth most, couered him ouer, and appeared vvnto him, not finding him as a Kings sonne, or an adopted child of great Pharaohs daughter, but as a meeke and humble shepherd, sitting at a mountaines foot, a keeper and commander of those poore beasts only.

Egyptian

20 In that part of Arabia, neere Madian, hee consumed 40. yeares. And though (as Philo in the story of Moses life obserueth) he did not neglect the care of those flocks, committed to his charge, but that he excelled all others in that Pastorall knowledge; yet in that solitary Desert he enioyed himselfe: and being separate from the preasse of the vv world, and the trouble some affaires thereof, hee gaue himselfe to contemplation, and to make perfect in himselfe all those vv knowledges, vv whereof his younger yeares had gathered the grounds and principles: the same Author also iudging, that his Pastorall life did excellently prepare him for the execution of the Principality, vv which he afterward obtained. Eusebius (saith Philo) ars Pastorali, quasi preludium ad regnum, hoc est, ad regimen hominum, gregis mansuetissimi. Quomodo bellicosa ingenia praesecent se in venationibus, experientia in feris, quod posita in militia & bello perficuntur sunt: brutis praebentibus materiam exercitii, tam belli quam pacis tempore. At vero praefectura mansueti pecoris, habet quiddam simile cum regno in subditis; ideoque Reges cognominantur Pastores populi, non contumelia sed honoris gratia. The art of keeping sheepe is, as it were, an introductory exercise vvnto a Kingdome, namely, the rule ouer men, the most gentle flocke: Euen as warlike vv natures doe before hand exercise themselves in hunting, practising on vvild beasts those things, vv which after they vvill accomplish in vv warfare: those brute beasts affording matter, vv wherein to traine themselves, both in time of vv warre and of peace. But the government of gentle castell, hath a kinde of resemblance vvnto a vv Kingly rule ouer vv subiects: therefore, Kings are stiled shepherds of the people, not in vv way of reproach, but for their honour.

40 That Moses, in this time of his abode at Madian, vv wrote the Booke of Iob, as Peterius suppoeth, I cannot iudge of it, because it is thought, that Iob vv was at that time liuing. Neither dare I subscribe to Peterius opinion, That Moses vv while hee liued in that part of Arabia, vv wrote the Booke of Genesis; although I cannot deny the reason of Peterius coniecture, That by the example of Iobs patience he might strengthen the oppressed Hebrewes: and by the promises of God to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, put them in assurance of their deliuey from the Egyptian slavery, and of the Land of rest, and plentie promised.

Of this calling backe into Egypt by the Angell of God, and the vv maruailes and vv wonders vv which he performed, thereby to persuade Pharaoh, that hee vv was the messenger of the most High, the particulars are vv written in the first fourteene Chapters of Exodus; and therefore to treat of all the particulars therein contained, it vv were needlesse. But for the first, it is to be noted, that vv when Moses desired to be taught by God, by vv what name hee should make him vv knowne, and by vv whom he vv was sent; he received from God so much, as man could comprehend of his infinite and euer-being nature. Out of vv which he deliueyred him in the first part of his answer, a name to be considered of by the vv vv wisest: and in his second, to be vv vv vv understood by all. For there is nothing that is, or hath being of it selfe; but the Eternall: vv which truly is; vv which is aboue all; vv which is immutable. The bodies of men are changed euery moment: their substance vv wasteth, and is repaired by nutriment;

ment; neuer continuing at one stay, nor being the same so long as vvhile one may say, Now. Likewise, vvhathoeuer is consumed in the longest continuance of time, the same in euery shortest piece of time suffereth decay; neither doth any thing abide in one state. Vna est Dei & sola natura qua verè est: id enim quod subsistit, non habet aliunde, sed sum est. Cetera que creata sunt, etiam si videntur esse, non sunt, quia aliquando non fuerunt, & potest rursum non esse, quod non fuit; it is the one and onely nature of God, which truly is: for hee hath his being of himselfe, and not from any thing without him. Other things that are created, although they seeme to be, yet they are not; for sometimes they were not: and that which hath not bene, may againe want being. And vvith this, in respect of the Diuine nature, the saying of Zeno Eleates excellently agreeth: Totarum natura umbra est, aut inani, aut fallax; The whole nature of things is but a shadow, either empty or deceitfull: in comparison of whom (saith E/ay) all Nations are as nothing, lesse than nothing, and meere vanity.

C. 4. v. 13.

C. 16. v. 5.

Of the tenne plagues vvherewith the Egyptians were stricken, the first was by changing the Riuer in blood: God punishing them by those waters, into which their Forefathers had throwne, and in which they had drowned the innocent children of the Hebrewes. To which this place of the Reuelation may bee fitly applied: And I heard the Angel of the water say, Lord, thou art iust, which art, and which wast, and holy, because thou hast iudged these things; for they shed the blood of thy Saints and Prophets, and therefore hast thou giuen them blood to drinke.

The rest of the plagues by Frogges, Lice, Flies, or stinging Waspes; by the death of their Cattaile; by leprous Scabbes; by Haile and Fire; by Grasshoppers; by Darknesse, after vvich Pharaoh forbad Moses his presence: moued the hardened heart of the vnbelieuing King, no longer, than the paine and perill lasted; till such time as his owne first-borne, and the first-borne of all his Nation perished. He then, while he feared his owne life, (a time vvherin we remember God perforce) stood vpon no condition: vvheras before, he first yeelded but to the departure of the men, then of the men, women, and children, referring their bestiall; but he was now content for the present, that the Israelites should not onely depart vvith all their own, but vvith a part of the Silver, Gold, and Jewels of his owne people: of vvich (the feare being past) hee suddainly repented him, as his pursuit after them proued. For when euery one of the Hebrewes had (according to³⁹) direction from Moses receiued slaine a Lambe, vvithout spot or blemish, for the Pascheuer, (a Sacrament of the most cleane and vvorthiest Saviour, and vvith the blood thereof coloured the poste and linterne of the doores; the Angel of God in the night smote euery first-borne of Egypt, from the sonne of the King, to that of the Beggar and Slaue: the children of the Israelites excepted. At vvich terrible iudgement of God, Pharaoh being more than cuer amazed, yeelded, as before is said, to their departure. The Egyptians (saith Epiphanius) did in after-times imitate this colouring vvith blood, vvich the Israelites vsed after the Pascheuer; ascribing an exceeding vertue to the Red Colour: and therefore they did not onely marke their Sheepe and Cattell, but their Trees bearing Fruit, to preserue them from lightning and other harmes.

§. V.

Of Pharaohs pursuit of the Israelites: and of their passage towards the Red Sea, so farre as Succoth.

Now, when the people were remoued, and on their way, (his heart being hardened by God) hee bethought him, as well of the Honour lost, as of the shame remaining after so many Calamities and Plagues, in suffering them to depart vvith the spoils of his people, and in despight of himselfe. And hauing before this time great Companies of Souldiers in readinesse, he consulted vvith himselfe, what way the Israelites vsed like to take. Hee knew that the shortest and fairest passage was through the Countrey of the Philistines. But becauethese people vv ere very strong, and a vvaylike Nation, and in all probability of his Allies, he suspected Moses meant to finde some other out-let, to vvith, through the Desert of Sihon; and there, becauethat the Countrey was exceeding mountainous, and of hard access, and that Moses was pestered vvith multitudes of Women, Children, and Cattell, hee thought it impossible for the Israelites to escape escape him that way. In the meane-while hauing gathered together all the Chariots of Egypt, and 600. of his owne, and Captaines ouer them; hee determined to set vpon them in the Plains of Gosen, which way fouer they turned themselves. For it vv as the ancient manner to fight in those Chariots, armed vvith broad and sharpe Hooks on both sides, in fashion like the Mowers Sythe. Which kinde of fight in Chariots, but not hooked, the Brittaines vsed against the Romanes, vvile they made the Warre for the Conquest of this Land. Of this Army of Pharaoh, Iosephus affirmeth, that it consisted of 50000. Horse, and 20000. Foot; vvich, were it true, then it cannot bee doubted but that Pharaoh intended long before to assaile the Hebrewes at their departure, or to destroy them in Gosen; and refused them passage, till such time as hee had prepared an Army, to set on them. For, as it is vvritten in the first of Exodus, hee doubted two things; either that the Hebrewes might ioine themselves to his enemies vvithin the Land; or being so multiplied, as they were, might leaue his seruice, and get themselves thence at their pleasure. But the plagues vvich God grieued him vvithall, enforce him at this time to giue an assent to their departure: perchance fore-running his intent. But were it otherwise, and Iosephus partiall in this affaie, yet by the vvords of the Text it appeareth, that he gathered all the Chariots of Egypt, vvich could not bee done in haste. For Moses made but three dayes march, ere Pharaoh was at his heeles; and yet the last day he vv ent on sixteen miles: vvich, in so hot a Countrey, and to driue their Cattell and Sheepe vvith them, pestered vvith a vvorld of Women and Children, was a march vvitnessing the dread of a powerfull Enemy at hand. Now, as Moses vv ell knew that hee vv ent out vvith a mightie hand, and that God vv ided vvithstanding in all his Enterprizes: so he vv lay not still in the ditch crying for helpe, but vv ing the vvnderstanding vvich God had giuen him, hee left nothing vv nperformed becomming a Wife man, and a vv aliant and skillfull Conducter; as by all his actions and counsailes from this day to his death, vv ell appeared.

When Moses perceived that Pharaoh was entaged against him, & commanded him not to doe to come thenceforth into his presence; after that he had vv arned Israel of the Pascheuer, he appointed a generall Assembly or Reinde-vous of all the Hebrewes at Ramases in the Territory of Gosen; a City vv anding indifferent to receiue from all parts of the Countrey the dispersed Hebrewes: and gaue com mandement, that euery Family should bring vvith them such Roë as they had of Dow, and Pasture, nor staying to make it into bread, knowing then that Pharaoh vv as on foote, and on his way towards them. Which done, and hauing considered the great strength of Pharaohs Horse-men & Chariots, of vvich kind of defence Moses vv as vv terly vv nprovided (though, as it is vv ritten, the Israelites vv ere vv armed) he vv marched from Ramases East-ward, towards the Desarts of Eihon, and vv camped at Succoth; vvich hee vv performed on the fiftenth day of the Moneth Abib. Vvich Moneth from that time forward they vv ere com manded to account as the first Moneth of the yeare. Whether in former times they had vv een accustomed to begin their yeare in some other Moneth, following the manner of the Egyptians, and vv ere now recalled by Moses to the rule of their Fore-fathers, it is vvncertain. Certaine it is, that they had, and retained, another beginning of their politticke yeare, vvich vv as not abrogated, but rather by some solemnities thereunto annexed, vv as confirmed, and still continued in vfe. Vvherefore in referring things done, or hapning among them, vvnto the beginning, middle, or ending of the yeare; that distinction of the Sacred, and the Politticke yeare is not to be neglected. Concerning the number of dayes in euery Moneth, and the vv hole forme of their yeare, like enough it is that Moses himselfe in forty yeares space, did sufficiently instruct the Priests, to vv hole care the ordering thereof (as common opinion holds) vv as giuen in trust: but that any rule of framing their Kalender, vv as made publicke, before the captiuitie of Babylon, I do not finde. Now becauethat time and motion begin together, it vv ill not, I thinke, be any great breach of order, to shew heere at their first setting forth, vvhat vv as the forme of the Hebrew yeare: vvith the difference betvv een them and other Nations, in ordering the account of time.

The territory of Gosen vv as afterward called Ramases, after the name of this City, as appeareth in Gen. 47. Num. 33. Exod. 13.

VE Adar was an intercalary Moneth, added, some yeeres, vnto the other twelve, to make the Solary and Lunary yeere agree; which (besides the generall inconuenience that would otherwise haue risen, by casting the Moneths of Summer into the Winter season, to the great confusion of all account) was more necessarily to be regarded of the Hebrewes, because of the diuine Precept. For God appointed especiall Feasts to be celebrated precisely in such a Moneth of the yeere, and withall on a set day, both of the Moone and of the Moneth; as the Feast of the first fruits; the new Moones, and the like: which could not haue so becaue kept, if either the day of the Moone had fallen in some other part of the Moneth, or the Moneth it selfe beene found farre distant from his place in the season of the yeere.

Other Nations, the better to obserue their Solemnities in the due time, and to ascertaine all reckonings and remembrances, (which is the principall commodity of time, that is the measure of endurance) were driuen in like manner to make their yeeres vnequall, by adding sometimes, & sometimes abating one or more daies, as the error committed in foregoing yeeres required. The error grew at first, by not knowing what number of daies made vp a compleat yeere. For though by the continuall course of the Sun, causing Summer and Winter duly to succeed each other, it is plaine enough euen to the most sence of all people, when a yeere hath passed ouer them, yet the necessity of ordinary occurrences, that are to be numbred by a shorter Tally, makes this long measure of whole yeeres insufficient for the smaller sort of more daily affairs. Therefore men obserued the Monthly conspicuous reuolution of the Moone, by which they diuided the yeere into twelve parts, subdividing the Moneth into 29. daies and nights, and those againe into their quarters and houres. But as the markes of time are sensible and easily discerned: so the exact calculation of it is very intricate, and worketh much perplexity in the vnderstanding. Twelve reuolutions of the Moone, containing lesse time by 11. daies or thereabout, than the yearly course of the Sunne, through the Zodiacke, in the space of sixteen yeeres, euery moneth was found in the quite contrary part of the yeere, to that wherein it was placed at the first. This caused them to adde some daies to the year, making it to consist of twelve Moneths, and as many daies more, as they thought would make the courses of the Sun and Moon to agree. But herein were committed many new errors. For neither did the Sunne determine his yearly reuolution by any set number of whole daies; neyther did the Moone change alwaies at one houre; but the very minutes and lesser fractions were to be obserued by him, that would speke to reduce their motions (which motions also were not still alike) into any certaine rule.

Here lay much Wifedome and deep Art, which could not soone bee brought to perfection. Yet as making an estimate at randome, the Athenians held the year to containe three hundred and sixty daies, wherein most of the Greekes concurred with them. That 360. daies filled vp the Grecian yeere (besides many collaterall proofes) it is manifest by that which Pliny directly affirmeth, telling of the Statues, erected in honour of

Demetrius

Demetrius Balerem, which were (saith he) 360. whilst as yet the yeere exceeded not that number of daies. By this account neither did any certaine age of the Moone begin on one of their Moneths; neither could their Moneths continue many yeeres, in their owne places; but must needs be shifted by little and little from Winter to Summer, and from Summer to Winter, as the daies forgotten to be inserted into the Almagest by men, has not forgotten by the superior bodies in their courses, should occupy their owne rooms in their due turnes. Now, because the solemnity of the Olympian games was to be held at the full Moone; and withall on the 25. day of the Moneth Theromabon (which answered in a manner to our Iune) they were careful to take order, that this Moneth might ever begin with the new Moone; which they effected by adding some vnto daies to the last Moneth of every yeere, those Games being held once in foure yeeres. This intercalation sufficed not to make the matter euer, which caused them sometimes to omit one day in the fourth yeere, which was the second of the Moneth Theromabon (agreeing nearly with our August) sometimes not to omit it on (which is all one) to insert another for it in their fourth Lunary yeere, accounting by the Moone after a manner that was not vulgar. All this notwithstanding, their Moneth of Iune would euery yeere haue growne colder and colder, had they not sought to keep all vpright, by intercalating in each other Olympiad, that is, each eighth yeere one whole Moneth, which they called the second Pesiden or Epiphen, which was the denice of Hephalus, who also taught them to make one Moneth of 29. daies, another of 30. daies, and so successively through the whole yeere. Thus with much labour they kept their yeeres as neare as they could, vnto the high way of the Planets; but these markes which they obserued, were found at length to be deceitfull Guides. For it was not possible for so fallow this eighth yeeres intercalation, that it should not deceiue them in 1. houre and 18. minutes at the least, or some waies in 34. houres and 10. minutes, or 36. and 42. minutes, which differences would, in few Ages, haue bred much confusion. The first that introduced a good method, likely to continue, was Metasthenes the Athenian, who not regarding the Olympiads, and the eighth yeeres intercalation; deuised a Cycle of 19. yeeres, wherein the Moone hauing 235. times runne out her circuit, once with the Sunne in the same place, and on the same day of the yeere, as in the 19. yeere before past she had done. This inuention of Metasthenes was entertained with great applause, and passing from Athenes to Rome, was there inserted into the Kalendar in Golden Letters, being called the Golden Number, which name it retaineth vnto this day. Hereby were auoyded the great and vncertaine intercalations that formerly had been vsed, for by the intercalation of 7. Moneths in the 19. yeeres, all was so euen, that no sensible difference could be found. Yet that error which in one yeere could not be perceived, was very apparent in a few of those Cycles; the new Moones anticipating in one Cycle 7. houres, and some minutes of the precise rule. Therefore Calippus deuised a new Cycle containing foure of Metasthenes, that is to say, 76. yeeres; and afterwards Hipparchus, a Noble Astronomer, framed another, containing foure of Calippus his Periods, each of them finding some error in the former obseruations, which they diligently corrected. The last reformation of the Kalendar was that which Iulius Caesar made, who by advice of the best Mathematicians, then to be found, examining the courses of those heavenly bodies, reduced the year vnto the form which is now in vse with vs, containing 365. daies and six houres, which houres in foure yeeres make vp one whole day, that is intercalated euery fourth yeere, the 24. of February. The correction of the Iulian yeere by Pope Gregory the 13. Anno Domini 1582. is not as yet entertained by generall consent; it was indeed, but as a note added vnto the work of Caesar; yet a note of great importance. For whereas it was obserued, that the Sunne, which at the time of the Nicene Council, Anno Dom. 324. entered the Aequinoctiall on the 21. day of March, was in the year 1582. ten daies sooner found in that time, Pope Gregory strooke out of the Kalendar ten daies, following the fourth of October, so that instead of the fifth day was written the fifteenth, by which means the moueable Feasts depending on the Suns entrance into Aries, were againe celebrated in such time, as at the Nicene Council they had been. And the better to prevent the like alterations, it was by the Council of Trent ordained, that from thence forward in euery hundred yeeres the Leape day should be omitted, excepting still the fourth hundred: because the Sun doth not in his yearly course take vp full six houres about the 365. daies, but faileth so many minutes, as in 400. yeeres make about three whole daies.

But the Cycle of 19. years, which the Hebrews used, was such as neither did need any nice curiosity of houres, minutes, and other lesser Fractions to helpe it; neither did in summing vp the dayes of the whole year, neglect the dayes of the Moon, confounding one Moneth with another. For with them it fell out so, that alwayes the Kaleuli or first day of the Moneth was at the new Moone; and because that day was festiuall, they were very carefull as well to obserue the short year of the Moone, passing through all the 12 Signes in one Moneth, as that longer of the Sun, which is needfully regarded in greater accounts. First, therefore they gaue it to Nisan their first Moneth, which is about our March or April, 30. dayes; to Iar their second Moneth 29. dayes; and so successiue 30. to one, 29. to another. Herby it came to passe, that euery two Moneths of theirs contained somewhat euenly two reuolutions of the Moone, allowing 29. dayes, 12. houres, and odde minutes, from change to change: The spare minutes were bestowed among the superfluous or Epact dayes; which made vp 7. Moneths in 19. years; to 6. of which 7. were commonly giuen 30. dayes; to one of them 29. dayes, or otherwise as was found requisite. Their common year (as appeareth by the seuerall dayes of each Moneth) contained 354. dayes, which faile of the year, wherein the Sun finisheth his course, 11. whole dayes, with some fractions of time. But these dayes, and other broken pieces, howsoeuer they were neglected in one year, yet in the Cycle of 19. years were lo disposed of by conuenient intercalations, that still at the end of that Cycle, both the Sun and Moone were found on the same day of the year, moneth and weeke, yea commonly on the same houre of the day, where they had been at the beginning of it 19. years before.

Genes. Chron.

Diuers haue diuersly set downe the forme of the Hebrew year, with the manner of their Intercalations. Signius tells vs, that euery second year they did adde a Moneth of 22. dayes; euery fourth year a Moneth of 23. in the regard of 11. dayes and a halfe wanting in 12. Moones to fulfill a year of the Sun. But herein Signius was very much deceived. For the Moone doth neuer finish her course in 22. or 23. dayes; and therefore to haue added so many daies to the end of the year, had bene the way to change the fashion of all the Moneths in the years following, which could not haue begun as they ought, with the new Moon. Genebrard saith, that euery third year, or second year, as neede required, they did intercalate one Moneth, adding it at the years end vnto the other 12. This I beleue to haue bene true; but in which of the years the intercalation was (if it be worthy of consideration) me thinks they do not probably deliuer, who keep all farre from euennesse vntill the very last of the 19. years. For (to omit such as erre grossely) some there are who say, that after three years, when besides the daies spent in 36. courses of the Moone, 33. daies are left remaining, that is, 11. daies of each year; then did the Hebrews adde a Moneth of 30. daies; keeping three daies, as it were in plussage vnto the next account. The like, say they, was done at the end of the six year, at which time, besides the Intercalary Moneth, remained six daies, namely, three summing that Moneth, and the Epact of three years, besides the three formerly referred. Thus they goe on to the 18. year; at which time they haue 18. daies in hand: all which with the Epact of the 19. year, make vp a moneth of 29. daies, that being intercalated at the end of the Cycle, makes all euen.

Whether this were the practise, I can neither affirm nor deny, yet surely it must needs haue bred a great confusion, if in the 18. year euery Moneth were removed from his owne place by the distance of 48. daies, that is, halfe a quarter of the year and more; which inconuenience by such a reckoning was vnaoidable. Wherefore, I preferre the common opinion, which preuenteth such dislocation of the Moneths, by setting downe a more conuenient way of Intercalation in the 8. year. For the 6. daies remaining after the two former Intercalations made in the third and six year, added vnto the 22. daies, arising out of the Epacts of the 7. and 8. years, do fitly serue to make vp a Moneth, with the borrowing of one day or two from the year following; and this borrowing of two daies is so farre from causing any disorder, that indeed it helpe to make the years ensuing vary the lesse from the proper season of euery Moneth. This may suffice to bee spoken of the Hebrew Moneths and years, by which they guided their accounts.

§. VII.

Of the passage of Israel from Succoth towards the Red Sea: and of the diuers wayes leading out of Egypt.

FROM Succoth in the morning following, Moses led the Israelites towards the Desert of Etham, to recover the Mountaine foot, by the edge of that Wilderness, though he intended nothing lesse than to goe out of that way, of all other the nearest. But being assured of the multitude of Horsemeh and armed Chariots, that followed him, he kept himselfe from being incompassed by keeping the rough and mountainous ground on his left hand. At Etham he refected but one night, and then he refected backe from the entrance thereof, and marched away directly towards the South; the distance betweene it and Succoth being about eight miles. That he forbore to enter Arabia, being then in sight thereof, it seemeth to proceede from three respects; the first two naturall, the third diuine. For Pharaoh being then at hand, and hauing receiued intelligence of the way which Moses tooke, perswaded himselfe, that the numbers which Moses led, consisting of about a Million, if not two Millions of soules, (for as it is written, Exod. 12. Great multitudes of sundry sorts of people went out with them) could not possibly passe ouer those desert and high Mountaines with so great multitudes of Women, Children, & Cattel, but that at the very entrance of that saltieffe he should haue overtaken them, and destroyed the greatest numbers of them. For these his owne words: They are tangled in the Land, the Wilderness hath fast them in, doe shew his hopes and intents; which Moses, by turning another way, did frustrate. Secondly, Moses by offering to enter Arabia that way, drew Pharaoh towards the East side of the Land of Gosen, or Ramesis: from whence (miffing Moses there) his pursuit after him with his Chariots was more difficult, by reason of the roughnesse of the way; and howsoeuer, yet while the Hebrewes kept the Mountaine foot on the left hand, they were better secured from the ouer-bearing violence both of the Horle & Chariots. Thirdly, Moses confidence in the Al-powerfull God was such, by whose spirit, only wise, he was directed, as he rather made choice to leaue the glory of his deliuerance & victory to Almighty God, than either by an escape the next way, or by the strenght of his multitude, consisting of 600000 men, to cast the successe vpon his owne vnderstanding, wife conduction, or valour. The third day he marched with a double pace from Etham towards the Vally of Pihacheroth, 16. miles distant; and late downe betweene two ledges of Mountaines adioyning to the Red Sea, to wit, the Mountains of Etham on the North, & Baalzephon towards the South: the same which Orpheus calleth Climax: on the top whereof there stood a Temple dedicated to Baal. And, as Phagius noteth, the word so compounded, is as much to say, as, Dominus specule, sine chyladie, Lord of the watch tower. For the Egyptians beleueed, or at least made their slauess beleue, that if any of them offered to escape that way into Arabia, this Idoll would both arrest them, and force them to returne to their Lords and Masters. For the Egyptians had gods for all turnes. Egypti dysfuerandi; The Egyptians were fruitfull in gods, saith Saint Hierome. But Moses, who encamped at the foot of this Mountaine with a million of soules, or as other conceiue, with two millions, found this Lord of the watch-towe asleepe, or out of countenance.

It is probable that all those Egyptians and others brought by the Hebrews to the knowledge of the true God, followed Moses at his departure.

Climax is so called in respect of a passage vp and downe, than that it is any proper name.

Exod. 13. 17.

Cap. 13. 17.

Now these two passages leading out of Egypt into Arabia vpon the firme land, Moses refused, as well that of Pelusium and Cafotis, the fairest and shortest of all other, in respect of Iudea, as the other by Etham, from which he refected, for the reasons before remembered, and tooke the way by the Valley of Pihacheroth, betweene the Mountaines, which made a freight entrance towards the Sea. After whom Pharaoh made so great speed with his Horle-men and Chariots, as he gaue the Hebrewes no time at all to rest them after so long a march; but gate fight of them, and they of him, euen at the very brink and wash of the Sea in so much as the Hebrewes being terrified with Pharaohs sudden approach, began to despair, and to mutine, at that time when it behoued them most to haue taken courage for their owne defence, laying it to Moses charge, that themselves foresaw those perils in which they were wrapped. And feare, which, saith the booke of Wisdoms, is the betraying of those succours which reason offereth, made them both despair in Gods former promises, and to be forgetfull of their owne strenght and multitudes.

six leagues in breadth, and the same also filled every where with Ilands, but afterwards it extendeth it selfe 58. Leagues from Coast to Coast, and it runneth vp between Arabia the Happy, and Arabia Petraea, on one side, and Aethiopia and Egypt on the other, as far as Sues, the vttermost end and indraught of that Sea: where the Turk now keepeth his fleet of Gallies. The Cosmographers commonly giue it the name of the Arabian Gulfe: but the North part towards Sues, and where Moses past, is called Heropolites of the City Heropolis; sometime Troy, and of later times Sues. Pliny calls it Cambisa, by which name it was knowne, saith he, before it was called Hero many yeares. The Arabians call this Sea towards the North Apocopa, Eccant, and Eant. Artemidorus writes it Aleniticum; King Taba Leniticum, others more properly Elaniticum, of the Port and City Elana: which the Septuagint call Elath: Ptolomy, Elana: Pliny, Lana: Iosephus, ilana: and Marino Niger, Aila: there is also Ilalab in Affryia, to which Salmanassar carried the Israelites captiue, 2. Kings 19. 37. v. 1. which Ilalab in Affryia, the Septuagint call Elan: and in the first of Chron. the Ala. But as for this Red Sea or the parts thereof, thus diuersly named, the Moures and Arabians (Vassals to the Turk) know it by no other appellation, than the Gulfe of Meca, after the name of Mahomets Towne Mecca. The Greekes write it the Sea Erythraeum, of a King called Erythras, or Erythraeum: and because Erythros in the Greek signifieth Red: hence it is, that being denominated of this Erythraeum, the sonne of Perseus and Andromeda, yet it tooke the name of the Red Sea, as Quintus Curtius coniectureth: which Arianus confirmeth. But it seemeth to me by the view of a discouery of that Sea in the year 1544. performed by Steuen Gama, Viceroy of the East India for the King of Portugall, that this Sea was so called from a reflection of redness, both from the banks, cliffs, and sands of many Ilands, and part of the Continent bordering it. For I finde by the report of Castro, a principall Commandervnder Gama (which discourse I gaue Master Richard Hacluit to publish) that there is an Iland called Dalagua, sometime Leques, containing in length 25. Leagues, and 12. in breadth; the earth, sands, & cliffs, of which Iland, being of a reddish colour, serue for a foile to the waters about it: and make it seeme altogether of the same colour. Secondly, the same Castro reporteth, that from 24. degrees of Septentrional Latitude, to 27. (which make in length of Coast 180. miles, lying as it doth Northly and Southly) all the cliffs and banks are of red earth or stone, which by reflection of the Sun-beames, giue a kinde of reddish luster to the waters. Thirdly, those Portugals report, and we know it by many testimonies, that there are found in the bottome of this Sea towards the shore, great abundance of red stones, on which the greatest store of Corall growes, which is carryed into most parts of Europe, & elsewhere. There are also on the Ilands of this Sea many red Trees, saith Strabo, & those growing vnder water may also be a cause of such a colour. Of these appearances of rednesse by the shadowes of these stones, sands, earth, & cliffs, I suppose that it first took the name of the Red Sea, because in so many places it seemeth to be such: which Iohannes Barros in his second Decade, eight Booke and first Chapter, confirmeth.

The breadth of this Sea from Elana or Ezion-Gaber adioyning, now Tora, called by the ancient Cosmographers Sinus Elaniticus, which washeth the banks of Madian or Midian, is for 16. or 17. Leagues together, along Northward towards Sues, some three Leagues or nine English miles ouer, and from this Port of Tora to Sues, and the end of this Sea it is in length about 28. Leagues, of which the first 26. haue nine miles breadth, as aforesaid, and afterward the lands both from Egypt and Arabia, thrust themselves into the Sea, & streighten it so fast, as for six miles together it is not above three miles ouer; from thence vppward the land on Egypt side, falleth away and makes a kinde of Bay or Cose for some ten miles together, after which the land growes vpon the Sea againe, and so binds it into the very end thereof, at foure miles breadth or thereabout, in which tract it was that Moses past it ouer, though others would haue it to be ouer against Elana or Tora, but without iudgement; for from Ramases to Pihacheroth and Rasaphon, there is not above 30. miles interuent, on 35. miles at most, which Moses past ouer in three dayes: and betwene the land of Egypt opposite to Elana or Tora, the distance is about 80. miles. For Ramases to which City Moses came (being the Metropolis of Gisen) when hee left Pharao at Leuee, and took his last leave, standeth in 30. degrees five minutes of Septentrional Latitude, and Adigol, or the Valley of Pihacheroth, at the foot of the Mountaine Climax, or Rasaphon, in nine and twenty, and a halfe, which made a difference of five and thirty English miles, the way lying in effect North and South.

That the passage through the Red Sea was miraculous, and not at a low Ebbe.

THe Egyptians, and of them the Memphites, and other Heathen Writers, who in hatred of the Hebrewes haue objected that Moses past ouer the Red Sea at a low ebbe, vpon a great spring-tyde, and that Pharao, conducted more by fury than discretion, pursued him so farre, as before he could recover the coast of Egypt, he was ouer-taken by the flood and therein perished, did not well consider the nature of this place with other circumstances. For, not to borrow strength from that part of the Scriptures, which makes it plaine, that the Waters were diuided, and that God wrought this miracle by an Easterly winde, and by the hand & rod of Moses (which authority to men that beleue not therein, perswadeth nothing) I say, that by the same naturall reason vnto which they fasten themselves, it is made manifest, that had there been no other working power from above, or assistance giuen from God himselfe to Moses and the children of Israel than ordinary and casuall, then could not Pharao and all his Army haue perished in that pursuit.

For wheresoeuer there is any ebbing of the Sea in any gulfe, or indraught, there doe the waters fall away from the Land, and run downwards toward the Ocean, leaving all that part towards the Land as farre as the Sea can ebbe, or fall off, to be dry Land. Now Moses entering the Sea at Migdol vnder Baalzephon (if he had taken the aduantage and opportunity of the tyde) must haue left all that end of the Red Sea towards Sues, on his left hand dry and vncouered. For if a passage were made by falling away of the vvater ten or twelue miles farther into the Sea than Sues, and betwene it and where Moses past, who entered the same so farre below it, and towards the body of the same Sea: it followeth then, that if all that part of the Sea or Strait, had been by the ebbe of a spring-tyde discovered, when Pharao found the flood increasing, he needed not to haue returned by the same way toward Egypt side, but might haue gone on in his returne before the tyde, on his right hand: & so taken ground againe at the end of that Sea, at Sues it selfe, or elsewhere. But the Scriptures doe truly witness the contrary, that is, That the Sea did not fall away from the Land, as naturally it doth, but that Moses past on betwene two Seas, and that the waters vvere diuided. Otherwise Pharao by any returne of waters could not haue perished, as he did: and therefore the effects of that great Armes destruction, proue the cause to haue bene a power aboue nature, and the miraculous worke of God himselfe. Again, those words of the Scriptures, that God caused the Sea to runne backe by a strong East-winde, doe rather proue the miracle, than that thereby vvvas caused an ebbe more than ordinary: for that Sea did not lye East and West, but in effect North and South. And it must haue bene a West and North-west winde, that must haue driuen those waters away through their proper Channels, and to the South-east into the Sea. But the East winde blew athwart the Sea, and cut it asunder: so as one part fell backe towards the South and maine body thereof, the other part remained towards Sues, and the North. Which being vnkowne to Pharao: while hee vvvas checkt by that Sea which vvied in all times before to ebbe away, the flood prest him & ouerwhelmed him. Thirdly, seeing Iosephus auoweth, that Moses was not onely of excellent iudgement generally, but also, so great a Captaine, as he ouer-threw the Ethiopians in battels, being employed by Pharao, and vvanne diuers Cities seeming impregnable: it vvith barbarous to condemne him of this grossenesse, and distraction: that rather than he vvould haue endured the hardnesse of a Mountainous passage at hand (had not God commanded him to take that vvay, and foretold him of the honour vvich hee would there winne vpon Pharao) he vvould haue trusted to the aduantage of an ebbing vvater. For hee knew not the contrary, but that Pharao might haue found him, and prest him, as well when it flowed as when it ebbed, as it seemeth hee did. For the people, beholding *Pharao*s approach, cryed out against Moses, and despaired altogether of their safetie: and vvhen Moses prayed vnto God for helpe, hee vvvas answered by God: *wherefore cryest thou vnto mee? Speake vnto the children of Israel that they goe forward: and lift thou up thy rod, and stretch out thy hand vpon the Sea, and diuide it: vvich proues, that there was not at the time of *Pharao*s approach any ebbe at all, but that God did disperse and cut through the vveight of waters, by a strong East-winde, vvhereby the Sands*

discovered themselves between the Sea on the left hand toward Sues, from whence the waters moued not, and the Sea which was towards the South on the right hand, so that the waters were a wall vnto them on the right hand, and on the left hand, that is, the waters so defended them on both sides, as the Egyptians could only follow them in the same path: not that the waters stood vpright as walls doe, as some of the Schoole-men haue fancied. For had Pharao and the Egyptians perceived any such buildings in the Sea, they would soone haue quitted the chase and pursuit of Israel. Furthermore, there is no man of iudgement, that can think, that Pharao and the Egyptians, who then excelled all Nations in the obseruations of heavenly Motions, could be ignorant of the fluxes & refluxes of the Sea, in his owne Country, on his owne Coast, and in his owne most traded and frequented Ports and Hauens; and wherein, his people hauing had so many hundreds of years experience of the tydes, he could not be caught, as hee was, through ignorance, nor by any foreknown or naturall accident, but by Gods powerfull hand onely; which then falleth most heauily on all men, when looking through no other spectacle but their own prosperitie, they least discern it coming, and least feare it. Lastly, if the Army of the Egyptians had been ouer-taken by the ordinary returne of the flood before they could recover their owne Coast; their bodies drowned would haue bene carried with the flood which runneth vp to Sues, and to the end of that Sea, & not haue been cast ashore on that Coast of Arabia where Moses landed, to wit, vpon the Sea-bank ouer against Baalzephon, on Arabia side: where it was that the Israelites saw their dead bodies; & not at the end of the Red Sea, to which place the ordinary flood would haue carried them: Which flood doth not any where crosse the Channell, and run athwart it, as it must haue done from Egypt side to Arabia, to haue cast the bodies there; but it keepes the naturall course towards the end of that Sea: and to which their carcasses should haue been carried, if the worke had not been supernaturall and miraculous. Appelloni in the liues of the Fathers affirmeth, that those of the Egyptians which staid in the country, and did not follow Pharao in the pursuit of Israel, did euer after honour those Beasts, Birds, Plants, or other Creatures, about which they were busied at the time of *Pharao*s destruction: as he that was then labouring in his garden, made a god of that Plant or Root, about which he was occupied: and so of the rest. But how those multitudes of gods were erected among them, a more probable reason shall bee giuen elsewhere. Orosius in his first Booke and tenth Chapter against the Pagans, tels vs, that in his time, who liued some 400. years after Christ, the prints of *Pharao*s Chariot wheeles were to be seen at a low vvater on the Egyptian sands: and though they were sometime defaced by winde and weather, yet soone after they appeared again. But hercof I leaue euery man to his own beliefe.

Of the iourning of the Israelites from the Red Sea, to the place where the Law was giuen them: With a discourse of Lawes.

§. I.

A transcription, by way of recapitulation of some things touching Chronologie: with a continuance of the storie, vntill the Amalekites met with the Israelites.

BVt to goe on with the storie of Israel, in this sort I collect the times. Moses was borne in the yeare of the World 2434. Saphir then governing Assyria; Orithopolis Sycionia, or Peloponnesus; Crisius the Argiues; Orus Egypt, and Dencalion Thessalic. He fled into Midian when he had liued 40. years, in the yeere of the World 2474. and two yeares after was Caleb borne. He returned by the commandment and ordinance of God into Egypt, and wrought 25 14. his miracles in the fields of Zoan, in the year 25 14. the last moneth of that year. On the 14. day of the first Hebrew moneth Abib, or the 15. of that moneth, beginning the day (as they say) Sun setting, in the year of the world 25 14. was the celebration of the Passover: and in the dead of the night of the same day were the first-borne slain through Egypt, or in all those parts where the Hebrewes inhabited not. The 15. day of the first moneth of the Hebrewes called Abib, being about the beginning of the year of the World 25 14. Moses with the children of Israel removed from the generall assembly at Ramises, and marched to Succoth.

And departing thence they made their third Station at Etham: and journeying from Etham, they incamped in the Valley of Pilacheroth, or Migdol, vnder the Mountain Baalzephon; and in the same night after mid-night, they past the Red Sea: Pharaoh and his Army perishing in their returne, about the first dawne of the day. Moses hauing recovered the banks of Arabia, gaue thanks vnto God, for the deliuey of Israel; and making no stay on that coast, entred the Deserts of Arabia Petraea, called Sur. But finding no water in that passage, he incamped at Marah, in the Desert of Etham, which in Exod. 15. v. 22. is also called Sur, 25. miles from the Sea: where the children of Israel perill with extreme thirst, murmured against Moses the second time; first at Pharaohs approach in Pilacheroth, and now in Arabia. But Moses taking the branches of a tree, growing neer a Lake of bitter water, and casting the same therinto, made the same sweet: a plain Type and Figure of our Saniour; who vpon the tree of the Crosse changed the bitterneesse of euellasting death into the sweetneesse of eternall life. Plinie remembers these bitter Fountaines in his sixth Book and 29. Chapter. From whence to Delta in Egypt, Sesostris first, Darius after him, and lastly Ptolomie the second, began to cut an artificial Riuer, therby by Boats and small Shipping to trade & navigate the Red Sea, from the great Cities vpon Nilus. From Marah he removed to Elim, the sixth Mansion, a march of eight miles: where finding twelue Fountaines of sweet water, and three score and ten Palme trees, he rested diuers dayes.

Whether this Helim were the name of a Towne or City in Moses time, I cannot affirm. And yet the scarcity of waters in that Region was such, as Helim, which had twelue Fountaines, could hardly be left vnpeopled. William, Archbishop of Tyre, in his History of the Holy Warre, found at Helim the ruines of a great and ancient City. And at that time as Baldwine the first past that way into Egypt. Ingressus (saith he) Helim, Ciuitatem antiquissimam, populo Israhelico aliquando familiarum; ad quam cum peruenisset, laetissimus incole, Regis aduentu praeognito, nauculam ingredientiens, in mare vicinum se contulerunt. Entering Helim a very ancient City, well known sometime to the people of Israel; whither, when he came, the inhabitants forewarned of the Kings approach, took Boate, and bised themselves into the Sea, lying neere them. From Elim he returned again towards the South, and fare downe by the banks of the Red Sea: the seuenth mansion. For it seemeth that he had knowledge of Amalech, who repaired to resist his passage through that part of Arabia. And Moses who had not as yet trained those of the Hebrewes, appointed to beare armes: nor assured the mindes of the rest, who encountering with the least milcry, were more apt to returne to their quiet slavery, than either to endure the wants and perils which euery where accompanied them in that passage, or at this time to vndertake or sustaine so dangerous an enemy: he therefore made stay at this Mansion, vntill the fifteenth of his second Moneth called Zim, or Iar: and made the eight Mansion in the Desert of Zim; where the children of Israel mutined against Moses the third time, hauing want of Food. In the sixteenth Chapter of Exodus, Moses omitteth this retreat from Elim to the Red Sea, but in the collection of euery fewell incamping, in the 33. of Numbers, 40 it is set down.

Here it pleased God to send so many flights of Quails, as all the Country about their incamping was couered with them. The morning following it also rained Manna, being the sixteenth of their Moneth, which serued them in stead of bread. For now was the store consumed which the people carried with them out of Egypt. And though they had great numbers of cattell and sheepe among them, yet it seemeth that they durst not feed themselves with many of those: but reserved them both for the milke to releue the children withall: and for bread to store themselves when they came to the Land promised.

From hence towards Raphidim they made two remoues of twenty miles: the one to Daphsa, the other to Alus, distant from Raphidim fixe miles. Here being againe preft with want of water, they murmured the fourth time, and repented them of their departure from Egypt, where they rather contented themselves to be fed and beaten after the manner of beasts, than to suffer a casual and sometime necessary want, and to vndergoe the hazzards and trauailes which euery manly minde seeketh after, for the loue of God, and their own freedoms. But Moses with the same rod which he diuided the Sea withall, in the sight of the Elders of Israel, brought waters out of the rocke, wherewith the whole multitude were satisfied.

Of the Amalekites, Madianites, and Kenites, vpon occasion of the battell with the Amalekites, and Iethroes coming: who being a Kenite, was Priest of Madian.

And while Moses incamped in this place, the Amalekites who had knowledge of his approach, and ghesied that he meant to leade the children of Israel through their Country (which being barren of it selfe, would be vtterly wasted by so great a multitude of people and cattell) thought it most for their advantage to set vpon them at Raphidim: where the want of water, and all other things needfull for the life of so many feeble men. On the other side, Moses perceiving their resolutions, gaue charge to Iosua to draw out a sufficient number of the ablest Hebrewes, to encounter Amalech. Between whom and Israel, the victory remained doubtfull, for the most part of the day: the Hebrewes and Amalekites contending with equal hopes & repulses for many hours. And had not the strength of Moses prayers to God been of far greater force, and more preualent, than all resistance and attempt made by the bodies of men; that valiant and warlike Nation had greatly endangered the whole enterprise. For those bodies which are vnaquainted with scarcity of food, and those mines whom a seruile education hath dulled, being beaten, & despaired in their first attempts, will hardly, or neuer be brought again to hazzard themselves.

After this victory, Iethro repaired to Moses, bringing with him, Moses his wife, and his two Sons, which either Iethro forbore to conduct, or Moses to receiue, till he had by this ouerthrow of Amalech the better assured himselfe of that part of Arabia. For it is written in the 18. of Exod. v. 1. When Iethro the Priest of Midian, Moses father in Law heard all that God had done for Moses, &c. of which, the last deed, to wit, the ouerthrow of Amalech, gaue Iethro courage and assurance, hee then repaired to his sonne in law Moses, at Sinai; where amongst other things, he aduised Moses to appoint Iudges, and other Officers, ouer Israel, being himselfe vnable to giue order in all causes and controuersies, among so many thousands of people, full of discontentment and priuate controuersie.

This Iethro, although he dwelt amongst the Midianites, yet he was by Nation a Kenite, as in the fourth of Judges. v. 11. & 17. it is manifest; where it is written, Now Heber the Kenite, which was of the children of Hobab, to wit, the sonne of Iethro, the father in law of Moses, was departed from the Kenites, and pitched his Tents vntill the Plaine of Zaananim, which is by Kedesh. Likewise in the first of Samuel, Saul commanded the Kenites to depart from the Amalekites, lest hee should destroy them with the Amalekites. For the Kenites inhabited the mountaines of Sin Kedesh: and the Amalekites dwelt in the Plains, according to the saying of Balaam, speaking of the Kenites, Strong is thy dwelling place, and thou hast put thy nest in the Rocks. And that Saul spared this Nation, hee giueth for cause; that they shewed mercy to all the children of Israel, when they came vp from Egypt. For these Kenites were a Nation of the Madianites, and the Madianites were of the issues of Madian, one of the fixe sonnes which Abraham begat on Kethura: and might also take that name of Kenites from Kethura, of whom they descended by the Mother, who (as it seemeth) kept the knowledge of the true God among them, which they receiued from their parent Abraham. For Moses, when hee fled out of Egypt into Midian, and married the daughter of Iethro, would not (had hee found them Idolaters) haue made Iethroes daughter the Mother of his children. And although the Kenites are named amongst those Nations, which God promised, that the seede of Abraham should roote out, and inherit their lands; yet it cannot bee meant by these, who are descended from Abraham himselfe: but by some other Nation, bearing the

the same name; and in all likelihood of the race of Chim. For in the fifteenth of Genesis verse nineteenth, these Kenites or Chusites are listed with the Hittites & Perizzites, with the Amorites, Canaanites, Gergesites, and Iebusites, which were indeed afterwards rooted out. But these Kenites, descended from Abraham, had separated themselves from among the rest, which were altogether idolatrous. For, as it is before remembred, Heber the Kenite,¹⁵ which was of the children of Habab, was departed from the Kenites, that is to say, from those Kenites of Canaan, and inhabited in Zaanaim, which is by Kedesh or Kadesb. Again, Moses nameth that Nation of the Kenites, before Midian, or any of Abraham's other sonnes were borne: which he did (referring my self to better judgement) rather, because they were more ancient, than by anticipation.

And as of the Kenites, so we may consider of the Madianites, parted by Moses into¹⁶ five Tribes. For some of them were corrupted, and heathens; as those of Madian by the River Zared, afterwards destroyed by Moses. But the Madianites neere the banks of the Red Sea, where Moses married his wife Zippora, and with whom he left her and his children, till after the overthrow of Amalech, seeme likewise not to haue beene corrupted. For these Madianites with the Kenites, assisted Israel, and guided them in the Desarts. But the Madianites in Moab, and to the North of the Metropolis of Arabia, called Petrea, were by Israel rooted out, when those adioyning to the Red Sea were not touched.

And though it may be doubted, whether those of Madian, of whom Iethro was Priest,¹⁷ and the other Cities in Moab were the same, yet the contrary is more probable. For Moses would not haue sent 12000. Israelites, as far backe as the Red Sea, from the Plaines of Moab, to haue destroyed that Madian, where his wiues kindred inhabited; seeing himself comming with 600000. able men, was encountered by Amalech, in that passage. Neither could Moses forget the length of the way through those discomfortable Desarts, wherein himselfe and Israel had wandred 40. yeeres.

That Iethro, or Iethor, Raguel, or Reuel, and Habab, were but one person, the Scriptures teach vs. For the Volgar and Septuagint, which call him Raguel, and our Englisb Reuel, Exodus 2. 18. calls him Iethro, or Iethor, Exod. 3. & v. 1. c. 4. v. 18. & c. 18. 1. & 6. 9. 10. & 12. and in Num. c. 10. v. 29. Habab. Others take Iethro & Habab to be the same, but not Raguel,¹⁸

§. III.

Of the time when the Law was given; with diuers commendations of the inuention of Lawes.

THe rest of the monthes of this yeere 25 15. were spent in the Desart of Sinai, neere the mountaine of Sinai or Horeb, the twelfth Mansion. Esaius thought that Sinai or Horeb were distinct mountaines: Hierame, to be but one, of a double name. And so it appeareth by many Scriptures. For, in Exod. 3. v. 1. it is called Horeb: and in Exod. 24. v. 19. it is written Sinai. In the 106. Psalme v. 19. Horeb: in Exod. 19. 11. Sinai. And so it is called, Galatians 4. 24. and againe, Deut. 4. 10. & 15. & Deut. 5. 2. Horeb. And so it is in the first of Kings 8. 6. and the second of Chron. 5. 10. and in Malachie 4. 4. Finally, in Ecclesiasticus the 48. 7. they are named as one, which bearded (saith Ecclesiasticus) the rebuke of the Lord in Sinai, and in Horeb the iudgements of the vengeance. Somewhat they are diuoynd at the top by the report of Peter Belonius; who in the yeere 1588. past out of Egypt into Arabia, with Monsieur de Fumes of France, and trauielled to the top both of Sinai and Horeb: Sinai being by far the higher hill. From the side of Horeb (saith he) there falleth a very faire spring of water into the Valley adioyning: where he found two Monasteries of Christian Marrymutes, containing some 100. Religious persons of diuers Nations, who had pleasant gardens, delicate fruits, and excellent wine. These (saith the same Author) giue entertainment to all strangers, which passe that way.¹⁹

Now that there was some such Torrent of water neere Sinai in Moses time; it is very probable: First, because hee incamped thereabout almost a yeere, and drew no water, as in other places, by miracle: secondly, because it is written, Exod. 32. 20. that when Moses had broken the golden Calfe to powder, which Aaron set vp in his absence, hee cast the powder thereof into the water, and made the children of Israel to drinke thereof.

On this mountaine, the Law by the Angel of God was giuen to Moses, where hee staied staied a whole yeere, wanting some ten or twelue daies: for he remoued not till the 20. day of the second month of the second yeere; and hee arrived about the 45. day after the eggression: the Law being giuen the 50. day.

At this Mansion all was done, which is written from the beginning of the 29. Chapter of Exodus, to the end of that booke; and all in Leuiticus; and all in Numbers, to the 10. Chapter. Whereof (because there is no storie nor other passage) I will omit the repetition, and in place thereof speake somewhat of the Law; and the kinds and vse thereof: whereby, if the Reader finde the story any way diuoynd, hee may turne ouer a few leaues; and, omitting this, finde the continuation thereof. We must first consider, that as there can bee neither foundation, building, nor continuance of any Common-wealth, without the rule, Iuell, and square of Lawes: so it pleased God to giue thereby vnto Moses the powerfulllest meane (his miraculous grace excepted) to gouern that multitude which hee conducted; to make them victorious in their passage, and to establish them assuredly in their conquest. For as the North starre is the most fixed directour of the Seaman to his desired Port: so is the Law of God the guide and conductor of all in generally, to the haue of eternall life: the Law of nature, from God his eternall Law deduced, the rule of all his creatures: the Law humane, depending on both these, the guard of Kings, Magistrates, and vertuous men; yea, the very spirit, & the very finewes of euery Estate in the world, by which they liue and moue: the Law, to wit, a iust law, being resembled to an Heart without affection, to an Eye without lust, and to a Minde without passion; a Treasurer, which keepeth for euery man what he hath, and distributeth to euery man what he ought to haue. This benefit the Ancient, though barbarous, esteemed so highly, that among them, those which weretaken for the first makers of Lawes, were honoured as gods, or as the sonnes of gods: and the rest, that made either additions or corrections, were commended to all posteritie for men of no lesse vertue, and no lesse liberally beneficiall to their Countries, than the greatest and most prosperous Conquerours that euer gouerned them. The Israelites, the Lacedemonians, and the Athenians, receiued their Lawes from one: as the Israelites from Moses; the Lacedemonians from Lycargus; the Athenians from Solon; the Romanes sometime from their first Kings, from 30 their Decem viri; from their Senators, from their Lawyers, and from the people themselves: others from the Prince, Nobilitie, and People; as in England, France, and in other Christian Monarchies and Estates.

§. IIII.

Of the name and meaning of the words, Law, and Right.

THe word Lex, or Law, is not alwaies taken alike, but is diuersly, and in an indifferent sense vied. For if we consider it at large, it may bee vnderstood for any rule prescribing a necessarie meane, order, and methode, for the attaining of an end. And so the rules of Grammar, or other Arts, are called Lawes. Or it is taken for any priuate ordinance of Superiours to Inferiours: for the commandments of Tyrants, which they cause to be observed by force, for their decrees do also vspurp that title, according to the generall acceptance of the word Law: of which Esay, wee vnto them that deserve such decrees, and write grievous things; Likewise, the word is vied for the tumultuary resolutions of the people. For such constitutions doth Aristotle also call Lawes, though euill and vnjust: Idola lex est, quae tumultuaria posita est: it is an ill law, that is made tumultuously. So as all ordinances, either good or euill, are called by the name of Lawes.

The word Law is also taken for the morall habit of our minde, which doth (as it were) command our thoughts, words, and actions: framing and fashioning them according to it selfe; as to their patterne and plat-forme. And thus the law of the flesh which the Diuinitie call legem sensum, is to be vnderstood. For euery law is a kinde of patterne of that which is done according vnto it: in which sense as 'tillowhere, this morall habit or disposition of the heart is called the frame or signum of the heart: Ioan. S. Paul to the Romans is called a Law: But I see another law in my members, rebelling against the Law of my minde; and leading me captive vnto the law of sinne. Again, the nature and inclinations of all creatures are sometime called Lawes, so far as they agree with the reason of the law eternall; as the law of a Lyon, to be fierce or valiant.

Also private contracts among Merchants and other Trade-men, do often put on the name of lawes. But law commonly and properly, is taken for a right rule, prescribing a necessary meane, for the good of a Common-wealth, or Ciuill communitie. The rest, to wit, the cōmandements of Tyrants, &c. which haue not the common good for their end, but being leges inique, are by Thomas called violencia magis quam leges; rather compulsions than lawes: And whatsoeuer is not iust, S. Augustine doth not allow for lawes, howsoeuer established: for he calls them iniqua hominum constituta, quæ nec cura dicendi, nec putanda sunt; The vniuersal constitutions of men which are neither to be termed nor thought lawes. For, saith Aristotle, Legalia iusta sunt facienda, & conseruatiua felicitatis; Iust lawes are the workers and preseruers of happinesse: because by them we are directed ad vitam quietam, to a quiet life, according to Cicero: Yea, to life euerslasting, according to the Scriptures. For the end of the Law, saith Plato, is God and his worship: Finitis legibus Deus & cultus eius. Lex, or the Law is so called by the Latines à legendo, or à ligando, of reading or binding: Leges quia lecta & ad populum lata, saith Varro; For after Lawes were written and published, all men might reade them, and behold in them whereto they were bound. The other Etymology, à ligando, is no lesse agreeable with the nature of a Law: whence in the Scripture it is called also a yoke, and a band: as confrangerunt iugum, diruperunt vincula: they haue broken the yoke, they haue broken the bands. And in the second Psalme, Dirumpamus vincula eorum, & proiciamus à nobis funes ipsorum; Let vs break their bands in sunder, and cast away their cords from vs.

The Covenant it is called, because of the conditional promises of God: and because of Gods peoples voluntary submission of themselves vnto it: for which vvorde the Septuagint, and the Epistle to the Hebrewes, vse the word diathesis, a Testament or Last will: which name it hath, because it is not otherwise effectual for our saluation, but in respect of the death of the Testator; for without the death of the Testator, the Testament is of no force: as Hebr. 9. 17. it is said, Testamentum in mortuis ratum est.

The Hebrewes call the Law Torah of teaching, because euery man is thereby taught his dutie, both to God and Men. The Greekes call it Nomos of distributing, because it distributeth to euery man his owne due; the power of the law is the power of God: iustice being an attribute proper vnto God himselfe. Imperium legis imperium Dei est; The reigne of the Law is the reigne of God.

Law in generall is thus defined by the Philosophers: Lex est vita regala, precipiens que sunt sequenda, & que fugienda; Law is the rule of life, commanding what to follow, and what to shun: or Lex est omnium diuinarum & humanarum rerum Regina; Law is the Queene or Princeesse of things both humane and diuine. But this description is grounded vpon the opinion of ineuitable fate. Law is the very wisdom of Nature: the reason and vnderstanding of the prudent: and the rule of right and wrong. For as a right line is called index sui & carui, the demonstration of it selfe, and of the crooked: so is the law, the iudge and measure of right and wrong.

M. Hooker calls the Law a directive rule to goodnesse of operation: and though law as touching the substance and effence, consist in vnderstanding: Comprehendit tamen actum voluntatis; Yet it comprehends the act of our will. The word Law is also diuersly taken, as sometime for the matter of the law and for common right: sometime for the law it selfe: as Law civile, or Law gentium. Isidore distinguisheth the two generall words Law and Law: whereof Law, saith he, hath reference to men, Law to God: Law lex diuina, Law lex humana. To goe out another mans field, is permitted by Gods law, not by mans; and therefore in a thing out of controuersie, Virgil vsed both these words: as Lex & iura sumus, God and men permit.

The word Law or Right, is deriued or taken from the old substantiue Nowne iussu, a bidding or commandment: or perhaps from the Greece ζωω which is the name of Justice, or of the Latine genitiue case Iouis; because as the Scripture speaks, the iudgement is Gods. For as it is certaine that Law in Law came of Iouis iurandum, (for so we find it written in Nonius out of the ancient, in which sense the Scripture calls it iuramentum Iehoua) so also we may say, that Law came of Iouis, quia Iouis est: because as God is the Author, and Patterne, and Maintainer of right, so also in his Kiengdom the Magistrates, he is the pronouncer and executor of right. Of this Law the iust are denominated, iustus & iure, and iustitia à iusto; The right giues name to the righteous: and iustice takes her name from the iust.

§. V. Of the definition of Lawes; and of the Law eternall.

But because lawes are manifold, and that euery kinde hath a proper and peculiar definition, it agreeth with order, first to diuide and distinguish them. I meane those sorts of lawes, from whence all other particulars are drawne: leaving the individuals of humane lawes to their infinite and horrible confusion.

The law eternall is thus defined by Thomas. Lex aeterna est aeterna diuine sapientie concepta, secundum quod ordinatur ad gubernationem rerum ab ipso præconitatum; The eternall law is the eternall concept of Gods wisdom as it is referred to the government of things foreknowne by himselfe. Or, Lex aeterna est summa atque aeterna ratio diuine sapientie: quatenus res omnes ad destinatos fines ita dirigit, ut illis iuxta conditionem ipsarum modum aliquem necessitatis asserat; It is the high and eternall reason of diuine sapience: as it directeth all things in such sort to their proper ends, imposing a kinde of necessity according to their several natures, or conditions. Now the difference lieth in this: That as the same diuine vnderstanding directs all these to their proper ends, so it is called prouidence: but as it imposeth a necessity according to the nature of all things which it directeth, so it is called a law.

Of this eternall law Cicero took knowledge, when in his booke of Lawes, he wrote in this manner. Erat ratio perfecta, rerum natura, & ad recte faciendum impellens & à delictis auocans: que non tum incipit lex esse cum scripta est: sed tum cum orta est. Orta autem fuit cum mente diuina: quoniam breuiter lex vera atque princeps, apta ad iubendum & ad vetandum ratio est recta summi Iouis; This perfect reason and nature of things incommuting or impelling to rightfull actions, and calling vs backe from euill, did not (saith hee) then begin to bee a law when it was written: but when it had being. Being and beginning it had together with diuine vnderstanding, and therefore a true law and a fit Princeesse to command and forbid, is the right reason of the most high God. This eternall law, (if we consider it in God, or as God,) is alwaies one and the same; the nature of God being most simple: but as it is referred to diuers objects, so the reason of man findes it diuers and manifold. It also seemeth one law in respect of things necessary, as the motions of the heauens; stabilitie of the earth, &c. but it appeareth otherwise to things contingent: another law to men, another to other creatures, hauing life, and to all those that be inanimate.

By this eternall law all things are directed, as by the counsaile and prouidence of God: from this law all lawes are deriued, as from the rule vniuersall: and thereto referred, as the operation of the second to the first.

The eternall, and the diuine Law, differ only in consideration: the eternall directing more largely: as well euery creature, to their proper and naturall ends, as it doth man to his supernaturall: but the diuine law to a supernaturall end only: the naturall law is thence deriued, but an effect of the eternall: as it were a streame from this fountaine.

The Law humane or temporall is also thence drawn: in that it hath the forme of right reason: from which if it differ, it is then impositio iniqua, a wicked imposition: and only borroweth the name of a law.

To this eternall law all things are subiected, as well Angels and Men, as all other creatures, creature; or things created; whether necessary or contingent, naturall or morall, & humane. For the Law eternall runneth through all the vniuersall, and therefore it is the law also of things which are simple, naturall and inanimate.

Hence it is, that all things created are commanded to praise God their Creator and Directour: as, Praise him all ye his Angels: praise him Sunne and Moone, all bright Starres: heauen of heauens, for he hath established them for euer and euer. He hath made an ordinance which shall not passe: Praise ye the Lord from the earth ye Dragons and all Deepes: Fire and hail, snow and vapours, stormie windes, which execute his word: mountaines and hills, fruitful trees and all Cedars: Beasts, and all Cattel, &c. Now as the reasonable Creatures are by this eternall law bound, by the glory and felicity proposed vnto them (beatitude being both the attractiue, and the end) so all other naturall things and creatures, haue in themselves, and in their own natures, an obedience formall to it, without any proper intention, known cause, or end proposed. For beasts are led by sense, and naturall instinct: things without life by their created forme, or formall appetites, as that which is heavy to fall downward: things light to mount vpward, &c. and fire to heate whatfocuer is appoiled. This kinde of working the Aristotelians ascribe to common nature: others to fate; a difference vsed in termes only; it being no other than Gods generall providence: for as it is truly said of God, that he is omnia super omnia: so are all things which appeare in themselves thence deriued: there-vnder subiected: thence-from by his eternall law and providence directed, euen from the greatest to the least of his creatures, in heauen and in earth.

The Schoolemen are very curious and ample in the consideration of these lawes: and in discourse of the profit, and of the matter, and object of the eternall law. But as the profit is manifest in the good of all creatures, who haue thence-from, either reason, sense, vegetation, or appetite, to conduct them: so is the object and matter of the law, the whole creature. For according to S. Augustine, Lex aeterna est, qua iustum est, ut omnia sine ordinatissima; The law eternall is that, whereby it is iust, that all things should be disposed in the best and goodliest order.

Lastly, it is disputed, whether the eternall law be immutable, yea or no? But the resolution is, that it changeth not; for which S. Augustine vseth a sufficient argument in his first Booke of Free-will, the sixth Chapter. For the law of Moses which had a time prefixed, was eternally by God ordained to last vntill the time of the Pædagogic of Gods people, or introduction to Christ should be expired; which time of expiration some thinke our Sauour noted to be come, when on the Crosse he said, Consummatus est. But I rather thinke these words of our Sauour to haue no other signification, than that now the prophetic of their giuing him Vinegar to drink was fulfilled. For so Saint Iohn expounds it, when hee saith v. 28. That Christ seeing all (other) things to be fulfilled, vs consummaretur Scriptura, That the Scripture in this also might be fulfilled, said, I thirst: though I deny not, but at the same time also the date of the Law was expired, to wit, of the law ceremoniall, and of so much of the iudiciall, as appertained peculiarly to the Iewes, and agreeth not with the law of the new Testament and Gospel of Christ. For the immutable law of God, though prescribing things mutable, is not therefore changed in it selfe; but the things prescribed, change according to this eternall ordinance, of which the Wisdom of Salomon, And being one see can doe all things, and remaining in her selfe renoueth all.

§. VI.

Of the Law of Nature.

Of the law of Nature as it is taken in generall, I finde no definition among the Schoolemen: only as it is considered in man, it is called the impression of diuine light, and a participation of the eternall law in the reasonable creature. Lex naturalis est impressio diuini luminis in nobis, & participatio legis aeternae in rationali creatura. Philian defines the naturall law to be the same which nature hath taught all liuing creatures: Lex naturalis est quod Natura omnia animalia docuit: and hee afterward addeth, Lex ista non humani generis proprium, sed omnium animalium quae terra marique nascuntur, animi quoque commune est; The law of Nature is not proper to man alone, but the same is common to all liuing creatures, as well to birds, as to those which the Land and Sea produceth.

But

But this definition is not generall, but of the naturall Law in things of life.

The Law of nature in generall, I take to be that disposition, instinct, and formall quality, which God in his eternall providence hath giuen and imprinted in the nature of euery creature, animate, and inanimate. And as it is diuinum lumen in Men, enlightening our formall reason; so is it more than sense in Beasts, and more than vegetation in plants. For it is not sense alone in Beasts, which teacheth them at first sight, and without experience or instruction, to flee from the enemies of their liues; seeing that Bulles and Horses appeare vnto the sense more fearefull and terrible, than the least kind of Dogges, and yet the Hare and Deere feedeth by the one, and mereth from the other, yea, though by them neuer scene before, and that as soone as they fall from their Dammes. Neither is it sense which hath taught other Beasts to provide for Winter, Eagles to build their nests, high or low, according to the tempestuous or quiet seasons: or the Birds of India to make their nests on the smallest twiggies which hang ouer Rivers, and not on any other part of the tree, or else where: to laue their egges and young ones from the Monkeys, and other Beasts, whose weight such a twigge will not beare: and which would feare to fall into the water. The instances in this kinde are exceeding many which may bee giuen. Neither is it out of the vegetable or growing nature of plants, that some trees, as the female of the Palmitto, will not beare any fruite except the male grow in sight. But this they doe by that Law, which the infinite and vnsearchable wisdom of God had in all eternity provided for them, and for euery nature created. In man this Law is double, corrupt, and incorrupt; corrupt, where the reason of man hath made it selfe subiect, and a Vassall to passions, and affections brutall: and incorrupt, where time and custome hath bred in men a new nature, which also, as is aforesaid, is a kinde of Law. For it was not by the Law of Nature incorrupt, which Saint Augustine calleth the Law of reason, but by a nature blinded and corrupted, that the Germans did anciently allow of theft: and that other Nations whereby Law constrained to become Idolaters; that by the Lawes of Ergurgus it was permitted to men to vse one anothers Wife, and to the Woman to choosethem others besides their Husbands, to beget them with childe: which law in those parts hath lasted long, and is not forgotten to this day.

The Seythians, and the people of both Indies, hold it lawfull to bury with them the best beloved wiues: as also they haue many other customes remembred by G. Valentia, against nature and right reason.

And I know not from what authority it is, that these Lawes some men auow to be naturall: except it be of this corrupt nature, as (among others) to pay giule to become faithlesse among the faithlesse: to provide for our selues by another mans destruction: that iniury is not done to him that is willing to destroy those whom we feare, and the like. For taking the definition of naturall Lawes, either out of Saint Augustine or Aquinas, (the one calling it the impression of diuine light; the other, the dictate or eniunction of practique reason) the same can teach vs, or incline vs to no other thing, than to the exercise of Iustice and vprightnesse: and not to offer or performe any thing toward others, saue that which we would be content should be offered or performed toward our selues. For such is the Law of Nature to the minde, as the eye is to the body; and that which according to David heereth vs good, that is, the obseruation of those things which leade vs thereby to our last end; which is eternall life: though of themselves not sufficient without faith and grace.

Now, that which is truly and properly the law of Nature, where the corruption is not taken for the Law, is, as aforesaid, the impression of Gods diuine light in men, and a participation of the Law increased and eternall. For without any Law written, the right reason and vnderstanding, which God hath giuen vs, are abilities within our selues, sufficient to giue vs knowledge of the good and euill, which by our gratitude to God, and distribution of right to men, or by the contrary, we prepare and purchase for our selues. For when the Gentiles (saith Saint Paul) which haue not the Law, doe by nature shew things contained in the Law: they haue not the Law, are a Law vnto themselves. Now, to loue God by whom we are, and to doe the same right vnto all men, which we desire should be done vnto vs, is an effect of the purest reason: in whose highest Turrets, the quiet of conscience hath made her resting place, and habitation, In arce altissima rationis quies habitat. Therefore, the Gentiles (saith Saint Paul) which shew the effects of the Law written in their hearts, haue their consciences for a witness of those effects: and they probat: their thoughts to accuse them.

And

And it is most true, that whosoever is not a law unto himselfe (while hee hopeth to abuse the world by the advantage of hypocrisie) worketh nothing else, but the betraying of his owne soule, by crafty unrighteousnesse, purchasing eternall perdition. For it helpeth us not to hide our corrupt hearts from the worlds eye, seeing from him, who is an infinite eye, we cannot hide them: some Garlands we may gather in this May-game of the world, Sed folles illi, dum loquimur, arcescit; Those flowers wither while we discourse of their colours, or are in gathering them. That we should therefore inhabite and dwell within our selves, and become fearefull witnesses of our secretest euils, did that reuerend Philosopher Pythagoras teach in this golden precept: Nil turpe committis, neque coram alijs, neque tecum, maxime omnium vere te ipsum; Commit nothing foule or dishonest, faith he, neither to bee knowne to others, nor to thine owne heart: but above all men reuerence thine owne conscience. And this may be a precept of nature and right reason: by which law, men, and all creatures, and bodies, are inclined to those operations, which are answerable to their owne forme; as fire to give heate. Now, as the reasonable minde is the forme of man, so is heaptly moued to those things which his proper forme presenteth vnto him: to wit, to that which right reason offereth; and the acts of right reason, are the acts of vertue: and in the breach of the rules of this reason, is man least excusable: as being a reasonable creature. For all else, both sensitiue, growing, and inanimate, obey the Law which God imposed on them at their first creation.

Gen. 1. The Earth performeth her office, according to the Law of God in nature: for it bringeth forth the bud of the hearbe which feedeth feede, &c. and the Beast, which liueth thereon. Hee gaue a Law to the Seas, and commanded them to keepe their bounds: which they obey. Hee made a decree for the raine, and a way for the lightning of the thunders. He caused the Sunne to moue, and to giue light, and to serue for signes and for seasons. Were these as rebellious as man, for whose sake they were created, or did they once breake the law of their natures and formes: the whole world would then perish, and all returne to the first Chaos, darknesse, and confusion.

By this naturall Law, or Law of humane reason, did Cain perceiue his owne wickednesse, and offence, in the murder of Abel: for he not onely feared the displeasure of God, but the reuenge of men: it being written in his reason, that whatsoeuer he performed towards others, the same by others might be done vnto him againe. And that this judgement of well and euill doing, was put into our natures by God, and his eternall Law, before the Law written: Moses in the person of God witnesseth, Gen. 4. If thou doe well, shalt thou not be accepted, and if thou doe not well, sinne lieth at thy doore.

The Schoolemen are large also in this question of the naturall Law: the same being openedly by Keimerius, Antonius, and Valentia. But it is not my purpose to write a Volume of this subiect.

But this Law which Thomas Aquinas calleth an act of reason taken properly, and not a habite, as it is an euident naturall iudgement of practique reason: they diuide into indemonstrable, or needing no demonstration (as that good is to be followed, and euill eschewed) and demonstrable, which is euidently proued, out of higher and more vniuersall propositions. Again, as it answereth the naturall appetite, prescribing things to be desired as good, or to be auoyded as euill (as of the first, to desire to liue, and to satisfie hunger, &c. and of the second, to eschew paines, sorrow, and death) in this consideration they diuide it, according to the diuers kinds of appetites that are in vs. For in euery man there are three sorts of appetites, which answereth the three degrees of naturall Law. The first is, to be that which we are; in which is comprehended the desire, both to liue, and to perseuer our being and life, also the desire of issue, with care to provide for them: for the Father after his death liues in his children; and therefore the desire of life comprehends the desire of children. And to these appetites are referred the first indemonstrable lawes of nature, for the most part. For it needs no prooffe, that all creatures should desire to be, to liue, and to be defended, and to liue in their issue, when they cannot in themselves. And as man is a being, Ens or Res: so he doth desire good, and shun euill. For it is common to all things, to desire things agreeable to their owne natures, which is, to desire their owne good. And so is Good defined by Aristotle, to be that which all desire. Which definition Basil vpon the 44. Psalme approveth: Kellē quidem Bonum definiunt. Quod omnia expant; Rightly haue some men defined Good, or Goodnesse, to be that which all things desire.

The

The second kinde of appetite is of those things which appertaine to vs, as wee haue sense. Whence, by the law of Nature, we desire the delighs of euery sense, but with such moderation, as may neither glut vs with satietie, nor hurt vs with excess. For as Sense it selfe is for the preseruacion of life and being: so is it meete, euen by the Law of nature, that the sensitiue appetite should not carry vs to the destruction, either of our life or being. And although (seeing both these kinds of appetites are in beasts) we may well say, that Nature hath giuen diuers Lawes vnto them: In which sense the Civilians define Naturall right, or Ius naturale, to be the same which Nature hath taught all liuing creatures. Yet the Schoolemen admit not, that the instincts of beasts can be properly called a Law, but only a Ius, or Right which is the matter, and aime of euery Law. For so they distinguish it; where Vipian affirmeth, that Ius naturale is that, which Nature hath taught all liuing creatures. In this place (saith Valentia) Ius is not to be taken for a Law, but for the matter of the Law. And yet where Vipian also distinguisheth the right belonging to liuing creatures in generall, from the right belonging to men; calling the one Ius naturae, the other Ius gentium: the Diuines vnderstand the law of nature more largely, that is, for all euident dictates, precepts, or biddings of diuine reason: both in beasts and men; and restraints the law of Nations to a kinde of humane right.

The third appetite is of those things which appertaine properly to man, as hee is a liuing creature reasonable: as well with relation to God, and to our Neighbour, as for our selues: and the Lawes of this appetite are the Commandements of our Religion.

Now although there are many other branches and diuisions of this law of nature answering the diuision of matter, which it prescribeth, and as manifold, as the morall actions are which it commandeth or forbiddeth: yet is the law of nature but one law, according to Aquinas: first, because it hath one fountaine or roote in the naturall or moriue faculty, which is but one, stirring vnto good, and declining the contrary: secondly, because all is contained in that generall naturall precept, That good is to be followed, and ill auoyded: and thirdly, because all the parts are reduced to one and the same last end.

30 That this law of nature bindeth all creatures, it is manifest: and chiefly man; because he is indued with reason; in whom as reason groweth, so this band of obseruing the law of nature increaseth, Postquam ratio ad perfectum venit, tunc fit quod scriptum est, Adiuuante mandato, peccatum reuincit; When reason grew to perfection, then it came to passe, which was written by Saint Paul, when the Commandements came, sinne reuined. Neither is it a small warrant for this law of nature, when those which breake the same, are said by Saint Paul, To be deliuered ouer into a reprobate sense (or minde) to doe those things which are not conuenient: and againe, that their consciences beare witness, and their thoughts accuse them. For, though this law of nature stretch not to euery particular: as to command fasting and the like: yet, it commandeth in generall all good, and whatsoeuer is agreeable to right and reason. And therefore, said Damaschene; Homines facti sunt mali, declinando in id quod contra naturam est; Men (saith he) are made euill, by declining vnto that which is contrary to nature; and Saint Augustine, Omne vitium natura necat, ac per hoc contra naturam est; Euery vice doth wrong to nature, and is therefore contrary vnto it.

Neither yet are the rules of this law of nature so strait, but that they suffer exceptions in some particulars. For whereas by this law all men are borne Lords of the earth, yet it well alloweth inequality of portions, according to vnequall merit: by taking from the euill, and giuing to the good: and by permitting and commanding that all men shall enioy the fruites of their labours to themselves: according to the rules of iustice and equitie.

39 And though the Law of nature command, that all things be restored which are left in trust, yet in some causes, this her law need suffereth to be broken: as to denie a mad man his weapons, and the like, which he left in keeping while he was sober. But the vniuersall principles can no more be changed, than the decrees of God are alterable: who according to Saint Paul, abideth faithfull, and cannot denie himselfe.

§. VII. Of the written Law of GOD.

After the eternall, and naturall, the law Positive or imposed is the next in order, which law, being nothing but an addition, or rather explication of the former, hath two kinds: Diuine and Humane. Again, the diuine positive law is double, the Olde and New: The Old was giuen vnto Moses in Mount Sinai or Horeb, at such time as the world had stood 513. whole yeeres: and in the 67. day of this yeere, when as Alcatades or Alcatades gouerned the Affyrians, Marathus the Sycionians, Triopus the Argines, Cecrops Attica, and Acherres Egypt: to wit, after the promise to Abraham, 430. yeeres. And this it seemes, was the first written law which the world receiued. For the very word Nomes, signifying a law, was not then, nor long after inuented by the Gracians: no not in Homers time, who lived after the fall of Troy 80. yeeres at least: and Troy it selfe was cast downe 335. yeeres, after Moses led Israel out of Egypt. This Law, it pleased God to ingraue in stone, that it might remaine a lasting booke of his exprest will in the Church; and that the Priests and people might haue, whereof to meditate, till the coming of Christ: and that for these Children of Israel, though bred among an Idolatrous people in Egypt, might be without excuse: the slight defences of ignorance being taken from them.

The reason knowne to vs why this Law was not written before, is, that when the people were few, and their liues long, the Elders of Families might easily without any written Law, instruct their owne Children: and yet as they increased, so doubtlesse they had, besides the law of Nature, many precepts from God, before the Law written. But now at length, forasmuch as the law of Nature did not define all kinds of good, and euill; nor condemne euery sinne in particular: nor sufficiently terrifie the consciences of offenders: nor so expound diuine worship, as for those after-ages was required, who gaue euery day lesse authority than other to the naturall Law; In these respects it was necessary, that the Law should be written, and set before the eyes of all men: which before, they might, but would not read, in their owne consciences. The Schoolmen, and the Fathers before them, inlarge the causes and necessity, why the Law was written, whereof these are the chiefeft.

The first, for restraining of sinne, directly grounded vpon this place of Dauid, The law of the Lord is undefiled, conuerting soules: The testimonies of the Lord are faithfull, giuing wisdom to children. For the humane Law, saith Saint Augustine, meeteth not with all offences, either by way of prohibition or punishment; seeing thereby it might take away something seeming necessary, and hinder common profit: but the diuine law written, forbiddeth euery euill, and therefore by Dauid it is called vndefiled.

Secondly, it serueth for the direction of our mindes. For the Lawes of men can onely take knowledge of outward actions, but not of internall motions, or of our disposition and will: and yet it is required, that wee be no lesse cleane in the one, than in the other. And therefore were the words conuerting our soules, added by Dauid: wherein are all our outward acts first generated, according to the Cabalists, Adhones hominum nulla essent, nisi prius in mente diceretur: The actions of men (say they) would be none at all, were they not first conceived in the minde.

Thirdly, it leadeth vs to the knowledge of truth, which by reason of diuersitie of opinion, and difference of peculiar Lawes among sundrie Nations, wee cannot bee assured of; but the Law of GOD bindeth all men, and is without error: and therefore also said Dauid, That the testimony of the Law of God is faithfull: giuing wisdom to children.

§. VIII. Of the unwritten Law of God, giuen to the Patriarkes by Tradition.

NO W, that in all this long tract of time, betwene the creation and the written Law, the world and people of God were left altogether to the law of reason and nature, it doth not appeare. For the Patriarkes of the first Age receiued many precepts from God himselfe, and whatsoeuer was first imposed by Adam, the same was obserued by Seth, who instructed Enos: from whom it descended to Noah, Sem, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Joseph, and Moses. Yea many particular Commandements afterward written, were formerly imposed and deliuered ouer by Tradition; which kinde of teaching the Iewes afterward called called Cabala, or Receptio: precepts receiued from the mouth of their Priests and Elders: to which the Iewes after the law written, added the interpretation of secret mysteries, reserved in the bosomes of their Priests, and vnlawfull to be vttered to the people. But the true Cabala was not to be concealed from any; as being indeed the diuine law revealed to the Patriarkes, and from them deliuered to the posterity, when as yet it was vnwritten. The Commandements which God gaue vnto Adam in the beginning, were, that hee should impose names to all beasts, according to their natures; to whose perfection of vnderstanding they were sufficiently knowne. For finding the reason of his owne name Adam, or Adamah, Earth, or red clay, he gaue other names significant, not onely to beasts, but to his Children and Nephewes, which afterward his issues imitated; as the name of Seth signifieth, as some take it, one that was laid for the ground or foundation of the Church, or rather, one giuen in recompence for Abel that was slaine: and Enosh signifieth man or miserable; &c. Further, God commanded Adam to till the ground, and to liue by the labour thereof: God also gaue him the choise of all fruits, but the forbidden; and in Adam also was marriage first instituted: all men thence after being commanded to cohabit with their Wiues, rather than with their Father or Mother.

That murder and cruelty was also forbidden, both before the law written, and before the flood it selfe, it is manifest. God himselfe making it appeare, that it was one of the greatest causes of the destruction of mankind by the generall flood. For God said vnto Noah, An end of all flesh is come before me: for the earth is filled with cruelty through them: and behold, I will destroy them * from the earth. That offence therefore, for which all perished, could not be vnknown to all that perished: Gods mercy and iustice interposing between the vntaught, and reuenge. This commandment God repeated to Noah, after the waters were dried vp from the earth: Who so sheddeth mans blood, by man shall his blood be shed: for in the Image of God hath he made man.

Also the law of honouring and reuerencing our parents, was obserued among the faithfull, and the contrary punished by the fathers curse: as, Cursed be Canaan, a seruant of seruants shall he be vnto his brethren. Again, we finde that the vnnatural sin of the Sodomites was punished in the highest degree, as with fire from heauen. The sinne of Adulterie and Rausishment, was before the law no lesse detested than the rest, as appeareth by that reuenge, taken for Dina's forcing: and by the iudgement which Iuda gaue against Tamar, That she should be burnt: and by the repentance of Pharaoh & Abimelech, against whom this sentence was pronounced, Thou art but dead, because of the woman which thou hast taken: for she is a mans wife. To these we may adde the ordinance of Sacrifice, of distinction of cleane and vncleane beasts; of Circumcision, of the brother to raise vp seed to his brother that left a widow childlesse, and diuers other constitutions, partly Morall, and partly Ceremoniall, which being deliuered before the written law, were after by it confirmed. So that this Diuine Law imposed, of which the Law of Moses containeth that which is called The old Testament, may be said, not onely to haue bene written in the hearts of 40 men, before it was engrauen in stone, but also in substance to haue bene giuen in precept to the Patriarkes. For as S. Paul witnesseth of himselfe, I knew not sinne, but by the Law: so euer the Law naturally preceded, and went before offences, though written after offences committed. It is true, that all the creatures of God were directed by some kinde of vnwritten law; the Angels intuitiue; Men by reason; Beasts by sense and instinct, without discourse; Plants by their vegetative powers; and things inanimate by their necessary motions, without sense or preception.

§. IX. Of the Morall, Indiciall, and Ceremoniall Law, with a note prefixed, How the Scripture speaketh not alway in one sense, when it nameth the Law of Moses.

NO W as the word (Law) in generall, as is aforesaid, hath diuers significations, and is taken for all doctrine which doth prescribe and restraine: so the Law, called the Law of Moses in particular, is taken by S. Paul diuersly; as sometime for all the old Testament, as, Now we know what ouer the Law (saith he) saith to them which are vnder the Law. When it is opposed, or differenced from the Prophets and Psalmes, it is there taken for the five Bookes of Moses. For so S. Luke hath distinguished them, as, All must bee fulfilled which are written of me in the Law, in the Prophets, and in the Psalmes.

* The common reading is can terea: but God did not destroy the earth, and why may not this proposition in this place, haue the same force, which it hath according to Lament. Gen. 4. Item 4.4.4. & Deut. 3.4.1. especially, seeing these words are but a repetition of that which is said, verse 7. Delub. hominibus in perditione. Gen. 6. Gen. 9.1. Gen. 14.1. Gen. 38.2.

When it is opposed to the Gospel, then it is taken for the Law Morall, Ceremoniall, and Iudiciall; as, Therefore we conclude, that a man is iustified by Faith, without the works of the Law.

When it is opposed to Grace, it signifieth the declaration of Gods wrath, and our guilt of condemnation; or the extremity of the law, and summum ius: as, For ye are not under the Law, but under Grace.

When it is opposed to the Truth, namely, where the Ceremonies or signes are taken for the things signified; as the Sacrifice for Christ, and the like: then it signifieth but shadowes and figures; as, The Law was giuen by Moses, but grace & truth came by Iesus Christ.

Lastly, when it is opposed to the time of Christs comming, it signifieth the whole polity of the Jewes Common-weale; as, before faith came, we were kept under the Law, &c. Or the Law of the order and institution of the Aaronicall Priesthood; as, All the Prophetes and the Law, or the Priests prophesied vnto Iohn. And if the Priesthood be changed, the Law also, to wit, of the Priesthood, must needs be changed.

The word (Law) is sometime also taken by the Figure Metonymia, for Interest, Authority, and Empire, or for constraining force; as, The Law of the Spirit of life, the law or the force of sinne and death, the enforcements of concupiscence, &c.

But the Written Law of Moses, or the Law of the Olde Testament, of which we now speake, is thus defined. The Law is a doctrine, which was first put into the minds of men by God, and afterwards written by Moses, or by him repeated, commanding Holinesse and Iustice, promising eternall life conditionally, that is, to the obseruers of the law, and threatening death to those which breake the law in the least. For, according to S. James, who soeuer shall keepe the whole, and faileth in one point, is guilty of all. The definition vsed by the Schoolemen, in which both the Old and New Law are comprehended, is thus giuen. Lex diuina est diuinum decretum, hominibus prescribens modum necessarium ut apte peruenire possint ad supernaturalem beatitudinem, quæ est ultimus humane vite finis: The diuine Law (say they) is the decree of God, prescribing vnto men a necessary meane, whereby they may aptly attaine supernaturall beatitude, which is the last end of mans life.

The law of Moses hath three parts: Morall, Ceremoniall, and Iudiciall. The Morall part commandeth this or that good to be done, and this or that euill to be auoided, in particular; as also it declareth, for whose sake it is to be done; as, Do this, for I am the Lord; whereas the law of nature commands it but in generall. Again, the Morall law entreateth of vertue and goodnesse; the Ceremoniall of diuine seruice, and of holinesse; (for externall worship, and the order of hallowing our selues vnto God is called Ceremony) and the Iudiciall teacheth the particular government, fit for the Common-wealth of the Jewes, and prescribeth orders for iustice and equity. And therefore was it said of Saint Paul, The commandment is iust, holy, and good: iust, or iustice being referred to the Iudiciall: holy, or holinesse to the Ceremoniall; good, or honest to the Morall. The Iudiciall part is touching the government of the Common-wealth of the Jewes, in which many things must needs be proper to that estate, as such as were instituted either in respect of place or persons.

The Ceremoniall is diuided into foure parts, according to the foure kindes of things of which it speaketh, to wit, Sacrifice, Holy things, Sacraments, and Obseruances. To Sacrifices belong beasts, and the fruites of the earth; to Holy things the Tabernacle, Temple, Vessels, Altars and the like; to Sacraments, Circumcision, the Passouer, and such like. For Obseruances, they consisted either in prohibition of certaine meates, as not to eate the blood and fat of beasts: or in some other outward things, as in washings, purgings, anointings, and attire, as not to wear mixt garments of Linnen and Woollen: also it prohibiteth other vnnatural and vnproper commixtions, as, Thou shalt not yoke together in a Plough an Oxe and an Asse, or cast mingled seed in one field. It also exhorteth to naturall compulsion, and forbiddeth crueltie euen to beasts, birds, and plants, whereby the creatures of God might be destroyed without any profit to man. For so some reſerue these precepts, Thou shalt not kill the bird sitting on her nest, nor beate downe the first buds of the tree, nor mazzell the labouring Oxe, and the like, to the Ceremoniall Law.

Nether is there any of these three parts of the Law of Moses, but it hath as yet in some respects, the same power which it had before the comming of Christ. For the Morall liueth still, and is not abrogated or taken away: sauing in the ability of iustifying or condemning; for therein are wee commanded to loue and worship God: and to vie charitie

one towards another: which for euershall be required at our hands. Therein also are we in particular directed, how this ought to bee done: which power of directing by speciall rules and precepts of life, it retaineth still. For these things also are commanded in both Testaments to be obserued: though principally for the feare of God in the one, and for the loue of God in the other.

The Ceremoniall also liueth in the things which it fore-signified. For the shadow is not destroyed, but perfected, when the body it selfe is represented to vs. Besides, it still liueth, in that it giueth both instruction and testimony of Christ, and in that it giueth direction to the Church, for some Ceremonies and Types of holy signification, which are still expedient; though in a farre fewer number than before Christs comming, and in a far lesse degree of necessity.

Lastly, the Iudiciall liueth in substance, and concerning the end, and the naturall and vniuersall equitie thereof.

But the Morall faileth in the point of iustification, the Ceremoniall as touching the vse and externall obseruation (because Christ himselfe is come, of whom the ceremonies were signes and shadowes) and the Iudiciall is taken away, as farre forth as it was peculiar to the Jewes Common-weale and policie.

§. X. A proposall of nine other points to be considered, with a touch of the five first.

AS for that which remaineth in the generall consideration of the diuine written Law, it may in effect be reduced into these nine points.

1. The dignity and worth of the Law.
2. The Maieſty of the Law-giuer.
3. The property and peculiarity of the people receiuing it.
4. The conueniency of the time in which it was giuen.
5. The efficacy and power thereof.
6. The difference and agreement of the old and new Testament.
7. The end and vse of the Law.
8. The sense and vnderstanding of the Law.
9. The durance and continuance thereof.

1. The dignity of the Law is sufficiently proued by S. Paul, in these words: Wherefore the Law is holy, and the Commandment is holy, and iust, and good: which three attributes are referred, as aforesaid, to the Morall, Ceremoniall, and Iudiciall.

2. The Maieſty of the Law-giuer is approued in all his creatures: who as he hath giuen all things their liues and beings, so he onely gaue the Law, who could onely giue the end and reward promised to wit, the saluation of mankind: but he gaue it not to Moses immediately, but by the ministry of Angels: as it is said: And the Law was ordained by Angels, in the hand of a Mediator: and in the Acts, He gaue the Law by the ordinance of Angels.

3. The propriety and peculiarity of the people, receiuing the Law, is in three respects. First, in that they were prepared. Secondly, in that they were a Nation apart and disaffected: Thirdly, in that they were the children of the promise made to Abraham. Prepared they were, because they had the knowledge of one God, when all other Nations were Idolaters. A Nation apart and seuered they were, because of Gods choice and election. Children of the promise they were, for the promise was made by God vnto Abraham & his seed: nor vnto his feedes, as to Eſau and Jacob, but to his seed, as to Jacob or Israel singularly, of whom Christ. Now to Abraham and his seed were the promises made: hee saith not to the seeds, as speaking of many, but to thy seed, as of one, which is Christ.

4. The conueniency of the time, in which it was giuen, is noted by S. Augustine: that it was about the middle time, betwene the Law of Nature, and Grace: the Law of Nature continued from Adam to Moses: the Law written in the Commandments receiued by Moses in the worlds yeere 2514. continued to the Baptisme of Iohn: from which time, begun the Law of Grace, which shall continue to the worlds end. Other reasons for the conueniency are formerly giuen.

5. The fit consideration is of the efficacy of this Law, the same being a disposition to, or signe of our Iustification: but not by it selfe sufficient, but as a figure of Christ in ceremonies, and a preparation to righteoussesse in morall precepts. For through the passion of Christ were sinnes forgiven, who taken away, the sinnes of the world: and therefore S. Paul calleth the rudiments of the law beggerly and weake; beggerly as containing no grace, weake as not able to forgive and iustifie. The blood of Goats and Bulles, and the ashes of an Heifer could onely cleanse the body; but they were figures of Christ's blood, which doth cleanse the inward soule. For if the Law could iustifie, then Christ died in vaine.

or

§. XI. Of the sixt point, to wit, of the difference and agreement of the Old and New Testament.

The Old and New Testament differ in name, and in the meane and way proposed for attaining to saluation; as the Olde by workes, the New by grace: but in the thing it selfe, or object and remote end, they agree: which is mans happinesse and saluation.

The Old Testament, or Law, or Letter, or the Witnesse of Gods will, was called the Old, because it preceded the New Testament, which is an explication of the Old: from which the New taketh witness. Yet the New of more excellencie, in that it doeth more lively expresse, and openly and directly delineate the wayes of our redemption. It is also called the Old, to shew that in part it was to be abrogated: In that he saith the New Testament, he hath abrogated the Old. For the Old law, though greatly extolled by the Prophets, and delivered with wonderfull miracles, yet was it constituted in a policy perishable: but the New was given in a promise of an everlasting Kingdome, and therefore called in the Apocalyps, a Testament and Gospel for ever durin.

The Old Testament is called the Law, because the first and cheefe part is the Law of Moses, of which the Prophets and Psalmes are Commentaries, explicating that Law.

The New Testament is called the Gospell, because the first and cheefe part thereof, is the glad tidings of our Redemption: the other Bookes, as the Epistles, or Letters of the Apostles, and the Acts or story of the Apostles, are plentifull interpreters thereof. The word Evangelion, signifying a ioyfull, happy, and prosperous message, or (as Homer vsed it) the reward given to the Messenger, bringing ioyfull newes. It is also sometime taken for a sacrifice, offered after victory, or other pleasing successe, as by Xenophon. In the Scriptures it hath three significations. First, for glad tydings in generall, as in Esay the 52. verse 7. concerning peace: Secondly, by an excellencie it is restrained, to signifie that most ioyfull message of Saluation, as in Luce 2. 10. whence also by figure it is taken for the History of Christ: and so we understand the four Gospels.

Lastly, for the preaching and diuulging the doctrine of Christ, as 1 Cor. 9. 14. & 2. Cor. 8. 18.

The agreement of both Testaments (taken, I thinke, as they are diuided in volumes) is by Darius comprised in these foure.

In their Author.

In the substance of the Couenant, or things promised.

In the foundation, to wit, Christ.

In the effects, that is, in righteoussesse and iustification,

In the Author they agree, because both are of God, and therefore both one Testament and will of God in substance of doctrine. For as there was euer one Church, so was there one Couenant, one Adoption, and one Doctrine. As the old law doth point at Christ, so doth the new Law teach Christ: the olde proposing him as to come, the new as already come; one and the same thing being promised in both; both tending to one, and the same end: euen the saluation of our soules: which according to S. Peter, is the end of our Faith. For although it be said, that Moses did promise by obseruing the Law, an earthly King, so done, a land flowing with milke and hony, the propagation of children, and other worldly blessings: yet all these were but figures to teach, and pledges to assure the Fathers of those spirituall blessings by Christ; for by the earthly, he raised their minds to the hope of heavenly. And the Fathers notwithstanding these worldly goods, did yet acknowledge themselves strangers, and pilgrims, expecting the heavenly Hierusalem: according to this place of the Hebrewes: All these dyed in faith, and receiued not the promises, but saw them a farre off, and beleueed them, confessing that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth. To which purpose also Saint Augustine: Omnia pauci veterum legem intelligunt, non attendunt.

cap. 11. c. 13.

Lib. de Ciuit.

cap. 18. c. 15.

studentes per promissa terrena, aeterna promitti: Few (saith he) do understand the old law: nor attending that by things earthly eternall are promised. And S. Hierome: Noluit Deus pacem in syon, cap. 12. 9. Iudeos more pecorum corporalibus donis epibusque, ut iudeis somniant; God would not feed the Jews as beasts with corporall gifts and riches, as themselves dreame. And this may bee gathered out of Gods owne words, Ego sum Deus tuus; & ero vobis in Deum; I am thy God, and I will be your God. For the words, I will be your God, proue that it was not for the present, or for perishable things, that God gaue them this promise, but in respect of the future: to wit, the safetie of their soules. For as God created both body and soule, so hath he of his goodnesse, not left the better part vncaured for, which lieth cuer.

The agreement betweene the Old and New Testament in substance, inferres also the agreement in foundation. For Christ is called the foundation of the law, laide both by the Apostles and Prophets; in whom all the promises of God in the Olde and New, are assured: the Fathers hauing eaten the same spirituall foode, which we eate in our Sacraments.

The agreement in effects is, in that the knowledge of our sinne and miserie, which is taught vs by the law, maketh way, and as it were, serueth in subordination to the Gospell, the proper effects whereof are mercy and saluation: to which the Law serueth as an introduction (for to those which acknowledge their sin and misery, God sheweth his mercy and saluation) may be said to agree with the Gospell in the effect. For otherwise if we so seuer the Law from subordination to the Gospell, the effects are very different: the one sheweth the way of righteoussesse by workes, the other by faith: the Law woundeth, the Gospell healeth: the Law terrifieth, the Gospell allureth; Moses accuseth, Christ defendeth: Moses condemneth, Christ pardoneth. The Old restraineth the hand, the New the minde. Data est lex quae non sanaret (saith Saint Augustine) sed quae agrotantes probaret: The Law was given, not to helpe, but to discover sicknesse: and Saint Chrysostome, Data est lex, ut se homo inueniret, non ut moribus sanaretur, sed ut medicus quaeretur: The Law was given that man might finde and know his owne imperfection: not that his disease was thereby holpen, but that he might then seeke out the Physician. For Christ came to saue the world, which the Law had condemned. And as Moses was but a servant, and Christ a Son; so the greatest benefit was reserved to bee brought, as by the worthiest person, saith Cyril: for this law made nothing perfect, but was an introduction of a better hope.

Heb. 7.

§. XII. Of the rest of the points proposed.

The seuenth consideration is of the end, and vse of the law: which is to bring vs to Christ: for finding no righteoussesse in our owne workes, wee must seeke it in some other. But this is the last, and remote, and vniust end: the next and proper end of the law, is to prescribe righteoussesse, and to exact absolute and perfect obedience to God. Leuit. 18. 5. Cursed is he which continueth not in all the things of this law.

The second end of the Law, is to render vs inexcusable before God: who knowing so perfect a law, doe not keepe it: the law requiring a perfect and intire, not a broken or halfe obedience: but both inward and outward righteoussesse, and performance of duty to God and Men.

The third and cheefe end of the law is, as hath beene said, to send vs to Christ, and his grace, being in our selues condemned and lost. For the law was delivered with thunder, and with a most violent and fearfull tempest, threatening eternall death.

The fourth end of the law was to designe, and preserue, the place of the Church and true people of God: and to holde them in one Discipline, and awe, till the coming of Christ: after whom the Church was to be dispersed ouer the whole world.

These be the ends of the Morall law. The end and vse of the Ceremoniall law, is to confirme the truth of Christ, and the new Testament. The vse of the Iudiciall, to teach vs naturall equity, and right, whereto we must conforme our selues.

The sense and vnderstanding of the Law is double, literall and spirituall: by the literall we are taught the worship and seruice of God: by the spirituall, the figures and mythicall fore-speakings of Christ.

Lastly, for the durance or continuance of the Law, the same had being vntill the passion of Christ: before which time, and while Christ taught in the world, both the old and the new were in force. But after that the true sacrifice was offered vpon the Altar of the Crosse,

* Gen. 49. 10. The Scepter shall not depart from Iuda, nor a Law-giver from between his feet, vntill Shiloh come.

Crosse, then the Jewish sacrifices and ceremonies, which were Types and figures of Christ (Christ being the body of those shadows) ceased to binde the consciences any longer: the mystery of our redemption being now by Christ and in him finished. In token whereof, the vail of the Temple rent asunder; noting that the ceremonial vail and shadows were now to be removed, not that the morall law of the Commandements was hereby abolished, or weakened at all: otherwise than that it had not power to condemne according to the Jewish doctrine, as aforesaid. For the obseruing of the law was by Christ himselfe feuerly commanded: our loue towards God being thereby to be witnessed. And herein David so much reioyced, as hee preferred the obseruation of the Law, before all that the world could yeeld. In via testimoniorum tuorum delectatus sum, sicut in omnibus diuitijs: et habere delictum in lege tua, in omni manu tua: et in omni lingua tua. Quia non est iniquitas in ore tuo: et non est iniquitas in lingua tua. Quia non est iniquitas in ore tuo: et non est iniquitas in lingua tua. (saith S. Iohn) that we keepe his Commandement. And that there is no excuse for the neglect of the things commanded in the law, God himselfe in Deuteronomy witnesseth. This Commandement (saith he) which I command thee this day, is not hid from thee, neither is it farre off. It is not in heauen that thou shouldest say, who shall goe up for vs to heauen, and bring it vs, and cause vs to heare it that we may do it? neither is it beyond the Sea, that thou shouldest say, who shall gaue me the Sea for vs, and bring it vs? &c. but the word is very neere vnto thee, euen in thy mouth, and in thy heart for to do it. Behold (saith Moses) I haue set before thee this day, life and death good and euill, in that I command thee this day, to loue the Lord thy God, to walke in his wayes, and to keepe his Commandements, and his Ordinances, and his Lawes, that thou mayst liue, &c. Neither is it said in vaine in Saint Matthew: Si vis ad vitam ingredi, serua mandata; if thou wilt enter into life keepe the Commandements: and in S. Iohn, Sciatis mandatum meum vita aeterna est; I know that his Commandement is life everlasting. And if this bee the charitie of God, or of Men towards God, as S. Iohn hath taught, to wit, that we keepe his Commandements: certainly hee is but a liar, that professeth to loue God, and neglecteth to obserue the word of his will, with all his power. And though I confesse it not in mans ability, without the speciall grace of God, to fulfill the law (Christ only as man excepted) yet if wee rightly consider the mercifull care which God had of his people in those his Commandements, we shall finde in our selues, how wee borrow liberty, and rather let slip our affections, and voluntarily loosen them from the chaines of obedience, to which the word of God and diuine reason hath fastened them, than that wee are excusable by those difficulties and impossibilities, which our minde (greedy of libertie) propoeth to it selfe. For this is the loue of God, that we keepe his Commandements; & his Commandements are not greivous. 1 Iohn 5. 12. and if wee examine euery precept apart, and then weigh them each after other, in the ballance of our consciences: it is not hard for any man to iudge, by what easie perswasions, we steale away from our owne power, as vnwilling to vse it against our pleasing desires.

§. XIII. Of the severall Commandements of the Decalogue: and that the difficulty is not in respect of the Commandements, but by our defaults.

For by the first we are commanded to acknowledge, serue, and loue one God. Now, whereby are we inticed to the breach of this precept? Seeing euery reasonable man may conceiue and know, that infinite power cannot be diuided into many infinities: and that it is of necessitie, that by this almighty Vnitie, all things haue bin caused, and are continued. And if brute beasts had this knowledge of their Creator, and how in his providence he hath also provided for euery of them, which giueth to beasts their foode, &c. there is no doubt but that they would also serue and loue him only.

The second precept is the forbidding of Idolatry, and worship of Images: the making whereof, out of doubt, was not the inuention of an ill intent in the beginning, seeing this is generally true: Omnia mala exempla bonis initijs orta sunt; Ad illa exempla did sperire and arise from good beginnings. For their first erection was to keep the memory of men famous for their vertue: vntill (saith Lactantius) the diuell crept into them, and (hauing blotted out the first intent) working in weak and ignorant foules, changed the nature of the one, and the reason of the other, to serue himselfe thereby. For what reasonable man, if he be not forsaken of God, will call on those blinde, deafe, dumbe, and dead stocks, more

worthlesse then the most worthlesse of those, that hauing life and reason, implore their helpe, which haue neither: yea, of more vild prize and baser, than the basest of beasts, who haue sense and estimation? For what doe we thereby (saith the Wisdome of Solomon) but call to the weake for helpe, pray to the dead for life, require aide of him that hath no experience, assistance in our iourneys of him that cannot goe, and successe in our affaires of him that hath no power? And whether the Idolater, or the blocke, to which he prayeth, bee more senselesse, David maketh a doubt. For (saith he) they that make them are like vnto them, and so are all the rest that trust in them.

The breach of the third Commandement, is neither perswaded by worldly pleasure, nor worldly profit: the two greatest inchanters of mortall men. No, wee are no way allured to this horrible disdain of God, vnlesse the hate of good men, and Gods curse, be accounted an aduantage. For as our corruptest nature giues vs nothing towards it, so can it satisfie no one appetite, except euillasting sorrow, and hell dwell in our desire. And therefore this strange custome hath the diuell brought vp among men, without all subtletie of argument, or cunning perswasion, taking thereby the greatest and most scornfull aduantage ouer vs. For slaughter satisfieth hatred, Theft giues satisfaction to need; Adultery to lust, Oppression to countenance: but this contemptuous offence of blasphemy, and the irreuerent abuse of Gods name, as it giueth no helpe to any of our worldly afflictions, so the most saluage Nations of the world doe not vse it.

The fourth Commandement, to keepe the Sabbath day holy, hath neither pain, burthen, nor inconuenience. For it giueth rest to the laborer, and consolation to their Masters. And that this law was imposed on man for his benefit, Moses teacheth in the reason of the law: as in Exod. 23. 12. And in the seventh day thou shalt rest, that thine Oxe and thine Asse may rest, and the sonne of thy maide, and the stranger may be refreshed.

The first of the second Table to honour our Parents, with whom wee are one and the same, is a gratitude which nature it selfe hath taught vs towards them, who after God gaue vs life and being, haue begotten vs, and borne vs, cherished vs in our weak and helpelesse fancie, and bestowed on vs the harvest and profit of their labours and cares. Therefore, in the Temporall and Iudiciall ordinances, curling of parents, or the offering of them violence, was made death. The next is, that thou shalt not Murther, that is, thou shalt not doe the actes following the affections of hatred. For the law of God, and after it our owne lawes, and in effect the law of all Nations, haue made difference between slaughter casual, and furious. Affectionum tuarum (saith Braddon) imponit nomen operi tuo; it is the affection and will that makes the worke such as it is. And certainly, who soeuer cannot forbear to commit murther, hath neither the grace of God, nor any vse of his owne will.

The third of the second Table, commands vs from Adultery. Now, if the preservation of Virginity haue bene possible, for thousands of Men and Women, who in all Ages haue mastered their fleshly desires, and haue returned chaste to their graue: It cannot be accounted a burthen, to forbear the dishonour and iniurie, which wee offer to others by such a violation, seeing marriage is permitted by the lawes of God, and Men, to all that affect it. And there is no man liuing whom the desire of beauty and forme hath so constrained, but he might with ease forbear the prosecution of this ill: did not himselfe giue sucke to this Infant, and nourish warmth till it grow to strong heate, heat it till it turne to fire, and fire to flame.

The fourth of the second Table, is, that we shall not steale. And if that kinde of violent robbery had bene viced in Moses time, which many Ruffians practise now a dayes in England, and to the dishonor of our Nation more in England, than in any Region of the world among Christians; out of doubt, he would haue censured them by death, and not by restitution, though quadruple. For I speake not of the poore and miserable foules, whom hunger and extreme necessitie inforce, but of those detested Theeues, who to maintaine themselves Lord-like, assault, rob, and wound the Merchant, Artificer, and Labouring man; or breake by violence into other mens houses, and spend in Brauerie, Drunkenness, and vpon Harlots, in one day, what other men sometime haue laboured for all their liues: impoverishing whole Families, and taking the bread and foode from the mouths of their children. And that this Commandement might easily be obserued; it would soone appeare, if Princes would resolute, but for a few yeeres to pardon none. For, it is the hope of life, and the argument of sparing the first offence, that encourageth these these Hell-hounds. And if every man presume to be pardoned once, there is no State or Common-wealth, but these men would in a short time impouerish or destroy it.

The fifth Commandment of this second Table, is, the prohibition of false witness; from which if men could not forbear, all surety of estate and life were taken away. And so much did God detest a false witness, and a false accuser, especially in matters criminal, that the law ordained him to suffer the same death or punishment, which he sought by falsehood to lay on his brother.

The last of the ten Commandments forbiddeth vs to covet any thing, which belongeth to another man, either the bodies of their wives for concupiscence, or their goods for desire of gain. And this precept seemeth the hardest for men to observe; so esteemed by reason of our frail affections: and yet if wee iudge hereof rightly, it may be doubted whether it extend to all our inconsiderate fancies and vaine thoughts. For, although it be not easie to master all our sudden passions, yet we may restrain and hinder the growing, and farther increase, if we please to intend our strength, and seeke for grace. How the word Coveting reacheth to all those it is to be considered. For Concupiscencia, according to some, Est effrenatus habendi appetitus; An vnbrided, or vnrestrained appetite of having: And as touching such an appetite, we cannot excuse our selves by any our naturall frailty, or vnadvised error; But as I suppose, the word Concupiscence is more largely taken, either for a determinate and vnbridled euill intent, or for some vrging inclination thereunto. All the question is of the latter sort: which is, Actus imperfectus, id est, non deliberatus ratione, que est principium proprium actus boni aut vitiosi. Such passions, or inclinations are imperfect acts, that is, not deliberated upon by reason, which is the proper principle of a good or vicious action. And sure, that so long as we resist such motions, they harme vs not: as they say, Quamdiu refragmur nihil nocent: nocent autem cum eas dominari permittimus; As long as wee giue no assent vnto them, it is thought by some that they hurt vs not, and that then only they hurt, when we suffer them to beare sway. But these men, as it seemes, make nothing forbidden in this tenth precept, but what hath bene forbidden in the other: for in euery Commandment, not onely the outward act, but also the inward assent vnto euill, though it breake not out into acte, is forbidden: therefore, that we may know the difference between this Commandment and the rest, the distinction of desires is to be held: that some are with assent, and vnbridled; others bridled, and without assent. For to euent the Morall Philosopher can tell vs, that the Continent man hath euill desires, but without assent (for they are bridled by the strength of right reason) as on the other side the Incontinent hath good desires, but restrained and suppressed by contrary passions. The euill desires when they are accompanied with assent, are in euery Commandment forbidden, together with the outward act: and therefore, if we will haue any thing proper to this Commandment, wee must needs say, that the euill desires of the Continent man (that is, even those which wee resist and bridle) are here forbidden. For though he that bridleth his euill desires, bee much better than he that yeeldeth vnto them: yet such a man, euen according to the Heathen Philosopher, is not worthy the name of a vertuous man. For Aristotle himselfe makes Continentia, not to be vertue, but onely a degree vnto it: confessing, that though the Continent man doe well in bridling his euill affections, yet he doth not all, seeing he ought not so much as to haue them at all. Neither is it much more, that true diuinity deliuereth touching this matter. For, as he saith, that in the continent man the hauing of these euill desires, though he resist them, is the cause that he cannot be called a vertuous man: so we, that the hauing of them is a sinne. Only in this we excell him here: that we are able out of diuinity to giue the true reason of this doctrine: which is, that euery one sinneth, that doeth not loue God with his whole heart and affection: whence it followeth, that the euill desires of the Continent man; that is, of him which bridleth them, must needs be sinne: seeing such desires, though bridled, are a pulling away of a part of our heart and affection from God.

Seeing therefore it hath pleased God, to make vs know, that by our faithfull endeauours to keepe his commandments, we witnesse our loue toward himselfe; we may not lawfully giue libertie to our vanities, by casting backe vpon God (who is iustice it selfe) that he hath giuen vs precepts altogether beyond our power, and Commandments impossible for vs to keepe. For, as hee is accused (saith Saint Iherome) that aouges that the Law is in all things possible to be obserued: so he hath made this addition: Maledictus qui qui dicit impossibile Deum precepisse; Accused is hee that saith that God hath commanded things (in themselves, and not through our fault) impossible. Now, as the places are many which command vs to keepe the Law: so is our weakenesse also in the Scriptures laide before vs, and therefore it is thus safely to be vnderstood, that we should without euasione, or without betraying of our selves, doe our faithfull endeauours to obserue them: which if we doe vnfaignedly, no doubt, but God will accept our desires therein. For that there is no man iust, Dauid witnesseth: Enter not into iudgement with thy seruant, for in thy Psa. 143: 2 fight no flesh that liueth shall be iustified. And in the first of Kings, There is no man that sinneth not: And againe, Whocan say, I haue made my heart cleane? But seeing there is no sinne so greuous without deliberation; let euery mans conscience iudge him, whether hee giue way willingly, or restraime himselfe in all that he can; yea, or no: For when a King giues to his subiect a commandment vpon paine of losse of his loue, to performe some seruice: if the subiect neglecting the same, seeke to satisfie his Saueraigne with shifting excuses, out of doubt such a Prince will take himselfe to be derided therein.

§. XIII.

If there were not any Religion, nor Iudgement to come, yet the Decalogue were most necessary to be obserued.

And if wee consider aduisedly and soberly, of the Morall Law, or ten Commandments, which God by the hand of Moses gaue vnto his people, it will appeare that such was his mercifull prouidence in the choise of them, as were there neither paine, nor profit adioyned to the obseruing, or not obseruing of them; were there no diuine power at all, nor any Religion among men; yet if wee did not for our owne sakes strue to obserue these Lawes, all society of men, and all endeauours, all happinesse and contentment in this life would be taken away: and euery State and common-wealth in the World fall to the ground and dissolue. Therefore, these Lawes were not imposed as a burthen, but as a blessing: to the end that the innocent might be defended, that euery man might enioy the fruites of his owne trauaile, that right might be done to all men from all men: that by iustice, order, and peace, we might liue the liues of reasonable men, and not of beasts; of free-men, and not of slaues; of ciuill men, and not of sauages. And hereof making our humane reason onely iudge, let vs see the inconueniences in this life which would follow by the breach and neglect of these Lawes.

As first, what would the issue be if we acknowledged many Gods? would not a farre greater hatred, warre, and bloud-shed follow, than that which the difference of ceremonies, and diuersity of interpretation, hath already brought into the World, euen among those Nations which acknowledge one God, and one Christ?

And what could it profit man-kinde to pray to Idols, and Images of gold, mettall, dead stones, and rotten wood, whence nothing can be hoped, but the losse of time, and an impossibilitie to receive thence from, either helpe or comfort?

The breach of the third Commandment bringeth there-with this disadvantage, and ill to man, that whosoever taketh the name of God in vaine, shall not at any time benefit himselfe by calling God to witnesse for him, when hee may iustly vse his holy name.

The obseruing the Sabbath holy, giueth rest to men and beasts, and nature her selfe requieth intermission of labour.

If we despise our Parents, who haue giuen vs being, we thereby teach our owne children to scorn and neglect vs, when our aged yeeres require comfort and helpe at their hands.

If murder were not forbidden, and severely punished, the race of man-kinde would be extinguished: and whosoever would take the liberty to destroy others, giueth liberty to others to destroy himselfe.

If adultery were lawfull and permitted, no man could say vnto himselfe; This is my sonne: there could be no inheritance proper, no honour descend to posterity, no endeauour by vertue and vndertaking to raise Families: murders and poisonings betweene man and wife would be daily committed: and euery man subiect to most filthy and vncleane diseases.

If stealth and violent rapine were suffered, all man-kinde would shortly after perish, or liue as the saluages, by rootes and acornes. For no man labourerh but to enioy the fruites thereof. And such is the mischief of robbery, as where Moses for lesser crimes appointed restitution fourefold, policie of State and necessity hath made it death.

To permiit false witness, is to take all mens liues and estates from them by corruption: the wicked would swear against the vertuous: the waster against the wealthie: the idle beggar and loyterer, against the carefull and painfull labourer: all trial of right were taken away, and iustice thereby banished out of the world.

The couering of that which belongs to other men, bringeth no other profit than a distraction of minde, with an inward vexation: for while we couet what appertaines to others, we neglect our owne: our appetites are therein fed with vaine and fruitlesse hopes, so long as we do but couet; and if we doe attaine to the desire of the one, or the other, to wit, the wiles or goods of our neighbours, we can looke for no other, but that our selues shall also, either by theft or by strong hand, be deuiued of our owne.

Wherein then appeareth the burthen of Gods Commandements, if there bee nothing in them, but rules and directions for the generall and particular good of all liuing? Surely, for our owne good, and not in respect of himselfe, did the most mercifull & provident God ordaine them; without the obseruation of which, the vertues of heavenly bodies, the fertility of the earth, with all the blessings giuen vs in this life, would be vnto vs altogether vnprofitable, and of no vse. For wee should remaine but in the state of brute beasts, if not in a farre more vnhappy condition.

§. XV. Of humane Law, written and vnwritten.

Humane Law, of which now it followeth to speake, is first diuided into two, (Viz.) Written, and Vnwritten. The vnwritten consists of vsage, approved by time: which Isidore calls Mores; and he defines Mores to be Consuetudines vetustate probatae; to be customes approved by antiquitie, or vnwritten lawes. Now custome differeth from use, as the cause from the effect: in that custome is by vse and continuance established into a Law: but yet there where the law is defectiue, saith Isidore.

And of customes there are two generall natures, containing innumerable particulars: the first are written customes, receiued and exercised by Nations, as the customes of Burgundie and Normandie, the ancient generall custome of England, and the customes of Calisill, and other Provinces.

The second are these petty customes, vsed in particular Places, Cities, Hundreds, and Mannors: The generall or Nationall customes are some written, others vnwritten.

The particular or petty customes are seldom written, but witnessed by testimony of the inhabitants. The Customes of the Duchie of Cornwall, comprehending also the Stannerie of Deuon, as touching Tin, and Tin causes, are written in Deuon, but not in Cornwall. But howsoever vse and time hath made these customes as lawes, yet ought every custome to be rationabili, as well as prescripta. Non firmatur tractu temporis quod de iure ab initio non subsistit; That which at first was not grounded vpon good right, is not made good by continuance of time. And (saith Ulpian) quod ab initio vitiosum est, non potest tractu temporis conualescere; Course of time aduerts not that which was naught from the first beginning. For these two defences are necessary in all lawes of custome; the one, that it be not repugnant to the law diuine, and naturall: the other, that the cause and reason be strong, prouing a right birth, and necessary continuance: it being manifest, that euery custome which is against the law, had his beginning from euill deeds, and therefore not without the former considerations to be allowed. And it is true, that all customes of this nature were but tolerated for a time, by the Law-makers, though they haue beene since continued, because posterity is not bound to examine by what cause their Ancestors were thereto moued. For non sufficit simplex toleratio. And it is in this sort ordered in the law; Per populum consuetudo contra legem induci non potest, nisi de voluntate illius qui non in legem, & non in constitutionem statuere potest, qui solus Princeps est; The people cannot bring in a new custome against law: save by his will, who hath power to make a new law and ordinance, which is onely the Prince.

Humane Law generally taken, to wit, humane law written, is by some defined to be the decree or doome of praetique reason: by which humane actions are ruled and directed. Papinian calls the Law a common precept, the aduicement of wise men, and the restraint restraint of offences committed, either willingly or ignorantly. Isidore calles the Law a Constitution written, agreeing with Religion, fittest for Government and common profit: And more largely, Omne id quod ratione consistit; All that stands with reason.

Lastly, and more precisely it is thus defined. Humane Law is a righteous decree, agreeing with the Law naturall and eternall: made by the rational discourse of those, that exercise publike authority: prescribing necessary obseruances to the subiect. That euery Law ought to be a righteous decree, S. Augustine teacheth, saying: Nihil lex esse non videtur, quae iusta non fuerit; It seemes to be no law at all to me, which is not iust: and iust it cannot be, except it agree with the law naturall and eternall. For there is no Law iust and legitimate (saith S. Augustine) which the Law-makers haue not deriued from the eternall. Nihil iustum atque legitimum est, quod non ab aeterna lege sibi homines derinauerint.

Secondly, it ought to be constituted by discourse of reason, whereby it is distinguished from the Law naturall, to wit, the naturall, indemonstrable, or needing no demonstration, from whence the law humane is taken and deduced.

Thirdly, that it ought to be made by an authorised Magistracie, it cannot be doubted, be the government of what kinde soeuer. For it falleth otherwise vnder the Title of those decrees called Violentia, or iniquae constitutiones; Violences, or wicked constitutions.

Of humane Law there are foure properties, especially answering these foure conditions in the former definition. First, as it is drawne out of the law of nature: so euery particular of the humane Law may be resolved into some principle or rule of the naturall.

Secondly, it is to be considered as it is referred vnto, and doth respect the common good.

Thirdly, it is to be made by publique authority.

Fourthly, concerning the matter of the Law, it prescribeth, and directeth, all humane actions. And so is the Law as large and diuers, as all humane actions are diuers, which may fall vnder it. For according to Thomas, Alia lex Iulia de Adulterijs, alia Cornelia de Sycarijs; The Law of Julian against Adultery is one, the Cornelian against Ruffians, is another. Now the humane Law, generally taken, is in respect of the first of these considerations, diuided into the Law of Nations, and the Ciuill.

The Law of Nations is taken lesse or more properly; lesse properly for euery Law which is not of it selfe, but from other higher principles deduced: and so it seemeth that Ulpian vnderstands it: for he defineth Ius gentium, or the Law of Nations, to be that which is onely common amongst Men, as Religion, and the worship of God: which is not in the very nature of this Law of Nations; but from the principles of the Scriptures, and other diuine Reuelations. But the Law of Nations properly taken, is that discrete, or sentence, which is drawne from a very probable, though not from an euident principle, yet so probable, that all Nations doe assent vnto the conclusion, as that the free passage of Ambassadors be granted betwene enemies, &c. which Nationall Law, according to diuers acceptions, and diuers considerations had of the humane Law, may be sometime taken for a species of the Naturall, sometime of the Humane.

Ius Civile, or the Ciuill Law, is not the same in all Common-wealths, but in diuers estates it is also diuers and peculiar, and this Law is not so immediately deriued from the Law of Nature, as the Law of Nations is: For it is partly deduced out of such principles as all Nations doe agree in, or easily assent vnto; because they depend on particular circumstances, which are diuers, and doe not fit all estates. Hereof Ulpian, Ius civile, neque in totum a naturali & gentium recedit, neque per omnia ei seruit; itag, cum aliquid addimus, vel detrahimus Iuri communi, Ius proprium, id est, Civile efficitur; The Ciuill Law (saith he) doeth neither wholly differ from the Law of Nature, and Nations, nor yet in all points obey it: therefore when we adde ought to, or take from the Law that is common, we make a Law proper, that is, the Ciuill Law.

The Law now commonly called the Ciuill Law, had its birth in Rome: and was first written by the Decem-viri, 303. yeeres after the foundation of the City. It was compounded as wel out of the Athenian, & other Grecian Lawes, as out of the ancient Roman customes and Lawes Regall. The Regal Lawes were deuicd by the first Kings; and called Leges Regiae, or Papirianae, because they were gathered by Papirius, Tarquin then reigning. For though so many of the former Lawes as maintained Kingly authority, were abolished, shed, with the name, yet those of Servius Tullius, for Commerce and Contracts, and all that appertained to Religion, and common utility, were continued, and were a part of the Lawes of the twelve Tables. To these Lawes of the twelve Tables were added (as the times gave occasion) those made by the Senate, called Senatus consulta: those of the common people called plebei-faicta, those of the Lawyers, called Responsa prudentum: and the Edicts of the Annual Magistrats: which Edicts being first gathered and interpreted by Tullian, and presented to Adrian the Emperour, they were by him confirmed and made perpetuall Lawes, and the Volume titled Edictum perpetuum; as those and the like Collections of Tullian afterward were.

The difference anciently betwene Lawes and Edicts, which the French call Reglements, consisted in this, that Lawes are the Constitutions made or confirmed by soveraign authority (be the soveraigny in the people, in a few, or in one) and are withall generall and permanent: but an Edict (which is but Tullian Magistratus, yf selfe by authority it be made a Law) hath end with the Officer, who made the same, saith Varro. Qui plurimum Edicta tribuunt, legem annuam esse dicunt: They who ascribe the most unto an Edict, say that it is a Law for one yeere: Though Isidore doth also expresse by the word Constitutions or Edicts, those Ordinances called Acts of Prerogatives; as Constitutio vel Edictum quod Rex, vel Imperator constituit, vel edicit: An Ordinance or Edict is that which a King or Emperour doth ordaine or proclaime.

Lastly, the Humane Law is divided into the Secular, and into the Ecclesiasticall, or Civil. The Secular commanding temporall good, to wit, the peace and tranquillity of the Common-weale: the Ecclesiasticall the spirituall good, and right Government of the Ecclesiasticall Common-weale, or Church, Illud naturalem legem, hoc divina spectat; That respecteth the Law of Nature, this the Law of God, And so many ius Civile be taken two ways; first, as distinguished from the Law of Nations, as in the first division: Secondly, as it is the same with the Secular, and differs from the Ecclesiasticall. But this division of the Schoolmen is obscure. For although the Civil be the same with the Secular, as the Civil is a Law, yet the Secular is more generall, and comprehendeth both the Civil, and all other Lawes not Ecclesiasticall. For of Secular Lawes, in use among Christian Princes, and in Christian Common-weales, there are three kinds; the Civil, which hath every where a voyce, and is in all Christian estates (England excepted) most powerfully; the Lawes of England called Common, and the Lawes of custome or Provinciall. In Spain besides the Law Civil, they have the customes of Castile, and other Provinces. In France besides the Civil, the customes of Burgundy, Boys, Berri, Nivernois, and Lodunois, &c. Tout leux siens & assis en Lodunois, seront gouvernez selon les costumes du dit pays; All places lying within the precincts of Lodunois shall be governed according to the customes of that place. There are also in France the customes of Normandy, and these of two kinds; Generall, and Locall; and all purged and reformed by diuers Acts of the three Estates. The Charters of confirmation of these ancient customes, before and since their reformation have these words, Nulla annorum, regisrum predictum, usulaudabiles, & consuetudines antiquas, &c. Landamus, approbamus, & autoritate Regis confirmamus, The Register aforesaid, laudable, use, and ancient customes we praise, approve, and by our Kingly authority confirme. The common Law of England is also compounded of the ancient customes of the same, and of certain Maximes by those customes of the Realme approved. Upon which customes also are grounded those Courts of Record, of the Chancery, Kings Bench, Common Pleas, and Exchequer, with other small Courts.

These ancient customes of England have beene approved by the Kings thereof, from age to age: as that custome by which no man shall be taken, imprisoned, disfiled, nor otherwise destroyed, but he must first be put to answer by the Law of the Land, was confirmed by the Statute of Magna Charta. It is by the ancient custome of England, that the eldest Sonne should inherit without partition. In Germany, France, and elsewhere otherwise, and by partition. In Ireland it is the custome for all Landes (that have not beene resigned into the Kings hands) that the eldest of the House shall enjoy the Inheritance during his own life: and to the second and third eldest (if there be so many brothers) before the Heire in lineall descent: this is called the custome of Tanishrie. For example, if a Lord of Land have foure sonnes, and the eldest of those foure have also a Sonne, the three Brothers of the eldest Sonne, shall after the death of their Brother, enjoy their Fathers Lands before the Grand-child: the custome being grounded grounded upon the reason of necessity. For the Irish in former times, having alwayes lived in a subdivided Civil Warre, not onely the greatest against the greatest, but every Baron and Gentleman one against another, were enforst to leave successors of age and ability, to defend their owne Territories. Now as in Normandie, Burgundie, and other Provinces of France, there are certaine peculiar and petty Customes, besides the great, and generall custome of the Land, so are there in England, and in every part thereof. But the greatest bulke of our Lawes, as I take it, are the Acts of Parliament: Lawes propounded and approved by the three estates of the Realme, and confirmed by the King, to the obedience of which all men are therefore bound; because they are Acts of choise, and selfe-desire. Leges nulla alia causa nos tenent, quam quod indicio populi recepte sunt, The Lawes doe therefore binde the subject, because they are received by the iudgement of the subject. Tu enim demum humane leges habent cum suamque sanctionem modo instituta, sed etiam firmata approbatione communitatis; it is then that humane lawes have their strength, when they shall not onely be desired, but by the approbation of the people confirmed.

Isidore fasteneth these properties to every Christian Law, that the same bee honest, that it bee possible, that it bee according to Nature, and according to the custome of the Countrey; also for the time and place convenient, profitable, and manifest, and without respect of private profite, that it be written for the generall good. He also gives foure effects of the Law, which Modestinus comprehends in two; to wit, Obligation, and inligation: the former binde vs by feare, to avoid vices; the latter inligate vs with hope, to follow vertue. For according to Cicero, Legem oportet esse vitiorum emendatricem, commendatricemque virtutum: It behooveth the Law to be commander of vices, and a commander of vertues. The part obligatorie or binding vs to the observation of things commanded or forbidden, is an effect common to all lawes; and it is two-fold; the one constraineth vs by feare of our consciences, the other by feare of externall punishment. These two effects the law performeth, by the exercise of those two powers, to wit, Coactive and Directive.

The second of these two effects remembered by Modestinus, is Inligation, or incouragement to vertue, as Aristotle makes it the end of the law, to make men virtuous. For lawes being such as they ought to be, doe both by prescribing and forbidding, give vs to well doing laying before vs the good and the evil, by the one and the other purchased. And this power affirmative commanding good, and power negative forbidding evil, are those into which the law is divided, as touching the matter: and in which David comprehendeth the whole body and substance thereof: saying, Declina a malo, & fac bonum: Decline from ill, and doe good.

§. XVI. That onely the Prince is exempt from humane Lawes, and in what sort.

NOW whether the power of the humane Law bee without exception of any person, it is doubtfully disputed among those that have written of this subject, as well Divines as Lawyers: and namely, whether Soveraign Princes bee compellable; yea, or no: But whereas there are two powers of the Law, as aforesaid, the one Directive, the other Coactive: to the power Directive they ought to be subiect, but not to that which constraineth. For as touching violence or punishments, no man is bound to give a preiudicial iudgement against himselfe; and if equals have no any power over each other, much lesse have inferiours over their superiours, from whom they receive their authority and strength.

And speaking of the supreme power of lawes, simply then is the Prince so much above the lawes, as the soule and body united, is above a dead and senselesse carke. For the King is truly called, ius vivum, & lex animata: An animate and living Law. But this is true, that by giving authority to lawes, Princes both made greatnes to themselves, & conferre it; and therefore was it said of Isidore out of Tullian, Merito debet Rex prius se legem quod lex attribuitur ei: namely, first to give to himselfe the Law; Rightfully ought the King to attribute that to himselfe, which the Law first attributeth to the King; for it is the Law that doth make Kings.

But what is Isidore just betwixt his power to the humane law, he is therein mistaken. For Kings are made by God, and lawes divine; and by humane lawes onely, declared to bee Kings. As for the places remembered by the Divines and Lawyers, which inferre a kinde of obligation of Princes, they teach no other thing therein, than the bond of conscience, and profit arising from the examples of vertuous Princes, who are to giue an account of their actions to God onely.

Tibi soli peccavi, saith David; Against thee onely have I sinned: therefore, the Prince can not bee said to be subiect to the Law; Principes non subijcitur legi. For seeing according to the Schoolemen, the Law humane is but *quoddam organum & instrumentum potestatis gubernativa: non videtur posse eius obligatio ad eum se extendere, ad quem ipsa vis potestatis humane non pertinet; sed via potestatis humana non se extendit ad gubernatorem, in quo illa residet. Ergo neq; lex condita per talem potestatem obligare potest ipsum conditorem. Omnis enim potentia activa, est principium transmutandi aliud; Seeing humane Law (say they) is but a kind of Organ or Instrument of the power that governeth, it seemes that it cannot extend it selfe to binde any one whom no humane power can controll, or lay hold of: but the Governour himselfe, in whom the governing power doth reside, is a person that cannot by himselfe, or by his own power be controlled. And therefore the Law which is made by such a power, cannot binde the Law-maker himselfe: for every active ability, is a cause or principle of alteration in another body, not in the body in which it selfe resides. And seeing Princes have power to delivier others from the obligation of the Law: Ergo etiam potest ipsemet Princeps sine legislator sua se voluntate pro libito ab obligatione legis liberare: Therefore also may a Prince or Law-maker at his owne will and pleasure delivier himselfe from the bond of the Law. Therefore in the rules of the Law it is thus concluded: Subditi tenentur leges observare necessitate conditionis, 30 Principes vero sola voluntate sua, & in suis ubi communis; The subditi are bound to fulfill the Law by necessity of compulsion, but the Prince onely by his owne will, and regard of the common good.*

Now concerning the politike Lawes, giuen by Moses to the Nation of the Israelites, whether they ought to be a President, from which no ciuill institutions of other people should presume to digresse, I will not presume to determine, but leave it as a question for such men to decide, whose professions giue them greater ability. Thus much I may be bold to affirme, That we ought not to seeme wiser than God himselfe, who hath told vs that there are no Lawes so righteous, as those which it pleased him to giue to his Elect people to be governed by. True it is, that all Nations haue their severall qualities, wherein they differ, even from their next borderers, no lesse than in their peculiar languages: which disageable conditions to gouerne aptly, one and the same Law very hardly were able. The Roman ciuill Lawes did indeed containe in order a great part of the then knowne World, without any notable inconuenience, after such time as once it was receiued and become familiar: yet was not the administration of it alike in all parts, but yeelded much vnto the naturall customes of the sundry people, which it gouerned. For whether it be through a long continued perswasion; or (as Astrologers more willingly grant) some influence of the Heauens; or peraduenture some temper of the soile and climate, affoording matter of prouocation to vice (as plenty made the Sybarites luxurious: want and opportunity to steale, makes the Arabians to be Theeves) very hard it were to forbid by Law an offence so common with any people, as it wanted a name, whereby to be distinguished from iust and honest. By such rigour was the Kingdome of Congo unhappily diuerted from the Christian Religion, which it willingly at the first imbraced, but after with great fury reiected, because plurality of Wiues was denied vnto them, I know not how necessarily, but more contentiously than seasonably. In such cases, me thinks, it were not amisse to consider that the high God himselfe permitted some things to the Israelites, rather in regard of their naturall disposition (for they were hard-hearted) than because they were consonant vnto the ancient rules of the first perfection. So, where euen the generall nature of man doth condemne (as many things it doth) for wicked and vniust; there may the Law, giuen by Moses, worthily be deemed the most exact reformer of the euill, which forsooth man, as neere as may be, to the will and pleasure of his Maker. But where nature or custome hath entertained a vicious, yet not intolerable habite, with so long and so publike approbation, that the vertue opposing it would seeme as vncouth, as it were to walke naked in England, or to weare the English fashion of apparel in Turkie: there may a wise and vpright Law-giuer, without presumption, omit somewhat that the rigour of Moses his Law required; euen as the good King Hezekiah did, in a matter merely Ecclesiasticall, and therefore the lesse capable of dispensation, praying for the people; The good Lord be mercifull vnto him, that prepareth his whole heart to seeke the Lord God, the God of his Fathers, though hee be not cleansed according to the purification of the Sanctuary: which prayer the Lord heard and granted.

To this effect it is well obserued by Master Doctor Willet, that the morall Iudicials of Moses doe partly binde, and partly are let free. They doe not hold affirmatiuely that we are tryed to the same severity of punishment now, which was inflicted then; but negatiuely they doe hold, that now the punishment of death should not be adiudged, where sentence of death is not giuen by Moses: Christian Magistrates ruling vnder Christ the Prince of peace, that is, of Clemency and Mercy, may abate of the severity of Moses Law, and mitigate the punishment of death, but they cannot adde vnto it to make the burden more heavy: for to shew more rigour than Moses, becommeth not the Gospel.

But I will not wander in this copious argument, which hath bene the subiect of many learned discourses, neither will I take vpon me, to speake any thing definitiuely in a case which dependeth still in some controuersie among worthy Diuines. Thus much (as in honour of the Iudiciall Law, or rather of him that gaue it) I may well and truly say, that the defence of it hath alwayes bene very plausible. And surely howsoeuer they be not accepted (neither were it expedient) as a generall and onely Law: yet shall we hardly find any other ground, whereon the conscience of a Iudge may rest, with equall satisfaction in making interpretation, or giuing sentence vpon doubts, arising out of any Law besides it. Hereof, perhaps, that Iudge could haue bene witness, of whom Fortescue that notable Bulwarke of our Lawes doth speake, complaining of a iudgement giuen against a Gentlewoman at Salisbury, who being accused by her owne Man, without any other prooff, for murdering her Husband, was thereupon condemned, and burnt to ashes: the Man who accused her, within a yeere after being conuict for the same offence, confest that his Mistres was altogether innocent of that cruell fact, whose terrible death hee then (though ouer-late) greiuously lamented: but this Iudge, saith the same Author, Sapius ipse mihi falsus est, quod nunquam in vita sua animum eius de hoc facta ipse purgaret; He himselfe often confessed vnto me, that he should neuer during his life, be able to cleare his conscience of that fact. Wherefore that acknowledgement which other Sciences yeeld vnto the Metaphysiques, that from thence are drawne propositions, able to proue the principles of 30 Sciences, which out of the Sciences themselves cannot be proued, may iustly be granted by all other politike institutions, to that of Moses; and so much the more iustly, by how much the subiect of the Metaphysiques, which is, Ens quatenus Ens: Being as it is being, is infinitely inferiour to the Ens Entium; The being of beings; the onely good, the fountaine of truth, whose feare is the beginning of wisdom. To which purpose well saith Saint Augustine, Conditur legum temporalium si vir bonus est & sapiens, illam ipsam consulis eternam, de qua nulli anima iudicare datum est; The Author of temporall Lawes, if he be good and wise, doth therein consult the Law eternall, so determine of which there is no power giuen to any soule. And as well Prince Edward, in Fortescue his discourse, Nemo potest melius aut aliud fundamentum ponere, quam posuit Dominus; Nemo san lay a better, or another foundation 40 than the Lord hath laide.

CHAP. V.

The Story of the Israelites from the receiuing of the Law to the death of Moses.

§. 1. Of the numbring and disposing of the Host of Israel, for their marches through the wilderness; with a note of the reuerence giuen to the worship of God, in this ordering of their troups.

When Moses had receiued the Law from God, and published it among the people, and finished the Tabernacle of the Arke and Sanctuary; he mustred all the Tribes and Families of Israel: and hauing scene what numbers of Men fit to beare armes, were found in euery Tribe, from 20. yeeres of age upwards; he appointed vnto them, by direction from the Lord, such Princes and Leaders, as in worth and reputation were in euery Tribe most eminent. The number number of the whole Army was 60356. able men for the wars, besides women & children; also, besides the strangers which followed them out of Egypt. This great Army was divided by Moses into foure grosse and mighty Battalions, each of which contained the strength of three whole Tribes.

The first of these containing 186400. able men, consisted of three Regiments, which may well, in respect of their numbers, be called Armies; as containing the three whole Tribes of Judah, Issachar, and Zabulon. In the Tribe of Judah were 74600. fighting men, led by Nasasson: in Issachar 54400. led by Nathaniel: in Zabulon 57400. led by Eliab. All these marched vnder the Standard of the Tribe of Judah, who held the Vantage-guard, and was the first that moved & marched, being lodged and quartered at their general incampment on the East-side of the Army, which was held the first place, and of greatest dignity.

The second Battalion or Army, called in the Scriptures the Host of Reuben, had joynted vnto it Simon and Gad, in number 151450. All which marched vnder the Standard of Reuben. In the Tribe of Reuben were 46500. vnder Elizur: in Simon: 59300. vnder Shelumai: in Gad 45650. vnder Eliab: These had the second place, and incamped on the South-side of the Tabernacle.

The third Army, marched vnder the Standard of Ephraim, to whom were joynted the Regiments of Manasse and Beniamin; who, joynted together, made in number 108100. able men. These marched in the third place, incamping on the West quarter of the Tabernacle. Ephraim had 40500. vnder Elishama: Manasse 32200. vnder Gamliel: Beniamin 35400. vnder Abidan.

The fourth and last Army, or Squadron, of the generall Army, containing 157600. able men, marched vnder the Standard of Dan; to whom were joynted the two Tribes of Nephthali and Ascher. And these had the Rereward, and moved last, incamping on the North-side. Dan had 62700. vnder Abiezzer: Ascher 41500. vnder Pagiel: Nephthali 53400. vnder Ahira.

Besides these Princes of the severall Tribes, there were ordained Captaines ouer Thousands, ouer Hundreds, ouer Fifties, and ouer Tens; as it may appear by that murmur and insurrection against Moses, Num. 16. v. 1. & c. For there arose vp against Moses 250. Captaines of the Assembly, famous in the Congregation, and men of renowne: of which number were Korah, Dathan, and Abiram. Which three principall Muriners, with those 250. Captaines that followed them, were not any of the 12. Princes of the Tribes or Generall Colonels before spoken of, as by their names, Num. 1. is made manifest.

The blessing which Israel gave to his children, tooke place not onely in the diuision of the Land of promise, and other things of more consequence, long after following; but euen in sorting them vnder their severall Standards in the wilderness it was observed. For Judah had the precedency and the greatest Army, which also was wholly compounded of the Sonnes of Leah, Jacob, which Jacob having lost his birth-right, followed in the second place, accompanied with his brother Simon, who had vnder-gone the Fathers curse; and with Gad, the sonne of his Mothers Hand-maide. Joseph, who in temporal blessing had the prerogative of the first borne a double portion, was accounted as two Tribes, and diuided into two Regiments, the younger (according to *Jacob*s prophecy) taking place before the elder. He was assisted by Beniamin, his best beloved brother, the other son of Rachel. To Dan, the eldest son of Zabul Concubines, was giuen the leading of the fourth Army, according to *Jacob*s prophecy. Hee had with him vnder his Standard none of the children of Lea, or Rachel, but onely the sonnes of the Hand-maides.

In the middle of these foure Armies, was the Tabernacle, or portable Temple of the Congregation carried, surrounded by the Leuites. Neere vnto which, as the Heathens and Pagans could not approach, by reason of the foure powerful Armies which guarded the same: so was it denied for any of the children of Israel to come neere it, who were not of the Leuites, to whom the charge was committed. So sacred was the moueable Temple of God, and with such reverence guarded and transported, as 22000. persons were dedicated to the seruice and attendance thereof: of which 8580. had the peculiar charge, according to their severall offices and functions, the particulars whereof are written in the third and fourth of Numbers. And as the Armies of the people observed the same order in their incampment, so did the Leuites quarter themselves as in an inner square on every side of the Tabernacle; the Ascherites on the West, within the Armie, and Standard of Ephraim, ouer whom Eliab commanded, in number 7500.

The

The Family of Cohath on the South-side guided by Elizaphan, within the Army of Reuben, and betweene him and the Tabernacle, in number 8600. The third company were of the Family of Merari, ouer whom Zuriel commanded, in number 6200. and these were lodged on the North side, within the Army of Dan; On the East-side, and next within those Tribes and Forces which Judah led, did Moses and Aaron lodge, and their children, who were the first and immediate Commanders, both of the Ceremonies and of the People; vnder whom, as the chiefe of all the other Leuiticall Families, was Eleazar the sonne of Aaron, his successeur in the high Priest-hood.

This was the order of the Army of Israel, and of their incamping and marching, the Tabernacle of God being alway set in the middle and center thereof. The reuerend care, which Moses the Prophet, and chosen seruant of God, had in all that belonged euen to the outward and least parts of the Tabernacle, Arke and Sanctuary, witnessed well the inward and most humble zeale borne towards God himselfe. The industry vsed in the framing thereof, and euery, and the least part thereof; the curious workmanship thereon bestowed; the exceeding charge and expence in the provisions; the dutifull obseruance in the laying vp, and preserving the holy Vessels; the solemne removing thereof; the vigilant attendance thereon, and the prudent defence of the same, which all Ages haue in some degree imitated, is now so forgotten and cast away in this super-fine Age, by those of the Family, by the Anabaptists, Brownists, and other Settlers, as all cost and care bestowed and had of the Church, wherein God is to be serued and worshipped, is accounted a kinde of Poperie, and as proceeding from an idolatrous disposition: insomuch as Time would soone bring to passe (if it were not resisted) that God would be turned out of Churches into Barnes, and from thence againe into the Fields and Mountaines, and vnder the hedges; and the Offices of the Ministry (robbed of all dignity and respect) be as contemptible as these places; all Order, Discipline, and Church-gouernment, left to newnetie of opinion, and mens fancies: yea, and soone after, as many kindes of Religions would spring vp, as there are Parish-Churches within England: euery contentious and ignorant person clothing his fancie with the Spirit of God, and his imagination with the gift of revelation; insomuch, as when the Truth, which is but one, shall appeare to the simple multitude, no lesse variable than contrary to it selfe, the Faith of Men will soone after dye away by degrees, and all Religion be held in scorn and contempt. Which distraction gaue a great Prince of Germany cause of this answer to those that perswaded him to become a Lutheran, Siue adiungo vobis, tunc condemnor ab alijs: si me alijs adiungo, à vobis condemnor: quid fugiam video, sed quid sequar, non habeo: If I adioyne my selfe to you, I am condemned by others: if I ioyne with others, I am condemned by you: what I should auoid I see, but I know not what I should follow.

§. II. The offerings of the twelue Princes: the Passouer of the second yeere: The departing of Iethro.

Now when Moses had taken order for all things necessary, provided for the seruice of God, written the Lawes, numbered his Army, and diuided them into the battailes and troupes before remembred, and appointed them Leaders of all sorts; The twelue Princes or Commanders of the Tribes brought their offerings before the Lord, to wit, sixe couered Chariots, and twelue Oxen to draw them, therein to transport, as they marched, the parts of the Tabernacle, with all that belonged thereunto: the Sanctuary excepted, which for reuerence was carried vpon the shoulders of the sons of Korah, to whom the charge was committed; and the Chariots in which was conueyed the other parts of the Tabernacles and Vessels thereto belonging, were deliuered to the Leuites for that seruice, namely to the Sonnes of Gershan and Merari.

Besides these Chariots, each of these Commanders, Princes, or Heads of Tribes, offered vnto God, and for his seruice in the Temple, a Charger of fine siluer, weighing 130. sheekles; a siluer Boll of 70. sheekles; after the sheckle of the Sanctuary; and an Incense-Cup of gold, of ten sheekles, which they performed at the same time when the Altar was dedicated vnto God by Aaron: and before they marched from Sinai towards half-pence sterling: the Siele of the Sanctuary (as it is expounded, Exod. 10. 13.) containeth 20. Gerahs, so a Sanctuary Siele of Siluer is about 7. groats, the common Siele is but halfe as much, so wit ten Gerahs: as it is usually expounded; though Philoponus labours to prove that the common and the Sanctuary Siele were all one, Num. 9. verse 5. Num. 10. 11. Exodus. 28. 17. Numbers 9. 17.

their

their conquest, besides the Beasts which they offered for sacrifice, according to the Law Ceremoniall, the weight of all the twelve siluer Chargers, and twelve siluer Bolles, amounted vnto 2400. sheekles of siluer; and the weight of gold in the Incense-Cuppes, to 120. sheekles of gold; which makes of sheekles of siluer 1200. euery sheckle of gold valuing ten of siluer, so that the whole of gold and siluer which they offered at this time, was about foure hundredth and twenty pound sterling. This done, Moses, as in all the rest by the Spirit of God conducted, gaue order for the celebrating of the Passeouer, which they performed on the foureteenth day of the second moneth of the second yeare: and on the twentieth day of the same, the cloude was lifted vp from aboute the Tabernacle, as a signe of going forward; Moses beginning his march with this inuocation to God: Rise 10 up Lord, and let thine enemies be scattered, and let them that hate thee, flee before thee. Then all the people of Israel remoued from their incamping at the foote of the Mountaine Sinai, towards Paran, the Armie, or great Squadron of Juda, led by Naasson, taking the Vaunt-guard, followed by Nethanael and Eliab, Leaders of the Tribes of Issacar and Zabulon: after whom the rest marched, as in the figure exprest. And because the passage through so many desertes and mountaines, was exceeding difficult: Moses leauing nothing vnfore- thought which might serue for the aduancement of his enterprize, he instantly intreated his Father in Law, whom in the tenth of Numbers he calleth Hobab, to accompany them in their journey towards Canaan; promising him such part and profit of the enterprize, as God should bestow on them: for this man, as he was of great vnderstanding & iudge- 20 ment (as appeared by the Counsell hee gaue to Moses for the appointing of Iudges ouer the people) so was he a perfect guide in all those parts, himselfe inhabiting on the frontier thereof, at Midian, or Madian: and (as it seemeth) a man of great yeeres and experience; for he was then the Priest or Prince of Madian, when Moses fled first out of Egypt, and married his Daughter, which was 42. yeeres before this request made. And though Moses himselfe had liued 40. yeeres in these parts of Arabia, through which he was now to trauell: yet the better to assure his passage, and so great a multitude of foules, which could not be so few as a Million, it was necessary to vse many guides, and many conducters. To this request of Moses, it may seeme by the places, Exod. 18. 27. and Num. 10. 30. that Iethro, otherwise called Hobab, yeelded not: for it is euident, that he went backe from 30 Moses into his owne Countrey. But because it appeareth by other places of Scripture, that the posterity of this Hobab was mingled with the Israelites, it is most likely that this his returne to his owne Countrey, was rather to fetch away his Family, and to take his leaue of his owne Countrey, by setting things in order, than to abide there.

§. III.

The voyage from Horeb to Kades: the mutinies by the way: and the cause of their turning backe to the Red Sea.

AFTER this dismissal of Hobab, Israel began to march towards the Deserts of Paran: 40 and after three daies wandering, they fate downe at the Sepulchres of lust, afterward called Tabera, or Incesio: by reason that God consumed with fire those Mutiners and Murmurers which rose vp in this remoue, which happened about the 23. day of the same Moneth. And from this 23. day of the second Moneth, of the second yeere, they rested and fed themselves with Quailles (which it pleased God by a Sea-winde to cast vpon them) to the 24. day of the third moneth, to wit, all the moneth of Sinan or Iune: whereof surfsaiting there dyed great numbers: from whence in the following moneth, called Thamus, answering to our July, they went on to Hazereth, where Miriam the sister of Moses was stricken with the leprosie, which continued vpon her seven dayes, after whose recovery Israel remoued toward the border of Idumea; and incamped at Rithma, 50 neere Kades Barnea, from whence Moses sent the twelve discoverers into the Territory of Canaan, both to informe themselves of the fertility and strength of the Countrey; as also to take knowledge of the Wayes, Passages, Riuers, Lords, and Mountaines. For Arad king of the Canaanites surprized diuers companies of the Israelites, by lying in ambush neere those wayes, through which the discoverers and searchers of the Land had formerly past. Now, after the returne of the discoverers of Kades, the wrath of God was turned against Israel, whose ingratitude and rebellion after his so many benefits, so many remissions, so many miracles wrought, was such, as they esteemed their deliuerance from the

the Egyptian slavery, his feeding them, and conducting them through that great and terrible wilderness (for so Moses calleth it) with the victory which he gaue them against the powerfull Amalekites, to be no other than the effects of his hatred, thinking that hee led them on and preferred them, but to bring them, their wiues, and children to be slaughtered, and giuen for a prey and spoyle to the Amorites or Canaanites. For it was reported vnto them, by the searchers of the Land, that the Cities of their enemies were walled and defended with many strong Towers and Castles; that many of the people were Giant-like, (for they confest that they saw the sonnes of Anac there) who were men of fearefull stature, and so farre ouer-topped the Israelites, as they appeared to them, and to them- 10 selves, but as Grasshoppers in their respect. Now, as this mutiny exceeded all the rest, whereto they both accused God, and consulted to chooße them a Captaine (or as they call it now adayes, an Elele) to carry them backe againe into Egypt; so did God punish the same in a greater measure, than any of the former. For he extinguished euery soule of the whole multitude (Iosua and Caleb excepted) who being confident in Gods promises, perswaded the people to enter Canaan, being then neere it; and at the mountaine foote of Idumea, which is but narrow, laying before them the fertility thereof; and assu- 20 ring them of victory. But as men, whom the passion of feare had bereaued both of reason and common sense, they threatned to stone these encouragers to death; accounting them as men either desperate in themselves, or betrayers of the liues, goods, and children of all their brethren, to their enemies; but God resisted these wicked purposes, and inter- posing the feare of his bright glory between the vnadvised fury of the multitude, and the innocency and constancy of his seruants, preferred them thereby from their violence; threatening an intire destruction of the whole Nation, by sending among them a consuming and mercilesse pestilence. For this was the tenth insurrection and rebellion, which 30 they had made, since God deliuered them from the slavery of the Egyptians. But Moses (the mildest or meekest of all men) prayed vnto God to remember his infinite mercies; alledging, that this so seuer a iudgement, how deseruedly soeuer inflicted, would increase the pride of the Heathen Nations, and giue them occasion to vaunt, that the God of Israel, failing in power to performe his promises, suffered them to perish in these barren and fruitlesse Deserts. Yet as God is no lesse iust than mercifull, as God is slow to anger, so is his wrath a consuming fire; the same being once kindled by the violent breath of mans ingratitude: and therefore, as with a hand lesse heauy than hoped for, he scourged this iniquity, so by the measure of his glory (euermore ialous of neglect and derision) he suffered not the wicked to passe unpunished; reseruing his compassion for the innocent: whom, because they participated not with the offences of their Fathers, he was pleased to preferre, and in them to performe his promises, which haue neuer bene frus- 40 strate.

§. III.

Of their unwillingnesse to returne: with the punishment thereof, and of diuers accidents in the returne.

NOW when Moses had reuealed the purposes of God to the people, and made them know his heauy displeasure towards them, they began to bewaile themselves; though ouer-late: the times of grace and mens repentance, hauing also their appointment. And then when God had left them to themselves, and was no more among them, after they had so often plaid and dallied with his mercifull sufferings; they would needs amend their former disobedience by a second contempt: and make offer to enter the Land contrary againe to the aduice of Moses; who assured them, that God was 50 not among them; and that the Arke of his couenant should not moue, but by His direction, who could not erre; and that the enemies sword which God had hitherto benedicted and rebated, was now left no lesse sharpe than death; and in the hands of the Amalekites, and Canaanites no lesse cruell. But as men from whom God hath with-drawne his grace, doe alwayes follow those counsels which carry them to their owne destructions: so the Hebrewes, after they had forsaken the opportunity by God and their Conductors offered: and might then haue entered Juda before their enemies were prepared and ioy- ned; did afterward, contrary to Gods commandement, vndertake the enterprize of them- selves; and ranne head-long and without aduice into the mountaines of Idumea. the Canaanites and the Amalekites being ioynded, and attending their advantage, set on them, brake them: and of their numbers slaughtered the greatest part: and following their victory and pursuit, consumed them all the way of their flight, even unto Hormah: the Amalekites in revenge of their former losse, and overthrow at Raphidim: the Canaanites to prevent their displantation and destruction threatened. Of which powerfull assembly of those two Nations (assisted in all likelihood with the neighbour Kings ioynded together for their common safetie) it pleased God to forewarne Moses, and to direct him another way, than that formerly intended. For he commanded him to returne by those painfull passages of the Deserts, through which they had formerly trauelled, till they found the banks of the Red Sea againe: in which retraite before they came backe to passe ouer Jordan, there were consumed 38. yeeres; and the whole number of the 600. and odd thousand, which came out of Egypt (Moses, Ishua, and Caleb excepted) were dead in the Wildernesse, the stubborne and careless generations were wholly worne out, and the promised Land bestowed on their children; which were increased to 600000. and more. For besides the double fault both of refusing to enter the Land vpon the returne of their discouersers, and the presumption then to attempt it, when they were countermaunded: it seemeth that they had committed that horrible Idolatry or worshipping Moloch, and the Hosts of Heauen. For although Moses doth not mention it, yet Amos doth, and so doth the Martyr Stephen; as also that the Israelites worshipped the Sunne and Moone in after-times, it is proved out of sundry other places.

Num. 33.

Now after the broken Companies were returned to the Campe at Cades, Moses according to the commandment receiued from God, departed towards the South from whence hee came, to recouer the shoares of the Red Sea. And so from Cades or Rithma hee remoued to Remmonparez, so called of abundance of Pomegranates there found and diuided among them. From whence he went on to Libnah, taking that name of the Frankincense there found. From Libnah he crost the Valley, and fate downe at Refsa, neere the foote of the mountaine. And after hee had rested there, he bended towards the West, and incamped at Ceclata; where one of the Hebrewes, for gathering broken wood on the Sabbath, was stoned to death. After which, Moses alwayes keeping the Valley, betwene two great ledges of mountaines, (those which bound the Desert of Sinne, and those of Pharan) crost the same from Ceclata, and marched Eastward to the mountaine of Saphir, or Sepher: this making the Twentieth mansion. From thence hee passed on to Harada; then to Maccloth; and then to Thahab, and so to Thara or Thare; the foure and twentieth mansion. Where Moses rested, the people began that insolent and dangerous mutiny of Korah, Dathan, & Abiram; who for their contempt of God & his Ministers, were some of them swallowed vp aliue, and by the Earth opening her mouth deuoured; others, euen two hundred and fifty which offered incense with Korah, were consumed with fire from Heauen; and 14700. of their party, which murmured against Moses, stricken dead with a sudden pestilence: one of the greatest maruailes and iudgements of God, that hath been shewed in all the time of Moses his gouernment, or before. For among so great a multitude, those lay-men who would haue vsurped Ecclesiasticall authority, were suddenly swallowed vp aliue into the Earth with their families and goods; euen while they sought to ouerthrow the Order, Discipline, and power of the Church, and to make all men alike therein, rebelliously contending against the High Priest and Magistrate, to whom God had committed the gouernment both of his Church, and Common-weale of his people. And the better to assure the people, and out of his great mercy to confirme them, it pleased him in this place also to approue by miracle the former election of his seruant Aaron, by the twelue rods giuen in by the Heads of the twelue Tribes; of which Moses receiued one of eury Head, and Prince of his Tribe: which being all withered and dried Wands, and on eury rod the name of the Prince of the Tribe written, and Aarons on that of Leui, it pleased God, that the rod of Aaron receiued by his power a vegetable spirit, and hauing laine in the Tabernacle of the Congregation, before the Arke one night; had on it both Buddes, Blossomes, and ripe Almonds.

From Tharah the whole Army remoued to Methra; and thence to Esmona; and thence to Moseroth, (or Masur, after Saint Hierome, and from Moseroth to Benciscan; and so to Gadgad, which Hierome calleth Gadgada; thence to Ietabata, the thirtieth Mansion; where from certaine fountaines of water gathered in one, Adrichomius maketh a Riuer, which falleth into the Red Sea, betwene Madian and Asiongaber.

Now

Now although it be very probable, that at Asiongaber, where Salomon twinnish his Fleets for the East India, there was store of fresh water; and though Herodotus maketh mention of a great Riuer in Arabia the florist, which he calleth Corya, from whence (saith he) the inhabitants conueigh water in pipes of leathard to other places, by which deuice the King of Arabia reioiced the Army of Cambyses: yet is Adrichomius greatly deceiued, as many times hee is, in finding these Springs at Gadgad, or Ietabata, being the nine and twentieth or thirtieth Mansion. For it was at Punon, that those Springs are spoken of, which in Democritus they call the scamper Perse, is also called Asiongaber or Sabark; a Land of running waters, and which by all probability fall into the Red Sea: the next adioyning. And that those Springs should fall into the Red Sea, at Asiongaber, or Eloth, I cannot beleue, for the way thither is very long. And this I finde in Belonius, that there are diuers Fontaines of fresh water in those parts of Arabia: which though they continue their course for a few miles, yet they are drunke vp by the hot and thirsty Land, before they can recouer the banks of the Red Sea.

From Ietabata, Moses directed his journey towards the Red Sea, and incamped at Hibrona, and from thence to Esiogaber: which City in Iosephus time had the name of Beronic; and in Hieromes, Esiu. From thence, keeping the Sea, and Eloth on his right hand, hee turned towards the North, as hee was by God commanded to Esiogaber: 20. being the farthest place towards the South: East; that Moses trauielled in that passage.

It seemeth that Esiogaber or Asiongaber and Madian, were not at this time in the possession of the Kings of Edom. For it is said, That the Lord spake unto Moses and Aaron in the Mount Sinay, where the East of the Red Sea of Edom; so as the Mount Sinay was at this time in the South border of Idumaea. And if Esiogaber, and the other places neere the Red Sea, had at this present been subiect vnto the Idumaeans, Moses would also haue demanded a free passage through them. It is true, that in the future the Idumaeans obtained those places; for it is said, And they arose out of Idumaea, and came to Paran; and took men with them; which were those companies that folowed young Abd of Idumaea, vnto Egypt, when he fled from Isaac. Likewise it is said of Salomon, that hee made a Navy of shippes in Esiogaber besides Eloth, in the Land of Edom.

Num. c. 20.

v. 13.

1 Kings 11. 18.

Of Moses arrivall at Zin Kades: and of the accidents while that they abode there.

From Esiogaber hee turned againe towards the North, and pitched in the Wildernesse of Zin, which is Kades; or in Beroth of the children of Isaac; where they fate downe in the first Moneth of the fourth yeere; after they were in Egypt. For at the next Mansion Aaron died in the first day of the fifth Moneth of the fortieth yeere: the nine and thirtieth yeere taking end at Esiogaber. And at this City of Cades (for so it was thought to be) or neere it, died Miriam, or Mary, Moses sister, whose Sepulcher was to be seene in Saint Hieromes time, as himselfe auoweth. From thence ere they departed to the Mountaine Hor, all the people murmured most violently against Moses, by reason of the scarcity of water. For neither the punishments by fire from Heauen; by being deuoured and swallowed vp by the earth; by the sudden pestilence, which often seized them; nor any miracle formerly shewing, either the loue or wrath of God, could preuaile with this Nation any longer, than while they were full fed and satisfied in eury of their appetites: but in stead of seeking for helpe and reliefe at Gods hands, when they suffered hunger, thirst, or any other want, they murmured, repined, and rebelled, repenting them of their changed estates, and casting vngratefully on Moses all their misadventures; yea, though they well knew that their owne Fathers had left their bodies in the Deserts, and that they were now entred into the fortieth yeere, wherein all their miseries were to take end. And being, as it were, in the sight of the Land promised, they againe as obstinately tempted God as in former times, and neither trusted his promises, nor feared his indignation. But as the will and purposes of God are without beginning; so his mercies being without end, he commanded Moses to strike a Rocke adioyning with his rod; and the waters issued out in a great abundance, with which both themselves and their cattell were satiated. Neuertheless, because God perceived a kinde of diffidence both in Moses and Aaron, at this place; therefore he permitted neither of them to enter the Land promised, whereto perchance their worldly desires might inuite them. But it pleased him to end the trauailes of Aaron at the Mountaine Hor, being the next, and foure and thirtieth Station. At which Mountaine of Hor, Aaron was depoyled of the garments of his Priest-hood, and the same put on Eleazar his sonne, as God had commanded. Which done, Moses and Eleazar descended the Mountaine; but God receiued Aaron on the top thereof, and he was no more scene.

God

Of this Mountaine called Hor, otherwife Mofira, as in Deuteronomy 10. Verse 6. those Horites tooke name, which the Idumeans had formerly vanquished. Some there are which make Mofera, which was the seauen and twentieth Mansion; and Mofera which they write Mofroth for difference, which was the foure and thirtieth Mansion, and is also called Hor, to be two distinct places: because Moses in passing from Cadesbarne towards Egypt, incamped at Mofera, after hee departed from Hesmona, and before he came to Beniamin. And this Mofera, which is also called Hor, he came vnto after he left Cades, where Miriam, Moses sister dyed; the first being the seauen and twentieth, and the second being the foure and thirtieth Mansion. But for Hor, which is also called Mofera, it should haue bene written, Hor iuxta Mofera; Hor neere Mofera: for it is but one roote of a Mountaine, diuided into diuers tops, as Sinai and Horeb are: Whereof the West part Moses calleth Mofera, and the East part Horeb. By the West part Moses encamped, as hee past towards the Red Sea, on his left hand; by the East part, as hee went backe againe North-wards towards Moab: as in the description of Moses his passage through Araba, the Reader may perceiue.

Now it was from Cades, before they came to Hor, because Hor belonged to Edom, that Moses sent messengers to the Prince of Idumea, praying him that he might passe with the people of Israel through his Territory into the Land of Canaan, which bordered it. For it was the neereest way of all other from the City of Cades, where Moses then encamped; whereas otherwife taking his iourney by the Riuer of Zared, Arnon, and Jordan, he might haue runne into many hazards in the passage of those Riuer, the farre way about, and the many powerful Kings, which commanded in those Regions. Now the better to perswade the Prince of Idumea hereunto, Moses remembered him, that hee was of the same race and family with Israel: calling him by the name of brother, because both the Edomites and Israelites were the sonnes of one father, to wit, Isaac; inferring thereby that hee had more reason to fauour and respect them, than hee had to assit the Canaanites; against whom Esau his Ancestor had made warre, and driuen out the Horites (who were of their ancient races descended of Cham) out of the Region of Seir, calling it by his owne name Edom, or Edumaea. He also making a short repetition of Gods blessings bestowed on them, and of his purposes and promises; assured Edom, or the King thereof, that he would not way offend his people, or waste his Countrey, but that hee would restrain his Army within the bounds of the Common, and Kings high wayes, paying money for whatsoever he vsed, yea, euen for the water, which themselves or their Cattell should drinke. For Moses was commanded by God, not to prouoke the children of Esau. But the King of Edumaea knowing the strength of his owne Countrey, the same being neere Canaan, rampard with high and sharpe mountaines: and withall suspecting, as a naturall wise man, that 600000. strangers being once entred his Countrey, it would rest in their wills to giue him law, resolutely refused them passage, and deliuered this answer to the Messengers: That, if they attempted to enter that way, he would take them for enemies, and resist them by all possible meanes. And not knowing whether such a deniall might satisfie or exasperate, hee gathered the strength of his Countrey together, and shewed himselfe prepared to defend their passage. For, as it is written; Then Edom came out against him (to wit, Moses) with much people, and with a mighty power. Whereupon Moses considering, that the end of his enterprife was not the conquest of Seir or Edumaea, and that the Land promised was that of Canaan: like vnto himselfe who was of naturall vnderstanding the greatest of any man, and the skilfullest man of warre that the world had, hee refused to aduerture the Army of Israel against a Nation, which being overcome, gaue but a passage to invade others; and which by reason of the feate of their mountainous Countrey, could not but haue endangered, or (at least) greatly enfeebled the strength of Israel, and rendred them lesse able, if not altogether powerlesse, to haue conquered the rest.

§. VI.

Of their compassing Idumea, and traouelling to Arnon, the border of Moab.

10 Therefore leaving the way of Idumea, turned himselfe towards the East, and marched towards the Deserts of Moab. Which when Arad King of the Canaanites vnderstood, and that Moses had blanchd the way of Idumea; and knowing that it was Canaan, and not Edom, which Israel aimed at, he thought it safest, rather to finde his enemies in his neighbours Countrey, than to be found by them in his owne: which he might haue done with a farre greater hope of victory, had Moses bene enforced first to haue made his way by the Sword through Idumea, and thereby though victorious, greatly haue lessened his numbers. But although it fell out otherwise than Arad hoped for, yet being resolutely to make triall, what courage the Israelites brought with them out of Egypt, before they came neerer his owne home; leading the strength of his Nation to the edge of the Desert, he set vpon some part of the Army; which, for the multitude occupied a great space, and for the many heards of Cattell that they draue with them, could not encampe so neere together, but that some quarter or other was cuermore subiect to surpris. By which aduantage, and in that his attempts were then perchance v unexpected, he slew some few of the Israelites, and carried with him many prisoners.

Now it is very probable, that it was this Canaanite, or his Predecessour, which ioynd his forces with the Amalekites, and gaue an ouerthrow to those mutinous Israelites, which without direction from God by Moses, would haue entred Canaan from Cadesbarne. For it seemeth that the greatest number of that Army were of the Canaanites, because in the first of Deuteronomy, 44. the Amorites are named alone without the Amalekites, and are said to haue beaten the Israelites at that time. And this Arad, if he were the same that had a victory ouer Israel, neere Cadesbarne; or if it were his Predecessour that then preuailed, this man finding that Moses was returned from the Red Sea; and in his way towards Canaan, and that the South part of Canaan was first to be invaded, and in danger of being conquered, not knowing of Moses purpose to compasse Moab, determined while hee was yet in the Desert, to trie the quarrell. And whereas it followeth in the third verse of the twelfth Chapter of Numbers, that the Israelites utterly destroyed the Canaanites and their Cities, they are much mistaken that thinke, that this destruction was presently performed by the Israelites. But it is to be vnderstood, to haue bene done in the future, to wit, in the time of Iosua. For had Moses at this time entred Canaan in the pursuit of Arad, he would not haue fallen backe againe into the Deserts of Zin and Moab, and haue fetcht a wearisome and needlesse compasse, by the Riuer of Zared and Arnon.

Neither is their coniecture to be valued at any thing, which affirme, that Arad did not inhabit any part of Canaan it selfe, but that his Territory lay without it, and neere the Mountaine Hor. For Hor and Zin Cades were the South borders of Edom, and not of Canaan. And it was in the South of the Land of Canaan, that Arad dwelt: which South part of Canaan was the North part of Edom.

Againe, Horma (for so farre the Israelites after their victory pursued the Canaanites) is so seated in the South of Judea. There is also a City of that name in Simeon. But there is no such place to the South of Edom. And were there no other argument, but the mutiny which followed presently after the repetition of this victory, it were enough to proue, that the same was obtained in the future, and in Iosua his time, and not at the instant of Arads assault. For had the Israelites at this time sackt the Cities of Arad, they would not the next day haue complained for want of water and bread. For where there are great Cities, there is also water and bread. But it was in the time of Iosua, that the Israelites tooke their reuenge, and after they had past Jordan: Iosua then gouerning them; who in the twelfth Chapter and fourteenth Verse, nameth this Arad by the name of his Citie so called; and with him the King of Horma: to which place the Israelites pursued the Canaanites. And he nameth them amongst those Kings, which he vanquished, and put to death.

Now after this assault and surprize by Arad, Moses finding that all entrance on that side was defended, he led the people Eastward to compass Idumaea and the Dead Sea, and to make his entrance by Arnon and the Plains of Moab, at that time in the possession of the Amorites. But the Israelites, to whom the very name of a Desert was terrible, began againe to rebell against their Leader; till God by a multitude of fiery Serpents, (that is, by the bytting of Serpents, whose venom inflamed them, and burnt them as fire) made them know their error, and afterward, according to his plentifull grace, cured them againe by their beholding an artificiall Serpent, by his Commandement set vp.

From the Mount Hor, Moses leaving the ordinary way which lyeth betwene the Red Sea, and Cafofria, encamped at Zalmona: and thence hee remoued to Phunon, where hee erected the Brazen Serpent; making these iourneys by the edge of Idumaea, but without it. For Phunon was sometime a principall City of the Edomites. Now where it is written in Numbers 21. Verse 4. That from Mount Hor they departed by the way of the Red Sea, which grieved the people, it was not thereby meant that the Israelites turned back towards the Red Sea; neither did they march (according to Fonsica) per viam que habet a latere maris rubrum; By the way that sided the Red Sea, but indeed they crost, and went athwart the common way from Galaad, Traconitis, and the Countreys of Moab, to the Red Sea,¹⁸ that is, to Esfongaber, Eloth, and Midian: which way, as it lay North and South, so Israel to thinne the border of Edom, and to take the utmost East part of Moab, crost the common way towards the East, and then they turned againe towards the North, as before.

From Phunon he went to Oboth; where they entred the Territory of Moab, adioyning to the Land of Supha, a Countrey bordering on the Dead Sea; and from thence to Abarim, the eight and thirtieth Mansioun, that is, where the Mountaines so called take beginning, and are as yet but small Mountures of Hills, on the East border of Moab. From thence they recovered Dibon Gad, or the Riuer of Zared, which riseth in the mountaines of Arabia, and runneth towards the Dead Sea, not farre from Petra the Metropolis thereof, being the nine and thirtieth Station. And hauing past that Riuer, they lodged at Dibon Gad,¹⁹ and from thence they kept the way to Diblathaim, one of the Cities of Moab; which Hieremie the Prophet Chap. 48. Verse 22. calleth the House of Diblathaim, the same which afterward was destroyed among the rest by Nabuchadnezzar. From thence they came to the Riuer of Arnon, and encamped in the mountaines of Abarim: though in the 22. of Numbers, Moses doth not remember Heldmondiblathaim, but speaketh of his remoue from the Riuer of Zared, immediately to the other side of Arnon, calling Arnon the border of Moab, betwene them and the Amorites: speaking, as he found the state of the Countrey at that time. For Arnon was not anciently the border of Moab, but was lately conquered from the Moabites, by Sehon, King of the Amorites: euen from the Predecessour of Balac Peor then reigning. From Diblathaim, Moses sent messengers to Sehon, King of the Amorites, to desire a passage through his Countrey: which though he knew would be denied him, yet he desired to giue a reason to the neighbour Nations, of the warre he vnderooke. And though Edom had refused him as Sehon did, yet he had no warrant from God to enforce him. Moses also in sending messengers to Sehon, obserued the same precept, which he left to his posterity and successors, for a law of the warre; namely in Deut. 20. Verse 10. in these words; When thou comest neere vnto a Citie to fight against it, thou shalt offer it peace, which if it doe accept of, and open vnto thee, then let all the people found therein be tributaries vnto thee, and serue thee; but if it refuse, etc. thou shalt smite all the males thereof with the edge of the sword. Which ordinance all commanders of Armies haue obserued to this day, or ought to haue done.

Of the Booke of the battailes of the Lord, mentioned in this Story, and of other Bookes mentioned in Scripture, which are lost.

Num. c. 21. v. 14.

Now concerning the Warre betwene Israel and Sehon, Moses seemeth to referre a great part of this Story to that Booke intituled, Liber bellorum Domini; The booke of Gods battailes: and therefore passeth ouer many encounters, and other things memor-memorable, with greater breuiaty in this place. His words after the Geneus Translation are these: wherefore it shall be spoken in the Booke of the battailes of the Lord, what things he did in the Red Sea, and in the Riuers of Arnon. The Vulgar copie differeth not in sense from this: But the Greeke Septuagint vary. For the Greeke writes it to this effect; For thus it is said in the Booke: The warre of the Lord hath burnt (or inflamed) Zoob; and the brookes of Arnon. Iunius for the Red Sea, which is in the Geneuan and Vulgar Edition, names the Region of * Supha, a Countrey bordering the Dead Sea towards the East, as he coniectureth. The Text he readeth thus. Idcirco dicit solet in recessione bellorum Ichoua, contra Vahebim in Regione Supha: & contra flumina, flumina Arnonis; Therefore it is spoken in repeating of the battailes of Ichouah, against Vahab, in the Countrey of Supha; and against the Riuers, the Riuers of Arnon. In which words he vnderstands, that among the warres which the Lord disposed for the good of the Israelites, there was in those times a famous memory in the mouth of most men, concerning the warre of Sehon against Vahab, the King of the Moabites, and of his winning the Countrey neere Arnon, out of the possession of the Moabites. For this Vahab was the immediate predecessor of Balac, who liued with Moses: though it be written that this Balac was the son of Zippor, and not of Vahab. For it seemes (as it is plaine in the succession of the Edomites) that these Kingdomes were electiue, and not successiue. And as Iunius in this Translation vnderstandeth no speciall Booke of the battailes of the Lord: so others, as Vatablus in his Annotations, doubt whether in this place any speciall Booke be meant; and if any, whether it be not a prediction of warres in future ages, to be waged in these places, and to be written in the Booke of Judges, Synacides c. 46. tells vs plainly, that those battailes of the Lord were fought by Isaia, whom he there (saith he) before him like to him? for he fought the battailes of the Lord. Put seeing the Histories of the Scripture elsewhere often passe ouer matters of great weight in few words, referring the Reader to other Bookes, written of the same matter at large: therefore it seemeth probable; that such a Booke as this there was; wherein the severall victories by Israel obtained, and also victories of other Kings, making way for the good of the Israelites, were particularly and largely written. And that the same should now be wanting, it is not strange, seeing so many other Volumes, filled with diuine discourse, haue perished in the long race of time, or haue beene destroyed by the ignorant and malicious Heathen Magistrate. For the Bookes of Henoch, howsoeuer they haue beene in later ages corrupted, and therefore now suspected, are remembered in an Epistle of Thaddaeus, and cited by Origen,²⁰ and by Tertullian.

That worke also of the Patriarch Abraham, of Formation, which others bestow on Rabbi Achiba, is no where found. The Bookes remembered by Isaia c. 10. v. 13. and in the second of Samuel, c. 1. v. 18. called the Booke of Isaiher, or Isaiherum, is also lost; wherein the stay of the Sunne and Moone in the midst of the Heauens is recorded, and how they stood still till Israel had auenged themselves of their enemies: out of which also Danid tooke the precept, of teaching the children of Israhel, to exercise their bowes against their enemies.

Some thinke this to be the Booke of eternall Predestination, in which the iust are written, according vnto the sixty and ninth Psalm, Verse 28. where it is said; Let them bee put out of the booke of Life, neither let them bee written with the righteous. Hierome thinkes, that Dauid by this Booke vnderstood those of Samuel; Rabbi Salomon, that the Bookes of the Law are thereby meant, in which the acts of the iust. Abraham of Isaac, Jacob, and Moses, are written; Others, that it was the Booke of Exodus, others, as Theodoresus, that it was a Commentary vpon Isaia, by an vknowne Author.

The booke of Chozai, concerning Manasse, remembered in the second of Chron. 33. v. 18. & 16. Of this booke, also lost, Hierome conceiues that the Prophet Isay was the Author.

The same mischance came aswell to the Story of Salomon, written by Abia Siluiter, who met with Ieroboam, and foretold him of his obtaining the Kingdome of Israhel from the sonne of Salomon; as to the bookes of Nathan the Prophet, and to those of Iezabab the Seer, remembered in the second of Chron. c. 9. v. 29. With these haue the bookes of Shemai and of Ado, remembered in the second of Chron. c. 12. v. 15. perished; and that of Iehu the sonne of Hamani, of the acts of Iezabab, cited in the second of Chron. c. 20. v. 34. Also that booke of Salomon which the Hebrewes write Hastorim, of 5200. verses, of which that part called Canticum Canticorum, onely remaineth, 1. Kings 4. 32. and with this diuers others of Salomons works haue perished, as his Booke of the naturcs of Trees, Plants, Beasts, Fishes, &c. 1. Kings 4. 33. with the rest remembred by Origen, Iosephus, Hierome, Cedrenius, Ciccius Asculanus, Picrus Mirandula, and others.

Of these and other Bookes many were consumed with the same fire, wherewith Nabuchadnezzar burnt the Temple of Iherusalem. But let vs returne thither where wee left.

§. VIII.

Of Moses his sparing the issue of Lot; and of the Giants in those parts; and of Sehon and Og.

When Moses had past Arnon, he incamped on the other side thereof at Abarim, opposite to the City of Nebo, leaving the City of Midian on the left hand, & attempting nothing vpon the Moabites on that side. For Moab did at this time inhabit on the South-side of Arnon, hauing lost all his ancient and best Territory, which was now in the possession of Sehon the Amorite. For Moses was commanded by God not to molest Moab, neither to prouoke them to battaile, God hauing giuen that Land to the children of Lot; the same which was anciently posselt by the Emims, who were men of great stature, and comparable to those Giants called Anakims, or the sonnes of Anac.

God also commanded Moses to spare the Ammonites, because they likewise were descended of Lot: who had expelled from thence those Giants, which the Ammonites called Zamzummims. For it seemeth that all that part, especially to the East of Jordan, euen to the Desert of Arabia, as well on the West, as on the East-side of the Mountaines of Gilead, was inhabited by Giants. And in the plantation of the Land promised, the Israelites did not at any time passe those Mountaines to the East of Basan, but left their Countrey to them, as in the description following is made manifest. We find also, that as there were many Giants both before and after the flood: so these Nations, which anciently inhabited both the border of Canaan, and the Land it selfe, had among them many Families of Giant-like men. For the Anakims dwelt in Hebron, which sometimes was called the City of Arbah, which Arbah in Iofus is called the father of the Anakims; and the greatest man of the Anakims. There had also bene Giants in the Land of the Moabites, called Emims: and their chiefe City was Aroer or Ar, neere the Riuer of Arnon. To the Giants of the Rephaims, the Ammonites gaue the name of Zamzummims; which were of the same ancient Canaanites: and their chiefe City was Rabba, afterward Philadelpia. They were also called Zuzims, which is as much to say, as Viri robusti, horrendi, Gigantes, Strong men, and fearefull Giants, who inhabited other Cities of Ham, or Hom, in the same Prouince, and not farre to the North of Aroer.

Now Moses hauing past Arnon, and being encamped at Abarim; and hauing (as before) sent to Sehon, as he had done to Edom, to pray a passage through his Countrey, was denied it. For Sehon being made proud by his former conquest vpon Vahab the Moabite; which Nation the Amorites esteemed but as strangers and vsurpers, (themselves being of the sonnes of Canaan, and the Moabites of Lot) refused to grant Israel any entrance that way, and withall prepared to encounter Moses with as much speed as he could, because Moses encamped in the Countrey of his new conquests, to wit, the Plaines of Moab, the two and fortieth and last Mansion: which Moses waited with the multitude of his people, and cattell. Towards him therefore hauing himselfe, they encountered each other at Iabash, where Sehon with his children and people were broken and discomfited: and the victory so pursued by Moses, as few or none of the Amorites escaped. He also slaughtered all the Women and Children of the Amorites, which he found in Essebon, and all the other Cities, Villages, or Fields; they being of the race of Canaan, as those of Basan also were: and defended of Enochus or Amoreus: for Moses calleth the Basantes also Amorites. And although Israel might now haue taken a ready way and passage into Iudea: being at this time, and after this victory at the banks of Jordan: yet he knew it to be perillous to leaue so great a part of that Nation of the Amorites on his backe, as inhabited all the Region of Basan or Tracoonitis: and therefore he led on his Army to inuade Og: a person of exceeding strength and stature: and the onely man of marke remaining of the ancient Giants of those parts, and who at that time had 60. Cities walled and defended: lying betwene the Mountaine of Herman (which Mountaine, saith Moses, the Sidonians call Shirion; and the Amorites Shenir) and the Riuer of Jordan. And it befell vnto the King of Basan (who attended Moses coming at Edrei) as it did vnto Sihon: for he and his sonnes perished, and all his Cities were taken and posselt. After this, Moses with-drawing himselfe backe againe to the Mountaines of Abarim, left the prosequotion of that warre vnto Isaac the sonne of Manasse: who conquering the East parts of Basan, to wit, the Kingdome of Argob, euen vnto the Nations of the Gessurim and Machati, 60. walled Cities: called the same after his owne name Huoth lair: of all which conquests afterward the halfe Tribe of Manasse posselt the North part as farre as Edrei, but the East part that belonged to Sihon the Amorite, with the Mountaines of Gilead adioyning, was giuen to Reuben and vnto Gad.

Of the troubles about the Medianites, and of Moses his death.

After these victories, and while Israel sojourned in the valley of Moab, the Medianites and Moabites (ouer both which Nations it seemeth that Balaam King of the Moabites then commanded in chiefe) sought, according to the aduice of Balaam, both by alluring the Hebrewes to the loue of their daughters, and by perswading them to honour and serue their Idols, to diuine them both in Loue and Religion among themselves: thereby the better both to defend their owne interest against them, as also to beate them out of Moab, and the Countreys adioyning. The Israelites as they had euer bene inclined, so were they now easily perswaded to these euill courses, and thereby drew on themselves the plague of pestilence, whereof there perished 24500. persons: besides which punishment of God, the most of the offenders among the Hebrewes, were by his commandement put to the Sword, or other violent deaths: after this, when that Phineas the sonne of Eleazar had pierced the bodies of Zimri, a Prince of the Simeonites, together with Cosbi a daughter of one of the chiefe of the Midianites, the plague ceased, and Gods wrath was appeased. For such was the loue and kindeesse of his all-powerfulnesse, respecting the ardent zeale of Phineas in persecuting of Zimri (who being a chiefe among the Hebrewes, became an Idolater) as he forgave the rest of Israel, and stayed his hand for his sake.

In this valley it was that Moses caused the people to be numbred the third time: and thereremained of able men fit to beare armes, 601730. of which as his last enterprife, he appointed 12000. to be chosen out, to inuade the Cities of Midian, who together with the Moabites practised with Balaam to curse Israel: and after that sought to allure them (as before remembred) from the worship of the true God, to the seruice of Beth-Peor: and to the rest of their barbarous Idolatry. Ouer which companies of 12000. Moses gaue the charge to Phineas, the sonne of Eleazar the high Priest: who slew the five Princes of the Medianites, which were, or had lately bene, the vassals of Sehon, as appeareth by Iofus. These five Princes of the Medianites slaine by Eleazar, were at this time but the vassals of Sehon the Amorite, to wit, Eui, Rekem, Zur, Hur, and Reba, the Dukes of Sehon saith Iofus. He slew also all the men, male-children, and women: sauing such as had not yet vsed the company of men, but those they sau'd, and disperst them among the children of Israel to serue them.

And Moses hauing now liued 120. yeeres, making both his owne weakenesse of body knowne to the people, and his vnability to traualle: and also that he was forewarned of his end by the Spirit of God: from whom hee receiued anew commandement to ascend the Mountaines of Abarim, and thereon to render vp his life: He hastned to settle the Government in Iofus: whom hee perswaded with most liuely arguments to prosecute the conquest begun, assuring him of Gods fauour and assistance therein. And so hauing spent these his later dayes after the Conquest of Og and Sehon, King of the Amorites, in the repetition and exposition of the Law, (or an iteration of the Law, according to Saint Augustine) vsing both arguments, prayers, and threats vnto the people: which he often repeated vnto them; thereby to confirme them in knowledge, loue, feare, and seruice, of the all-powerfull God: He blessed the twelue Tribes, that of Simcon excepted, with severall and most comfortable blessings: praying the greatnesse and goodnesse

Observations out of the Story of Moses, how God disposeth both the smallest occasions, and the greatest resistances, to the effecting of his purpose.

Now let vs a little, for instruction, looke backe to the occasions of sundry of the great euents, which haue beene mentioned in this Story of the life of Moses, for (excepting Gods miracles, his promise, and fore-choise of this people) hee wrought in all things else by the mediu of mens affections, and naturall appetites. And so we shall finde that the feare which Pharaoh had of the increafe of the Hebrewes, multiplied by God to exceeding great numbers, was the next naturall cause of the sorrowes and losse, which befell him selfe, and the Egyptian Nation : which numbers when he fought by cruell and vngodly policies to cut off and lessen, as when he commanded all the male-children of the Hebrewes to be slaine, God (whose providence cannot be resisted, nor his purposes preuented by all the foolish and saluage craft of mortall men) moued compassion in the heart of Pharaoh's owne daughter, to preferue that childe, which afterward became the most wise, and of all men the most gentle and milde, the most excellently learned in all Diuine and Humane knowledge, to be the conductor and deliuerer of his oppressed brethren, and the ouerthrow of Pharaoh, and all the flower of his Nation ; euen then, when he fought by the strength of his men of Warre, of his Horse, and Chariots, to tread them vnder, and bury them in the dust. The griefe which Moses conceived of the iniuries, and of the violence offered to one of the Hebrewes in his owne presence, moued him to take reuenge of the Egyptian that offered it : the ingratitude of one of his owne Nation, by threatening him to discover the slaughter of the Egyptian, moued him to sic into Midian : the contention betwene the Shepherds of that place, and Lehrs Daughters, made him knowne to their Father : who not onely entertained him, but married him to one of those Sisters : and in that solitary life of keeping of his Father in lawes sheepe, farre from the presse of the World, contenting himselfe (though bred as a Kings Sonne) with the lot of a poore Heards-man, God found him out in that Desert, wherein he first suffered him to liue many yeeres, the better to know the wayes and passages through which he purposed that he should conduct his people, toward the Land promised : and therein appearing vnto him, he made him know his will and diuine pleasure for his returne into Egypt. The like may be said of all things else, which Moses afterward by Gods direction performed in the Story of Israel before remembred. There is not therefore the smallest accident, which may seeme vnto men as falling out by chance, and of no consequence : but that the same is caused by God to effect somewhat else by : yea, and oftentimes to effect things of the greatest worldly importance, either presently, or in many yeeres after, when the occasions are either not considered, or forgotten.

CHAP.

CHAP. VI.

Of the Nations with whom the Israelites had dealing after their coming out of Egypt : and of the men of renoune in other Nations, about the times of Moses and Joshua, with the summe of the History of Joshua.

§. I.

How the Nations with whom the Israelites were to haue warre, were diuers wayes, as it were, prepared to be their enemies.

IN like manner if we look to the quality of the Nations, with whom the Israelites, after their coming out of Egypt, had to doe, either in the wilderness, or afterward : we shall finde them long before-hand, by the disposing providence of God, as it were prepared for enmity : partly in respect that they were most of them of the issue of Canaan, or at least of Ham : and the rest (as the Edomites, Moabites, Ammonites, & Israelites) were mingled with them by mutuall marriages : whereas the Israelites still continued strangers, and separate from them : and so partly in this respect, and partly by ancient iniuries or enmities, and partly by reason of diuersity in Religion, were these Nations, as it were prepared to be enemies to the Israelites : and so to serue for such purposes as God had referred them for. To make these things more manifest, wee must vnderstand that this part of Syria, bounded by the mountaines of Libanus, and Zidon on the North, by the same mountaines continued as farre as the Springs of Arnon on the East : by the way of Egypt, and the Red Sea, on the South : and by the Mediterran Sea on the West : was inhabited and peopled by two Nations, the one springing from the sonnes of Cham, the other from Sem : but those of Sem, were but as strangers therein for a long time, and came thither in effect but with * one Family, to wit, that of Abraham, and a few of his kindred. The other for the greatest part were the Canaanites, the ancient Lords and possessors of those Territories, by proceffe of time diuided into seuerall Families and names : whereof some of them were of eminent stature and strength, as the Anakims, Zamzummins, or Zuzi, Emims, Horites, and others : These (as men most valiant and able commonly doe) did inhabit the vtter borders and mountaines of their Countries : the rest were the Zidonians, Iebusites, Amorites, Henites, Hetites, and others, who tooke name after the sonnes of Canaan, and after whom the Countrey in generall was still called.

As for the Hebrewes which descended of Shem by Abraham, they were of another Familie, and strangers in that Countrey, especially the Israelites : and this was some cause that the Canaanites did not affect them, or indure them : no more than the Philistins did, who descended also of Cham by Mizraim. For though Abraham himselfe being a stranger, was highly esteemed and honoured among them : especially by the Amorites inhabiting the West part of Jordan : yet now euen they which descended from Abraham, or from his kindred, abode and multiplied in those parts, were alienated in affections from the Israelites : as holding them strangers and intruders : making more account of their alliance with the Canaanites, and the rest of the issue of Cham, with whom they daily contracted affinity, than of their old pedigree from Abraham.

True it is, that these Nations descended of Abraham, or of his kindred, who had singled themselves and matched with the Canaanites and others, had so farre posset themselves of the borders of those Regions, as they began to be equal in strength to the bordering Canaanites, if not superiour. For of Lot came those two great Families of the Moabites, & Ammonites : of Esaue the Idumians, and of Madian the Madianites : of Ismael the eldest sonne of Abraham, came the Ismaelites, with whom are ioyned as of the same Nation, the Amalekites, whom though the more common opinion thinketh to haue bene a Tribe of Edom, because Esaue had a grand-child of that name, yet manifest reason con-

* It seemeth also that Hur, the Sonne of Nahor, and Buz his Brother, planted themselves in the East side of Jordan, about Babylon : where they finde the Land of Eliazar in which Iob dwelt as one of the issue of Ham the Sonne of Nahor, and Eliab, his friend which is called a Buzite. See hereafter chap. 10. §. 7. Exod. 17. 14.

unceth it to haue beene otherwise. For the Israelites were forbidden to prouoke the Edomites, or doe them any wrong, whereas contrariwise Amalek was cursed, and enleſſe warre decreed against him: but hereof more elsewhere, Chap. 8. §. 3. Of Ismaels eldest sonne Naboth sprung the Arabians, called Nabatheis. Now euen as Abraham befought God to bleſſe Ismael, so it pleased him both to promise and performe it. For of him those twelve Princes came, which inhabited, in effect, all that Tract of Land betwene Hanilah vpon Tigris, and Sur which is the West part of the Desert of Arabia Petraea. Yet howsoever the strength of these later named Nations, which descended from Abraham, were great; it is not vnlikely, but that some reason which moued them not to fauour the entrance of the Israelites into Canaan, was in respect of feare: because all Princes and States doe not willingly permit any stranger or powerfull Nation to enter their Territories. Wherefore, though all these Families before named, were not so vnited, in and among themselves, but that they had their ieaousies of each other, and contended for dominion: yet fearing a third more strong than themselves, whether they stood apart or vnited, they were taught by the care of their owne preservation, to ioyne themselves together against Israel: though they did it nothing so maliciously and resolutely as the Canaanites did. For the Edumians onely denied the Hebrewes a passage: which the Moabites durst not deny: because their Countrey lay more open; and because themselves had lately beene beaten out of the richest part of their Dominions, by the Amorites; and as for the Ammonites, their Countrey lay altogether out of the way, and the strength of Sehon and Og Kings of the Amorites, was interiaent: and besides that, the border of the Ammonites was strong, by reason of the mountains which diuided it from Baſan. Again, that which moued the Moabites in their owne reason not much to interrupt Israel, in the conquest of Sehon the Amorite, and of Og his confederate, was that the Moabites might hope after such time as the Amorites were beaten by Moses, that themselves might recouer againe their owne inheritance: to wit, the Vallies and Plaines lying betwene the mountains of Arabia and Jordan: But as soone as Sehon was slaine, and that the King of Moab, Balac, perceived that Moses allotted that valley to the Tribes of Gad and Ruben, he began to practise with Balaam against Israel, and by the daughters of Midian as aforeſaid, to allure them to Idolatry: and thus at the length the Moabites by speciall occasion were more and more stirred vp to enmity against Israel. And as for diuers of the rest that were defended from Abrahams kindred, we may note, how in the beginning, betwene the Authors of their Petigrees, God permitted some enmities to be as it were preſages of future quarrels, which in the posterity might be the easier incensed, by the memory of old grudges: and withall by some disſaine from the elder in nature to the younger. For the Ismaelites being descended from the eldest sonne of Abraham, and the Edomites from the eldest sonne of Isaac, Jacob, being but a second sonne, of a second brother; those Princes which were descended of the elder Houses, being naturall men might ſcorne to giue place, much lesse to ſubiect themselves to their inferiours, as they tooke it: and for a more aggravation, the issues of Eſau Princes of Edumaea, might keepe in record that their Parent was bought out of his birth-right by Jacobs taking his aduantage, and that he was deceived of his fathers blessing also by him: and that Jacob after reconciliation came not vnto him as he promised, into Seir or Idumaea.

So also in the posterity of Ismael, it might remaine as a seed or pretence of enmity, that their fore-father was by the infatigation of Sara, cast out into the Desert, with his mother Hagar; and had therein perished, but that it pleased God by his Angell to relieue them. Ismael also had an Egyptian both to his mother and to his wife: and Amalec was also an Horite by his mother: which Horites were of the ancient Canaanites. The Edumians also, or Edomites, were by their Maternall line descended of the Canaanites. For Eſau tooke two wiues of that Nation: one of them was Adath, the daughter of Elon, the Hittite; and the other Abolihamah, the grand-child of Ziboen the Heuite, Lord of Seir, before the same was conquered by Eſau, and called after his name, Edom, or Edumaea.

Lastly, it appeareth that all those Families of the Ismaelites, Amalekites, Moabites, Ammonites, Edomites, &c. were in proceſſe of time corrupted, and drawne from the knowledge and worship of God, and became Idolaters, infected and seduced by the conuersation of those people among whom they dwelt, and by those wiues of the Canaanites which they had married: only a few of the Kenites and those Madianites, which inhabited on the edge of the Red Sea, whereof Iethro was Priest, or Prince, or both, worshipped the true and euer-living God.

Of the Kings of the Canaanites and Madianites, mentioned in the ancient Warrs of the Israelites.

OF the Kings of the Canaanites, descended of Cham, (for Melchizedek may be thought to be of a better Petigree) we finde foure named by Moses: and one and thirty remembred by Iſus; though few of these named, otherwise than by the Cities ouer which they commanded: to which each of them had a small Territory adjoining, and no other Dominion. These Canaanites in a generall consideration are to be vnderſtood for all those Nations, descended of Cham by Canaan, as the Hittites, Iebusites, Amorites, Gergesites, Heuites, &c. and so here we vnderſtand this name in speaking of the Kings of the Canaanites: and so also we call the Countrey of their habitation, the holy Land, or the Land of promise: for God hath appointed that the seven principle Families should be rooted out: and that his owne people should inherit their Lands and Cities. But if we consider of the name and Nation in particular, then is their proper habitation bounded by Jordan, on the East, and by the Mediterranean Sea on the West: in which narrow Countrey, and in the choylest places thereof, those Canaanites which held their Paternall name chiefly inhabited.

20 The first King of these Nations, named in the Scriptures, was Hamor or Hemer, of the Heuites, whom Simeon and Leui slew, together with his sonne Sichem, in reuenge of their sisters rauishment.

Araad was the second King which the Scriptures haue remembred, who had that part of Canaan towards the South, neighbouring Edom and the dead Sea; the same which surprised Israel, as they encamped in the Wildernesse in the edge of Edumaea.

The third named was Sehon King of Eſſebon, who before Moses arrivall had beaten the Moabites out of the West part of Arabia Petraea or Nabathaea, and thrust them ouer Arnon into the Deſerts, the same whom Moses ouerthrew in the plaines of Moab: at which time he tooke Eſſebon, and all the Cities of the Amorites.

30 Preſently after which victory, Og was also slaine by Israel, who commanded the North part of that Valley betwene the Mountains Traconis or Galaad and Jordan, who was also a King of the Amorites.

The fifth was Adonizedek King of the Iebusites, and of Hieruſalem, with whom Iſus nameth foure other Kings.

Hoham, King of Hebron.
Piram, King of Iarmuth.
Japla, King of Lachis: and Deber, King of Eglon, who were all Amorites ouerthrowne in battell by Iſus 10.
Iſus: Adonizedek ouerthrow Iſus nameth Iabin, King of Hazor, and 40 Iobab, King of Madan: whom he also slaughtered, and tooke his Cities: and this Iabin seemed to haue some dominion ouer the rest; for it is said in the Text, For Hazor before times was the head of all those Kingdomes.

After these Adonizedek that notorious Tyrant is named: who conſent that he had cut off the thumbs of the hands and feete of ſeuenty Kings, inforcing them to gather crummes vnder his Table: who, after Inda and Simeon had vied the same execution vpon himselfe, acknowledged it to be a iust reuenge of God: this King was carried to Hieruſalem where he died.

The last King named is Iabin the second, who as it seemeth had rebuilt Hazor, burnt by Iſus. For at such time as he employed Sisara against Israel, whom he oppressed twenty 50 yeeres, after the death of Ehud, He inhabited Hazor. This Iabin, Barac (encouraged by Debara) ouerthrew; and his Captaine Sisara had by Iael, the wife of Heber the Kenite, a nail driven into his head while he slept in her Tent: Iabin himselfe perishing afterward in that warre.

The Madianites had also their Kings at times, but commonly mixt with the Moabites: and they held a corner of Land in Nabathaea: to the South-east of the Dead Sea. They descended from Madian, Abrahams sonne, by Cethura. Raguel surnamed Gethegleus or Le-thes, laith Iosephus, called Iethro in Exodus, Kenis in the first of Judges, the sonne of Dathan, the grand-child of Iexannu, or Iokſam, the great grand-child of Abraham by Cethura, thura, was Priest or Prince of the Midianites by the Red Sea: whose Daughter or Niece, Moses married: and of whom I have spoken elsewhere more at large. This Iethro ~~who were not the same with Hobab~~, must be his father: and this Hobab had leaven daughters. He guided Moses in the wilderness: and became one of the Israelites: of him descended the Kenites, so called of his father Kaguel surname, of which Kenites was Heber, who had peace with Israhel the second, euen now remembered.

At such time as Saul invaded the Amalekites, he knowing the good affection of the Kenites to Israhel, gave them warning to separate themselves: and yet the Kenites had strong faith, and lived in the mountains of the Desert.

The Kings of the Canaanites, and Midianites, and the Amalekites, as many as I find named, were these:

1. Homer the Heite of Sichem
2. Arad of the South parts
3. Sehon of Essebon
4. Og of Basan
5. Adonizedek the Jebusite, King of Hiernsalem
6. Hobab of Hebron
7. Pirax of Jarmuth
8. Iapla of Lachis
9. Debir of Eglon
10. Jabin of Hazor
11. Iobab of Madon
12. Adonibezek of Bezek, and
13. Jabin the second King of Hazor.

Of the Midianites these:

Eni or Enit.

Rekam or Rekem who built Petra the Metropolis of Petra, so called by the Greekes: and by Esai cap. 16. verse 1. and Selah, which is as much as Petra: and so also it is called a Rock 14. 7. where it is also called Iokhael.

1. Zur
2. Hur and
3. Reba
4. Oreb
5. Zeb
6. Zabab
7. Zalmunna.

After the death of Barac, Judge of Israhel, the four last named of these Midianite Kings, vexed Israhel leuen yeeres: till they being put to flight by Gideon, two of them, to wit, Oreb and Zeb, were taken and flaine by the Ephraimites, at the passage of Iordan, as in the 6. 17. and 8. of Judges it is written at large. Afterward in the pursuit of the rest, Gideon himselfe laide hands vpon Zabab and Salmana, or Zalmunna, and executed them, being prisoners, in which expedition of Gideon there perished 120000. of the Midianites and their confederates. Of the Idumeans, Moabites, and Ammonites, I will speake hereafter in the description of their Territories.

§. III.

Of the Amalekites, and Ismaelites.

OF the Kings of the Amalekites and Ismaelites, I finde few that are named; and though of the Ismaelites there were more in number than of the rest (for they were multiplied into a greater Nation, according vnto the promise of God made vnto Abraham) yet the Amalekites, who together with the Midianites were numbered among them, were more renowned in Moses time than the rest of the Ismaelites. So also were they when Saul gouerned Israhel. For Saul pursued them from Sur vnto Hauilah, to wit, ouer a great part of Arabia Petraea, and the Desert. The reason to me seemeth to be this: That the twelue Princes which came of Israhel, were content to leaue those barren Deserts of Arabia Petraea, called Sur, Paran, and Sin, to the issue of Abraham by Cethura, that that ioyned with them (for so seeme the Amalekites to haue been, and so were the Midianites): themselves taking possession of a better Soyle in Arabia the Happy, and about the Mountaines of Galaad in Arabia Petraea. For Nabaioth the eldest of those twelue Princes planted that part of Arabia Petraea, which was very fruitfull though adjoining to the Desert, in which Moses wandered, afterward called Nabathaea: the same which neighbourth Iudea on the East side. They also peopled a Prouince in Arabia the Happy, whereof the people were in after times called Napathai (B) changed into (P).

Kedar, the second of Ismaels sonnes, gaue his own name to the East part of Basan, or Basanea, which was afterward posselt by Manasse, so much thereof as lay within the mountaines Tracani, or Gilead. Which Nation Lampridius calleth Kedarens, & Plinie Cedareans.

Abbeel laye downe in the Desert Arabia, neere the Mountaines which diuide it from the Happy: and gaue nameto the Adubens, which Plotomus calleth Agubens.

Mibsam was the Parent of the Masamaneuses, neere the Mountaine Zamar, in the same Arabia the Happy.

The Rababens were of Mibsam: who ioyned to the Orchens, neere the Arabian gulfe, where Plotomus setteth Zagmais.

Of Duma were the Dumeans, betweene the Adubens and Rababens: where the Citie Dumeth sometimes stood.

Of Massa the Massani, and of Hadar, or Chadar the Athritae, who bordered the Napathans in the same Happy Arabia.

Thema begat the Themaneans, among the Arabian Mountaines, where also the Citie of Thema is seated.

Of Ietur the Itureans, or Chamathens: of whom Tobu was King in Dauids time.

Of Nabhi the Nubian Arabians: inhabiting Syria Zoba: ouer whom Adad & ezor commanded, while Dauid ruled Israhel.

Cadma, the last and twelfth of Ismaels sonnes, was the Ancestor of the Cadmonians: who were afterward called Asite: because they worshipped the Fire with the Babylonians.

The Amalekites gaue their Kings the name of Agag, as the Egyptians the name of Pharaoh to theirs, and the ancient Syrians Adad to theirs, and the Arabian Nabatheans Aretas, as Names of Honour.

The Amalekites were the first that fought with Moses, after he past the Red Sea: when of all times they flourished most, and yet were vanquished.

Afterward they ioyned with the Canaanites, and beate the Israelites neere Cadesbarne. After the gouernment of Othoniel, they ioyned them with the Moabites: after Barac with the Midianites: and invaded Israhel. God commanded that as soone as Israhel had rest, they should roote out the name of the Amalekites: which Saul executed in part, when he wasted them from the border of Egypt, to the border of Caldea: from Hauilah to Shur.

In Dauids time they tooke Siklag in Simcon: but Dauid followed them, and surprised them, recouering his prisoners and spoiles. And yet, after Dauid became King, they againe vexed him, but to their owne losse.

In Ezekias time as many of them as ioyned to Edumaea were wasted and dispianted by the children of Simcon.

§. IIII.

Of the inflammation of Ciuitiy in Europe about these times, and of Prometheus and Atlas.

HERE lived at this time, and in the same age together with Moses, many men exceeding famous, as well in bodily strength, as in all sorts of learning. And as the World was but euen now enriched with the written Law of the liuing God, so did Art and Ciuitiy (bred and fostered farre off in the East, and in Egypt) begin at this time to discouer a passage into Europe, and into those parts of Greece, neighbouring Asia and Iudea. For if Pelagius besides his bodily strength, was chosen King of Arcadia, because he taught those people to erect them simple Cottages, to defend them from raime and storme: and learned them withall to make a kinde of Meale, and bread of Acornes, who beforeliued for the most part, by Hearbes and Rootes: wee may thereby iudge how poore, and wretched those times were, and how falsly those Nations haue vaunted of thole their antiquities, accompanied not onely with ciuill learning, but with all other kinds of knowledge. And it was in this age of the World, as both both Ensebius and Saint Augustine haue obserued, that Prometheus flourished: *Quem propterea seruant deus formasse homines, quia optimus sapientia doctor fuisse perhibetur; Of whom it is reported that he formed men out of clay, because he was an excellent teacher of wisdom: and so Theophrastus expoundeth the inuention of fire ascribed to Prometheus, Ad inuenta sapientia pertinere; To haue reference to wise inuentions: and Aeschylus affirmeth, That by the stealing of Iupiters fire, was meant, that the knowledge of Prometheus reached to the Starres, and other celestiall bodies. Againe, it is written of him, that he had the art so to vse this fire, as therby he gaue life to the Images of Wood, Stone, and Clay: meaning that before his birth and being, those people among whom hee liued, had nothing elie worthy of men, but externall forme and figure. By that fiction of Prometheus, being bound on the top of the Hill Caucasus, his entrailes the while deuoured by an Eagle, was meant the inward care and restless desire he had to inuestigate the Natures, Motions, and Influences of Heauenly bodies; for so it is said: *Ideo altissimum ascendisse Caucasum, ut sereno calo quam longissimè astrâ, signorum obitus & ortus spectaret; That he ascended Caucasus, to the end that he might in a cleere skye discern the settings and risings of the Starres: though Diodorus Siculus expounds it otherwise, and others diuersly.

Of this Mans knowledge Aeschylus gines this testimonie.

*Ast agebant omnia
Visors ferebat: donec ipse repperi
Signorum obitus, ortusq; quimortalibus
Sunt utilis: & multitudinem artium.
His repperi: componere inde literas;
Matremq; Musarum auxi ego Memoriam
Permittem cunctis, &c.*

But Fortune govern'd all their workes, till when I first found out how Starres did set and rise:
A profitable art to mortall men:
And others of like vse I did deuise:
As letters to compose in learned wile
I first did teach: and first did amplifie
The Mother of the Muses Memorie.

Africanus makes Prometheus farre more ancient, and but 94. yeeres after Ogyges. Porphyrius sayes that he liued at once with Inachus, who liued with Isaac.

There liued also at once with Moses, that famous Atlas, brother to Prometheus, both being the sonnes of Iapetus, of whom though it bee said, that they were borne before Moses dayes, and therefore are by others esteemed of a more ancient date: yet the advantage of their long liues gaue them a part of other ages among men, which came into the World long after them. Besides these sonnes of Iapetus, Aeschylus findes two other, to wit, Oceanus and Hesperus, who being famous in the West, gaue name to the Euening, and so to the euening Starre. Also besides this Atlas of Lybia, or Mauritanie, there were others which bare the same name: but of the Lybian, and the brother of Prometheus, it was that those Mountaines which crosse Africa, to the South of Marocco, Sas, and Hera, with the Sea adioyning, tooke name, which memory Plato in Critias bestowes on Atlas, the sonne of Neptune.

Cicero in the fifth of his Tusculan questions affirmeth that all things written of Prometheus and Atlas were but by those names to expresse diuine knowledge. Nec uero Atlas sustinere celum, nec Prometheus affixus Caucasus, nec stellatus Cepheus cum uxore traditur, nisi diuina cognitio nomen eorum ad errorem fabulæ raduxisset; Neither should Atlas be said to beare up Heauen, nor Prometheus to be fastened to Caucasus, nor Cepheus with his wife to be selfed; vntill their diuine knowledge had raised upon their names these erroneous fables.

Orpheus sometime exprest Time by Prometheus, sometime he tooke him for Saturnus, as Alcaeus comix alme Promethen. But that the story of Prometheus was not altogether a fiction:

a fiction: and that he liued about this time, the most approued Historians and Antiquaries, and among them Ensebius and Saint Augustine haue not doubted; For the great iudgement which Atlas had in Astronomy, saith Saint Augustine, were his daughters called by the names of constellations, Pleiades and Hyades: Others attribute vnto him the finding out of the Moones course, of which Archeus the sonne of Orchomenus challengeth the inuention. Of this Archeus Arcadia in Peloponnesus tooke name; and therefore did the Arcadians vaunt that they were more ancient than the Moone: Et Luna gens prior illa fuit: which is to be vnderstood, saith Natalis Comes, before there had been any obseruation of the Moones course: or of her working in inferior bodies. And though there be so that bestow the finding out thereof vpon Endymion: others (as Xenagoras) on Typhon: yet Isaacus Tetzels, a curious searcher of antiquities, gaue it Atlas of Lybia: who besides his gifts of minde, was a man of vnequall and incomparable strength: from whom Thales the Milesian, as it is said, had the ground of his Philosophy.

§. V.

Of Deucalion and Phaeton.

And in this age of the World, and while Moses yet liued, Deucalion reigned in Thessalie, Crotopus then ruling the Argives. This Deucalion was the son of Prometheus, saith Herodotus, Apollonius, Hesiodus, and Strabo. Hesiodus gaue him Pandora for mother, the rest Clymene: Homer in the fifteenth of his Odysses, makes Deucalion the sonne of Minos: but hee must needs haue meant some other Deucalion; for else either Vlysses was mistaken, or Homer, who put the tale into his mouth. For Vlysses after his returne from Troy, faimed himselfe to be the brother of Idomeneus, who was sonne to this later Deucalion, the sonne of Minos: but this Minos liued but one age before Troy was taken: (for Idomeneus serued in that warre) and this Deucalion the sonne of Prometheus, who liued at once with Moses, was long before. In the first Deucalions time happened that great inundation in Thessalie: by which in effect every foule, in those parts, perished, but Deucalion, Pyrrha his wife, and some few others. It is affirmed that at the time of this flood in Thessalie, those people exceeded in all kinde of wickednesse and villany: and as the impiety of men is the forcible attractive of Gods vengeance, so did all that Nation for their foule sinnes perish by waters: as in the time of Noah, the corruption and cruelty of all man kinde drew on them that general destruction by the flood vniuersall. Onely Deucalion, and Pyrrha his wife, whom God spared, were both of them esteemed to be louers of Vertue, of Iustice and of Religion. Of whom Ouid:

*Non illa melior quisquam, nec amantior aequi
Vir fuit: aut illa reuerentior vlla deorum.*

No man was better, nor more iust than he:
Nor any woman godlier than shee.

It is also affirmed that Prometheus fore-told his sonne Deucalion of this ouer-flowing; and aduised him to prouide for his safety: who hereupon prepared himselfe a kinde of Vessell, which Lucian in his Dialogue of Timon calles Cleptum, and others Larnax. And because to these circumstances, they afterward adde the sending out of the Dove, to discover the waters fall and decrease, I should verily thinke that this Story had been but an imitation of Noahs flood deuised by the Greekes, did not the times so much differ, and Saint Augustine with others of the Fathers and reuerent Writers approue this Story of Deucalion. Among other his children Deucalion had these two of note, Hellus of whom Greece had first the name of Hellas, and Melanthis, on whom Neptune is said to haue begot Delphus, which gaue name to Delphes, so renowned among the Heathen for the Oracle of Apollo therein founded.

And that which was no lesse strange and maruailous than this flood, was that great burning and conflagration which about this time also happened vnder Phaeton; nor onely in Ethiopia, but in Libria, a Region in Italy, and about Cuma, and the Mountaines of Vesunius: of both which the Greekes, after their manner, haue inuented many strange fables.

§. VI.

Of Hermes Trismegistus.

BVt of all other which this age brought forth among the Heathen, Mercurius was the most famous, and renowned; the same which was also called Trismegistus, or Ter Maximus, and of the Greekes, Hermes.

Many there were of this name; and how to distinguish, and set them in their owne times, both S. Augustine & Lactantius finde it difficult. For that Mercury which was esteemed the God of Theeues, the God of Wrestlers, of Merchants, and Sea-men, and to the God of Eloquence (though all by one name confounded) was not the same with that Mercury, of whose many works some fragments are now extant.

Cicero, Clement Alexandrinus, Arnobius, and certaine of the Greekes reckon five Mercuries. Of which, two were famous in Egypt, and there worshipped; one, the sonne of Nilus, whose name the Egyptians feared to utter, as the Jewes did their Tetragrammaton; the other, that Mercury, which flew Argus in Greece, and flying into Egypt, is said to have deliuered literature to the Egyptians, and to have giuen them Lawes. But Diodorus affirmeth, that Orpheus, and others after him, brought learning and letters out of Egypt into Greece: which Plato also confirmeth, saying; That letters were not found out by that Mercury which flew Argus, but by that ancient Mercury, otherwise Themet; whom Philosophus writeth Taanitus the Egyptians Thoyth the Alexandrians Thot; & the Greekes (as before) Hermes. And to this Taanitus, Sanconiathe, who liued about the war of Troy giues the inuention of letters. But S. Augustine making two Mercuries, which were both Egyptians, calles neither of them the son of Nilus, nor acknowledgeth either of them to haue slain Argus. For he findes this Mercury the slayer of Argus, to be the grand-child of that Atlas, which liued while Moses was yet young. And yet L. Vines vpon S. Augustine seemes to vnderstand them to be the same with those, whom Cicero, Alexandrinus, and the rest haue remembered. But that coniecture of theirs, that any Græcian Mercury brought letters into Egypt, hath no ground. For it is manifest, (if there be any truth in prophane antiquitie) that all the knowledge which the Greekes had, was transported out of Egypt or Phœnicia, & not out of Greece, nor by any Græcian into Egypt. For they all confesse, that Cadmus brought letters first into Boœtia, either out of Egypt, or out of Phœnicia: it being true, that betweene Mercurius, that liued at once with Moses; and Cadmus, there were these descents cast; Crotopus King of the Argiues, with whom Moses liued, and in whose time about his tenth yeere Moses died; after Crotopus, Sthenelus, who reigned eleuen yeeres; after him Danaus fifty yeeres; after him Linceus: in whose time, and after him in the time of Minos King of Crete, this Cadmus arriued in Boœtia. And therefore it cannot bee true, that any Mercurius about Moses his time, flying out of Greece for the slaughter of Argus, brought literature out of Greece into Egypt. Neither did either of those two Mercuries of Egypt, whom Saint Augustine remembereth, the one the grand-father, the other the Nephew or grand-child, come out of Greece. Eupolemus and Artapanus note, that Moses found out Letters and taught the vie of them to the Jewes; of whom the Phœnicians their neighbors receiued them; & the Greeks of the Phœnicians by Cadmus. But this inuention was also ascribed to Moses; for the reason before remembered; that is, because the Jewes & the Phœnicians had them first from him. For euery Nation gaue vnto those men the honour of first Inuentors, from whom they receiued the profit. Ficinus makes that Mercury, vpon part of whose works hee Commenteth, to haue bene foure descents after Moses; which hee hath out of Virgil, who calles Atlas, that liued with Moses, the maternall grand-father of the first famous Mercury, whom others, as Diogenes, call the Counsellor and Instructor of that renowned Isis, wife of Osiris. But Ficinus is enough no reason for his opinion herein. But that the elder Mercury instructed Isis, Diogenes & Isidorus asseuereth, and that such an inscription was found on a pillar erected on the Tombe of Isis. Lod. Vines vpon the sixe and twentieth Chapter of the eight Booke of Saint Augustine, de Ciuitate Dei, conceiueth, that this Mercury, whose works are extant, was not the first which was entituled Ter maximus; but his Nephew or grand-child, Sanconiathe, an ancient Phœnician, who liued shortly after Moses, hath other fancies of this Mercury; asseuering that he was the Scribe of Saturne, and called by the Phœnicians Taanitus; and by the Egyptians Thot, or Thoyt. It may be, that the many yeeres which he is said to haue liued, to wit, three hundred yeeres, gave occasion to some Writers to finde him in one time, and to others in other times. But by those who haue collected the grounds of the Egyptian Philosophie and Diuinitie, he is found more ancient than Moses; because the Inuentor of the Egyptian wisdom; wherein it is said, that Moses was excellently learned.

It is true, that although this Mercurius or Hermes doth in his Diuinitie differ in many particulars from the Scriptures, especially in the approving of Images, which Moses of all things most detested: yet whosoever shall read him with an euen iudgement, will rather resolue, that these works which are now extant, were by the Greekes and Egyptian Priests corrupted, and those fooleries inserted, than that euer they were by the hand of Hermes written, or by his heart and spirit deuised. For there is no man of vnderstanding, and master of his owne wits, that hath affirmed in one and the same Tract, those things which are directly contrary in doctrine, and in nature: For out of doubt Moses (excepted) there was neuer any man of those elder times that hath attributed more, and in a stile more reuerend and diuine, vnto Almighty God, than hee hath done. And therefore if those his two Treatises, now among vs; the one conuerted by Apuleius, the other by that learned Ficinus, had bene found in all things like themselves: I thinke it had not bene perillous to haue thought with Eupolemus, that this Hermes was Moses himselfe; and that the Egyptian Theologie hereafter written, was deuised by the first, and more ancient Mercurius, which others haue thought to haue bene Joseph, the son of Iacob: whom, after the exposition of Pharaonis dreames, they called Sapientephane, which is as much to say, as absconditorum reperor; A finder out of hidden things. But these are ouer-venturous opinions. For what this man was, it is known to God. Enuy aged time hath partly defaced, and partly worne out the certaine knowledge of him: of whom, whosoever he were, Lactantius writeth in this sort: Hic scripsit libros, & quidem multos, ad cognitionem diuinorum rerum pertinentes, in quibus Mactatem summi ac singularis Dei asserit, & idemque nominibus appellat, quibus nos, Deum & Patrem; Hec hath written many books belonging to, or expressing the knowledge of diuine things, in which he affirmeth the Majesty of the most High and one God, calling him by the same names of God and Father, which wee 30 call: The same Father also seareth not to number him amongst the Sybils and Prophets. And to contrary are these his acknowledgements to those Idolatrous fictions of the Egyptians and Græcians, as for my selfe I am perswaded, that whatsoeuer is found in him contrary thereto, was by corruption inserted. For thus much himselfe confesseth: Deum enim Dominum, & Patrem, fons & vita, potentia & lux, & mens, & spiritus; & omnia in ipso, & sub ipso sunt. Verbum enim ex eiu esse prodiens, perfectissimum existens, & generator & opifex, &c. God (saith he) the Lord and Father of all things, the fountaine, and life, and power, and light, and minde, and spirit: And all things are in him and vnder him. For his word out of himselfe proceeding, most perfect, and generative, and operative, falling vpon fruitfull nature, made it also fruitfull and producing. And hee was therefore (saith 40 Suydas) called Ter maximus, quia de Trinitate loquutus est: in Trinitate vnum esse Deum asserens; Because hee spake of the Trinity, affirming that there is one God in Trinitie: Hic rursus (saith Ficinus) prænedit prius Religionis, licetorum noue fidei, hic aduentum Christi, hic futurum iudicium, resurrectionem seculi, beatorum gloriam, supplicia peccatorum; This 50 Mercurius foresaw the ruine of the old or superstitious Religion, and the birth of the new faith, and of the coming of Christ, the future iudgement, the resurrection, the glory of the blessed, and the torment or affliction of the wicked or damned.

To this I will onely add: his two last speeches reported by Calcidius the Platonist, and by Volterran out of Suydas. Hæcenus filii pulsi a patria, vixi peregrinus & exal, nunc incolumis repleto: cumq; post paulum a vobis corporeis vinculis absolutus discessero, videtote me 50 quasi mortuum legeatis: Nam ad illam optimam beatamq; Cinitatem regredior, ad quam vniuersi cives mortis conditione venturi sunt. And when I shall after a few dayes (or in a short time) by being loosed from these bonds of flesh and blood depart from you, see that you doe not bewaile me as a man dead, for I doe but returne to that best and blessed Citie, to which all her Citizens (by the condition of death) shall repaire. Therein is the only God, the most high and chiefe Prince, who filleth or feedeth his Citizens with sweetnesse more than O beatus, & non uise worke of the great God, and thee O voyce of the Father, which he first uttered, when he framed the whole world, by his only begotten word, and Spirit, comprehending all things. Hanc mercy vpon me.*

But Soydas hath his inuocation in those words: Obsecro seculum magni Dei sapientis opus, obsecro te vocem Patris quam loquutus est primam, cum omnem mundum firmavit, obsecro te per vniuersum sermonem omnia continens, propitius, propitius esto, I beseech thee O heauen, wise worke of the great God, I beseech thee O voyce of the Father, which he spake first when he established all the world, I beseech thee by the only begotten Word containing all things, be favourable, be favourable.

§. VII.

Of Iannes and Iambres, and some other that liued about those times.

L. Vines. in l. 8.
August. de Civ.
Dei. cap. 16.

Here were also in this age both Asculapius, which after his death became the God of Physicians, being the brother of Mercurius, as Vines thinks in his Commentary vpon Augustine, de Ciuitate Dei. lib. 8. and also those two notorious Sorcerers, Iannes and Iambres, who in that impious art excelled all that euer had been heard of to this day: and yet Moses himselfe doth not charge them with any familiar with Diuels, or ill Spirits: words indeed that seldome came out of his mouth; howeuer by the Septuagint they are called sophista or Penefici and Incantatores, Sophists Poysoners and Incantaters: by Hierome, Sapientes & malefici; Wise men, and euill doers: and so by Platinius, who also vseth the word Magi. The Greeke it selfe seemes to attribute somewhat of what they did to naturall Magick: calling them, operantes, workers by drugs. The Genetian, Sorcerers and Incantaters: Iunius, Sapientes; præstigiatores & Magi. Magicians and Wife men here by him are taken in one sense: and Præstigiatores are such as dazzle mens eyes, and make them seeme to see what they see not: as false colours, and false shapes. But as some vertues and some vices are so nicely distinguished, and so resembling each other, as they are often confounded, and the one taken for the other: (Religion and Superstition hauing one face and countenance) so did the workes and workings of Moses, and of Pharaos Sorcerers appeare in outward shew, and to the beholders of common capacities, to be one and the same art and gift of knowledge. For the Diuell changeth himselfe into an Angel of light: and imitateth in all he can the waies and workings of the most High. And yet on the contrary euery worke which surmounteth the wisdom of most men, is not to be condemned, as performed by the helpe or ministry of ill Spirits. For the properties and powers which God hath giuen to naturall things, are such as where he also bestoweth the knowledge to vnderstand their hidden and best vertues, many things by them are brought to passe, which seeme altogether impossible, and aboue nature or art: which two speculations of workes of nature, and of miracle, the Cabbalists distinguished by these names; Opus de Deo, & opus de mercana: the one they call Sapientiam nature; The Wisdom of nature: the other Sapientiam diuinitatis; The Wisdom of diuinity: the one Iacob practised in breeding the pied Lambes in Mesopotamia, the other Moses exercised in his miracles wrought in Egypt, hauing receiued from God the knowledge of the one in the highest perfection, to wit, the knowledge of nature: of the other so farre as it pleased God to proportion him, both which he vied to his glory that gaue them: assuming to himselfe nothing at all, either in the least or most. Also Saint Augustine noteth, that from the time that Moses left Egypt, to the death of Isaia, diuers other famous men liued in the World, who after their deaths for their eminent vertues and inuentions, were numbred among the Gods: as Dionysius, otherwise Liber Pater, who taught the Grecians the vse of the Vine in Attica: at which time also there were instituted Musickall playes to Apello Delphicus: thereby to regaine his fauour, who brought barrenesse and scarcity vpon that part of Greece, because they refused not the attempts of Damianus, who spoiled his Temple and set it on fire: so did Erithonius imitate the like games to Minerva: wherein the Victor was rewarded with a present of Oyle, in memory of her that first prest it out of the Oliue.

In this age also Xanthus rauished Europa: and begat on her Radamantus, Sarpedon and Minos, which three are also giuen to Iupiter by other Historians. To these Saint Augustine addeth Hercules; the same to whom the twelue labours are ascribed, natue of Syrinthis a City of Peloponnesus: for as others say, only nuried and brought vp there) who came into Italy, and destroyed many Monsters there; being neither that Hercules, which Eusebius surnameth Delphin, famous in Phœnicia; nor that Hercules, according to Philistratus, which came to Gades, whom he calleth an Egyptian: Manifestum est, non Thebanum Hercules, sed Ægyptium ad Gades peruenisse, & ibi finem statuisse terra (saith Philistratus) It is manifest that it was the Egyptian Hercules, and not the Theban, which traualled as farre as the streights of Gades, and there determined the bounds of the earth. In this time also while Moses wandered in the Deserts, Dardanius built Dardania.

But whoso euer they were, or how worthy fouer they were that liued in the dayes and age of Moses, there was neuer any man, that was no more than man, by whom it pleased God to worke greater things; whom he fauoured more, to whom (according to the appearing of an infinite God) he so often appeared; neuer any man more familiar and conuersant with Angels; neuer any more learned both in Diuine and Humane knowledge; neuer a greater Prophet in Israel. He was the first that receiued and deliuered the Law of God entire; the first that left to posterity by letters, the truth and power of one infinite God; his creating out of nothing the World vniuersall, and all the creatures therein; that taught the detestation of Idolatry, and the punishment, vengeance, and eradication, which followed.

Syracides calleth Moses the beloued of God and Men, whose remembrance is blessed. Hee made him (saith the same Author) like to the glorious Saints; and magnified him by the feare of his enemies, made him glorious in the sight of Kings, shewed him his glory, caused him to heare his voyce, sanctified him with faithfullnesse and meekenesse, and chose him out of all men.

Hee is remembered among prophane Authōrs; as by Clearchus the Peripateticke by Megasthenes, and Numenius the Pythagorian. The long liues which the Patriarchs enioyed before the flood, remembered by Moses, Esiens, Hieronymus Egyptius, Hecataus, Elanicus, Ariflanus, Ephorus and Alexander the Historian, confirme. The vniuersall flood which God reuealed vnto Moses, Berosus, Nicolaus Damascenus, and others haue testified. The building of the Tower of Babel, and confusion of tongues, Abydenus, Esiens, and Sybilis haue appoued. Berosus also honoureth Abraham. Hecataus wrote a Booke of him. Damascenus before cited, speaketh of Abrahams passage from Damascus into Canaan, agreeing with the Bookes of Moses. Eupolemon writeth the very fame of Abraham, which Moses did. For beginning with the building of Babel, and the ouerthrow thereof by diuine power, he saith that Abraham, borne in the tenth generation, in the City called Camerind, 40 or Vrien, excelled all men in wisdom: and by whom the Astrologie of the Caldeans was inuented. Is istius pietateq; sua (saith Eusebius out of the same Author) sic Deo gratus fuit, ut diuino precepto in Phœnicem venerit, ibiq; habitauerit; Per huius pietate et pietate he was so pleasing vnto God, as by his commandment he came into Phœnicia, and dwelt there. Likewise Diadorus Siculus, in his second Booke and fift Chapter, speaketh recently of Moses: There are many other among prophane Authors, which doe confirme the Bookes of Moses, as Eusebius hath gathered in the ninth of his Preparation to the Gospel. Chapter the third and fourth, to whom I referre the Reader. Lastly, I cannot but for some things in it commend this notable testimony of Strabo, who writeth of Moses in these words. Moses enim affirmans, docebatq; Ægyptios non redde sentire, qui bestiarum & pecorum imagines Deo tribuerunt: itemq; Afros & Græcos, qui Djs hominum figuram assignerunt: id verò solum esse Deum, quod nos & terram & mare continet, quod caelum & mundum & rerum omnium naturam appellamus: cuius profecto imaginem, nemo sane mentis, alicuius earum rerum, quæ penes nos sunt, similem audeat effingere. Proinde (omni simulachrorum effusione repudiata) dignum est Templum ac Delubrum constitutendum, ac sine aliqua figura colendum. Moses affirmed and taught, that the Egyptians thought amisse, which attributed vnto God the Images of beasts and cattell: Also that the Affricans and Greekes greatly erred in giuing vnto their Gods the shapes of men: whereas that only is God indeed, which containeth both vs, the Earth and Sea, which we call Heauen, the World, and the nature of all things, whose image,

image, doubtlesse, no wife man will dare to fashion out vnto the likenes of those things, which are amongst vs: That therefore (all deuising of Idols cast aside) a worthy Temple and place of prayer was to be erected vnto him, and he to be worshipped without any figure at all therein.

All. 7. v. 21.

Now concerning the Egyptian wisdome, for which the Martyr Stephen commended Moses, saying, That Moses was learned in all the wisdome of the Egyptians, and was mighty in his works and words: the fame is corrected (how truly I know not) by Diodorus, Diogenes, Laertius, Iamblicus Philo Iudeus, and Eusebius Caesariensis, and diuided into foure parts, viz. Mathematicall, Naturall, Diuine, and Morall.

In the Mathematicall part, which is distinguished into Geometrie, Astronomie, Arithmetick, and Musick; the ancient Egyptians excelled all others. For Geometrie which is by interpretation measuring of grounds, was vnto them: because it consisting of infallible principles, directed them certainly in bounding out their proper Lands, and Territories, when their fields and limits, by the inundations of Nilus, were yeerely overflowne and confounded, so as no man could know what in right belonged vnto him.

For the second part, to wit, Astronomie, the site of the Country being a lencell and spacious Plaine, free and cleere from the clouds, yielded them delight with ease, in observing and contemplating the risings, fallings, and motions of the Starres.

Arithmetick also, which is the knowledge of numbers, they studied; because without it, in Geometrie and Astronomie, nothing can be demonstrated or concluded. But of Musick they made no other account, nor desired farthar knowledge, than seemed to them sufficient to serue and magnifie their Gods, their Kings, and good Men.

The Naturall part of this Wisdome, which handleth the principles, causes, elements, and operations of naturall things, differs little from Peripateticall Philosophie; teaching, that Materia prima is the beginning of all things; that of it all mixt bodies & liuing creatures haue their being; that Heauen is round like a Globe, that all Starres haue a certain fouent heate, and temperate influences, whereby all things grow and are produced; that raines proceed and be from mutations in the ayre; that the Planets haue their proper foules, &c.

The Diuine part of this wisdome, which is called Theologie, teacheth and beleueth that the world had a beginning, and shall perish; that men had their first originall in Egypt; partly by meanes of the temperatenesse of that Country, where neither Winter with cold, nor Summer with heate are offensive; and partly through the fertility, that Nilus giueth in those places; That the soule is immortal, and hath transmigration from body to body; That God is one, the Father and Prince of all Gods; and that from this God, other Gods are, as the Sunne and Moone, whom they worshipped by the names of Osiris and Isis, and erected to them Temples, Statues, and diuers Images, because the true similitudes of the Gods is not known; that many of the Gods haue bene in the estate of mortall men, and after death, for their vertues, and benefites bestowed on mankind, haue bene Deified; that those beasts, whose Images and formes the Kings did carrie in their Armes, when they obtained victory, were adored for Gods: because vnder those Ensignes they prevailed ouer their enemies. Moreouer the Egyptian Diuines had a peculiar kinde of writing, mysticall and secret, wherein the highest points of their Religion and worship of God, which was to be concealed from the vulgar sort, were obscured.

Clem. Strom. 1.

Clement distributed the whole summe of this later Egyptian learning into three seuerall sorts, viz. Epistolary, which is vsed in writing common Epistles; Secratorie, which is peculiar to their Priests; and Sacred, which Sacred contained Scripture of two kinds: the one proper, which it expressed by letters Alphabetically in obscure and figurative words; as for example, where it is written: The Hur by the Horne participateth the beauty of the Hawke; which is read thus: The Moone doth by the Sunne borrow so part of the light of God: because Light is an Image of Diuine beauty; the other symbolically, or by signatures, which is threefold, viz. Imitatiue, Tropically, and Anygmaticall: Imitatiue, which designeth things by characters, like to the things signified, as by a Circle the Sun; and by the Hornes of the Moone, the Moone it selfe: Tropically or transferent, which applies the diuers formes and figures of naturall bodies or creatures, to signifie the dignities, fortunes, conditions, vertues, vices, affections, and actions of their Gods, and of men. So with the Egyptian Diuines, the Image of an Hawke signifieth God, the figure of the Horne signifieth the Sunne, the picture of the Bird Ibu signifieth the Moone: by by the forme of a Man, Prudence and Skilfulnesse: by a Lion, Fortitude: by a Horse, Libertie: by a Crocodile, Impudency: by a Fish, Hatred is to be vnderstood: Anygmaticall is a composition or mixture of Images or Similitudes: in which sense, the monstrous Image of a Lions body hauing a Mans head, was grauen on their Temples and Altars, to signifie, that to men all giuinceth are Anygmaticall and obscure. So the Image of the Sun set on the head of a Crocodile, (which liueth aswell in the Waters, as on Land) expresseth that the Sun nourisheth Meteors in the Aire, aswell from the Waters as from the Earth. So a Scepter, at the top wherof is made an Eye, and an Eare, signifieth God, Hearing, Seeing, and gouerning all things. The Scythians are thought to haue been delighted with this kinde of writing. For Phereides Syrius reporteth, That when Darius sending letters, threatned Idanthura, King of the Scythians, with ruine & destruction of his Kingdome, unless he would acknowledge subiection: Idanthura returned to him a Moule, a Frog, a Bird, a Dart, and a Ploughshare: which Orontopates, Tribune of the Souldiers, interpreted to signifie, that by the moule, their dwellings: by the Frog, their waters: by the Bird, their ayre: by the Dart, their weapons: by the Plough, their landes: were signified to bee ready to be deliuered to Darius, as their Soueraigne Lord. But Xyphodes made another construction, viz. that the King meant, That except Darius with his men did hasten away, as a Bird through the Ayre, or creep into holes as a moule, or runne into the waters which they had passed as a Frog, they should not escape his armes, but either be slaine, or being made Captiues; Till his groundes. The same History is with little difference reported by Herodotus.

Herod. 1. 4

The fourth and last part, which is Morall and Politique, doth containe especially the Lawes, which (according to Laertius) Mercurius Trifinegius, or Ter Maximus devised: who in his Bookes or Dialogues of Vimander & Aclepius, hath written for many things of God, worthy of admiration; aswell (saith Sixtus Senensis) of the Trinity, and of the coming of Christ, as of the last and fearefull day of Iudgement: that (as saith the same Author, the opinion being also ancient) he is not onely to be accounted a Philosopher, but a Prophet of things to come.

Iamblicus in his Bookes of Mysteries of the Egyptians, taking two very ancient Historians for his Authors, to wit, Seleucus & Menatus, affirmeth that this Mercury was not onely the Inuenter of the Egyptian Philosophy, but of all other learning, called the Wisdome of the Egyptians before remembred: and that he wrote of that subiect 365. Books, or Pages. Of which there were numbered, of Fiery Spirits, one hundred Bookes, of Aerall Spirits as many, and of Spirits Celestiall a thousand; which because they were out of the Egyptians language conuerted by certaine learned Philosophers into the naturall Græcke, they seemed to haue bene first written in that Tongue. Clement Alexandrinus writeth, that among the Bookes of Hermes, to wit, of the Wisdome of the Egyptians, there were extant in his time 36. of Physick sixe Bookes; of the orders of Priests ten; and of Astrology foure.

Clem. Strom. 1. 6.

§. VIII.

A Brieue of the History of Iosua; and of the space between him and Othoniel: and of the remainders of the Canaanites; with a note of some Contemporaries to Iosua: and of the breach of Faith.

AFTER the death of Moses, and in the one and fortieth yeere of the Egression, in the first moneth called Nisan, or March, Iosua the son of Nun, of the Tribe of Ephraim, being filled with the Spirit of wisdome, tooke on him the gouernment of Israel: God giuing him comfort, and encouraging him to passe the Riuer of Iordan, and to possesse, and diuide among the Israelites the Land promised.

The beginning of Iosua's rule, Saint Augustine dates with the raigne of Amyntus, the eighth King in Affrya; with Corax the sixteenth King in Sicyonia, when Danaus gouerned the Argines; and Erichonius, Athens.

Lib. 18. de ci. nit. 1. 11.

Iosua imitating in all things his Predecessor, sent ouer Iordan certaine discoverers to view the seate and strength of Ierico, the next City vnto him on the other side of the Riuer, which hee was to passe ouer. Which discoverers being laued, and sent back by Rahab, a woman of ill fame, because she kept a Tauerne or Yiding-house, made Iosua know that the inhabitants of Ierico, and those of the Country about it, hearing of the approach

Iof. 2. 11. of Israel, had lost courage. Whereupon the day after the returne of the Spies, which was the sixth day of the one and fortieth yeere after the Egression, Iofua remoued from Sitim in the plaines of Moab, and drew down his Army to the bankes of the Riuer Iordan; and gaue them commandement to put themselves in order to follow the Arke of God, when the Leuites tooke it vp, and moued towards the Riuer; giuing them withall this forcible encouragement, That they should thereby assure themselves of his fauour and preſence who is Lord of all the world, when the Riuer of Iordan should be cut off and diuided, and the waters comming from aboue should stand still in a heape, whereby those below towards the Dead Sea wanting supply, they might passe ouer into the land of Canaan with dry feet.

Iof. 1. 11. Hee also commanded Reuben, Gad, and the halfe Tribe of Manasse, to prepare themselves (according to their Couenant made with Moses) to march in the head of the rest, and as we call it in this age, to leade in the Vanguard, which through all the Deserts of Arabia, from the Mount Sinai to this place, those of the Tribe of Iuda had performed. For these Tribes being already prouided of their habitations, and Countrie and Cities of the Amorites, by the helpe of the rest, conquered for them: It agreed with iustice and equalitye, that Reuben, Gad, and the halfe of Manasse should also assist their brethren in the obtaining of their parts, as yet in their enemies possession.

Iof. 4. 19. On the bankes of Iordan they rested themselves from the sixth day to the ninth; and on the tenth day of the first moneth Nisan, or March, they past ouer to the other side, taking with them twelue stones from the drie ground in the middelt of the Riuer: which, for a memory of that miracle by God wrought, they set vp at Gilgal, on the East side of the Citie of Ierico, where they encamped the first night. At which place Iofua gaue commandement, that all born in the last fortieth yeere in the Deserts should be circumcised, which ceremonie to that day had bene omitted. Of the neglect wherof S. Augustine giueth for cause, The peoples contempt of their superiours, Thomas excuseth it in this sort; That the Israelites knew not the certaine time of their remouing from one place to another: Damascen, That it was not needfull by circumcision to distinguish them from other Nations, at such time as they liued by themselves, and a-part from all Nations.

Iof. 5. 10. On the fourteenth day of the same Moneth, the children of Israel celebrated the Passover now the third time; first, at their leauing Egypt; secondly, at Mount Sinai; and now at Gilgal. After which being desirous to taste of the fruits of the Countrie, and hauing, as it were, surfeited on Man, they parched of the Corne of the land, being not yet fully ripe, and ate thereof.

Iof. 14. 3. And as Moses began to distribute those Regions beyond Iordan, to wit, the Lands of the Amorites, which Og of Basan, and Sehon held, so did Iofua performe the rest; and after a view and partition made of the Territories, hee gaue to each Tribe his portion by lot. But this partition and distribution was not done at once, but at three severall times; first, by Moses to Gad, Reuben, and the halfe Tribe of Manasse, of the Lands ouer Iordan; secondly, by Iofua, to the Tribe of Iuda, Ephraim, and the other halfe Tribe of Manasse, about the fift yeere of his government; proued in the 14. of Iofua, v. 10. and a third diuision was made to the other seuen Tribes, at Shilo, where Iofua feared the Tabernacle of the Congregation.

Iof. 18. The victories of Iofua against the Kings of the Canaanites, are so particularly set down in his own bookes, as I shall not need to lengthen this part by their repetition. In whose storie I chiefly note these particulars. First, how in the beginning of the warre, those little Kings or Regnuli of the Canaanites, had not so much vnderstanding, as to vnite themselves together against the Israelites; but according to the custome of those estates, from whose Governours God hath taken away all wisdome and fore-sight, they left those of their owne Nation, which were next the invaders, to themselves, and to their owne defences; hoping that the fire kindled somewhat farre off, might againe haue been quenched, ere it could spread it selfe so farre as their owne Territories and Cities. But after such time as Ierico and Ai were entred, and the Kings, People, and Cities consumed; sue of those 31. Kings, all which at length perished in that warre, ioyned themselves together, first attempting the Gibeonites, who had rendred themselves to Iofua. Onely sue (the rest looking on to the successe, namely, the King of the Iebusites, in Iebus, or Hierusalem, the Kings of Hebron, Jarmoth, Lachis, & Eglon), addrest themselves for resistance: whose Armie being by Iofua surprisid and broken, themselves despairing to escape by flight, flight, and hopelesse of mercy by submission, creeping into a Caue vader ground, were thence by Iofua drawne forth and hanged. In the prosecution of which victory hee also tooke Makkedah, and Libnah, and Lachis. To the reliefe wherof Hiram King of Gezar hastened, and perished. After which Iofua posselt himselfe of Eglon, Hebron, and Debir, destroying the Cities with their Princes.

In the end, and when the South Countreies were posselt, the Cities thereof conquered, and their Kings and People made dust: the rest of the Canaanites, guided by the over-late counsailes of necessity, vnited themselves, to make one grosse strength and body of an Armie: which Iabin, King of Hazor, praetised and gathered together, by Iofua discovered, as the same rested neere the Lake of Merom, he vsed such diligence, as he came on them vnwarres, and obtaining absolute victory ouer them, he prosecuted the same to the utmost effect. And, besides the slaughter of the defendants, he entred their Cities, of which he burnt Hazor only, reseruing the rest for Israel to inhabite and enioy.

Secondly, I note, that Iofua shewed himselfe a skillfull man of Warre, for that in those ancient times he vsed the stratagem of an ambush in taking of AI; and in that hee broke the Armies of the first fise Kings of the Amorites, which attempted Gibeon by surpris. For hee marched all night from his campe at Gilgal, and set on them early the next day; when he ouerthrew Iabin and his confederates. After which, making the best profit of his victory, he assaulted the great Citie of Hazor.

Thirdly, the miracles which God wrought during this warre, were exceeding admirable; as the stay of the Riuer Iordan at the Springs, so as the Armie of Israel past it with a drie foote; the fall of Ierico by the found of the Hornes; the shewes of Haile-stones, which fell vpon the Amorites in their flight from Gibeon, whereby more of them perished than by the sword of Iofua: againe, the arrest of the Sunne in the firmament, whereby the day was so much the more lightened, as the Israelites had time to execute all those which fled after the ouerthrow: a wonder of wonders, and a worke only proper to the all-powerfull God.

Fourthly, out of the passage betweene Iofua and the Gibeonites, the Doctrine of keeping Faith is so plainly and excellently taught, as it taketh away all euasion, it admitteth no imposition, nor leaueth open any hole or out-let at all to that cunning perfidiousnes, and horrible deceit of this latter age, called Equivocation. For, notwithstanding that these Gibeonites were a people of the Leuites, expressly and by name, by the commandement of God to be rooted out, and notwithstanding that they were liars, and deceiuers, and counterfeiters; and that they did ouer-reach, and as it were, deride Iofua, and the Princes of Israel, by faining to bee sent as Embassadors from a farre Countrie, in which trauaile their clothes were worne, their bread mouldie, which they auowed to haue been warme for newnesse when they first set it out; their barrs and bottels of wine broken; their shoes parcht; and their sacks rent and ragged: Yet Iofua hauing sworn vnto them by the Lord God of Israel, hee durst not, though urged by the multitude of the people, to laye violent hands on them; but hee spared both their Liues, and the Cities of their inheritance.

Now if euer man had warrant to breake Faith, and to retract his promise made, Iofua had it. For first, the commandement which hee receiued from God to roote out this Nation among the rest, preceded by farre the peace which he had granted them. Secondly, he might iustly haue put these men to the sword, and haue sackt their Cities; if there be any euasion from a promise made, wherof the liuing God is called to witness. For it was not to the Gibeonites hee gaue peace, because hee knew them to be a people hated of God. He told them, that if they were of the Heuteis, it was not in his power to make a league with them. But it was to a strange people that he gaue faith, & to a Nation which so came from farre, who hearing of the wonders which the God of Israel had done in Egypt and ouer Iordan, sought for peace and protection from his people. Thirdly, the accord, which Israel made with these crafty Canaanites, was without warrant. For it is written in the same place, That the Israelites accepted their tale, that is, beleueed what they had said, and counsailed not with the mouth of the Lord. Fourthly, these men who were knowne Idolaters, and serued those Puppets of the Heathen, men of an Apish Religion, as all Worshippers of Images are, could not challenge the witness of the true God, in whom they beleueed not. I say therefore, that if euer man might haue serued himselfe by any euasion or distinction, Iofua might iustly haue done it. For hee needed not not in this case the helpe of Aquino or Mentall Reservation. For what he swaer, he swaer in good Faith; but he swaer nothing, nor made any promise at all to the Gibeonites. And yet, to the end that the faithlesse subtiltie of man should borrow nothing in the future from his example, who knowing well, that the promises hee made in the name of God, were made to the liuing God, and not to the dying Man, hee held them firme, and inuiolable, notwithstanding that they, to whom he had sworne it, were worshippers of the Deuill.

For it is not, as faithlesse men take it, that he which sweareth to a Man, to a Societie, to a State, or to a King, and sweareth by the name of the liuing Lord, and in his presence, That this promise (if it bee broken) is broken to a man, to a Societie, to a State, or to a Prince; but the promise in the name of God made, is broken to God. It is God, that we therein neglect: we therein professe that we feare him not, and that we set him at naught and despise him. If he that without Reservation of honour giueth a lie in the presence of the King, or of his Superiour, doth in point of Honour giue the lie to the King himselfe, or to his Superiour; how much more doth he breake Faith with God, that giueth Faith in the presence of God, promisseth in his name, and makes him a witness of the Couenant made?

Out of doubt, it is a fearefull thing for a Sonne to breake the Promise, Will, or Deed of the Father; for a State, or Kingdome, to breake those Contracts which haue beene made in former times, and confirmed by publike faith. For though it were 400 yeeres after Iosua, that Saul, euen out of deuotion, slaughtered some of those people descended of the Gibeonites: yet God, who forgot not what the Predecessors and Fore-fathers of Saul and the Israelites had sworne in his name, afflicted the whole Nation with a consuming famine; and could not be appeased, till seven of Sauls Sonnes were deliuered to the Gibeonites grieued, and by them hanged vp.

And certainly, if it be permitted by the helpe of a ridiculous distinction, or by a God-mocking equiuocation, to sweare one thing by the name of the liuing God, and to reserve in silence a contrary intent: the life of man, the estates of men, the faith of Subjects to Kings, of Seruants to their Masters, of Vassals to their Lords, of Wives to their Husbands, and of Children to their Parents, and of all trials of right, will not only be made vncertaine, but all the chaines wherby free men are tied in the world, be torne asunder. It is by oath (when Kings and Armies cannot passe) that we enter into the Cities of our enemies, and into their Armies: it is by oath that warres take end, which weapons cannot end. And what is it or ought it to be that makes an oath thus powerfull, but this; That he that sweareth by the name of God, doth assure others that his words are true, as the Lord of all the World is true whom he calleth for a witness, and in whose presence he that taketh the oath hath promised: I am not ignorant of their poore euasions, which play with the severity of Gods commandements in this kinde: But this indeed is the best answer, That hee breakes no faith, that hath none to breake. For whosoeuer hath faith and the feare of God, dares not doe it.

The Christians in the Holy Land when they were at the greatest, and had brought the Caliph of Egypt to pay them tribute, did not onely lose it againe, but were soone after beaten out of the Holy Land it selfe: by reason faith William of Tyre, a reuerend Bishop which wrote that storie) that Americk the fiftieth King after Godfrey brake faith with the Caliph Elhadech, and his Vicegerent. The Soldan Samar, who being suddenly invaded by Americk, drew in the Turke Syracon to their aide: whose Nephew Seladine, after he had made Egypt his owne, beat the Christians out of the Holy Land; neither would the wooden Crosse (the very Crosse, say they, that Christ died on) giue them victorie ouer Seladine, when they brought it into the field as their last refuge: seeing they had forsworne themselves in his name, that was crucified thereon: And if it be a direction from the holy Ghost, That he that speaketh lies shall be destroyed, and that the mouth which uttereth them, slayeth the soule: how much more perillous is it (if any perill be greater than to destroy the soule) to sweare a lie? It was Eugenius the Pope, that perswaded, or rather commanded the King of Hungarie after his great victory ouer Amurath the Turk, & when the said King had compelled him to peace, the most aduantageous that euer was made for the Christians, to breake his Faith, and to prouoke the Turke to renew the warre. And though the said King was farre stronger in the field than euer; yet hee lost the battle with 30000 Christians, and his owne life. But I will stay my hand: For this first volume will not hold the repetition of Gods iudgements vpon faith-breakers; bee it against Infidels, Turks, or Christians of diuers Religions. Iudgement it is, that the taking of oathes now-a-dayes, is rather made a matter of custome than of conscience.

It is also very remarkable; That it pleased God to leaue so many Cities of the Canaanites vnconquered by Israel, to scourge and afflict them, by forcing their Idolatrie, and as it is said in the scriptures, To be Thornes in their eyes to proue them, and to teach them to make warre. For these Cities hereafter named did not only remaine in the Canaanites possession all the time of Iosua; but soone after his death the Children of Dan were beaten out of the plaine Countries, and enforced to inhabite the Mountaines, and places of hardest access. And those of Iuda were not able to be Masters of their owne Vallies; because, as it is written in the Judges, I be Canaanites had Chariots of Iron. And those principall Cities which stood on the Sea-side, adioyning vnto Iuda, were still held by the remainder of the Anakims, or Philistines: as Azzah, Gath, Aldod; out of one of which Cities came Goliath, remembered in Samuel.

Neither did the children of Manasse ouer Iordan expell the Geshurites, nor the Maacharites: which inhabited the North parts of Basam, afterward Traconitis.

Nor the Nephthalims possesse themselves of Beth-Demish, nor of Beth-hanab; but they enforced those Canaanites to pay them tribute. Neither did Asher expell the Zidonians, nor those of Acho, or Acon, Athlab, Achizib, Heblah, Aphike, & Rechob, nor enforce them to tribute.

No more could Zabulon enioy Kiron, and Nahol, but received tribute from them.

Also the Canaanites dwelt in Gezer among the Ephraims: and among the children of Manasse, on the yea of Iordan, the Canaanites held Berthean, Taanach, Dor, Ibleam, and Megaddo; yea, Hierusalem it selfe did the Iebusites defend about foure hundred yeeres, euen till *Dan*s time.

Now Iosua liued one hundred and ten yeeres, eightene of which he gouerned Israel, and then changed this life for a better. The time of his rule is not expressed in the Scriptures, which causeth diuers to coniecture diuersly of the continuance. Iosephus giues him fise and twenty yeeres: Seder Ollam Rabbi the Authors of the Hebrew Chronologie eight and twentie; and Massius fixe and twentie: Maimonius cited by Masius, foure and twentie: Iohannes Lucius, seuentee: Caletanus ten: Eusebius giueth him seuen & twentie: and so doth S. Angustin: Melancthon, two and thirtie: Codaman, fixe and twentie. But whereas there passed 480. yeeres from the deliury of Israel out of Egypt, vnto the building of the Temple: it is necessary that wee allow to Iosua onely eightene of them; as finding the rest supplied otherwise, which to mee seemes the most likely, and as I thinke, a well approved opinion.

The same necessity of retaining precisely 480. yeeres from the departure out of Egypt vnto the building of the Temple, continueth of errors, such as haue inserted yeeres betwene Iosua and Othniel, of whom Eusebius findes eight yeeres, to which Arius Montanus adde thirtie; and for which hee giueth his reason in his foure and twentieth and last Chapter vpon Iosua: Ranting reckons it nine yeeres: Bucholzer and Kesfuer but one; Codaman twentie, and Nicphorus no lesse than thre and thirtie: whereas following the sure direction of these 480. yeeres, there can be no void yeeres found betwene Iosua, and Othniel, vnlesse they be taken out of those eightheene ascribed vnto Iosua by the account already specified. The prayes and acts of Iosua are briefly written in the fixe and fortieth Chapter of Ecclusiasticus, where among many other things it is said of him, who was there before him like to him, for he fought the battels of the Lord?

That he wrote the booke called by this name, it was the opinion of Arius Montanus, because it is said in the last Chapter of Ecclusiasticus, And Iosua wrote these words in the booke of the Law of God, which seemeth rather to haue beene meant by the couenant which Iosua made with Israel in Sichem, where they all promised to serue & obey the Lord: which promise Iosua caused to be written in the booke of the Law; and of this opinion were Caletan and Abelensis. Theodoris doth likewise conclude that the booke of Iosua was collected out of an ancient Volume, intitled Abel, remembered by Iosua himselfe; and others, that it was the work of Samar; but whereas Montanus groundeth his opinion vpon these words of the 26. verse, And Iosua wrote these words, &c. this place hath nothing in it to proue it: for when the people had answered Iosua; I the Lord haue God with me, and his voice will obey; it followeth that Iosua made a couenant with the people, and wrote the same in the booke of the Law of God.

There

There liued at once with Iofua, Erichonius in Attica, who taught that Nation to yoke beaſts together, thereby to till the ground with more eaſe and ſpeed : And about the ſame time the ſittie Daughters of Danauſ (as it is ſaid) ſlew the ſittie Sonnes of Aegyptus, all but Lyncus, who ſucceeded Danauſ, if the tale be true. There liued alſo with Iofua, Phoenix, and Cadmus, and neere the end of Iofua's life, Iupiter is ſaid to haue rauifhed Europe the Daughter of Phenix, (afterward married to Aſterius King of Creta) and begot on her Minos, Radamanthus, and Sarpedon. But S. Auguſtine reports this rauifhment to be committed by Xanthus, and yet they are more commonly taken for the Sons of Iupiter. But it may be doubted whether Minos was father to Deucalion, & Deucalion to Idomeneus, who was an old man at the warre of Troy, and Sarpedon was in perſon a young or ſtrong man at the ſame Troian war. And ſo doth Neflor reckon vp in the Councell of the Greeks, Theſeus and Perithous for men of Antiquitie, and of Ages paſt : Minos being yet more ancient than any of theſe. But hereof elſe-where.

CHAP. VII.

Of the Tribes of Iſrael, that were planted in the borders of Phœnicia, with ſundry Stories depending vpon thoſe places.

§. I.

The Proeme to the deſcription of the whole Land of Canaan, with an Expoſition of the name of Syria.

THE ſtory of the Iudges ought to follow that of Iofua, after whom the Common-wealth of the Iewes was gouerned by Kings, of which ſo many of them as ruled the tenn Tribes, ſhall be remembered when we come to the deſcription of Samaria : but becauſe the Land of Canaan, and the borders thereof, were the Stages and Theaters, whereon the greateſt part of the Story paſt, with that which followeth, hath beene acted, I thinke it very pertinent (for the better vnderſtanding of both) to make a Geographical deſcription of thoſe Regions : that all things therein performed by the places knowne, may the better be vnderſtood, and conceiued. To which purpoſe (beſides the addition of the Neighbour Countreys) I haue beſtowed on euery Tribe his proper portion : and doe ſhew what Cities and Places of ſtrength were by the Iewes obtained : and what numbers it pleaſed God to leaue vnconquered ; by whom he might correct and ſcourage them, when vngratefull for his many graces, they at ſundry times forgoat or neglected the Lord of all power, and adored thoſe deafe and dead Idols of the Heathen. Diuina bonitas (ſaith Auguſtine) ideo maxime irascitur in hoc ſeculo, ne irascatur in futuro : & miſericorditer temporalem addibet ſeueritatem, ne eternam iuſte inferat ultionem : The Diuine goodneſſe is eſpecially therefore angry in this world, that it may not be angry in the world to come, and doth mercifully uſe temporall ſeuerity, that it may not iuſtly bring vpon vs eternall vengeance.

To the Cities herein deſcribed, I haue added a ſhort Story of the beginnings and ends of diuers Kingdomes and common-wealthes : and to helpe my kſſe herein, I haue peruſed diuers of the beſt Authors vpon this ſubiect : among whom becauſe I finde ſo great diſagreement in many particulars, I haue rather in ſuch caſes aduentured to follow mine owne reaſon, than to borrow any one of their old patterns.

And becauſe Canaan, with Paleſtina of the Philiftins, and the Lands of Og and Sehon Kings of Baſan, and the Arabian Amorites, were but ſmall Prouinces of Syria : it ſhall be neceſſarie, firſt to diuide and bound the generally, and ſo to defend to this particular, now called the holy Land.

Syria, now Soria, according to the largeſt deſcription, and as it was anciently taken, embraced all thoſe Regions from the Euxine Sea, to the Red Sea : and therefore were the Cappadocians, which look into Pontus, called Leucſyrians or white Syrians. But taking it

ſhorter, and from the coaſt of Cilicia, which is the North border, vnto Idumæa towards the South, Tigris towards the Sunne riſing and the Mediterran Sea Weſtward : it then containeth beſides Babylonia, Chaldaea, Arabia the Deſert, & Arabia Petrea, that Region alſo which the Greeks call Meloſopotamia, the Hebrewes Syria, of the two Riuers, to wit, Tigris and Euphrates, for ſo Aran Nahairajim is expounded : alſo Padan Aram ; that is, Iuſum Syria, becauſe the two Riuers goe along in it as it were in a yoke.

Edeſſa, ſometime Rages, now Rage, was the Metropolis of this Region of Syria. In Syria taken largely, there were many ſmall Prouinces, as Coeleſyria which the Latines call Syria Cœna, becauſe it lay in that fruitfull Valley betweene the Mountaines of Lybanus, and Anrylibanus, in which the famous Cities of Antioch, Laodicea, Apamea, with many others were ſeated. Then Damaſcena, or Syria Lybanica, taking name of the Citie Damaſcus, and the Mountaines of Lybanus, the Regall ſeate of the Adades, the firſt Kings of Syria. Adioyning to it was the Prouince of Sophene, or Syria Soba, Choba, or Zobah : ouer which Adadezer commanded in Salomons time. Then Phœnicia and the people Syraphœnicis : and laſtly Syria Paleſtina bordering Egypt : of which Ptolomie maketh Syda alſo a part : and to that Prouince which Mofes calleth Seir and Edom, Pomponius Melagiueth the name of Syria Iudæa.

§. II.

Of the bounds of the Land of Canaan, and of the promiſes touching this Land.

VE that Land which was anciently Canaan, taketh a part of Phœnicia, and ſtretcheth from behinde Lybanus to the great Deſerts betweene Idumæa and Egypt : bounded by the Mid-land Sea on the Weſt, and the Mountaines of Hermion : Galaad and Arnon towards the Eaſt : the ſame Hills which Strabo calleth Traconi or Tracônitis, and Ptolomie Hippus. The name of Canaan it had from Canaan the ſonne of Cham, & lingua appellata ſuit Canaan ; The language was alſo called Canaan, ſaith Montanus : and after Iſebraa of the Hebrewes : who tooke name from Fieber, the ſonne of Sale, according to S. Auguſtine. But Arim Montanus not ſo well allowing of this derivation, makes it a common name to all thoſe of Noahs Sonnes, which paſt ouer Euphrates towards the Weſt Sea. For the word Heber, ſaith hee, is as much aſtransiens or transmittens, of going ; or paſſing ouer. And becauſe the children of Abraham had for a long time no certaine abiding : therefore as he thinks, they were by the Egyptians called Hebrai, as it were paſſengers, which is alſo the opinion of C. Sigonius, and of Eusebius long before them both. It had alſo the name of Iudæa from Iuda ; and then afterwards intitled the holy Land, becauſe therein our Sauour Chriſt was borne and buried. Now this part of Syria was againe diuided into foure ; namely, into Edom, (otherwiſe Sier, or Edumæa) Galilee, Samaria, and Iudæa. Galilee is double, the ſuperior called Gentium, and the inferior : and that Galilee and Iudæa are diſtinguiſhed, it is plaine in the Euaſgeliſts, though both of them belong to Phœnicia.

Now beſides theſe Prouinces of Phœnicia, and Paleſtina (both which the Riuer of Jordan boundeth ; ſauiug that Phœnicia ſtretcheth a little more Eaſterly towards Damaſcus) that part alſo to the Eaſt of Jordan, and within the Mountaines of Hermion Gilead, and Arnon, otherwiſe Traconi, fell to the poſſeſſion of halfe Manaſſe, Gad, and Reuben, and therefore are accounted a part of Canaan alſo : ſwell becauſe anciently poſſeſt by the Amorites, as for that they were conquered and enioyed by the Iſraelites, which Eaſtermoſt parts are againe diuided into Biſan or Batanea, into Gilead, Moab, Midian, Ammon, and the Territories of the Macbati, Geffari, Argobe, Haſ. They are knowne to the latter Cosmographers by the name of Arabia in generall : and by the names of Tracônitis, Pieria, Batanea, &c. of which I will ſpeake in their proper places.

But where Mofes deſcribeth the Land of Canaan in the tenth of Genefis, hee maketh no mention of the later Prouinces, which fell to Manaſſe, Gad, and Reuben, for theſe be his words, Then the border of the Canaanites was from Zidan, and thou commeſt to Gevar vntill Azzab (which is Gaza) and this was the length of the Countrey North and South : then it followeth in the Text ; And as thou goeſt vnto Sodome and Gomorah, and Admah, and Sebym, euen vnto Laſba : by which words Mofes ſetteth downe the breadth, to wit, from the Dead Sea to the Mediterran. But in Denteronomie it ſeemeth to be far more large : For it is therein written ; All the places whereon the ſole of your feet ſhall tread, ſhall bee yours : Deut. 11. 24.

your coast shall be from the wilderness, and from Libanon, and from the River Perab, unto the uttermost Sea. Now for the length of the Countrie North and South, this description agreeeth with the former: only Libanon is put for Zidon: and the wilderness for Gerar and Azab, which make no difference: but for the breadth and extent East and West, if Perab be taken for Euphrates: then the Land promised stretcheth it selfe both over Arabia Petraea, and the Desert, as farre as the border of Babylon: which the Israelites neuer possessed, nor at any time did so much as invade or attempt. And therefore Radianus doth conceiue, that by the River Perab, was meant Jordan, and not Euphrates: taking light from this place of Iosua: Behold, I haue diuided vnto you by lot these Nations, that remaine to bee an inheritance according to your Tribes: from Jordan with all the Nations that I haue destroyed, euen vnto the great Sea westward.

Radianus Epist.
lib. 1. c. 1. p. 1.

And though it be true that David greatly enlarged the Territorie of the Holy Land: yet as Radianus well noteth, if Perab in the former place be taken for Euphrates: then was it purpur pentes in amicitiam receptus. For David did not at any time enter so farre to the East as Assyria, or Babylonia. Neither doth the not possessing of all these Countries giue advantage to those that would make any irreligious cauil, as touching the promise of God to the Israelites vnperformed: For when both their Kings, Magistrates, and People, fell from his worship and seruice, it pleased him not onely to inclose them within that Territorie, which was for so many people exceeding narrow; but therein and elsewhere to subiect them vnto those Idolatrous Nations, whose false and foolish gods themselves also serued and obeyed. And sure the promise by which the Hebrewes claimed the inheritance of Canaan, and the lasting inioying thereof, to wit, as long as the heuens were aboue the earth, was tied to those conditions, both in the Verses preceding, and subsequence; which the Israelites neuer performed. And therefore they could not hope for other than all mankind could or can expect; who knew that all sorts of comforts from the mercifull goodnesse of God looked for, as well in this life as after it, are no longer to be attended, than while we perseuere in his loue, seruice, and obedience. So in the eighth Verse of the eleuenth of Deuteronomy, the keeping of Gods Commandements was a condition ioyned to the prosperity of Israel. For therein it is written, Therefore shall ye keepe all the Commandements which I command you this day: that ye may be strong, and goe in, and possess the Land, whither ye goe to possess it. Also that you may prolong your dayes in the Land which the Lord swore vnto your Fathers, &c.

Deut. 11. v. 11.

Deut. 11.

The like condition was also annexed to the enioying of the Land conquered, and the possession thereof, so long as the heuens were aboue the earth. For if ye keepe diligently, saith he, all these commandments, which I command you to doe, that is, to loue the Lord your God, &c. then will the Lord cast out all these Nations before you, and ye shall possess great Nations, & mightier than you. And here, though it be manifest, that by reason of the breach of Gods Commandements, and their falling away from the worship of his all-powerfull Miestie, to the Idoltry of the Heathen, the conditionall promises of God were absolutely void, as depending vpon obedience vnperformed: yet I cannot mislike that exposition of Arelanthon: For, saith he, Offendit promissionem praecipuam non esse de hoc Politico regno; sed fuisse quod eius promissio non est de ciuili Regno. To which agrees that answer which S. Hierome made to a certaine Heretique in his Epistle ad Dardanum, who accused S. Hierome: that he quethrew the reputation of the Jewes Storie, & brought the truth thereof in question, by drawing it altogether into an Allegorie, and ad illam distulit ad vineum terram que in cuius est; (that is) Onely to that Land of the living which is Heauen. Quoniam tota Iudaeorum Regio adeo angusta sit ambitu, ut vix longitudo habet 160. milia, latitudo vero 40. & in his ciuitates, loca, urbes & oppida sunt plurima, nunquam Iudaeis occupata, sed tantum diuina pollicitatione promissa; Because the whole Countrey of the Jewes is so narrow in compass, that it scarce hath 160. miles in length, & 40. miles in breadth, and in these are Countreys, places, Cities, & many Townes, which the Jewes neuer possessed, but were onely granted by diuine promise. In like manner the same Father speaketh vpon Esay touching the blessings promised vnto Hierusalem: where hee hath these words: De qua distans Hierusalem nequaquam in Palestina Regione petendam: qui totius Province deterrimus est: & saxa montibus asperatur, & penuriam paritur sitis: ita ut celestibus videretur pluuies, & raritatem fontium istius mundi extrusione solatur: sed in Deo manibus, ad quam dicitur, fessum erunt fructores eius: from whence, saith he, we learne, that Hierusalem is not so to be sought in that region of Palestina, which is the worst of the whole Province, & raised with with craggie Mountaines, and suffereth the penurie of thirst: so as it preserveth raine water, and supplieth the scarcitie of wells by building of Cisternes; but this Hierusalem is in Gods hands, & which it is said, Thy builders haue hastened: so farre S. Hierome, where also to prevent mistaking, he thus expoundeth himselfe. Neg, hoc dico in suffragationem terra Iudae, ut heretici Sycophantam inueniatur: aut quo anseram historia veritatem: qua fundamentum est intelligentie spiritualis, sed ut decusam supercilium Iudeorum: qui Synagoga angustias latitudinis Ecclesie praeferrunt. Si enim occidentem tantum sequuntur literam, & non spiritum viuificantem: offendant terram promissionis lacte & melle manantem; Neiber (saith hee) say I this to disgrace the land of Iudaea (as the Hereticall Sycophant doth belie me) to take away the truth of the Historie, which is the foundation of spiritual vnderstanding, but to beat down the pride of the Jewes, which enlarge the straits of the Synagoga farther than the breadth of the Church: for if they follow onely the killing letter, and not the quickening spirit, let them shew the Land of promise, flowing with milke and honey.

By this it may also be gathered, howeouer it be vnlike (seeing the West-bound in the place, Deut. 11. 24. had his truth in the literall sense, that Euphrates or Perab, which is made the East-bound, should be taken onely in a spiritual sense); yet neuertheless that Hieroms opinion inclineth to this, as if this Perab were not to be vnderstood for Euphrates, and that the promise it selfe was neuer so large: much lesse the plantation and conquest of Israel.

And now for a more particular description of this Holy Land, because After, Nephthaim, and Zabulon, held the Northernmost part, and were seated in Phoenicia, I will begin with these three, taking After for the first: of which Tribe yet before I speake, I must admonish the Reader touching the names of places in this, and the other Tribes to be mentioned, that he remember that many names by reason of the diuers fancies of Translators, are diuersly expressed, so that to the vnskillfull they may seeme diuers, when they are one and the same: the reason of this diuerfity (as by those learned in the Hebrew I am taught) is, partly because the ancient Editions of the Hebrew want vowels, the old Translators imagined other vowels than now the Hebrew Editions haue; and partly because the Ancient expressed or omitted diuers consonants, otherwise than the latter doe so thinke fit.

THE TRIBE OF ASHER.

†. I.

The bounds of the Tribe of Asher.

 He Asherites descended of After the Sonne of Iacob by Zelpha, the handmaid of Lea, were increased while they abode in Egypt, to the number of 41500. and odde persons, all men about twenty yeeres of age, and able to beare armes, at the time when they were mustered by Moses at Mount Sinai: all which number perishing in the Deserts, there remained of their issues, besides women and children 53400. bodies fit for the warres: which past the River of Arnon, into the Plaines of Moab, and after the Conquest of Canaan, had for their portion that part of Phoenicia, from Zidon and the fields of Libanus, vnto Ptolomais Acon alongst the Seacoast: containing thirtie English miles or thereabout: and from the Mid-land sea to the East border some twelue miles: though Antoninus makes it somewhat larger. This part of Canaan was very fruitfull, abounding in Wine, Oyle, and Wheate, besides the Balsamm, with other pleasant and profitable commodities: according to that Prophecie, Asher pinguis panis: Concerning After, his bread shall bee fat: And hee shall giue pleasures for a King.

Q. Curtius make Agenor the founder thereof: and Iustinus derives the name from the abundance of fish found on those shores: whereof it hath beene called Zidona. But that it was farre more ancient, Moses, Isaiah, and Iosephus witness, the same being founded by Zidon the eldest of Canaan's Sonnes: and so strong it was in Isaiah's time, as neither did himselfe attempt it, neither could the Assyrites, or any of their successors master it: but it continued all the time of the Judges and Kings, even unto the coming of Christ, a Citie interchangeably governed, by their owne Princes or other Magistrates: though according to the warnings and threats of the Prophets, Esaie, Jeremie, Ezechiel, and Zacharie, it was often afflicted both by the enemies sword, and by the pestilence.

Zidon is seated on the very wain of the Phenician Sea, which is a part of the Mediterran or Mid-land Sea. It hath to the North the Citie of Berythus, and the River Leontis: and to the South Sarepta, or Sarphat: which standeth betwene it and Tyre, the distance betwene which two great and famous Cities, to wit, Zidon and Tyre, is 14. thousand paces, saith Seigniorius: but Strabo makes it two hundred furlongs, and so doth weissimbrie in his description of the holy Land, and both from Strabo: which two hundred furlongs make five and twentie miles. This difference of distance as well betwene these two knowne Cities, as all the rest, make it over-difficult to devise any new scale to the Mappe and description of the holy Land.

What Kings it had till Agenor's time there is no memorie: The story which Zeno the Philosopher, who was a Zidonian, wrote thereof, being by time consumed and lost. It seemeth to bee more ancient than Tyre, which was also built by the Zidonians. For as Strabo noteth, Homer speaking of Zidon, neglecteth the memorie of Tyre, because it was but a member of Zidon, and a Citie subiect to the Kings thereof: though it be true that in after-times it contended with Zidon for Primacie, and became farre more renowned, opulent, and strong: From Zidon had Salomon and Zorobabel their principall workemen, both in Timber and Stone, for the building of the Temple. For as it flourished in all sorts of learning, so did it in all other Mechanicall Arts or Trades: the Prophet Zacharie calling them the wife Zidonians. The Citie was both by nature & Art exceeding strong, having a Castle or Citadell on the North-side, standing vpon an vnaccessible Rocke, and compassed by the Sea, which after the Citizens became Christians, was held and defended by the Knights of the Dutch Order: and another Castle it hath on the South side by the Port of Egypt, which the Templers guarded. It also had many other Colonies beside that of Tyre, into places remote: as vnto Thebes, and Sephya, Cities of Beotia in Greece. Strabo and Plinie giue the Zidonians the inuention of * Glasse, which they vsed to make of those sands which are taken out of the River Belus, falling into the Mediterran Sea, neere Protonis or Acon: and from whence the Venetians fetch the matter of those cleere Glasses which they make at Aturana: of which S. Hierome and Plinie: Zidon insignis artificum vtri: Zidon vtriusq; officinis Nobilis; Zidon a famous Glassemaker, or a skilfull worker in Glasse houses.

They were in Religion Idolaters (as the rest of the Canaanites) worshippers of Baal, and Astarte: which Idols though common to the other of the issue of Canaan (as Vindex gathers out of 1. Sam. 3. 10. and Iudg. 10. 6.) yet especially and peculiarly were accounted the Gods of the Zidonians: as appears 1. Kings 11. 5. in the story of Salomons Idolatrie: where Astarte is called the God of the Zidonians: and 1. Reg. 16. 33. in the story of Achab, the chiefe worshipper of Baal, where it is said that hee marrying Iezabel the Daughter of the King of the Zidonians, worshipped their Baal. Diuers Baals & diuers Astartes in their Idolatries they acknowledged: as it appears by the plurall names of Baalim and Astartoth, 1. Sam. 12. 10. and elsewhere: for euery the name Astartoth, as I am informed by a skilfull Hebrician, is plural: the singular being Astarte: whence Iudg. 2. 13. the Septuagint reads idolatriam istam adoramus. They worshipped the Astartes. The occasion of this, their multiplying of their Baals, & Astartes, may be diuersly vnderstood: either in respect of the diuersitie of the formes of the Images, or of the worship in diuers places, or of the stories depending vpon them: which (as tables vse to be) were doubtlesse in diuers Cities diuers. Angustine quest. 19. in Iudg. thinks Baal and Astarte to be Iupiter and Iuno. For the Carthaginians (which were Tyrians) call Iuno by such a name as Astarte, Tullie lib. 3. de Nat. D. orum, making diuers Goddesses of the name of Venus, expounds the fourth to bee Astarte: whom hee makes to be borne of Tyris and Syria, and to haue beene the Wife of Adonis: as also Macrobius 2. Saturn. cap. 21. saies that Adonis was with great veneration eneration commonly worshipped of the Assyrians: and Hierome vpon Ezek. 8. 44. notes that Thammuz (whom there the Idolatrous women are noted to bewaile) is the name of Adonis among the Syrians. So that it may seeme that in the worship of Astarte or Venus, they did bewaile her Husband Adonis: as also the Gracians did in their songs of Adonis: Mourne for Adonis the faire, dead is Adonis the faire. Howbeit others in that place of Ezekiel not without good probability, expound the mourning for Thammuz, to be the mourning for Osiris in the sacrifice of Isis: whose losse of her Husband Osiris, was as famous in the Egyptian Idolatrie, as with the Grecians, Venus losse of Adonis. And to this agreeeth that which Plutarch hath, de Iside & Osiride; that Osiris with the Egyptians is called Ammuz: which word may seeme to be the same with Ezekiels Thammuz. But howsoever the Zidonians were thus anciently fostered with the milke of Idolatry: yet they were more apt to receiue the Doctrine and Gospell of Christ after his Ascension, than the Iewes: who had beene taught by Moses and the Prophets so many yeeres, whereof our Sauour in Mathew and Luke: Woe be to thee Corazin, &c. for if the great works which were done in thee, had beene done in Tyris and Zidon, they had repented long agoe, &c. but I say vnto you, it shall be easier for Tyris and Zidon, at the day of Iudgement, than for you.

It receiued a Christian Bishop with the first: who was afterward of the Diocesse of Tyre. But in the yeere of our Redemption 636. it fell into the hands of the Saracens: and continued in their possession till Saladinus the first, then King of Iherusalem: in the yeere 1111. by the helpe of the Danes and Norwaies, who came with a Fleet to visite the holy Land, and tooke Port at Ioppa, it was againe recouered, the commandement thereof being giuen to Eustace Gremer, a Noble man of that Countrey. And againe in the yeere 1250. it was reedified and strengthened by Lothwicke the French King: while hee spent foure yeere in the Warre of the holy Land. Lastly, in the yeere 1289. it was reconquered by the Saracens: and is now in possession of the Turke, and hath the name of Zai.

†. III.

Of Sarepta, with a briefe History of Tyre in the same Coast.

Sarepta, or after the Hebrew, Sarphath, is the next City Southward from Zidon, between it and the River called Naar, or Fons hororum Libani (of which more hereafter) standing in the way towards Tyre, a City very famous for the excellent wine growing neere it: of which Sidonius:

Vina mihi non sunt Gazetica, Chia, Falerna.
Quaę, Sareptano palmitemissa bibis.

I haue no wine of Gaza, nor Falerna wine,
Nor any for the drinking of Sarepta's vine.

This City had also a Bishop, of the Diocesse of Tyre: after it came to the Saracens and Turkes, as the rest: and is now called Saphet, saith Posseilus.

Nor farre from Sarepta was situate that sometime famous City of Tyre, whose fleets of shippes commanded, and gaue the law ouer all the Mediterran Sea, and the borders thereof: during which time of greatnesse and power, the Tyrians erected Vtica, Leptis, and Carthage in Africa, of which Virgil. Vrbis antiqua fuit, Tyry tenneret Coloni, Carthago. Virgil.
Carthage was therefore called Punica quasi Phœni. um, a Colonie of the Phenicians. In 50 Spain they founded Gades, now Calix. In Italie, Nola: in Asia the lesse, Dromos A. chilis, which Citie the Schoolast of Apollonius placeth neere the River Phyllis, in Bythinia.

It had anciently the name of Zor, or Tzor: and so it is written in Isaiah the 19. taking name from the situation, because built on a high Rocke, sharpeat one end. The Latines, as it seems, knew it by the name of Sarra, for Virgil calleth the purple of Tyre, Osrum Sar. ranum, by which name Inuencius and Silius remember it. The Zidonians built it vpon a high hill, whereof many ruines remaine to this day; the place being still knowne by the name of the ancient Tyre: and because it was a Colonie of the Zidonians, the Prophet

Esay calleth it the Daughter of Zidon, which Trogus also confirmeth, though Berosus by affinity of name makes Thirus the sonne of Iaphet to be the Parent thereof: and though no doubt it was very ancient (for so much the Prophet Esay also witnesseth, Is not this your glorious Citie, whose antiquity is of ancient daies?) yet, that Thirus is the sonne of Iaphet set him selfe in the bosome of the Canaanites who built Zidon, and peopled all that Region: I see nothing to perfwade me.

But that new Tyre in after-times so renowned, seemeth to bee the worke of Agenor: and of this opinion was Curtius: and Iosephus, and Eusebius make this City elder than Salomons Temple 240. yeeres: Cedrenus 361. who also addeth that Tyris the wife of Agenor gaue it her name: but of Agenor I will speake more at large in the story of their Kings.

For strength and for the commodity of the harbour, and the better to receiue Trade from all places, it was in this new erection founded in an Island, 700. paces from the continent; and therefore Ezekiel placeth it in the midst of the Sea, as some read, or as others in the inner-most part of the Sea, whence he calleth it situate at the entry of the Sea, as also the same Prophet calleth it the Mart of the people for many Iles: and Esay, a Mart of the Nations: and so Proude, Wealthy, and Magnificent was this City, as the Prophet Esay calleth the Merchants thereof Princes, and their Chapmen the Nobles of the World.

It excelled both in learning, and in manu-facture: especially in the making and dying of Purple, and Scarlet-cloth: which, saith Iulius Pollux, was first found out by Hercules Dogge, who passing along the Sea-coast, and eating of the Fish Conchilis or Purpura: the haire of his lippes became of that colour. It worshipped the same Idols that Zidon did: sauing that Hercules became their Patron in after-times. For Alexander Macedon, when the Tyrians presented him with a Crowne of gold, and other gifts, desiring to remaine his friends and allies, answered them, that he had vowed a sacrifice to Hercules, the Defender of their City, and the Ancestor of the Macedonians Kings: and must therefore enter it. Whereupon they sent him word, that Hercules his Temple was in the Mountaine of old Tyre: where he might performe that ceremony. But this auailed not: For Alexander was not so superstitious, as ambitious; he desired to enter the Towne, which being denied, he as one whom no perill could feare, nor labour weary, gathered together as many ships as he could, and brought from Libanus so great a number of Cedars, and so many weighty stones, from the old City of Tyre adioyning, as notwithstanding that his materials were often washt away with the strength of the Sea and the Tydes, yet he neuer rested, till hee had made a foote passage from the Continent to the Island: and hauing once approached their Walls, he ouer-topt them with Turrets of wood, and other frames: from whence (hauing filled the body of force with the violent mouing spirit of resolution) he became Lord thereof, putting all to the Sword that resisted; after which, he cauled 2000. more to be hung vp in a ranke all alongst the Sea-shore: which execution vpon cold blood hee performed (as some Authours affirme) vpon the illues of those slaues which had formerly laine all their Masters, taking their Wiues, Children, Riches, and power of Gouernement to themselves. This victory of Alexander ouer the Tyrians, Iosephus remembreth: and how Sanaballat revolted from Darius, and came to Alexander with 8000. Souldiers: who was the last Satrapa or Prouinciall Gouernour, which Darius seated in Samaria: the same who hauing married his Daughter to Manasse, brother to Iaddus the high Priest of Hierusalem, obtained of Alexander that a Temple might be built on the Mountaine Garrim ouer Samaria: that the forces of the Iewes being diuided, Alexander might the better hold them in obedience. The honour of which Priesthood hee bestowed on his son in law Manasse, whom the Iewes oppugned, for that he had married out of their Tribes, and with a Gentile: but while Alexander besieged Gaza, Sanaballat, whom Guil. Tyrius calleth Santibula, died.

Long before this desolation of Tyre by the cruelty of Alexander, it was attempted by Salmanassar the Assyrian King: when the growing pride of the Assyrians, after that they had conquered the ten Tribes, with the rest of Syria, became enuious of the beauty, riches, and power of that City. He besieged it both on the Land-side, and with three-score shippes of Warre held the Port: to the end that neither any victuals nor any supply of men might enter it: but the Tyrians with twelue saile scattered that fleet, and tooke 500. prisoners of the Assyrians: notwithstanding, the Assyrian continued his resolution, and lay before before it by his Lieutenants sixe yeeres, but with ill successe. And this siege Menander Euphrates, cited by Iosephus, made report of in his Chronicles, as hee found the Story among the Annals of the Tyrians (which the said Menander conuerted into Greece), adding, that Elulams, whom Tyrius calleth Heliams, was then King of Tyre, hauing gouerned the same sixe and twenty yeeres. Soone after this repulse of Salmanassar, and about 200. yeeres before the victory of Alexander, Nabuchodonosor at such time as he destroyed Hierusalem with the Temple, came before this City: who indeed gaue to Alexander the example of that despairfull worke, of ioyning it to the Continent. For Nabuchodonosor had formerly done it: though by the diligence of the Citizens, and the strength of the Sea, the same cawley and passage was againe broken downe, and demolished.

Against Nabuchodonosor, for many yeeres, the Tyrians defended themselves: for so long did those Babylonians continue before it, As every head was made bald, and every shoulder made bare, saith Ezekiel, who with the Prophet Esay had manifestly foretold the destruction of this proude place. In the end and after thirteene yeeres siege or more, the Tyrians despoiled of all their hopes, and remembering ouer-late the predictions and threatnings of Gods Prophets, hauing prepared a convenient number of shippes, abandoned their City, transporting with themselves the ablest of all that remained: and with their wiues, children, and portable riches, sayled thence into Cyprus, Carthage, and other Maritime Cities of their Tributaries, or Confederates: so as the Babylonians finding nothing 20 therein, either to satisfie so many labours and perils, or any person vpon whom to auenge themselves for the losse of so many bodies in that Warre: it pleased God in recompence thereof, (who strengthened this resolution, as in worke of his owne) to make Nabuchodonosor victorious ouer the Egyptians: and gaue him that Kingdome and the spoile thereof, as it were in wages for his Army. Whereupon Saint Hierome noteth, that God leaue not the good deeds of the Heathen vnrwarded: who though they cannot hope by any laudable worldly action, to attaine vnto that eternall happinesse reserved for his Seruants and Saints: yet such is the boundlesse goodnesse of God, as he often repayeth them with many worldly gifts and temporall blessings.

Now of this enterprise of Nabuchodonosor against Tyre, prophane Historians haue 30 not bene silent. For both Diodorus and Philostratus (as Iosephus citeth them) the one in his second Booke, the other in his Phanician Histories, remember it.

After these two great Vasslations by the Kings of Babylon and Macedon: this City of Tyre repaired and recovered it selfe againe: and continued in great glory about 300. yeeres, cuento the coming of our Saviour Christ: and after him flourished in the Christian Faith neere 600. yeeres: the Archbishop whereof gaue place to none but to the Patriarke of Hierusalem onely, who within his owne Diocese and fouretene great Cities, with their Bishops and suffragans: namely Caipha, otherwise Porphyria, Acon, or Ptolomais, Sarepta, Zi- 40 don, Casarea, Philippi, Berytus, Syblus, Botrys, Trispolis, Orthosia, Archis, Aradus, Antaradus, Tortosa, and Maraclea. But in the yeere 636. it was with the rest of that beautifull Region of Phanicia and Palesina, subiected to the cruell and faithlesse Saracens. Vnder the burthen and yoke of whose tyranny it suffered, with the other Palesine Cities, 488. yeeres.

In the yeere 1112. it was attempted by Baldwine King of Hierusalem; but in vaine: yet in the yeere 1124. by Guaremonde, Patriarke of Hierusalem, Vicegerent to Baldwine the second, with the assistance of the Venetians, and their fleet of Gallies, it was againe recovered, and subiected to the Kings of Hierusalem, and so it remained 165. yeeres.

Finally, in the yeere 1189. Saladine hauing first taken Hierusalem, remoued his whole Army and sate downe before Tyre: drawing his fleet of shippes and Gallies from Alexandria into the Port, this City at then onely remaining in the Christian power.

50 The Citizens finding themselves reduced into great famine, and many other miseries, they at once with certaine rafters of timber, fiered, burnt, and brake the Saracens fleet, and sallied out resolutely vpon his Army, slew so great numbers of them, and followed their victory with such fury, as that the Saracens forsaking their Trenches and Tents, remoued in great disorder and dishonour. Two yeeres after which victory the body of that famous Fredrick Barbarossa (who by the lamentable accident of following the Christians enemies ouer a Riuer vnsafordably perished by the weight of his armour therein) was brought and interred in the Cathedrall Church of Tyre, neere vnto that glorious Sepulchre of Origen, garnished and graven with guile pillars of Marble, 940. yeeres before before therein buried : but in the yeere 1289. the Saracens againe attempted it, and carried it, and it now remaineth subiect to the Turkes.

Of Ptolomais or Acon.

The third City alongst the coast of the Sea, which the Asserites could not obtaine, on the South bound of Asfer was Acho, which was the ancient name thereof after Hierome, though other good Authours affirme that it tooke name from Acon the brother of Ptolomy. Plinie calleth it Ace : and otherwise the Colonie of Claudius. It had also the name of Coth, or Cod, and by Zeiglerus it is called Hapipos.

But lastly, it was intituled Ptolomais after the name of one of the Egyptian Ptolomies : which City also as it is, 1 Mac. 11. another of the Ptolomies, infideliously wrested from his sonne in law Alexander, which called himselfe the sonne of Antiochus Epiphanes : the same Alexander having married Cleopatra daughter of the said Ptolomie not long before. Therein also was Jonathan Machabees treacherously surprisid and slaine, as it is 1 Mac. 12. 48. by the perfidiouse of Tryphon, whom soone after Antiochus pursued, as it is in the Story ensuing : and by like reason about the same time was the afore said Alexander in the warre against Demetrius, one of the sonnes of Antiochus the great with whom Ptolomie joyned, overthrowne & treacherously murdered by Zabdiel the Arabian : to whom he fled for succour : and his head presented vnto his father in law Ptolomie : who enioyed not the glory of his victory and treason about three dayes, for God stricke him by death.

For the beauty and strength of this City, this Alexander made it his regall seate; two parts of the same being inuironed by the Sea, and the port for safety and capacity not inferior to any other in all that Tract. This Citie is distant from Hierusalem some foure and thirty miles : foure miles to the North from the Mountaine Carmel, and as much to the South from Castrum Lambertii : from Tyre, Antonius maketh it two and thirty Italian miles. In the midst of the City there was a Tower of great strength, sometime the Temple of Belzebub : and therefore called the Cattle of Flies, on the top whereof there was maintained a perpetuall light, like vnto that called Pharos in Egypt : to giue comfort in the night to those shippes, which came nere and fought that part. It had in it a Bishops seate, of the Diocesse of Tyre, after it became Christian : but in the yeere 636. (a fatal yeere to the Christians in those parts) it was forced and taken by Haumaris the Saracen. In the yeere 1104. it was regained by Baldwin the first, by the helpe of the Gallies of Genoa : to whom a third of the renew was giuen in recompence. Again, in the yeere of our Lord God, one thousand one hundred fourescore and feuen, Saladin King of Egypt, and Syria, became Lord thereof. In the yeere of Christ, one thousand one hundred and one, by Richard King of England, and Philip King of France, it was recovered, and redelivered to the Christians. Lastly, in the yeere 1291. it was by the fury of the Saracens besieged with an Army of 150000. entred, sackt, and vnterly demolished : though in some sort afterward reedified, and it is now Turkish.

Of the Castle of Saint George.

Six miles from Ptolomais towards the East, is the Castle of Saint George seated, in which he was borne : the Valley adioyning bearing the same name. And though for the credit of Saint Georges killing the Dragon, I leaue euery man to his owne beliefe : yet I cannot but thinke, that if the Kings of England had not some probable record of that his memorabile act, among many others : it was strange that the Order full of Honour, which Edward the third founded, and which his Successours royally haue continued, should haue borne his name, seeing the World had not that scarcity of Saints in those dayes, as that the English were diuen to make such an erection vpon a fable, or person fained. The place is described by Adrichomius in his description of Asfer, to haue bene in the fieldes of Libanus : betweene the Riuer Adonis, and Zidon : his owne words are these :

these : Hoc loco qui ab incolis Cappadocia appellatur, non longe à Beryte, memorant inelytum Christi Adiletem D. Georgium, Regis filium ab immanissimo Dracone asseruisse : eamq. matrat a bestia parenti restituisse. In cuius rei memoriam Ecclesia postmodum suis edificata : in this place, which by the inhabitants is called Cappadocia, not far from Berytus, men say that the famous Knight of Christ, Saint George, did rescue the Kings Daughter from a huge Dragon, and hauing killed the beast, deliuered the Virgin to her Parent. In memory of which deed a Church was after built there : Thus farre Adrichomius. His Authours he citeth Lodouicus Roman, Patrie. Navigationum l. 1. c. 3. and Bridenbach Itin. 5. The Valley vnder this Castle sometime called Asfer, was afterward called the Valley of Saint George. If this authority suffice not, we may rather make the Story allegorically, figuring the victory of Christ, than except of George the Arrian Bishop, mentioned by Am. Marcellinus.

Of Acziba, Sandalium, and others.

Betweene Ptolomais and Tyre alongst the Sea coast, was the strong City of Acziba, or Achazib, which Saint Hierome calleth Achziph, and Iosephus Ecdippas, Plinie Ecdippa, one of those which defended it selfe against the Asserites. Belserest findes Acziba and Sandalium, or the Cattle of Alexander to be one, but I know not whence he had it.

The twelue searchers of the Land which Moses sent from Cadesbarne, trauielled as far to the North as Roob, or Rechob, in the Tribe of Asfer, which Rechob, as also Berotha which by Ezekiel cap. 47. verse 16. is placed in these North borders, belonged in Dauids, 10f. Bell. Iud. time to the King Hadarbezzer, as it may be gathered out of the second of Samuel the 8. chapand 8. verse, and cap. 10. verse 6. and it defended it selfe against the Asserites, as Zidon, Tyre, Achziph, Ptolomais, Alab, Helbah, and Aphck did.

This Aphck it was, whose wall falling downe, slew feuen and twenty thousand of Benhadads Souldiers, after that a hundred thousand had bene slaughtered by the Israelites, vnder the conduct of Ahab. Here Iunius findes that the Philistims encamped a little before the battaile at Gilboa, though in his note vpon the first of Samuel, the 9. and 1. he takes Aphck there mentioned (at which battaile the Arke was taken) to haue bene in Iuda. which 10f. 15. and 3. and in the second of Kings 13. 17. he reade, Fortiter, for, in Aphck. Where others conuert it, Percutiens Syros in Aphck.

The next place alongst the coast is Sandalium, first called Schandalium of Schander, which we call Alexander, for Alexander Macedon built it, when he besieged Tyre : and set it on a point of Land which extendeth it selfe into the Sea, betweene Acziba and Tyre : which Castle Baldwin the first rebuilt and fortified, in the yeere of Christ 1157. when he vndertooke the recovery of Tyre.

Not much about a mile from this Castle, there ariseth that most plentiful Spring of water, which Salomon remembreth, called the Well of living waters : from whence not onely all the fields and plaines about Tyre are made fruitful by large pipes hence drawn : but the same Spring, which hath not about a bow-shot of ground to trauiell till it recover the Sea, drieth sixe great Milles in that short passage, saith Brocard.

Within the Land, and to the east of Acziba, and Sandalium, standeth Hofa : and beyond it, vnder the Mountaines of Tyre, the City of Achaph, or Axab, or after Saint Hierome Aclap, a City of great strength, whose King amongst the rest was slaine by Iosua, at the waters of Merom.

†. VII.

Of Thoron, Giscala, and some other places.

Further into the Land towards Iordan, was seated the Castle of Thoron, which Hugh de Sancto Abdemare built on the Easter-most Hills of Tyre, in the yeere 1107. thereby to restrain the excursions of the Saracens, while they held Tyre against the Christians : the place adioyning being very fruitfull, and exceeding pleasant. From this Castle the Lords of Thoron, famous in the Story of the Warres for the recovery of the Holy Land, deriue their names, and take their Nobility. It had in it a curious Chappell, dedicated to the blessed Virgin, in which Hunfrey of Thoron, Constable to Baldwin the 3. King of Hierusalem, lyeth buried : There were five Castles besides this within the Territory of Asfer : where whereof four are seated almost of equal distance from each other: to wit, Castrum, Lami, Montfort, Indin (or Saron) Castrum Regium and Belfort; the first neere the Sea vnder the Hills of Saron: the next three, to wit, Indin, Montfort, and Regium, stand more within the Land, and belonged to the Brotherhood and fellowship of the Tentonici, or Dutch Knights, by which they defended themselves, and gaue succour to other Christians at such time as the Saracens possessed the best part of the vpper Galilee: the chiefe of which Order was in Ptolomies Achon. The first fortresse was for beaury and strength called Belfort, seated in the high ground vpon the Riuer Naar, neere the Cicie Rama: of which in this Tribe Isa. 9. 2. 9. for which the Vulgar reade Horma: making the article a part of the word, and mistaking the vowels: from the siege of this Cattle of Belfort, the 10 great Saladine King of Syria and Egypt, was by the Christians Army raised, and with great losse and dishonour repulsed.

To the East of Belfort, is the strong City of Alab (or Achlab) which Saint Hierome calleth Chabal, one of those that defended themselves against Affer, as Roob (or Rechob) not farre thence did.

Towards the South from Roob they place Gabala (which Herod surnamed the Afcalone rebuilt making it of the Territory of Chabal, Quod Syrorum lingua dispicere significat (saith Wessenberg) so called, because Hiram of Tyre was ill pleased with those twenty Cities, seated hereabout, which Salomon presented vnto him in recompence of those provisions sent him for the building of the Temple. Others think this Chabal (or Cabul) containing a circuit of those twenty Cities given to Hiram, to haue bene without the compass of the holy Land: though bordering Asher on the North side: as it is said, 1 Reg. 9. 11. That they were in Regione limitis: that is, in limite Regionis, in the border of the Countrey: for it was not lawfull, say they, to giue to strangers any part of the possessions allotted to the Israelites: howsoever, that after Hiram had refused them, they were peopled by the Israelites, it appeares, 2 Chron. 8. 14. And it seemes they were conquered by Dauid from the Syri Rechabae, whose City Roob, or Rechob, was in these parts.

Almost of equal distance from the Cattle of Thoron, they place the Cities of Giscala, and Gadara: of which Gadara is rather to be placed ouer Iordan: Giscala was made famous by Iohn the sonne of Lui, who from a meane estate gathering together foure hundred Talukes, greatly troubled all the vpper Galilee: at such time as the Romans attempted the conquest of Iudea: by whose practice Iosephus, who then commanded in the vpper Galilee, was greatly endangered: whereof himselfe hath written at large, in his second Booke of those Warres. This Iohn betraying in all hee could the City of Giscala (where of he was native) to the Roman State: and finding a resistance in the City, gaue opportunity, during the contention, to the Tyrians and Gadarims, to surprize it: who at the same time fort it, and burnt it to the ground: but being by Iosephus authority rebuilt, it was afterwards rendered to Titus by composition. They finde also the Cities of Cana Maior, and Cades, (or Cadella) of the first was that Syro-phoenician, whose Daughter Christ delivered of the quill Spirit. Nere the other, they say, it was that touching Achab who overthrow the Army of Demetrius.

There are besides these shewnamed Cities within the Tribe of Affer, diuers others: as on the South border, and neere the Sea, Mcfall, or Misheal: within the Land, Befara, Berbedagon, and Bethmea, standing on the South border betwene Asher and Zabulon: on the North side keeping in by Phoenicia, is the City of Cheshlon, or Cheshlon, the vtmost of the holy Land that way: vnder which towards the Sea is Chali, and then Enoch supposed to be built by Cain, and named of his sonne Enoch, but without probability, as I haue formerly proued. There are others also besides these, as Ammon or Chammon, of which Isa. 19. 2. 8. where also we reade of Nehiel, Rama, Alamelec, and Beton: the Cities of Alcah, or Chelcah, Haddon, and Rechob, and Misheal, which we haue already mentioned, were by the Afferines giuen to the Leuites. Of others held by the Canaanites, mention is made, Iudg. 11. 30. to which two of Isa. 11. we may adde Babod, Amishad, and others, on which the most dependeth: and therefore I will not press the description with them.

Of the Riuer and Mountaines of Affer.

He Riuer to the North of Affer are Amnis, after ward Caul, to which Ziegler ioyneth Lycus, Ptolomy, Leontis: both which fall into the Sea neere Berytus, which Riuer of Leontis, Montanus drawes neere vnto Zidon: finding his head notwithstanding, where Ptolomy doth betwene Zidon and Tyre. It hath also a Riuer called Phos hororum Libani, which Adrichome out of Archeard intireth Eleutherus: for which he al- so citeth Plinie, and the first of Machabees the 11. Chapter, but neither of those authorities proue Eleutherus to be in Affer: for this Riuer falleth into the Sea at the Ile of Arados: not farre from Balanea, witnesseth Ptolomie: and therefore PINERUS calleth it Palania, and Postellus Velana: which Riuer boundeth Phenicia on the North-side: to which Strabo also agreeth: but this principall Riuer of Affer, Arius Montanus calleth Gabus. Christianus Cbrout out of the mouth and Papers of Peter Laifan (which Laifan in this our age both viewed and described the Holy Land) calleth the maine Riuer: Phos hororum Libani: and one of the streames which runneth into it from the North-side, Naar, and another from the South-west Chabal: of the City adioyning of the same name: for Eleutherus it cannot be. There is also another Riuer described by Adrichome, named Iephael, which I finde in no other Author; and for which he citeth the nineteenth of Isa. 17. but the word Ghe which is added there to Iephael, is not taken for a Riuer, but for a Valley: and for a Valley the Vulgar, the Geneua, and Arius Montanus turne it. There is also found in Affer, the Riuer of Belus, remembered by Iosephus and Tacitus, which is also called Pagidas, saith Plinie: out of the sands of this Riuer are made the best Glasse, which sometime the Zidanians practised: and now the Venetians at Murana. Arius Montanus makes Belus to be a branch of Chedunim, which it cannot be: for Belus is knowne to flow from out the Lake Cendena, as all Cosmographers, both Ancient and Moderne, and the later Trauailers into these parts, witnesseth. It is true that the Riuer of Chifan taketh water from Chedunim: but not in that fashion which Montanus hath described it: neither doth it find the Sea at Ptolomais 30 Acra, according to Montanus: but farther to the south betwene Caiphas and Sicaminum, witnesseth Ziegler, Adrichomius, and Schnor.

Besides these Riuer there are diuers famous Springs and Fountaines, as that of living waters adioyning to Tyre: and Maferophos, or after Saint Hierome, Maferophotamus, whose Well filled by the flood of the Sea adioyning, (they say) the Inhabitants by seething the water make salt thereof, as at Nantwich.

The Mountaines which bound Affer on the North, are those of Anti-libanus, which with Libanus bound Calisyrta: two great ledges of Hills, which from the Sea of Phenicia and Syria, extend themselves farre into the Land East-ward: foure hundred stadia or furlongs according to Strabo: for that length he giueth to the Valley of Calisyrta: which those Mountaines inclose: but Plinie giues them 1500. furlongs in length from the West (where they begin at Thiophalon, or Desfacies, neere Tripolis) to the Mountaines of Arabia beyond Damascus: where Anti-libanus turneth towards the South. These ledges where they begin to part Tracosis and Bafan, from the Desert Arabia, are called Herman: which Moses also nameth Sion, the Phoenicians Syrian, and the Amorites Samir, neither is this any one Mountain apart: but a continuation of Hills: which running farther fourtherly, is in the Scriptures called Galaad or Gilead: the same being still a part of Libanus, as the Prophet Hieremy proueth: Galaad tu mihi caput Libani: noting that this Galaad is the highest of those Hills of Libanus. Strabo knowes them by the name of Tracosis: and Ptolomie by Hippus. Arius Montanus calleth these Mountaines bordering Affer, Libanus, for Anti-libanus, contrary to all other Cosmographers, but he giueth no reason of his opinion.

They take the name of Libanus from their white tops, because according to Tacitus, the highest of them are covered with Snow all the Summer: the Hebrew word Libanos (saith Wessenberg) signifieth whitenesse. Others call them by that name of the Franks, because which those Trees yeeld: because Libani is also the Greeke word for that Gumme.

Niger out of Aphrodisens affirmeth, that on Libanus there falleth a kinde of hony dew, which is by the Sunne congealed into hard Sugar, which the Inhabitants call Sacchar, from whence came the Latine word saccharum.

The Riuer which Libanus bestoweth on the neighbour Regions, are, Chrysorrhoen, Jordan, Eleutheria, Leantes, Lycus, Adonis, Fons hortorum Libani, and others.

The rest of the Mountaines of Affer, are those Hills about Tyre, and the Hills of Saron, both exceeding fruitfull: but those are but of a low stature, compared with Libanus: for from Nebus, or the Mountaine of Abarim in Reuben, Mofes beheld Libanus threescor miles distant.

§. III.

THE TRIBE OF NEPHTALIM.

¶. I.

Of the bounds of Nephtalim, and of Heliopolis, and Abila.

THe next Portion of the Land of Canaan bordering Affer, was the vpper Galilee the greatest part whereof fell to the lot of Nephtalim, the sonne of Iacob by Billa, the hand-maide of Rachel: who while they abode in Egypt, were increased to the number of 53400. persons, able men to beare armes, numbered at Mount Sinai: all which leauing their bodies in the Deserts, there entered the Holy Land of their sonnes 45400. besides Infants, Women, and Children, vnder twenty yeares of age. The Land of Nephtalim tooke beginning on the North part, from the Fountaines of Jordan, and the Hills of Libanus adioyning, as farre South as the Sea of Galilee, bounded on the West by Affer, and on the East and South-east by Jordan.

On the North-side of Libanus, and adioyning to this Territory of Nephtalim, did the Amorites (or Emorites) also inhabit, in which Tract and vnder Libanus, was the City of Heliopolis: which the heighth of the Mountaines adioyning shadowed from the Sunne, the better part of the day. Postellus calls it Balbec; Niger, Marbech, and Leconianus; Beallbeca.

Of this name of Heliopolis, there are two great Cities in Egypt: the first called On, by the Hebrewes, and the Chaldean Paraphrast, otherwise Bethfemes, or after the Latines, Solus oppidum, or Domus Solis; The City of the Sunne: into which, faith Vlpian, Seuerus the Roman Emperour sent a Colonie: the other Geslitis nameth Dealmarchus; and of this name Stephanus also findeth a City in Thrace, and Glycas in Phrygia.

There is also in the same Valley adioyning to Nephtalim, Chalcis, and Abila. Chalcis, of whom the Region towards Palmyrena hath the name of Chalcidica, ouer which Herod, Agrippa, and Brenice the Queene commanded.

Abila also gaue name to the Region adioyning, of which Lysanias the sonne of Herod the elder, became Tetrarch or Gouernour: whereof Ptolomie gaue it the addition of Lysanias, and called it Abila Lysanias. Volaterran names it Aphila, of which he notes that one Diogenes, a famous Sophister, was native, who by Volaterran is intitled Aphileus, not Abileus. After that this City of Abila or Aphila, had receiued the Christian Faith, Prisillinus became the Bishop thereof: slaine afterward by our Brittish Maximus at Treuer. For distinction of this Citie (if it be not the same, as it may be thought to be the same) it is to be remembered, that in the Tribe of Manasse, ioyning vpon the bounds of the Tribe of Nephtalim, there is another City of the same name, sauing that it is written with an (E) for an (I) and called Abela, remembered in the 20. Chapter of the second of Samuel. The same Iosephus calls Abelnachca, and Hierome Bethmachca. In the place of Samuel for distinction sake, it is written Abel Beth-Mahaca, (for belike it was the Towne of Mahaca, the wife of Maacir, the soane of Manasse, the Father of Gilead) in the Chronicles it is called Abel-Maxim. This City Isab belicged: because Seba the sonne of Bichri, who rebelled against Dauid, fled threinto for succour: but a certaine wife woman of the Citie perswading the people to cast Seba his head ouer the wall, Isab retired his Army. The same Citie was afterward taken by the King of Damascus, Bennadad: and after a while by Teglatphalasar.

The word Abel may be expounded, either to signifie bewailing, or a plaine ground; and therefore no maruell that many Townes (with some addition for distinction sake) were thus called: for euen of bewailing, many places tooke name; as Bechim, Iudg. 2. 4. and and so doubtlesse * Abel-Misraim, Gen. 50. 11. and yet Iunius in his notes vpon Numb. 33. 49. thinks that Abel-Sittim was so called, rather by reason of the plaine ground thereunto, in the Land of Moab, and so perhaps Abel-Meholah in the Tribe of Ephraim: the Towne of Elisba the Prophet: also Abel-Vincarum of the Ammonites, whither Iephtha pursued them.

¶. II.
Of Hazor.

IN the Tribe of Nephtalim, was that famous City of Labin, in Iosua's time called Afor (or after the Chaldean Paraphrast, Hazor) by Iosephus, Afora; by Iunius * Charzor: which Laetan names Hefron; the Regall City, and Metropolis of Canaan: seated in the West part of Nephtalim, towards Affer. In this City was that great Renduous, and assembly of those foure and twenty Kings against Iosua: who being all ouerthrowen, slain, and scattered, this their powerfull City was by Iosua taken and burnt to dust. But in processe of time the same being rebuilt by the Canaanites, a second King Labin, 137. yeares after the death of this first Labin, invaded the Israclites: and being ordained of God to punish their Idolatry, he prevailed against them, and held them in a miserable seruitude twenty yeares: till Deborah the Prophetesse ouerthrew Sisera, Labins Lieutenant, and his Army, neere the Mountaine Tabor. This City Salomon restored at such time as hee also reedified Gezar, burnt by Pharao of Egypt, with * Megiddo, Bethoron, and other Cities; but about 260. yeares after, it fell into the hands of Teglatphalasar, King of the Assyrians. It is now, faith Adrichomius, called Antiochia: it was one of the principall Cities of Decapolis. There is another Citie of this name in the Territory of Beniamin, seated on the confines of Ascalon, called the new Hazor, b faith Hierome.

Numb. 34. 8. also in Simoon, Chasir-Susima, of which, 1 Chron. 4. 3. which also is called Chasir-Sufa, and Chasir-Gadde, and lastly Chasir-Saba, another City of Simoon. Ios. 19. 3. 21 Kings 9. b Hieron. loc. Ios. 14. out of Nebem, 11. 33. as it seemes.

¶. II.

Of Casarea Philippi.

THere was also on the border, and within the Territory of Nephtalim, that renowned City of Lais, or Laisch, as Iunius writes it, or Leschen, which City the children of Dan (being strained in their Territory vnder Iuda) invaded and mastered; and gaue it the name of their owne parent Dan: and by that name it is written in Genesis the foureteenth, at which place Abraham surprized Chedorlaomer and his confederates, and followed his victory as farre as Sobab, formerly remembered in the diuision of Syria, otherwise called Suphena. And after the possession of the Danites, it had the ioynt name of Leschem-Dan. weisenburg writes it Lacis, the Geneva Laisch, Iosephus, Dana; Beniamin, Balina; Breidenbach, Belena: but the now Inhabitants know it by the name of Belina to this day: witness Neubrigensis, Tyrius, Volaterranus, Erhardus the Monke, and Postellus: who also taketh this City to be the same, which in Mathew the 15. verse 39. in the Vulgar is called Magedan, for which the Greeke Text hath Magdala in that place, and in Saint Marke speaking of the same story, Dalmanutha. At such time as the children of Dan obtained this place, it seemed that it was either a free City, of the alliance & confederacy of the Zidonians, or else subiect vnto the Kings thereof; for it is written in the eighteenth of Iudges, And there was none to helpe, because Lais was farre from Zidon: and they had no businesse with other men, for it was about thirty English miles from the Mediterranean Sea, and from Zidon.

In after times when these Regions became subiect to the state of Rome, it had the name of Panias, from a Fountaine adioyning so called: and therefore Ptolomie calls it Casarea Panie. Hegesippus calls it Parnium, faith weisenburg: but hee had read it in a corrupt copy: for in Hegesippus set out by Badus, it is written Panemum without an (R): and at such time as Philip the sonne of the elder Herod, brother to Herod, Tetrarch of Galilee, became Gouernour of Traconitis, sometime Basani; this City was by him amplified and fortified; and both to giue memory to his owne name, and to flatter Tiberius Caesar, he called it * Casarea Philippi: and so it became the Metropolis, and head City of Traconitis; and one of the first Cities of Decapolis. And being by Agrippa in the succeeding age greatly adorned: by him in honour of Nero, it was called Neronia, or Neroniada. But as former part of nothing remained with that Emperour, but the memory of his impiety: so in Saint Hieromes time the Citizens remembered their former Panem, and so recalled it, with the Ter-rity adorning by the ancient name. Of this City was that woman whom Christ healed of a bloudy issue, by touching the hemme of his Garment with a constant Faith:

who afterward, as there was a woman of great wealth and ability, being mindfull of Gods goodnesse, and no lesse gratefull for the same, as Eusebius and Nicephorus report, caused two Statues to be cast in pure Copper: the one representing Christ, as neere as it could be moulded: the other made like her selfe, kneeling at his feet, and holding vp her hands towards him. These three mounted vpon two great Bases or Pedestals of the same Metall, which three placed by a Fountaine neere her owne house: both which (saith Eusebius) remained in their first perfection, euen to his owne time: which himselfe had seene, who liued in the Raigne of Constantine the Great. But in the year after Christ 363. that Monster Iulian Apostata, caused that worthy Monument to be cast downe, and defaced: setting vp the like of his owne in the same place: which Image of his was with fire from Heauen broken into fitters: the head, body, and other parts, lundered and scattered, to the great admiration of the people at that time liuing. The truth of this accident is also confirmed by Sozomenus Salaminus, in his first booke and twentieth Chapter.

This City built by the Danites, was neere the ioyning together of those two Rivers, which arising from the springs of Ior and Dan, the two apparant Fountaines of Jordan, in a foyle exceeding fruitful, and pleasant; for, as it is written, Iudges 18. it is a place which doth want nothing that is in the world. In the fields belonging to this Citie it was that Saint Peter acknowledged Christ to be the Sonne of God: whereupon it was answered, Tu es Petrus, & super hanc Petram, &c. After this City receiued the Christian faith, it was honoured with a Bishops seate: and it ranne the same fortune with the rest, for it was after taken and retaken by the Saracens, and Christians: vnder Fulch the fourth King of Hierusalem, and after the death of Gosfrey of Bullion, the King of Damascus wrested it from the Christians; and shortly after by them againe it was recovered. Lastly, now it remaineth with all that part of the World subiect to the Turke.

t. IIII.

Of Capernaum, and the Cities of Decapolis.

AMong the remarkable Cities within this Tribe, Capernaum is not the least: so often remembered by the Euangelists. This City had the honour of Christs presence three yeares: who for that time was a Citizen thereof, in which he first preached and taught the doctrine of our saluation: according to that notable Prophecy of Esaie,
The people that walked in darknesse, haue seene a great light: they that dwell in the Land of the shadow of death, vpon them hath the light shined.

Capernaum was seated on Jordan, euen where it entrench into the Sea of Galilee: in an excellent and rich foyle: of whose destruction Christ himselfe prophesied in these words, And thou Capernaum which art lifted up vnto Heauen, shalt be brought downe to Hell, &c.
which Hewed the pride and greatnesse of that City: for it was one of the principall Cities of Decapolis, and the Metropolis of Galilee. And although there were some markes of this Cities magnificence in Saint Hieromes time, as himselfe confesseth, it being then a reasonable Burge or Towne: yet those that haue since, and long since seene it, as Bro-chard, Breidenbach, and Saliniac affirme, that it then consisted but of six poore Fisher-mens houfes.

The Region of ten principall Cities called Decapolitana or Decapolis, is in this description often mentioned, and in Saint Mathew, Marke and Luke also remembered, but I finde no agreement among the Cosmographers, what proper limits it had: and so Plinie himselfe confesseth, for Marius Niger, speaking from others, bounds it on the North by the moun-taine Casius in Casioti: and endeth it to the South at Egypt and Arabia; by which description it embraceth Phoenicia, a part of Calesyria, all Palestina, and Iudea.

Plinie also makes it large, and for the ten Cities of which it taketh name, hee numb'reth four of them to be situated towards Arabia: to wit, first these three, Damascus, Opoto, Raphana, then Philadelphus (which was first called Amana, saith Stephanus, or as I gesse Amana rather; because it was the chiefe City of the Ammanites, knowne by the name of Rabbah, before Prolo, Philadelphus gaue it this later and new name.) Then Sycephopolis, sometime Nisa, built (as is said) by Bacchus, in memory of his Nurse, who died therein, anciently knowne by the name of Bethshaj; for the first he setteth Gadara (not that Gadara in Calesyria, which was also called Antioch and Seleucia;) but it is Gadara in Bajan, which Plinie in this place meaneth, seated on an high hill, neere the Riuer of Hieromax.

This Riuer Ortelius takes to be the Riuer Iaboc: which boundeth Gad and Manasse ouer Jordan: but he mistaketh it; for Hieromax falleth into the Sea of Galilee, betwene Hippos and Gerasa, whereas Iaboc entrench the same Sea betwene Ephron and Phanuel. For the seuenth he nameth * Hippos, or Hippion, a City so called of a Colonie of Horsemen there garrisoned by Isterid, on the East-side of the Galilean Sea, described hereafter in the Tribe of 10 Manasse ouer Jordan. For the eighth Pella, which is also called Butis, and Berenice, seated in the South border of the Region ouer Jordan, called Perea. For the ninth Gelasa, which Iosephus takes to be Gerasa: and Gerasa is found in Calesyria by Iosephus, Hegesippus, and Stephanus: but by Ptolomie (whom I rather follow) in Phoenicia. The tenth and last, Plinie nameth Canatha, and so doth Suetonius and Stephanus, which Volaterran calls Gamala, but Hegesippus rightly Camala, a City in the Region of Bajan ouer Jordan, so called, because those two Hills on which it is seated, haue the shape of a Camell. But the collection of these ten Cities, whereof this Region tooke name, is better gathered out of Brochard, Breidenbach, and Saliniac, which makes them to be these; Casarea Philippi, and Asor, before remembred, Cedes Nephtalim, Sephet, Corazin, Capharnaum, Bethsaida, Lotapata, Tiberias, and Sycephopolis, or Bethsan. For all other Authours disagree herein, and giue no reason for their opinion. One place of the Euangelist Saint Mathew makes it manifest, that this Region called Decapolitana, was all that Tract betwene Zidon, and the Sea of Galilee. For thus it is written: And he departed againe from the coasts of Tyros and Zidon, and came vnto the Sea of Galilee, through the midst of the coasts of Decapolis: so that it was bounded by Damascus and Libanus on the North: by the Phenician Sea, betwene Zidon and Prolomais on the West: by the Hills of Gelbe and Bethsan on the South: and by the Mountaines Tracones, otherwife Hermon, Sanir, and Galaad, on the East: which is from East to West the whole breadth of the Holy Land: and from the North to the South, neere the same distance, which may be each way forty English miles.

Of Hamath.

BUt to looke backe againe towards Libanus, there is seated neere the foot thereof the * *The Septua-
City* of * Hamath or Chammath, of which (as they say) the Countrey adioyning taketh name: the same which Iosephus calleth Amathitis, and Amathensis: * Iacobus Zeigler, Ituraea. Ituraea Regio tunc borealia tribus Nep-thalim, per montem Libanum effi; Tracones. The Countrey of Ituraea, faith hee, containeth the North parts of the 40 Tribe of Nephthali, along the Mount Libanus to Trachonines. But herein following Strabo, who calls Trachonitis Ituraea, hee mistaketh the seate of this Region: and so doth Mercator. For indeed were Ituraea (which Hegesippus calls Perea, and G. Tyrius, Baccar) the same with Trachonitis, yet Trachonitis it selfe is farr more to the East than Hamath in Nephtalim: for Trachonitis lyeth betwene Ce-saria Philippi, and the Mountaines Trachones: which the Hebrewes call Gilead: and this Hamath or Chammath is seated vnder Casarea, towards the Sea West-ward. And it seemeth that this mistaking grew by confounding Emath or Hamath the great in Calesyria, with beyond the Mountaines Trachones, which * Hermon vpon Amos calls Antiochia, with 50 Hamath or Hamath the lesser in Phoenicia, and Nephtalim, which hee calleth Epiphania: for this Hamath, or in our Translation Hamath, (and not that which is commonly called Emath, which 2 Chron. 8. 3. is set farr from the North border of Cansan in Syria Soba) is remembered in Numbers 34. verse 8. and Numbers 13. ver-22. and in Ezekiel 47. 16. In the first of which places from the other in Nephtalim, though Matt. Beroldus rectifying Ituraea, rather follow the opinion of Zeigler about mentioned, as indeed it cannot easily be mislaid, that either one or other of these is either Antiochia or Phoenicia, howbeit that the same City which Iosua 19. 35. is called Chammath, and placed in Nephtalim, was also called Chammath (whence the word Hamath and other Hamath, were framed) it may be gathered partly because the other Hamath, 2 Chron. 8. 3. for distinction is called Chammath Tibon, as this (as it may seeme by Ios. 12. 31.) was Chammath Dor,

proove it : the other Hamath or Emath (being farre removed and beyond the forenamed mountaines, which incloſe all thoſe Lands which Iſrael euer had poſſeſſion of) is that Emath, which is alſo called Iturea, winneſſe * Stella and Lacſan ; and not that in Nephthim, where [†] Jonathas Macchabeus attended the Army of Demetrius, who fled from him, and removed by night.

Forthough Tracomitis be comprehended within Iuræa (and therefore it is said to bee ²⁰*finimita Galilee Gentium*) yet it hath beginning ouer the mountaines Tracomis, and so it stretcheth into the plaines of the Territory of Iuræa; whence Philip the brother of Herod was Tetrarch or President both of Iuræa and Trachonitis: both which are ouer Jordan towards the Eaft. But Chemath in Nephthalim, is on the West fide of Jordan towards the Mediterranean Sea.

The Countrey Ituraa was so called of Iethur one of the sonnes of Ismael, it is placed in the bounds of Calesyria and Arabia * the Desart.

The people Itrai were valiant and warlike men, and excellent Archers : Of whom Virgil :

Iturxos Taxi torquentur in arcus.

Of Eugh the Iturians bowes were made.

This City Chamath or Hamath in Nephtalim seems to have been as ancient as the other in Issachar, both built by Amalech the eleventh son of Canaan. Whether in the time of David, this, or the other had Tobus for King, it is not certain; for Hamath or Emath beyond the Mountains, and Hammath in Nephtalim, were both neighbours to Damascus: of whose subjugation Tobus rejoiced, because Haddadefer whom the Damasceni came to help, was his enemy. This Tobus tearing the strength and prosperity of David, hearing⁴⁰ of his approach towards his Territory, bought his peace with many rich presents, and with many ancient vessels of gold, silver, and brass.

But it seemeth that David in such great successe would not haue had peace with Tobin, if he had beene King of any place in Nephthalim, and therefore it is probable that he ruled in Tjoba: which City Salomon after his Fathers death made him selfe Master of, as a part of the lands (in the larger and conditional promise) allotted by God to the children of Israel.

* But this Hammath of Nephtalim, in the end, and after diuers mutations and changes both of name and fortune, being, as it hath beene said, possessed by Antiochus Epiphanes, it was called Epiphania.

While Saint Hierome liued, it remained a City well peopled, knowne to the Syrians by the name Amathe, and to the Greekes by Epiphania.

†. VI.

Of Reblatha and Rama, and diuers other Townes.

IN the border of Hamath or Emath towards Jordan standeth the Citie Reblatha, or Ribla, watered from the fountaine Daphnis: which falleth into the lake of Merom. Hercunto was Zedekias brought prisoner, after his surprize in the fields of Terecho : and deliuered to Nabuchodonosor : who to be auenged of Zedekias's infidelity, beyond the proportion of piety, first caused the Princes his children to be slaine in his presence: and to the end that this miserable spectacle might be the last that euer he should behold in this world, and so the most remembered, he commanded both his eyes presently to be thrust out : and binding him in Iron chaines, he waded a slaue to Babylon, in which estate hee ended his life. Of which feldome-exempld calamity, though not in expresse words, Jeremie the Prophet fore-told him in Iherusalem not long before : But Ezechiel thus directly, speaking in the person of God, I will bring him to Babel to the Land of the Chaldeans, yet shall he not see it, though he shall die therein.

There are besides these before remembered, many other strong Cities in Nephtholim, as that which is called * Cedes: there are two other of the same name, one in * Isachar, another in Juda, of which Iof. 15. 23. and therefore to distinguish it, it is knowne by the addition of * Nephtalim, as Judg. 4. It is seated on a high hill, whence Iof. 20. 7. Kedes in Galilee in monte Nephthali: Iosephus calls it Cedes, and in Saint Hieromes time it was called Cidifus. Belfors greatly mistakes this Cedes, and confounds it with Cades in the Desart of Pharan.

After the King thereof among other of the Canaanites perished by the hand of Iofia, it was made a City of refuge, and giuent to the Leuites. Hercin was Barac borne; who o-20 uerthroweth the Armie of the second Isabon of Hacor, at the Mount Tabor. It was sometime posselt by Teglapthalasfer, when he wasteth all Nephtalim: afterward by the Romans, and numbered for one of the ten Cities of the Decapolis Region: When it had imbraced the Christian faith, it was honoured with a Bishops seate, but in time it fell with the rest into the power of the Saracens and Turkes, and by them it was demolished.

From Cedes some foure Italian miles towards the South-west, standeth Sephet, otherwise Zepeth, which was also one of the ten Decapolis Cities: a place exceeding strong, and for many yeares the inextinguishable Fortresse of the Christians, and afterward of the Saracens; for from hence they conquered all the neighbour Cities of those regions, both In-land and Maritimae neerer. Touching Rama of Nephtalim, seated Northward neerer 30 Sephet: this is to be noted that there are (1) diuers places of this name in Palestine, all situation on Hills: and therefore called Rama (Rama Hebraeis excelsum; Ramath with the Hebrewes is high.) Altho that from this Rama Ios. 19. 36. they read Arama, making the article (which is that in the Hebrew, as being a name of diuers Townes) to be a part of the word: whence casting away the aspiration, they read Arama. From Sephet towards the West they place * Bethjemes, of which Ios. 19. 38. which defended it selfe against Nephtalim, Jud. 1. 3. but paid them tribute. On the other side of Sephet towards the East was Bethanath, who also kept their Citie from the Nephtalims.

Advoyning to which standeth Cartham ⁴ or Kiriathajim a Citie of the Leuites, not farre from the Mountaine out of which the Springs of Capharnaum arise, called Mons Chrijji: a place by our Sauour often frequented: as also then when calling his Disciples together, he made choise of twelue, which he called and ordained to be his Apostles or Messengers: of which place or the acts therein done, there is often mention in the Euangelists.

Adjoining to these are Magdala, a place of strength, ⁴ and Mefaloth, of which we read that it was forced by Basidai in the time of the 5 Maccabees: also (according to Adrichomius) one of the two Berothae of Nephthali. For Adrichomius maketh two of this name in this Tribe, ⁴ one neerer Chamath in the North border, of which Ezek. 47. 6. another (upon a weake conjecture out of Ioseph. ant. l. 5. c. 2.) he therefore placeth in this tract neerer the waters of Merom: because the Kings that ioynd with Iabin against Iofia, which incamped at the waters of Merom, ⁴ Iof. i. 5. are by Iosephus said to have incamped at the 50 Citie Berotha in Galilee, not farre from Cedes superiour, which is also in Galilee: all which may be true of that Berotha of which Ezek. seeing it is in that Galilee which is called the vpper Galilee or Galilee of the Gentiles. The same Adrichomius placeth the Region of Berim neerer Abela (of which Abela or Abel-beth Mahabach we have spoken already) this he doth upon a conjecture touching the place 2 Sam. 20. 14. where some read Abel & Beth-mahabach, & omnia loca Berim: but the better reading is, & omnes Berim, that is, with all the Berai: for Shebah being of Beniamin (in which Tribe also there is a Citie called Berotha or Berothi) drew the men of that Citie after him.

To the North of Berasha of Nephthalim standeth Sebarim vnder Libanus, remembred by Ezck.

Ezek. 47. and Aroseth gentium, neere the waters of Merom or Samochoon, the Citie of Sifara Lieutenant of the Army of the second Isabn: from whence nor farre off towards the Sea of Gahler, is Edrai, or Edrech, a strong Citie: besides many others, whereof I finde no particular storie of importance: as Ser in Iofua 6. 19. v. 35. called Triddim-Ter, and named for the first of their fenced Cities: whence they make two Cities, Affedim & Ser. Thence Adami, which they call Edama: also Ilion which they call Abion, of which in the Bookes of Kings. Then the strong Citie of Cinnereth after called Genezareth, whence we read of the Land and Lake of Genezareth, the same Lake which is also called the Sea of Tiberius. In the body of the Land they place Galgala to the South border: of which ¹ Mas. 1. 9. 2. also diuers others named, Iof. 19. as Pucca or Chukko Horem and Azanoth. ² Iaher (which they place towards the East parts) and out of the same place of Iofua, Ierzon, ³ Lakkun Ipnal, Heleb, and ⁴ Raccath, which two last they place neere Casara Philippi: To these they adde out of Iofua, Nekeb, and Adami: for which two Iunius readeth Fossa Alunee, making it no Towne but a Dirch cast by some of Adameth, as it seemes; or at least the custodie of which March or Limit belonging to the Towne. To these out of Nun. 3. 1. 10. they adde Sephana, which Sam. 3. 2. 1. seemes to be called Sipmoth. As for Tichon and Ielon, whereof the former they fetch out of Ezek. 47. 16. and the later out of Iofua 19. 33. it may appeare by Iunius his Translation, that neither are to be taken for Cities: for the former he readeth Mediana, and for the later Quercetum. The Citie of ¹ Nephthalim which they make the native place of Tobie, and Naasson neere vnto it, they ² fetch out of the Galgar Translation, Tob. 7. 7. but in the Greeke Text there is no signe, neither of the one nor of the other.

§. V.

THE TRIBE OF ZABVLON.

F Zabulon of Zebulun, another of the sonnes of Iacob by Lea, there were mustered³¹ at Mount Sinai, 57400. able men, besides women, children, and aged vnable persons: all which dying in the Defarts, there entered the Holy Land of their issues 65000. fit to beare armes: who inhabited that part of Canaan, from Asher to the Riuer Chison Southward, and from the Sea of Galilee to the Mediterran, East and West.

The Cities within this Tribe which border Asher, are Sicaminum on the Sea Shore, of which Iofaph, Art. 1.3.c.19. Debbaget of * which Iof. 19.11. Lekonon or tokehnem (whose King was * flaine by Boza, and the City was given to the Zeonites;) and Gabaa after called the City of the *Hoi*lemen, of a Regiment there garrisoned by Herad. Then the City which beareth the name of Zabulon, or the City of men, exceeding ancient and magnificent, ^a burnt to the ground by Ceflius, Lieutenant of the Romane Armie. Adrichomius makes the birth-^b City of * Elon Judge of Israel, because he is called Zabulonita: not marking that in the same place, he is said to be buried at Aialon.

To the East of this City of Zabulon is Casteth, of which Iof. 19. 15. on the border of Asher: and beyond it the lesser ^d Cana of Galilee, where Christ converted Water into Wine: the native City of Nahumiel, and as it is thought, of Simon Zelotes. Beyond it begin the Mountains of Zabulon: and then the City of Cethron (in Zeigler, Ghiltron) which defended it selfe against Zabulon. Then Bersabe which standeth in the partition of the vpper and nether Galilee, fortified by Iosephus against the Romanes. Not farre from hence standeth Simron of Aceron, whose King was slaine by Iofua.

19.13. Then Dimna or Dimna, a Citie of the Leuites: then Noa or rather Neba, of which Iof.
 19.13. Then Dothan or Dothain, where Ioseph found his brethern feeding their flocks:
 the same wherein Elizans besieged by the Syrians, strooke them all blinde.

Beyond it towards the East they imagine Amathar or Amathar: then Remmon of the Leontes. The last of the Cities on the north border of Zabulon is Bethsaida, one of the ten Cities of Decapolis, situate on the Galilean Sea, and watered by the springs of Capharnaum, the native City of the Apostles, Peter, Andrew, and Philip. Herein Christ did many miracles, but these people being no less incredulous than the Capharnaïms, and others.

thers, received the same Curse of threatened Miseries, as, Woe bee unto thee Bethsaida, &c.

Along the West border of Galilee, towards the South from Bethsaida, was the strong Castle of Magdalum, the habitation of Marie Magdalen; not long since standing.

And beyond it the strong and high feated Citie of Jotapata: fortified by Iosephus in the Roman Warre: but in the end after a long siege surpris'd by Vespasian, who slaughtred many thousand of the Citizens, and held 1200. prisoners, whereof Iosephus the Historian was one.

The last and greatest of the Cities on that * Sea, and the Lake of Genesareth within Zabulon, was that of Tiberius, from whence afterward the Galilean Sea also changed name, and was called the Sea of the Citie Tiberias, so named in the honour of Tiberius Cæsar; it was one of the ten Cities, and the Metropolis of the Region Decapolis, and the greatest and last of the lower Galilee. From hence our Saviour called Matthew, from the toll or custom house, to be an Apostle, and neere unto it raied the daughter of Iairus from death: it was built (as Iosephus reports) by Herod the Tetrarch, the brother of Philip, in the beginning of the raigne of Tiberius Cæsar, in the most fruitful part of Galilee; but in a ground full of Sepulchers: Quam iuxta nostras leges (saith hee) ad septem dies impurus habetur, quin talibus locis habitat: whereas by our law hee should be seven daies held as uncleanne, who inhabited in such a place: by which words, and by the whole place of Iosephus it appeares, that this Tiberias is not (as some haue thought) the same as the old Cinzereth, which was seated, not in Zabulon, but in Nephthali.

Neere vnto this Tiberias, at Emas, there were hot baths, where Vespasian the Emperour encamped against Tiberias. More into the Land toward the South-welt is Bethulia, feared on a very high Hill, and of great strength, famous by the storie of Holofernes and Isath, such as it is. Neere which it standeth Bethleem of Zabulon : and adioynning vnto it Capharath, fortified by Iosephus against the Romans : and Laphan exceeding strong place, afterward forced by Titus : who in the entrance, and afterward in furie slew 15000. of the Citizens : and carried away about two thousand prisoners.

On the South side are the Cities of Cartha of the Levites, and Gabara, of which Iosephus in his own life, then Iaspe according to Adrieonius (of which Iof. 19.12.) for he thinks that it is not that Tapha of which we speak but now out of Iosephus Iadela, of which Iof. 19.15. Hierome calls it Iadela: vnder it Westward, Legia, (afterward a Bishop's seat) and the Citie Belma, in ancient times exceeding throng, remembered Iudith 7.3. otherwise Chelma. Betwene Legio and Nazeret is the Citie Saffa or Saffra, the birth Citie of Zebedeus, Alphus, James and Iohn: Then Sephoris, or Sephora, according to Iosephus: Sephoria according to Brochard: which afterward, faith Hegesippus and Hierome was called Diocefare; the Citie of Ioachim and Anna, the Parents of the Virgin Mary; was called by Herod the Tetrarch, and by him, as Iosephus speaks, made the head and defence of Galilee: in another place he faith, Verbum Galilee maxime Sephoris & Tiberias. This Sephoria greatly vexed Vespasian ere he wanne it. Herod Antipas when he made it the Regall seat of the nether Galilee, and surrounded it with a strong wall, called it Antiochacerta, which is as much to say as Imperiall, faith Iosephus; and it is now but a Castle called Zaphet.

1 To the South-west of this Sephoris or Diocæsarea was that blessed place of Nazareth the 2 Citie of Mary the Mother of Christ; in which hee himselfe was conceived; it standeth
 3 betwene Mount Tabor, and the Mediterran Sea. In this Citie hee abode chiefly 4 foure and twenty yeares, and was therefore called a Nazarite, as the Christians afterward
 5 were for many yeares. It was erected into an Archbishopricke in the following age. Need
 6 vnto it are the Cities Bursia (afterward well defended against the Turkes) and Nahalal,
 7 50 which Ios. 19. 15. and Jud. 1. 30. where it is called Nabalal; and Ios. 2. 13. where it is a 8 Citie of the Leuites, neere the Sea; adioyning to the Riuer of Chison is Sarid, noted in Ios.
 9 for the vertueth of Babylon.

In this Territorie of Zabulon there are diuers small Mountaines : but Tabor is the most renowned, by the Aparition of Moses and Elias : and by the Transfiguration of Christ in the presence of Peter, James, and Iohn : vnto whom Moses and Elias appeared in memorie whereof on the top of the Mountaine, the Emperesse Helen built a sumptuous Chappell.

The chiefe River of Zabulon is Chison, which rising out of Taber, runneth with o stream

Itreamed Eastward to the Sea of Galilee, and with another Itreamed Westward into the great Sea. This Riuer of Chifon where it riseth, and so farre as it runneth Southward, is called Chedumim or Eadumim: and for mine owne opinion, I take it to be the same which Protonic calleth Chorfeus: though others distinguishing them, and set Chorfeus by Casaria Palestine. There is a second Torrent or Brooke that riseth in the Hills of Bethulia, and falleth into the Sea of Galilee by Magdalum: and the third is a branch of a riuer rising out of the Fontaines of Capharnaum, which falleth also into the same Sea, and neere Magdalum; which Torrent they call Dotbam, from the name of the Citie, from which it passeth Eastward to Bethsaida, and so ioyning with Jordanus parvus, which runneth from the Valley of Iephthael, which Iofua reckoneth in the bounds of Zabulon, it endeth in the Sea of Galilee.

§. VI.

THE TRIBE OF ISACHAR.

HHe next adioyning Territory to Zabulon, to the South and Southwest, was Isachar, who inhabited a part of the nether Galilee, within Jordan: of whom there were increased in Egypt, as appeared by their musters at Mount Sinai, 54400. able and warlike men, who leaving their bodies with the rest in the Deserts, so there entered the Holy Land, 64300.

The first Citie of this Tribe neere the Sea of Galilee, was Tarichea, distant from Tiberias eight English miles, or somewhat more; a City wherein the Jewes (by the practice of a certainie murinious vsptair, Iohn the sonne of Leui) tooke armes against Iosephus the Historian, then Gouvernour of both Galilees. This Citie was first taken by Cassius, and 3000. Jewes carried thence captiue; and afterward with great difficultie by Vespasian, who entered it by the Sea side, hauing first beaten the Jewes in a sea-fight vpon the Lake or Sea of Galilee; he put to the sword all sorts of people, and of all ages: sauing that his furie being quenched with the Riuer of blood running through euery street, he reserued the remainder for slaues and bond-men.

Next to Tarichea is placed Cefion, or Cisbion, of the Leuites, and then Isachar, remembered in the first of Kings c. 4. v. 17. then Abes or Ebes, Iof. 19. 20. and Remeth, of which Iof. 19. 21. otherwise Ramoth, 1 Chron. 6. 73. or Iarmuth, Iof. 21. 29. this also was a City of the Leuites, from whose Territorie the Mountaines of Gilboa take beginning: and range themelues to the Mediterran sea, and towards the West as farre as the Citie of Iezreel, between which and Ramoth, are the Cities of Bethpheses, or Bethpases, according to Zeigler; and Enadda, or Hem chadda, neere which Saul slew himselfe: vnder those, Aphe or Apheca, which Atrichomius placeth in Isachar: betweene which and Suna, hee saith, that the Philistims incamped against Israel, & afterward against Saul: a Land thirstie of blood, for herein also, saith he, the Syrians with two and thirty Regals assisting Benhadad, incouraged Achab: and were ouerthrowne and slaughtered: to whom the King of Israel made a most memorable answer, when Benhadad vaunted before the victory: which was, Tell Benhadad, Let not him that girdeth his harness, boast himselfe as he that putteth it off: meaning that glorie followed after victorie, but ought not to precede it. In the yeere following, in the fields, as they say, adioyning to this Citie, was the same vaine-glorious Syrian utterly broken and discomforted by Achab: and 100000. footmen of the Aramites or Syrians slaine: before which ouerthrow the seruants and Counsaillers of Benhadad (in derision of the God of Israel) told him, That the Gods of Israel were Gods of the Mountaines: and therefore if they fought with them in the plaines, they should overcome them.

Vnder Aphe towards the Sea they set the Citie of Esdrelon; in the plaines of Galilee, so called also the great field of Esdrelon, and Mageda: in the border whereof are the ruines of Aphe to be seene, saith Brochard, and Breidenbach. After these are the Cities of Casloth, of which, 1 Machab. 9. 2. Lanem or Hem Gannim of the Leuites, and Sesima or Shahatima, the West border of Isachar, of which Iof. 19. 22. From hence ranging the Sea coast, there is found the Castle of Pilgrims: a strong Castle inuironed with the Sea, sometime the store-house and Magazine of the Christians, and built by the Earle of S. Giles or Tolose.

From the Castle of Pilgrims the Sea maketh a great Bay towards the North, and the farthermost farthermost shore beginneth Mount Carmel, not farre from the Riuer Chifon, where Elijah assembled all the Prophets and Priests of Baal, and prayed King Achab and the people assembled, to make triall whether the God of Israel, or the Idoll of Baal were to be worshipped; by laying a sacrifice without fire on the Altar: which done, the Priests of Baal prayed, and cut their owne flesh after their mannes, but the fire kindled not, while Elijah in derision told them that their God was either in pursuit of his enemies, not as Iesare, or perchance a sleape, &c. but at the prayer of Elijah his fire kindled, notwithstanding that he had caused the people to cast many Vessells of water thereon: by which miracle the people incensed, slew all those Idolaters on the banks of Chifon, adioyning.

At the foot of this Mountaine to the North standeth Caipha, built, as they say, by Caiphas the high Priest. It is also knowne by the name of Perusia and Perphyria, sometime a Suffragane Bishops seat. Returning againe from the Sea-coast towards Tiberias by the banks of Chifon, there are found the City of Hapharaim or Aphraim, and the Castles of Mezza, and Saba: of which Brochard and Breidenbach: and then Naim on the Riuer Chifon: a beautifull Citie while it stood, in the Gares whereof Christ raised from death the widowes onely sonne.

Then Seon or Shion named, Iof. 19. betweene the two Hills of Hermon, in Isachar: beyond it standeth Endor, famous by reason of the Inchantresse that vnderooke to raise vpthe body of Samuel at the instigation of Saul.

Beyond it stands Anaharath and Rabbith, named Iof. c. 19. v. 19. 20. Then Dabarath, as it is named, Iof. 2. 1. 28. or Dabratha, as it is named, 1 Chron. 6. 71. This Citie (which stretcht it selfe ouer Chifon) was a Citie of refuge belonging to the Leuites.

Next to Dabarath is Arbela situate, neere the Caues of those two Thecues which so greatly molested Galilee in Herods time. It ioyneeth on one side to the Mountaine of Isachar or Hermon, and on the other to the Valley of Israel: which valley continueth it selfe from Bethsan or Scythopolis, the East border of Isachar, euen to the Mediterran Sea: two parts whereof are inclosed by the Mountaines of Gilboa on the South, and by Hermon, and the Riuer Chifon on the North. In these plaines Gideon ouerthrew the Medianites, and herein, they thinke, Saul fought against the Philistims: Achab against the Syrians, and so the Tartars against the Saracens.

THE HALFE OF THE TRIBE OF MANASSE.

§. I.

Of the bounds of this halfe Tribe: and of Scythopolis, Salem, Thersa, and others.

THe next Tribe which ioyneeth it selfe to Isachar towards the South, is the halfe of Manasse, on the West side of Jordan. Manasses was the first begotten of Ioseph, the eleuenth sonne of Jacob. His mother was an Egyptian, the daughter of Putiphar, Priest and Prince of Heliopolis: which Manasses, with his brother Ephraim, and the grand-children of Isach, were by adoption numbred amongst the sonnes of Jacob, and made vpthe number of the twelue Patriarkes.

Of Manasse there were increased in Egypt, as they were numbred at Mount Sinai, 32200. able men: all which being consumed in the Desarts, there entered of their issues, 32700. bearing armes. The Territory which fell on this one halfe of Manasse, was bounded by Jordan, on the East, and Dofa vpon the Mediterran Sea on the West, Israel on the North, and Machmas is the South border.

The first and principall Citie which stood in this Territorie was Bethsan, sometime Nysa, saith Plinie, built by Liber Pater, in honour of his Nurse there buried, of the same name, which Solinus confirmes. Afterward when the Scythians invaded Asia the lesse, and pierct into the South, to the vtermoost of Celefryia, they built this Citie a-new, and very magnificent: and it had thereupon the name of Scythopolis, or the Citie of Scythians giuen by the Greekes.

These barbarous Northren people constrained the Jewes to fight against their owne Nation

Apollonia through Ptolemy fees Apollonia allow Herod, and toward Egypt; betweene this City and Soppe, so which Apollonia gaue the name of Plama Colonia. It was by Herod re-built, who there in laboured to exceed all the works in that part of the world: For besides the edifices which he reared within the Walls, of cast and polished marbles, the Theater and Amphitheater, from whence he might looke ouer the Seas farre away, with the high and stately Towers and Gates: hee founded a Harbour of great capacity, being in former times but an open Bay; and the wind blowing from the Sea, the Merchants haunting that Port, had no other hope, but in the strength of their Cables and Anchors. This work he performed with such charge and labour, as the side of that hill not been found in any Kingdome, nor in any age: which, because the Materials were fetched from farre, and the weight of the stones was such as it exceeded beholds, I haue added Iosephus owne words of this worke, which are these: *Hanc locorum inordinatam correcluram, circumlatus portus circumduxit, quantum pntaret magnitudo recipientis sufficere: Et in viginti vltimarum profundam, pro grandia saxa demisit: quorum plerq; pedum quinquaginta longitudinis, latitudinis vero octo decem, altitudine nouem pedatis fuerunt quedam etiam maiora, minora uis: To mend this inconuenience of place (saith Iosephus) hee compassed in a Bay wherein a great flecte might well ride: and let downe great stones twentie fathome deepe: whereof some were fifty foot long, eighteen foot broad, and nine foot thicke: some bigger, and some lesser. To this he added an arme or cawle of two hundred foot long, to breake the waues: the rest hee strengthened with a stone wall, with diuers stately Towers thereon builded: of which the most magnificent hee called Drusus, after the name of Drusus the sonne in law of Cesar: in whose honour he intituled the Citie it selfe, Casaria of Palestine: all which he performed in twelue yeeres time. It was the first of the Easterne Citie that receiued a Bishop afterward erected into an Archbishopricke, commanding twentie others vnder it, saith Tyrius.*

S. Hierome nameth Theophilus, Eusebius, Acacius, Euzornus, and Galasius to haue beene Bishops thereof. In this Citie was Cornelius the Centurion baptized by Saint Peter: and herein dwelt Philip the Apostle: S. Paul was herein two yeeres prisoner, vnder the President Felix, vnto the time and gouernment of Porcius Festus: by whom making his appeale, he was sent to Cesar. Here, when Herod Agrippa was passing on to celebrate the Quinquennalia, taking delight to be called a god by his flatterers, hee was stricken with an Angell vnto death, saith Iosephus.

To the North of Casaria standeth Dora, or Naphth Dor, as some reade, Ios. 1. 2. so called (saith Adrichomius) because it ioyneth to the Sea, whose King was slaine by Ishua. But Iunius for in Naphth Dor, reades in tracibus Dor: and so the Vulgar, in regionibus Dor, although 1 Reg. 4. 11. for the like speech in the Hebrew it readeth omnis Naphth Dor: The Septuagint in the place of Iosua call it Nephth-Dor, and in the other of the Kings, Nepha-Dor: but the true name by other places (as Ios. 13. 23. Iudg. 1. 27.) may seeme to be Dor. It was a strong and powerfull Citie, and the fourth in account of those twelue Principalities or Sitarchies, which Salomon erected. Iunius vpon Macchab. 15. 11. place this betwene the Hill Carmel, and the mouth of the Riuer Chorfenus: for so some name the Riuer Chorfenus, of which we haue spoken already.

Into this Citie, for the strength thereof, Tryphon fled from Antiochus the son of Demetrius, where hee was by the same Antiochus besieged with 12000. foot-men, and 8000. Horse: the same perfidious villain that receiued 200. talents for the ranfome of Ionathan Macchabaeus (whom he had taken by treacherie) and then slew him: and after him slew his owne Master, vsurping for a while the kingdome of Syria. It had also a Bishops seate of the Diocesse of Casaria.

From Casaria towards the South; they place the Cities of Capharnaum, Gabe, and Galgal: for besides that Capharnaum famous in the Euangelists, they finde in these parts neere the West Sea, another of the same name. Of Gabe Hierome in loci Hebraici. The famous Galgal or Gilgal, was in Beniamin: but this Gilgal, they say, it was whose King was slaine by Iosua.

Then Antipatris, so called of Herode, in honour of his Father: but in the time of the Macchabees it was called Capharsalama: in the fields whereof Iudas Macchabaeus overthrew a part of the Armie of Nicanor, Lieutenant to Demetrius: an armie drawn into Iudea by a traiterous Iew, called Alcimus: who contended for the Priest-hood, first vnder Macchabees, and then vnder Nicanor. To this was S. Paul carried prisoner from Hierusalem, conducted conducted by 470. Souldiers, to defend him from the furie of the Iewes. In after-times the Armie of Gudfrey of Bulio attempted it in vaine: yet was it taken by Baldwine. It was honoured in those dayes with a Bishops seate, but it is now a poore Village called Assur, saith Beorchard. Neere vnto this Citie the Prophet Ionas was three daies preferred in the body of a Whale.

Into the Land, from Antipatris and Casaria, standeth Narbata, whereof the Territory taketh name: which Cestius the Romanie waisted with fire and sword, because the Iewes which dwelt at Casaria fled thence, and carried with them the Bookes of Moses. Neere vnto it is the Mountaine of Abdia, the Steward of King Achab: wherein hee hid an hundred Prophets, and fedde them, after which hee himselfe is said to haue obtained from God the Spirit of Prophesie also.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the Kingdome of Phœnicia.

§. I.

The boundis and chiefe Cities, and Founders, and Name, of this Kingdome: and of the invention of Letters ascribed to them.

Because these five Tribes, of Asher, Nephthalim, Zabulon, Issachar, and the halfe of Manasse, posselt the better part of that ancient Kingdome of Phœnicia, to wit, of so much as lay to the South part of Anti-libanus: I haue therefore gathered a briefe of those Kings which haue gouerned therein: at least so many of them as time (which deuoureth all things) hath left to posteritie: and that the rest haue perished, it is not strange; seeing so many volumes of excellent learning in so long a race and reuolution, and in so many changes of Estates and Conquest of Heathen Princes, haue beene torne, cast away, or otherwise consumed.

The limits of this Kingdome, as touching the South parts, are very vncertaine: but all Cosmographers doe in effect agree, that it takes beginning from the North, where that part of Syria, which is called Casatia, ends: most of them bounding it by Orthofia, to the North of Tripolis. Ptolomie makes it a little larger, as reaching from the Riuer Elen-therus, that falls into the Sea at the Island of Aradus, somewhat to the North of Orthofia; and stretching from thence alongst the coast of the Mediterran sea, as farre as the Riuer of Chorfenus, which seemes to bee that which the Iewes call the Torrent or Riuer of Magedda. Plinie extends it farther, and comprehends Soppe within it: Cornelius and Budeus, Soppe and Gaza. Phœnicia apud priscos appellata (saith Budeus) que nunc Palestina Syria dicitur: It was called Phœnicia of old (saith he) which now is called Palestina of Syria.

Strabo comprehends in this Countrey of Phœnicia, all the Sea side of Iudea, and Palestina, euen vnto Pelusium, the first Port of Egypt. On the contrary Diodorus Siculus foldeth it vp in Calefyria, which hee boundeth not. But for my selfe I take a middle course, and like best of Ptolomies description, who was seldome deceived in his owne Art. It had in these famous Maritimate Cities (besides all those of the Islands) to wit, Aradus, Orthofia, Tripolis, Botrys, Byblus, Berytus, Sidon, Tyre, Ptolomais (or Acon) Dora, and Casaria Palestine: and by reason of the many Ports and goodly Sea-townes, it anciently commanded the Trades of the Easterne world: and they were absolute Kings of the Mediterran Sea.

The ancient Regall Seate of those Princes was Zidon, built by Zidon the first sonne of Canaan: and the people then subiect to that people were called Zidonians: the same state continuing euen vnto Iudas's time. For till then it is probable that there was but one King of all that Region; afterward called Phœnicia: which Procopius also confirmeth in his second Booke of *Vandal*l warres. But in processe of time the Citie of Tyre aduoyning became the more magnificent: yet according to the Prophet, it was but a Daughter of Zidon, and by them first built and peopled.

But after the death of Moses, and while Iofua yet gouerned Israel, Agenor an Egyptian of Thebes, or a Phœnician bred in Egypt, came thence with his sons of Cadmus, Phœnix, Cyrus, and Cilix, (say Cedrenus & Curcius) and built and posselt the Cities of Tyre and Zidon: to wit, the new Tyrus, and brought into Phœnicia (so called after the name of his second sonne) the vse of letters: which also Cadmus in his pursuite after his sister Europa, taught the Græcians. For Taurus King of Crete, when he surpris'd Tyre, had stollen her thence: of which the Poets deuised the fable of Iupiters transformation into a Bull, by whom that stealth was also supposed to be made. Pomponius Sabinus makes Belus the first King of Phœnicia, and findes Cadmus his succellour, whom hee calleth his grand-child: and it seemeth that Belus was the Father of Agenor, and not Neptune: because the successors of Dido held that name alwayes in reuerence, making it a part of their owne, as Asdrubal, Hannibal: which memorie Virgil also toucheth in these Verses:

*Hic Regina grauem gemmis anroq; poposcit
Impleuitq; moro pateram: quæ Belus & omnes
A Belo soliti.*

The Queene anon commands the waighty bowle (Waightrie with precious stones and masse gold)
To flow with wine. This Belus vs'd of old,
And all of Belus Line.

Whether this Belus were Father or Grand-father to Agenor, the matter is not great. But it seemes to me by comparing of times, that Belus was Ancestor to these Phœnicians, and preceeded Agenor. For were Belus, or Iupiter Belus, the sonne of Neptune by Lybia, the Daughter of Epaphus, or were he the Sonne of Thelegonus, according to Eusebius; yet it is agreed that Cecrops then ruled in Attica: and in the end of Cecrops time, saith Sanguistine, Moses left Egypt: Agenors succellor liuing at once with Iofua. Now that Agenor returned about the same time into the Territory of Zidon, I cannot doubt: neither doe I denie, but that he gaue that Region the name of Phœnicia, in honour of his Sonne. But in stead of the building of Tyre and Zidon, it is probable that hee repared and fortified both: and therefore was called a founder, as Semiramis and Nebuchadonzor were of Babylon.

For be it true that Agenor was of the same Nation, and brought vp in Egypt: where he learnt the vse of letters (Egypt flourishing in all kinde of learning in Moses time) or were he by Nation an Egyptian, yet it is very likely that either he came to saue his owne Territory; or otherwile to defend the coast of Canaan, from the Israelites: who were by Moses led out of Egypt, to the great losse and dishonour of that Nation: and by Iofua conducted ouer Jordan, to conquer and possesse the Canaanites Land. For though the Egyptians, by reason of the losse which they receiued by the hand of God, in the Red Sea, and by the ten plagues cast on them before that, and by the slaughter of so many of the Male children at the same time, could not hinder the Hebrews from inuading Canaan by Land: which also they knew had so many powerfull Nations to defend it: the Deserts inter-jacent, and the strong Edomites, Moabites, Emorites & Ammonites their borders: yet Egypt hauing such Vessels, or Ships, or Gallies, as were then in vse: did not in all probability neglect to Garrison the Sea coast, or assist Agenor with such forces, as they had to spare; and which they might performe with the greater facilitie, in that the Philistims which held the shores of Canaan, next adioyning vnto them, were their Friends and Confederates.

Now as it appeareth by the course of the storie, those Cities of Phœnicia, which Agenor was said to haue built (that is, to haue fortified and defended against Iofua, and against the Tribes after him, as Zidon, Sor, or Tyre, by Iofua called the strong Citie, Accho afterward Protomati, Azzeb and Dor) were all that Phœnicia had in those dayes.

That the Kings of Phœnicia were mighty, especially by Sea, it appeares, first by their defence against Israel: secondly by this, that Dauid and Salomon could not master them: but were glad of their alliance: thirdly, that one of their Cities, though they were then but Reguli, defended it selfe 13. yeeres against a King of Kings, Nabuchadonzor: and that Alexander the great (who being made victorious by the prouidence of God, seemed vnresistible) spent more time in the recovery of Tyre, than in the conquest of all the Cities in Asia.

Other

Other opinions there are, as that of Berosus out of Iosephus, who conceiues that Tyre was founded by Tyrus the sonne of Iaphet. And for the Region it selfe, though Calisthenes deriue it, ab arbore dactylorum; and the Greekes from the word Phœnos, of slaughter, because the Phœnicians slew all that came on their coasts, yet for my selfe I take it that Phœnix the sonne of Agenor gaue it that name. But that either Agenor in Phœnicia, or Cadmus his sonne in Greece, were the Inuentors of Letters, it is ridiculous: and therefore the dispute vnneccessary.

The Ethiopians affirme that Atlas, Orion, Orpheus, Linus, Hercules, Prometheus, Cadmus, and others, had from them the first light of all those Arts, Sciences, and ciuill Policies, which they afterward profest and taught others: and that Pythagoras himselfe was instructed by the Lybians: to wit, from the South and Superiour Egyptians: from whom those which inhabited nether the out-let of Nilus, as they say, borrowed their Diuinitie and Philosphie: and from them the Greekes, then barbarous, receiued Ciuilitie. Againe, the Phœnicians challenge this inuention of Letters and of Learning: acknowledging nothing from the Egyptians at all; neither doe they allow that Agenor and his sonnes were Affricans; whence Lucan.

*Phœnices primi (fame si creditur) ausi
Mansuram rudibus vocem signare figuris.*

Lucan. l. 5. 3.

Phœnicians first (if fame may credit haue)
In rude Characters dar'd our words to graue.

And that Cadmus was the sonne of Agenor, and was a Phœnician, and not an Egyptian, it appeareth by that answer made by Zeno; when hee in a kinde of reproach was called a stranger and not a Phœnician:

Si patria est Phœnix, quid tam? nam Cadmus & ipse Phœnix, cui debet Græcia docta libros.

Athen. 1. Dign. nos.

If a Phœnician borne I am, what then?
Cadmus was so: to whom Greece owes
The Bookes of learned men.

Out of doubt the Phœnicians were very ancient: and from the Records and Chronicles of Tyre, Iosephus the Historian confirms a great part of his Antiquities. The Thracians againe subscribe to none of these reports: but affirme constantly, that the great Zamolxis flourished among them: when Atlas liued in Mauritania: Nilus and Kulean in Egypt: and Ochus in Phœnicia. Yea, some of the French doe not blush to maintaine, that the ancient Gauls taught the Greekes the vse of Letters, and other Sciences. And doe not we know that our Bardes and Druides are as ancient as those Gauls, and that they sent their sonnes hither to be by them instructed in all kinde of learning?

Lastly, whereas others bestow this inuention on Moses, the same hath no probability at all, for he liued at such time as Learning and Arts flourished most, both in Egypt, and Affria, and hee himselfe was brought vp in all the learning of the Egyptians, from his infancie.

But true it is, that letters were inuented by those excellent Spirits of the first age, and before the wiselend floud: either by Seth or Enos, or by whom selfe God knowes; from whom all wisdom and vnderstanding hath proceeded. And as the same infinite God is present with all his Creatures, so hath he giuen the same inuention to diuers Nations: whereof the one hath not had commerce with the other; as well in this as in many other knowledges: for euen in Mexico, when it was first discovered, there was found written Bookes after the manner of those Hieroglyphicks, anciently vsed by the Egyptians, and other Nations: and so had those Americans a kinde of Heraldrie; and their Princes differing in Armes and Scutcheons, like vnto those vsed by the Kings and Nobilitie of other Nations, Imra naturalia communia, & generalia, &c. Naturali Lawes are common Turijcon. and general.

II.
Of the Kings of Tyre.

BUt whatsoeuer remaineth of the storie and Kings of Phœnicia (the bookes of Zenon, Sabonias, Masacas, and others of that Nation, being no where found) the same isto bee gathered out of the Scriptures, Iosephus, and Theophilus Antiochenus.

Agenor liued at once with Iofus, to whom succeeded Phœnix, of whom that part of Canaan, and so farre towards the North as Aradus, tooke the name of Phœnicia: what Ninib succeeded Phœnix it doth not appeare: but at such time as the Græcians besieged Troy, Phasis gouerned Phœnicia.

In Hieremies time, and while Iehoiakim ruled in Iuda, the Tyrians had a King apart: for Hieremie speaketh of the Kings of Zidon, of Tyre, of Edom, &c. as of severall Kings.

In Xerxes time, and when he prepared that incredible Armie wherewith hee invaded Greece, Tetramnestus ruled that part of Phœnicia, about Tyre, and Zidon: who commanded, as some writers affirme, Xerxes fleet, or rather, as I suppose, those 300. Gallies, which himselfe brought to his aide: for at this time it seemeth, that the Phœnicians were Tributaries to the Persian: for being broken into Reguli, and pettic Kings in Hieremies time, they were subiect by Nabuchodonozor, of whose conquests in the Chapter before remembered, Hieremie prophesied.

Tennes, though not immediately, succeeded Tetramnestus, remembered by D. Siculus in his 14. Booke.

Strato, his Successor, and King of Zidon, Alexander Macedon threw out, because of his dependencie vpon Darius, and that his Predecessors had serued the East Empire against the Græcians. But diuers Kings, of whom there is no memorie, came betweene Tennes and Strato. For there were conformed 130. yeeres and somewhat more between Xerxes and Alexander Macedon. And this man was by Alexander esteemed the more vnworthy of restitution, because (saith Curtius) hee rather submitted himselfe by the instigation of his Subiects (who forelaw their viter ruine by resistance) than that he had any disposition therunto, or bare any good affection towards the Macedonians.

Of this Strato, Athenicus out of Theopompus reporteth, that hee was a man of ill living, and most voluptuous; also that hee appointed certaine games and prizes for Women-dancers, and fingers, whom hee to this end chiefly inuited; and assembled: that hauing beheld the most beautifull and liuely among them, he might recouer them for his owne vse and delights. Of this strange accident about the death of one Strato King of these coasts, S. Hierome and others make mention: who hauing heard that the Persians were neere him with an Armie too waighy for his strength, & finding that he was to hope for little grace, because of his falling away from that Empire, and his adhering to the Egyptians; he determined to kill himselfe, but fainting in the execution, his wife being present, wrested the sword out of his hand and slew him: which done, shee also therewith pierced her owne body, and died.

After Alexander was possessor of Zidon, and the other Strato driven thence, He gaue the Kingdome to Hephestion, to dispose of: who hauing receiued great entertainment of one of the Citizens, in whose house he lodged, offered to recompence him therewith; and willingly offered to establish him therein: but this Citizen no lesse vertuous than rich, belied Hephestion that this Honour might be inferred on some one of the blood and race of their ancient Kings: and presented vnto him Balonymus, whom Curtius calls Abdolonimus, Iustine Abdolonius, and Plutarch Alynonus: who at the very houre that he was called to this regall Estate, was with his owne hands working in his Garden, setting heards and rootes, for his reliefe and sustenance: though otherwise a wise man and exceeding iust.

These were the ancient Kings of Zidon: whose estate being afterward changed into Popular, or Arithocraticall: and by times and turnes subiected to the Emperours of the East: there remaineth no farther memorie of them, than that which is formerly deliuered in the Tribe of Asser.

The Kings of Tyre, who they were before Samuels time, it doth not appeare: Iosephus the Historian, as is said, had many things wherewith hee garnished his Antiquities from the Tyrian Chronicles: and out of Iosephus, and Theophilus Antiochenus, there may be begathered a descent of some twenty Kings of the Tyrians; but these Authors, though they both pretend to writings of Manasser Ephejus, doe in no sort agree in the times of their reignes, nor in other particulars.

Abibalus is the first King of the Tyrians, whom Iosephus and Theophilus remember; whom Theophilus calls Abimachus: the same perchance that the sonne of Sirach mentioneth in his fourth and sixth Chapter, speaking of the Princes of the Tyrians.

To this Abibalus, Suron succeeded, if he be not one and the same with Abibalus, David (saith Eusebius out of Eusebius) constrained this Suron to pay him Tribute, of whom also David complaineth, Psalm 83.

Hiram succeeded Suron, whom Iosephus calls Iram, and Theophilus sometime Hieronymus, sometime Hierimus, but Tatian and Monarus, Chiram. Hee entred into a league with David, and sent him Cedars, with Majons and Carpenters, to performe his buildings in Ierusalem, after he had beaten thence the Iebusites. The same was he that so greatly assisted Salomon: whom hee not onely furnished with Cedars, and other Materials towards the raising of the Temple, and with great summes of money, but also he ioyned with him in his enterprize of the East India, and of Opbir: and furnished Salomon with Mariners and Pilots: the Tyrians being of all Nations the most excellent Navigators: and sent him 120. talents of gold. Of this Hiram, there is not onely mention in diuers places of Scripture, but in Iosephus in his Antiquities the 7. and 8. chap. 2. & 3. in Theophilus his 3. booke, in Tatians his Oration against the Greekes: and in Zonarus, Tome the first.

This Prince seemed to be very mighty and magnificent, hee despised the 20. Townes. Which Salomon offered him: he defended himselfe against that victorious King David: and gaue his daughter in marriage to Salomon, called the Zidonian: for whose sake he was contented to worship Asteroth, the Idoll of the Phœnicians. Hiram liued 53. yeeres.

Balestarius, whom Theoph. Antiochenus calleth Bazorus, succeeded Hiram, King of Tyre and Zidon; and reigned 7. yeeres according to Iosephus.

Abdastartus the eldest sonne of Balestarius, gouerned 9. yeeres, and liued but 20. yeeres according to Iosephus: but after Theophilus hee reigned 12. yeeres, and liued 54. who being slaine by the foure sonnes of his owne Nurle, the eldest of them held the 30. Kingdome 12. yeeres.

Astartus brother to Abdastartus, reconered the Kingdome from this Vsurper, and reigned 12. yeeres.

Aslamis, of Atharivus, after Theophilus, a third brother followed Astartus, and ruled 6. yeeres, and liued in all 54.

Phelles the fourth sonne of Balestarius, and brother to the three former Kings, slew Theoph. Astartus, and reigned 8. moneths, liued 50. yeeres.

Phisabul, or Iuthobalus, in Theophilus (sonne to the third brother Astartus, who was the chiefe Priest of the Qadejsi Astarte, which was a dignity next vnto the King, reuenged the death of his father, and slaughtered his Vnckle Phelles: and reigned 32. yeeres, 40. the same which in the first of Kings, chap. 16. is called Eshbaal, whose daughter Iezabel, Achab married.

Badezor or Bazor the sonne of Ithobalus or Ethbaal, brother to Iezabel, succeeded his Father, and reigned 6. yeeres, and liued in all 45.

Mettinus succeeded Badezor, and reigned but 9. yeeres (saith Iosephus) he had two sons, Pygmalion and Barca, and two daughters Elisa and Anna.

Pygmalion reigned after Mettinus his Father 40. yeeres, and liued 56. In the seventh yeere of whose reigne, Elisa sailed into Africa, and built Carthage, 143. yeeres and 8. moneths after the Temple of Salomon: which by our account was 289. yeeres after Troy taken, and 143. before Rome: and therefore that fiction by Virgil of Aeneas and 50 Dido must be farre out of square. For Pygmalion courteous of Sibius his riches, who had married his sister Elisa, slew him traitorously as he accompanied him in hunting: or if we beleue Iustine and Virgil, at the Alkar: whereupon Elisa fearing to be despoiled of her husbands treasure, fled by Sea into Africa, as aforesaid: whom when Pygmalion prepared to pursue, he was by his mother teares, and by threats from the Oracle arrested. Barca accompanied his sister, and assisted her, in the erection of Carthage: and from him sprang that noble Family of the Barci in Africa, of which race descended many famous Captaines, and the great Hanniball. Scrupus interprets this name of Dido by Virago, because of her man-like acts: others from Iedidia, a surname of Salomon.

Elulius

Eluleus succeeded Pygmalion : and reigned 36. yeeres : the same that ouerthrew the fleet of Salmanaſar, in the Port of Tyre : notwithstanding which, he continued his ſiege before it on the Land ſide five yeeres, but in vaine.

After Eluleus, Ethobales governed the Tyrians, who vaunted himſelfe to bee as wiſe as Daniel : and that he knew all ſecrets (ſaith Ezekiel) of whom the Prophet writeth at large in his 28. Chapter : out of whom it was gathered, that this Prince dyed, or was ſlain in that long ſiege of Nabuchodonſor : who ſurrounded and attempted Tyre, 13. yeeres together, ere he prevailed.

Baal followed Ethobales, and reigned 10. yeeres a tributary, perchanee, to Nabuchodonſor : for after his death, it was governed by diuers Judees, ſucceeding each other : 1. Firſt, by Enibalus, then by Chelbi, Abarus the Prieſt, Mittonus, and Geraſus, who held it among them ſome 7. years, and odde months : after whom Balatorus commanded therein as a King for one yeere : after him Merbalus ſent from Babylon 4. yeeres : after him from ſence thence alſo, 20. yeeres. In the 17. of whole reigne Cyrus began to gouerne Perſia.

§. III.

Of Bozeus his conceit, that the Edumæans inhabiting along the Red Sea, were the Progenitors of the Tyrians, and that the Tyrians from them receiued and brought into Phœnicia the knowledge of the true God.

OF the great mutations of this Kingdome and State of the Tyrians, mixed with a diſcourſe of diuers other Nations, there is one Bozius that hath written a Traſt at large, intituled de ruinis Gentium. And although the great, and many alterations found in this and other Cities, yea, in all things vnder heauen, haue proceeded from his ordinance who only is vnchangeable, and the ſame for euer ; yet whereas the ſaid Bozius, enforcing here-hence, that the proſperity and ruine of the Tyrians, were fruites of their embracing or forſaking the true Religion, to proue this his aſſertion, ſuppoſeth the Tyrians to haue bene Edumæans, deſcended from Eſau, Jacobs brother : firſt, it can hardly be beleued that Tyre, when it flouriſhed moſt in her ancient glory, was in any ſort truly deuout and religious. But to this end (beſides the prooffe which the Scriptures giue of *Hiram*s good affection when Salomon built the Temple) hee brings many conſiderall arguments ; whereof the ſtrongeſt is their pettigree and deſcent : it being likely in his opinion, that the poſterity of Eſau receiued from him by Tradition the Religion of Abraham and Iſaac. That the Tyrians were Edumæans, he endeouours to ſhew, partly by weakere reaſons, painfully ſtrained from ſome affinity of names, which are arguments of more delight than waight : partly by authority. For Strabo, Herodotus, Pliny, and others witneſſe, that the Tyrians came from the red Sea, in which there were three Ilands, called Tyrus, Aradus, and Sidon : which very names (as he thinketh) were afterwards giuen to the Cities of Phœnicia. Conſidering therefore that all the coaſt of the Red Sea, was (in his opinion) vnder the Edumæans : as Elah and Eſionaber ; or vnder the Amalekites, who deſcended of Amalec the Nephew of Eſau, whole chiefe City was Adian, ſo called of Adian the ſonne of Abraham by Cethura, whole poſterity did people it : the conſequence appeares good (as he takes it) that the Tyrians originally were Edomites : differing little or nothing in Religion from the children of Iſrael. Hereunto hee addes, that Cadmus and his Companions brought not into Greece the worſhip of Aſturtis, the Idoll of the Sidonians. That the Parents of Thales and Pherecydes being Phœnicians, themſelves differed much in their Phyloſophy from the Idolatrous cuſtomes of the Greeks. That in Teman, a Towne of the Edumæans, was an Vniuerſity, wherein as may appeare by Eliphaz the Temanite, who diſputed with Iob, Religion was ſincerely taught.

Such is the diſcourſe of Bozius, who labouring to proue one Paradoxe by another, deferues in both very little credit. For neither doth it follow, that if the Tyrians were Edumæans, they were then of the true Religion, or well affected to God and his people : neither is it true that they were Edumæans at all. In what Religion Eſau brought vp his children, it is no where found written, but that himſelfe was a prophane man, and diſvowed by God, the Scriptures in plainne termes expreſſe. That his poſterity were Idolaters, is directly proued in the 25. Chapter of the ſecond booke of Chronicles. That the Edomites were perpetual enemies to the Houſe of Iſrael, ſaue only when Dauid & ſome of his race, Kings of Juda, held them in ſubiection, who knowes not : or who is ignorant rant of *Dauid*s vnfriendly behaviour amongst them, when firſt they were, ſubdued : Surely it was not any argument of Kindred or Alliance, betwene Tyrus and Mount Seir, that Hiram held ſuch good correſpondence with Dauid : euen then when Iobab ſlew all the males of Edom : neither was it for their deuotion to God, and good affection to Iſrael, that the Edomites were ſo ill intreated. It ſeemeth that the piety and ancient wiſedome of Eliphaz the Temanite was then forgotten, and the Edumæans puniſhed, for being ſuch as Dauid in his owne dayes found them. Although indeed the City of Teman whence Eliphaz came to reaſon with Iob, is not that in Edumæa, but another of the ſame name, lying Eaſt from the Sea of Galilee, and adioyning to Hus, the country of Iob : and to ſuch the City of Biſlad the Subite, as both ſuch Chorographers who beſt know ſhore parts, doe plainly ſhew, and the holy Text makes manifeſt. For Iob is ſaid to haue exceeded in riches ; and Salomon in wiſedome, all the people of the Eaſt ; not the inhabitants of Mount Seir, which lay due South from Paleſtina. True it iſt that Eliphaz the ſonne of Eſau had a ſonne called Teman : but that Fathers were wont in thoſe dayes to take name of their ſonnes, I no where finde. And Iſrael alſo had a ſon called Thema : of whom it is not vnlike that Theman in the Eaſt had the name : for as much as in the 7. Chap. of the booke of Judges, the Midianites, Amalekites, and alſo the of the Eaſt are called Iſmaelites. And he that well conſiders how great and ſtrong a Nation Amalec was, which duſt giue bataile to the Hoſt of Iſrael, wherein were 600000. able men, will hardly beleue that ſuch a people were deſcended from one of *Eſau*s grand-children. For how powerfull and numberleſſe muſt the forces of all Edom haue bene : if one Tribe of them, yea, one Family of a Tribe had bene ſo great : ſurely Mount Seir and all the Regions adioyning could not haue held them. But we no where finde that Edom had to doe with Amalec : or aſſiſted the Amalekites : when Saul went to roote them out. For Amalec is no where in Scripture named as a Tribe of Edom : but a Nation of it ſelfe, if diſtinct from the Iſmaelites. The like may be ſaid of Midian, that the Founder thereof being ſon to Abraham by Cethura, doubtleſſe was no Edomite. And thus much in generall for all the ſeignory of the Red-ſea coaſt, which Bozius imagines the Edumæans to haue held : if the Edomites in after-times held ſome places, as Elan and Eſionaber on the Red Sea ſhore, yet in Moſes time, which was long after the building of Tyre, they held them not. For Moſes himſelfe ſaith, that Iſrael did compaſſe all the borders of Edom : within which limits had Midian flood, Moſes muſt needs haue known it : becauſe he had ſoourned long in that Country : and there had left his wife and children, when he went into Egypt.

But conſiderall Arguments, how probable focuer, are needleſſe in ſo manifeſt a caſe. For in the 83. Pal. Edom, Amalec, and Tyre, are named as diſtinct Nations : yea the Tyrians and Sidonians being one people, as all good Authours ſhew, and Bozius himſelfe confeſſeth, were Canaanites, as appeares, Gen. c. 10. v. 15. & 19. appointed by God to haue bene deſtroyed, and their Lands giuen to the children of Aſſer, Iof. 19. becauſe they were Idolaters, and of the curſed ſeed of Canaan, not Couſins to Iſrael, nor profeſſors of the ſame Religion. For though Hiram ſaid, Bleſſed bee God that hath ſent King Dauid a miſe ſonne : wee cannot inferre that he was of *Dauid*s Religion. The Turke hath ſaid as much of Chriſtian Princes, his confederates. Certaine it is, that the Sidonians then worſhipped Aſtaroth ; and drew Salomon alſo to the ſame Idolatry.

Whereas Hiram ayded Salomon in building the Temple, hee did it for his owne ends, receiuing therefore of Salomon great prouiſion of Corne, and Oyle, and the offer of 20. Townes and Villages in Galilee. And if we rightly conſider things, it will appeare that Hiram in all points, dealt Merchant-like with Salomon. Hee allowed him Timber, with which Libanus was, and yet is ouer-peſſered, being otherwiſe apt to yeeld ſilkes : as the Andarine ſilkes which come from thence, and other good commodities. For Corne and Oyle, which he wanted, he gaue that which he could well ſpare to Salomon. Alſo Gold for Land : wherein Salomon was the wiſer ; who hauing got the gold firſt, gaue to Hiram the worke Villages that he had : with which the Tyrian was ill pleaſed. But it was a neceſſary policy which enforced Tyrus to hold league with Iſrael. For Dauid had ſubdued Moab, Ammon, Edom, the Aramites, and a great part of Arabia, euen to Euphrates : thorough which Countries the Tyrians were wont to carry and re-carrie their Wares on Camels, to their ſhips on the Red Sea, and backe againe to Tyrus : ſo that Salomon being Lord of all the Countries through which they were to paſſe, could haue cut off their Trade.

But the Israelites were no Sea-men, and therefore glad to share with the Tyrians in their adventures. Yet Salomon as Lord of the Sea-townes, which his Father had taken from the Philistines, might have greatly distressed the Tyrians, & perhaps have brought them even into subjection. Which Hiram knowing, was glad (and no meruaile) that Salomon rather meant as a man of peace to employ his Fathers treasure, in magnificent workes, than in pursuing the conquest of all Syria. Therefore he willingly ayded him, and sent him cunning workmen, to encrease his delight in goodly buildings, imageries, and instruments of pleasure.

As these passages betwene Salomon and Hiram, are no strong Arguments of pietie in the Tyrians: to those other proofes which Bozius frames negatively vpon particular examples are very weak. For what the Religion of Cadmus was, I thinke, no man knowes. It seemes to me, that hauing more cunning than the Greekes, and being very ambitious, he would faine haue purchased diuine honours: which his Daughters, Nephewes, and others of his house obtained, but his owne many misfortunes beguiled him of such hopes, if he had any. Thales and Pherecydes are but single examples: Euery saluage Nation hath some wisdom excellen the Vulgar, euen of ciuill people. Neither did the morall wisdom of these men expresse any true knowledge of the true God. Only they made no good mention of the gods of Greece: whom being newly come thither, they knew not. It is no good argument to say, that Cadmus and Thales being Tyrians, are not knowne to haue taught Idolatry, therefore the Tyrians were not Idolaters. But this is of force, That Carthage, Vtica, Leptis, Cadix, and all Colonies of the Tyrians (of which I thinke, the Ilands before mentioned in the Red Sea to haue bene, for they traded in all Seas) were Idolaters, euen from their first beginnings: therefore, the Tyrians who planted them, and to whom they had reference, were so likewise.

This their Idolatry from Salomon's time on-wards is acknowledged by Bozius, who would haue vs thinke them to haue bene formerly a strange kinde of deuout Edomites. In which fancie he is so peremptory, that he styleth men of contrary opinion, Impii politici, as if it were impiety to thinke that God (who euen among the Heathen, which haue not knowne his name, doth fauour Vertue and hate Vice) hath often rewarded morall honesty, with temporall happinesse. Doubtlesse, this doctrine of Bozius would better haue agreed with Julian the Apostata, than with Cyril. For if the Assyrians, Greeks, Romanes, and all those Nations of the Gentiles, did then prosper most, when they drew neere vnto the true Religion: what may bee said of the foule Idolatry which grew in Rome, as fast as Rome it selfe grew: and was enlarged with some new superstition, almost vpon euery new victory? How few great battailes did the Romanes win, in which they vned not either a Temple to some new god, or some new honour to one of their old gods? yea, what one Nation, saue onely that of the Iewes, was subdued by them, whose gods they did not afterward entertaine in their City? Onely the true God, which was the God of the Iewes, they reiected, vpbraiding the Iewes with him, as if he were vnworthy of the Romane Maiesty: shall we hereupon enforce the lewd and foolish conclusion, which Heathen writers vied against the Christians in the Primitive Church: That such Idolatry had caused the Citie of Rome to flourish, and that the decay of those abominations did also bring with it the decay of the Empire? It might well be thought so, if prosperitie were a signe or effect of true Religion. Such is the blinde zeale of Bozius, who writing against those whom he falsely termes impious, giues strength to such as are impious indeed. But such indiscretion is usually found among men of his humour; who hauing once either foolishly embraced the dreames of others, or vainely fashioned in their owne braines any strange Chimera's of Diuinity, condemne all such in the pride of their zeale, as Atheists and Infidels, that are not transported with the like intemperate ignorance. Great pittie it is, that such mad dogges are oftentimes encouraged by those, who hauing the command of many tongues, when they themselves cannot touch a man in open and generous opposition, will wound him secretly by the malicious verue of an Hypocrite.

CHAP. IX.

Of the Tribe of Ephraim, and of the Kings of the ten Tribes, whose head was Ephraim.

§. I.

Of the memorable places in the Tribe of Ephraim.

Coming now past ouer Phenicia, wee come to the next Territorie adioyning: which is that of Ephraim: sometime taken per excellentiam for the whole Kingdome of the ten Tribes. Ephraim was the second sonne of Ioseph, whose issues when they left Egypt were in number 45000. all which dying in the Deserts, (Iosua excepted) there entred the Holy Land of their children growne to be able men 32500. who fate downe on the West side of Iordan, betwene Manasse, and Beniamin: who bounded Ephraim by the North and South; as Iordan, and the Mediterran Sea, did by the East and West.

The best and chiefe Citie which Ephraim had, was Samaria, the Metropolis of the Kingdome of Israel, built by Amurri or Homeri King thereof, and seated on the toppes of the Mountaine Somron, which ouerlooketh all the bottom, and as farre as the Sea-coast. It was afterward called Sebaste, or Augusta, in honour of Augustus Cesar. This Citie is oftentimes mentred in the Scriptures: and magnificent it was in the first building; for as Brochard obserueth, the ruines which yet remaine, and which Brochard found greater than those of Hierusalem, tell those that behold them, what it was when it stood vpright: for to this day there are found great store of goodly Marble pillars, with other hewne and carved stone in great abundance, among the rubble.

It was beaten to the ground by the sonnes of Hircanus the high Priest: restored and built by the first Herod the son of Antipater: who to flatter Cesar called it Sebaste. Herein were the Prophets Heliſeus, and Abdias buried: and so was Iohn Baptist. It now hath nothing but a few Cottages filled with Greecian Monkes.

Neere Samaria towards the South, is the Hill of Bethel, and a towne of that name: on the top of which Mountaine, Ieroboam erected one of his golden Calues, to be worshipped: with which he seduced the Israelites.

In sight of this Mountaine of Bethel, was that ancient Citie of Sichem; after the restitution called Neapolis, now Pelusa, and Napolsa: It was destroyed by Simcon and Leui, in reuenge of the ransliment of their sister Dina: and after that by Abimelec euened with the foyle. Ieroboam raised it vp againe: and the Damascens a third time cast it downe.

Vnder Sichem toward the Sea standeth Pharathon or Pirbathon, on the Mountaine Amalec, the Citie of Abdon Iudge of Israel. And vnder it Bethoron of the Leuites, built as it is said by Sara, the daughter of Ephraim. Neere to this Citie Iudas Macchabeus ouerthrew Saron and Lysias, Lieutenants to Antiochus. This Citie had Salomon formerly repaired and fortified.

Betweene Bethoron and the Sea, standeth Samir, of which Iosf. 10. and Saron whose King was slaine by Iosua: it is also mentioned Acts 9. 35. and of this Saron the Valley taketh name, which beginning at Cesarea Palestina, extendeth it selfe alongst the coast as farre as Ioppe, faith Adrichome: though indeed the name Saronis is not particularly giuen to this Valley, but to euery fruitfull plaine Region: for not onely this Valley is so called, to wit, betwene Cesarea and Ioppe, but that also betwene the Mountaine Tabor and the Sea of Galilee: for so S. Hierome vpon the five and thirtieth Chapter of Esay, interprets the word Saron: and so doth the same Father in his Commentaries vpon Abdias, read Saron for Affaron: vnderstanding thereby a Plaine neere Lidda: which Lidda in his time was called Diopola, or the City of Iupiter, one of the Toparchies of Iudea, the best in dignitie (or the third after Pliny) where Saint Peter (non Iua, sed Christi virtute) cured Saron. Niger calls all that Region from Anti-libanus to Ioppe, Saronis. This Ioppe was was burnt to the ground by the Romanes, those Rapens and spoylers of all Estates, disturbers of Common-weales, vsurpers of other Princes Kingdomes; who with no other respect led than to amplify their own glory, troubled the whole world: and themselves, after murdering one another, became a prey to the most Savage and barbarous Nations.

Of this Saint George, see more about in this booke, C. §. 3. l. 3.

In Diopolis (saith Will. of Tyre) was S. George beheaded, and buried: in whose honour and memory Iustinian the Emperour caused a faire Church to bee built over his Tombe; these be Tyrius his words: Relicta de atrig lacis maritimis Antepatrie, et Ioppe, per late patentem planitiem Elutheriam pertransiunt, Liddam que est Diopolis, ubi et egregij Martiris Georgij vsque hodie Sepulchrum ostenditur, pervenerunt, eius Ecclesiam quum ad honorem eiusdem Martiris pios & orthodoxos Principes Romanorum, Augustus Iustinianus multo studio & devotione prompta edificari preceperat, &c. They having left (saith he) on the right hand, the Sea Townes Antipatrii, and Ioppe, passing over the great open plaine of Elutheria, came so Lidda, which is Diopolis: where the sumptuous Tombe of the famous Martyr S. George is at this day shewed; whose Church, when the Godly and Orthodox Prince of the Romanes, High and Mighty Iustinian had commanded to be built, with great earnestnesse and present deuotion, &c. Thus saith Tyrius: by whose testimony, wee may coniecture that this S. George was not that Arrian Bishop of Alexandria; but rather some better Christian: for this of Alexandria was slaine there in an vppore of the people, and his ashes cast into the Sea, as Ammianus Marcellinus reports. And yet also it may be, that this Georgius was a better Christian, than he is commonly thought: for his words of the Temple of Genius, How long shall this Sepulchre stand? occasioned the vppore of the people against him: as fearing lest he would gie attempt to overthrow that beautifull Temple. This also Marcellinus reports, who though he say that this Georgius was also deadly hated of the Christians, who else might have rescued him: yet he addeth, that his ashes, with the ashes of two others, were therefore cast into the Sea, lest if their Reliques had beene gathered vp, Churches should bee built for them, as for others. But for my part, I rather thinke that it was not Georgius, whose name lies in the right honourable Order of our Knights of the Garter, but rather another, whom Tyrius about cited, witnesseth to have beene buried at Lidda or Diopolis. The same also is confirmed by Vitricus. Saint Hierome affirms that it was sometime called Tigrida, and while the Christians inhabited the Holy Land, it had a Bishop Suffragan.

Neere to Lidda or Diopolis standeth Ramatha of the Leuites, or Aramathia: afterward Rama, and Ramula, the native Citie of Ioseph, which buried the body of Christ. There are many places which beare this name of Rama; one they set in the Tribe of Juda neere Thecua in the way of Hebron; another in Nephtalim, not far from Sepher; a third in Zabulon, which they say, adioyneth to Sepheris; a fourth, which they make the same with Silo; and a fifth, which is this Rama, in the Hills of Ephraim, called Rama-Sophim, where Samuel liued, and wherein he is buried. From hence to the North alongst the coast are Helon, or Aialon of the Leuites, of which 1. Chron. 6. Apollonia, of which Iosephus in his Antiquities, and in the war of the Jewes. Also Balsalifa (for which Iunius, 2. Reg. 4. 42. reads planities Salitis) they place hereabout in this Tribe of Ephraim; but Iunius vpon 1. Sam. 6. where we read of the Land of Salitis, findeth it in Beniamin.

On the other side of the Mountaines of Ephraim standeth Gofsa, one of the Toparchies or Cities of government, the second in dignity, of which the Country about it taketh name.

1. Reg. 1. c. 9. It is called Thimnath (about 1. Reg. 1. c. 9. 10.)

Hieron. 1. c. 1. Hebr.

Mac. 1. c. 7. 10.

Then Thamnath-sarah, or according to the Hebrew, Thimnath-Serach: one also of the ten Toparchies or Presidencies of Juda, which they call Thamnitis; a goodly City and strong, seated on one of the high Hills of Ephraim; on the North of the hill called Gasa, which City and Territory, Israel gaue vnto their Leader Iosua; who also amplified it with buildings, neere which he was buried. His Sepulchre remained in S. Hieromes time, and ouer it the Sunne engrauen, in memory of that greatest of wonders which God wrought in Iosua's time.

In the places adioyning standeth Adarsa, or Adasa; where Judas Maccabeus with 3000. Jewes overthrowed the Army of Nicanor, Lieutenant of Syria; neere to Gafir or Gazer which Iosua tooke, and hung their King; a Citie of the Leuites. It was afterward taken by Pharaoh of Egypt; the people all slaine, and the Citie razed; Salomon re-built it.

To

To the East of this place is the Frontier City of Iesseti, of which Ios. 16. 3. otherwise Pellathi, whence David had part of his Prætorian Souldiers, vnder the charge of Benia. Then that high and famous Mountaine and City of Silo, whereon the Arke of God was kept so many yceres, till the Philistims got it.

To this they ioine the City of Machmas, or Michmas: in which Ionathas Maccabeus See in Beniamin inhabited, a place often remembered in the Scriptures. It standeth in the common way from Samaria towards Hierusalem: and is now called Byra.

Then the Village of Naioth where Saul prophesied; and neere it Ephron, one of those Cities which Abrah recovered from Ieroboam; after the great ouerthrow giuen him. 10. Then Kimbrsam, of the Leuites, of which Iosua 2. 22. which Iunius thinks to be the same with Iokmeham, of which 1. Chro. 6. 28. As for Abisalom Baalafor, which they finde hereabout, Iunius reads it in the Plaine of Chazor; and findes it in the Tribe of Juda; as Ios. 15. we read of two Chazors in that Tribe; one neere Kedelh, v. 23. and the other the same as Chetron, v. 25.

In this Tribe also they finde the City of Mello; whose Citizens, they say, ioyned with the Sichemites in making the Baithard Abimelec King: adding that for the building thereof with other Cities, Salomon raised a Tribute vpon the people. But it seemes that Mello or Millo is a common name of a strong Fort or Cittadell: and so Iunius for domus & 20. Millo, reads incola munitionis, and for Salomo edificabit Millo, hee reads edificabit munitionem, and so the Septuagint reads ἡ πόλις in that place. And without doubt the Millo which Salomon built, cannot be that of Sichem, but another in Hierusalem.

The other Cities of marke in Ephraim, are Taphuach, whose King was slaine by Iosua and Ianoach or Ianoah spoyled by Teglarphalassar; Pekah then gouerning Israel; with diuers others, but of no great fame. The Mountaines of Ephraim sometime signifie the greatest part of the Land of the sonnes of Ioseph, on the West of Jordan: seuerall parts whereof are the Hill of Samron or Samaria, 1. Reg. 16. 24. * the Hill of Gahas, Iudg. 2. 9. * the Hill of Talmon or Salmon, Iudg. 9. 48. the Hills of the Region of Tuph or Tiofphim, Iudg. 9. 5. where Rama-Tiofphim stood, which was the City of Samuel.

The great plenty of fruitfull Vines vpon the sides of the Mountaines, was the occasion that Iacob in the Spirit of Prophecie, Gen. 49. 22. compared Ioseph's two branches, Ephraim and Manasse, to the branches of a fruitful Vine planted by the Well side, and spreading her * Daughter-branches along the Wall: which Allegory also Ezekiel, c. 22. in his Lamentation for Ephraim (that is, for the ten Tribes, whose head was Ephraim) proseques: as also in his Lamentation for Juda, he followeth the other Allegory of Iacob, Gen. 49. 9. comparing Juda to a Lyon. Vpon the top of one of the highest of these Hills of Ephraim, which ouerlooketh all the plaines on both sides of Jordan, they finde the Citie called Dok; which they make to be the same with Dagon, of which Ioseph, 1. Reg. 1. c. 2. in which Cattle as it is, 1. Mac. 16. Protonie most traiterously, at a banquet, slew Simon Maccabeus his Father in Law.

Among the Riuer of this Tribe of Ephraim, they name Gaas, remembered in the second of Samuel, c. 23. v. 30. where though Iunius reads Hiddai ex una vallium Gahasi; yet the Vulgar and Vatablus reads Giddai of the Riuer of Gaas. Also in this Tribe they place the Riuer of Carith, by which the Prophet Elias abode during the great drought: where he was fed with the Raucens; and after that the Riuer was dried vp, hee trauailed (by the Spirit of God guided) towards Sidon: where he was relieved by the poore Widow of Zarepta, whose dead sonne he reuiued, and increased her pittance of Meale and Oyle: whereby she sustained her life.

§. II. Of the Kings of the ten Tribes from Ieroboam to Achab.

F the first Kings of Israel, I omit in this place to speake: and referue it to the Catalogue of the Kings of Juda: of whom hereafter.

Touching the acts of the Kings of the ten Tribes, but briefly, beginning after the dissolution from Juda and Beniamin, now it followeth to speake. The first of these Kings Ieroboam, the sonne of Nebat, an Ephrahithe of Zereda, who being a man of strength & courage, was by Salomon made ouerfeer of the buildings of the Munition in Hierusalem; for as much as he belonged to the charge of the Tribes of Ephraim & Manasse so many of them as wrought in those Works. During which time as he went from Hierusalem, Hiernsalem, he encountered the Prophet Ahijah: who made him know that he was by God destined to be King of Israel, and to command tenne of the twelve Tribes. After this, fearing that those things might come to Salomons knowledge, he fled into Egypt to Shishbak, whom Eusebius calleth Ochozias; whose Daughter hee married: the Predecessor of which Shishbak (if not the same) did likewise entertaine Adad the Edumæan, when he was carried young into Egypt from the furie of Dauid, and his Captaine Isab, which Adad, the King of Egypt married to his Wiues sister Taphnes; vsing both him and Ieroboam as instruments to shake the Kingdome of Iuda; that himselfe might the easilier spoile it, as hee did: for in the fifth yeare of Rehoboam, Shishbak took the Citie of Hiernsalem, and carried thence all the treasure of Dauid and Salomon, and all the spoyles which Dauid tooke from Adadazer of Soba, with the presents of Tobu, King of Hamath, which were of an inestimable value.

This Ieroboam after the death of Salomon became Lord of the tenne Tribes: and though he were permitted by God to gouerne the Israelites, and from a meane man exalted to that state: yet preferring the policies of the world before the seruice and honour of God (as fearing that if the Tribes vnder his rule should repaire to Hiernsalem to doe their vsall Sacrifices, they might be drawne from him by degrees) he erected two golden Calues, one in Dan, and another in Bethel, for the people to worship (an imitation of the Egyptian Apis, saith S. Ambrose, or rather of Aurons Calfe in Horeb;) further he made election of his Priests out of the basest and vnlearned people. This King made his chiefe seate and Palace at Sichem: Hee despised the warning of the Iudaean Prophet, whom Iosephus calleth Adon, and Glycus Isel: his hand there-after withered, and was againe restored: but continuing in his Idolatrie; and hardened vpon occasion that the Prophet returning was slaine by a Lyon, Ahijah makes him know, that God purposed to roote out his posterity.

Hee was afterward ouerthrowne by Abia King of Iuda, and died after hee had gouerned two and twenty yeeres; whom Nadab his son succeeded: who in the second yeere of his raigne, together with all the race of Ieroboam, was slaine, and rooted out by Baasha, who reigned in his stead: so Nadab liued King but two yeeres.

Baasha the sonne of Ahijah, the third King after the partition, made warre with Afa King of Iuda: he seated himselfe in Thersa: and fortified Rama against Iuda, to restraine their excursions. Hereupon Afa entertained Benhadad of Damascus against him, who inuaded Nephtalim, and destroyed many places therein: the meane while Afa carried away the materials, with which Baasha intended to fortifie Rama; but being an Idolater, he was thwartened by Iehu the Prophet, that it should befall his race, as it did to Ieroboam: which afterward came to passe: He ruled foure and twenty yeeres, and died.

To Baasha succeeded Ela his sonne, who at a feast at his Palace of Thersa, was in his cups slaine by Zambri, after he had reigned two yeeres: and in him the prophetic of Iehu was fulfilled.

Zambri succeeded Ela, and assumed the name of a King seuen dayes; But Ambri in reuenge of the Kings Murther, set vpon Zambri, or Zimri; and inclosed him in Thersa, and forced him to burne himselfe.

Ambri or Homri succeeded Ela, and transferred the Regall seate from Thersa to Samaria: which hee bought of Shemer, built, and fortified it. This Ambri was also an Idolater, no lesse impious than the rest: and therefore subiect to Tabremmon, King of Syria; the Father of Benadad according to Eusebius, Nicéphorus, and Zossus: but how this should stand, I doe not well conceiue; seeing Benadad the sonne of Tabremmon was inuited by Afa King of Iuda, to assaile Baasha King of Israel, the Father of Ela who forewent Ambri. This Ambri reigned twelue yeeres, fixe in Thersa, and fixe in Samaria, and left two children, Achab and Athalia.

§. III.

Of Achab and his Successors, with the captiuitie of the ten Tribes.

Achab or Ahab succeeded Omri, who not onely vp-held the Idolatrie of Ieroboam borrowed of the Egyptians: but he married Iezabel the Zidonian: and as Ieroboam followed the Religion of his Egyptian Wife: so did Achab of his Zidonian.

nian: and erected an Altar and a Grove to Baal in Samaria. Hee suffered Iezabel to kill the Prophets of the most high God. God sent famine on the Land of Israel. Achab met Elias: Elias preuailed in the triall of the Sacrifice, and killeth the false Prophets; and afterward flyeth for feare of Iezabel.

Benadad, not long after besieged Samaria: and taken by Achab, was by him set at liberty: for which the Prophet (whom Glycus calleth Michas) reproouth him: afterward he caused Naboth by a false accusation to be stoned. Then ioyning with Iosaphat in the warre for the recovery of Ramoth, he was slaine, as Michas had foretold him.

Hee had three sonnes named in the Scripture, Ochozias, Ioram, and Ious: besides seuentie other sonnes by sundry wiues and concubines.

Ochozias succeeded his father Achab. The Moabites fell from his obedience: he bruised himselfe by a fall: and sent for counsaile to Beel-zebub the God of Achaz. Elias the Prophet meeteth the messenger on the way: and mistaking that Ochozias sought helpe from that dead Idoll, asked the messenger, If there were not a God in Israel? Ochozias fendeth two Captaines, and with each fifty souldiers to bring Elias vnto him, both which with their Attendants were consumed with fire. The third Captaine besought mercy at Elias hands, and he spared him, and went with him to the King, anowing it to the King that he must then die, which came to passe in the second yeare of his raigne.

Ioram, the brother of Ochozias by Iezabel, succeeded: Hee allured Iosaphat King of Iu-da, and the King of Edom to assist him againe against the Moabites, who refused to pay him the tribute of 20000. sheepe. The three Kings wanted water, for themselves and their Horses, in the Deserts. The Prophet Elisha causeth the ditches to flow. The Moabites are ouerthrowne: their King flyeth to Kiharafeth, and being besieged, according to some Expositors, burnt his sonne on the walls as a Sacrifice, whereat the three Kings, moued with compassion, returned and left Moab, wasting and spoiling that Region. Others, as it seemes with better reason, vnderstand the Text to speake of the sonne of the King of Eddom, whom they suppose in this irruption to haue beene taken prisoner by the Moabites, and that the King of Moab shewed him ore the walls, threatening, vnlesse the siege were disfolued, that he would offer him in sacrifice to his gods. Whereupon the King of Edom besought those of Iuda and Israel to breake off the siege for the safety of his sonne: which when the other Kings refused to yeeld vnto, & that Moab according to his former threatning had burnt the King of Edom sonne vpon the rampire, that all the assailants might discerne it, the king of Edom being by this sad spectacle enraged, forsooke the party of the other Kings, for want of whose assistance the siege was broken vp.

After this the King of Aram sent to Ioram, to heale Naaman the Captaine of his Armie of the Leprosie. The answer of Ioram was; Am I God to kill, and to giue life, that hee doth send to heale a man from his Leprosie? adding, that the Aramite ought not matter of quarrell against him. Elisha hearing thereof, willed the King to send Naaman to him; promising that hee should know that there was a Prophet in Israel; and Naaman was healed by washing himselfe seuen times in Iordan. Elisha refused the gifts of Naaman; but his seruant Gehazi accepted a part thereof: from whence the sellers of spirituall gifts are called Gehazites, as the buyers are Simonians of Simon Magus.

Afterward Benhadad King of Aram or Damascus, hauing heard that this Prophet did discouer to the king of Israel whatsoeuer the Aramite consulted in his secretest coun-cell, sent a troupe of horse to take Elisha: all whom Elisha strooke blinde, and brought them captiues into Samaria: Ioram then asked leaue of the Prophet to slay them, Elisha forbad him to harme them: but caused them to be fed and sent backe to their own Prince in safetie.

The King of Aram notwithstanding these benefites, did againe attempt Samaria, and brought the Citizens to extreame famine. Ioram imputeth the cause thereof to the Prophet Elisha. Elisha by prayer caused a noife of Chariots and armour to sound in the ayre, whereby the Aramites affrighted, fled away, and left the siege. An act of great admiration, as the same is written in the second of Kings. After this, when Azael obtained the kingdome of Syria by the death of his Master, Ioram entring vpon his frontier, tooke Ramoth Gilead in which war he received diuers wounds, and returned to Iezreel to be cured. But whilst he lay there, Iehu (who commanding the armie of Ioram in Gilead, was anointed king by one of the children of the Prophets sent by Elisha) surprised and slew both him and all that belonged vnto him, rooting out the whole posteritie of Abab.

Iehu who reigned after Iehoram, destroyed not onely the race of his fore-goers, but also their religion; for which he received a promise from God, That his seed should occupie the Throne vnto the fourth generation. Yet hee vpheld the Idolatry of Ieroboam, for which he was plagued with grievous warre, wherein hee was beaten by Hazeel the Aramite, who spoiled all the Countries to the East of Jordan: in which warre hee was slaine, faith Cederus: whereof the Scriptures are silent. Iehu reigned 28.yeeres.

Ioachaz or Iehoahaz the sonne of Iehu succeeded his father, whom Azael and his son Benhadad often inuaded, and in the end subiected, leauing him onely 50. horse, 20. chariots, and 10000. foot; and as it is written in the Scriptures, he made them like dust beaten into powder. Ioachaz reigned 17.yeeres.

After ioachaz was his sonne gouerned Israel, who when hee repired to Elisba the Prophet as hee lay on his death-bed, the Prophet promised him three victories ouer the Aramites: and first commanded him to lay his hand on his bowe, and Elisba couered the Kings hands with his, and bad him open the window westward (which was toward Damascus) and then shoot an arrow thence out. Hee againe willed him to beate the ground with his arrowes, who smote it thrice and ceased: The Prophet then told him, that hee should haue smitten five or six times, and then he should haue had so many victories ouer the Aramites as he gaue strokes. And so it succeeded with Ioas, who ouerthrew the Aramites in three battels, and recovered the Cities and Territorie from Benhadad the sonne of Azael, which his Father ioachaz had lost. He also ouerthrew Amazias King of Juda, who prouoked him to make the warre, whereupon he entred Hierusalem, and sacked it with the Temple. This Ioas reigned sixteene yeeres and died; in whose time also the Prophet Elisba exchanged this life for a better.

Ieroboam the third from Iehu, followed Ioas his father, an Idolater as his predecessors; but he recovered all the rest of the lands belonging to Israel, from Hamath which is neere Libanus, to the dead Sea, and raigned one and forty yeeres.

Zacharias the fift and last of the house of Iehu, slaine by Shallum his vassall, who raigned in his stead, gouerned six moneths. Shallum held the kingdom but one moneth, being slaughtered by Menahem of the Gadites.

Menahem who tooke reuenge of Shallum, vsed great crueltie to those that did not acknowledge him: ripping the bellies of those that were with child. This Menahem being inuaded by Phul, bought his peace with ten thousand talents of siluer, which hee exacted by a Tribute of fifty shekels from euery man of wealth in Israel. Menahem gouerned twenty yeeres.

Pekahiah or Phaccia, or after Zonaras, Phaccia succeeded, and after hee had ruled two yeeres he was slaine by phaca or Pekah the Commander of his army, who raigned in his place. In this Pekahs time, Phulassar or Tiglat-Phylassar inuaded the kingdome of Israel, and wan Lion, Abel-bethmaaca, Ianoach, Keasb, Isfor, and Gilead, with all the Cities of Galilee, carrying them captiues into Assyria: he was drawne in by Achas king of Juda, against Pekah and Rezin, the last of the Adades. For Achas being wasted by Pekah of Israel, and by Rezin of Damascus, did a third time borrow the Church riches, & therewith engaged the Assyrian, who first suppressed the Monarchy of Syria and Damascus, and then of Israel: and this inuading of the great Assyrian, was the vtter ruine of both States, of Israel and of Juda, Pekah reigned twenty yeeres.

Then Isabea or Osca, who slew Pekah, became the vassall of Salmanassar; but hoping to shake off the Assyrian yoke, he sought aide from So, or Sua, or Selucius King of Egypt: which being knowne to the Assyrian, he cast him into prison, besieged Samaria, and mastered it: carried the ten idolatrous Tribes into Ninive in Assyria, and into Rages in Media, and into other Easterne Regions, and there disperfed them: and replanted Samaria with diuers Nations, and chiefly with the Cuthie (inhabiting about Cutha a riuer in Persia, or rather in Arabia Deserta) and with the people Catanei bounding vpon Syria, and with those of Sepharuaim (a people of Sephar in Mesopotamia vpon Euphrates, of whose conquest Senacherib vaunteth) also with those of Aua, which were of the ancient Asiis, who inhabited the Land of the Philistins in Abrabams time, dwelling neere vnto Gaza, whom the Capitarius rooted out: and at this time they were of Arabia the Desert, called Itanei, willing to returne to their ancient seates. To these he added those of Chamath or or Itanei, the ancient enemies of the Israelites, and sometime the Vassalls of the Adades of Damascus, which so often afflicted them: And thus did this Assyrian aduise himselfe better than the Romans did. For after Titus and Vespasian had wasted the Cities of Iudaea, and Hierusalem, they carried the people away captiue: but left no others in their places, but a very few simple labourers, besides their owne thin Garrisons, which soon decayed: and thereby they gaue that dangerous entrance to the Arabians and Saracens, who neuer could be driven thence againe to this day.

And this transmigration, plantation, and diplantation, happened in the yeare of the world 3292. the fifth yeare of Ezekiah King of Juda: and the ninth of Hofa the last King of Israel.

CHAP. X.

Of the memorable places of Dan, Simeon, Iuda, Reuben, Gad, and the other halfe of Manasse.

§. I.

Of Dan, whereof Ioppe, Gath, Accaron, Azotus, and other Townes.

Now following the coast of the Mediterran Sea, that portion of Land assigned to the Tribe of Dan, ioyneth to Ephraim, whereof I spake last: of which family there were numbred at Mount Sinai 62700. fighting men, all which leauing their bodies with the rest in the Deserts, there entered the Holy Land of their sonnes 66400. bearing armes. The first famous Citie in this Tribe on the Sea-coast was Ioppe, or Iapho, as in the 19. of Isaia: one of the most ancientest of the World, and the most famous of others on that coast, because it was the Port of Hierusalem. From hence Ioas embarked himselfe when he fled from the seruice of God, towards Tharhis in Cilicia. In the time of the Macchabees this Citie receiued many changes: and while Iudas Macchabeus gouerned the Iewes, the Syrians that were in Garrison in Ioppe, hauing their fleet in the Port, inuited 200. principall Citizens aboard them, and cast them all into the Sea: which Iudas reuenged by firing their fleet, and putting the companies which sought to escape, to the sword.

In Afalon, as some say, was that wicked Herod borne, that seeking after our Saviour, caused all the Male-children of two yeares old and under to be slaine. In the Christian times it had a Bishop, and after that, when it was by the Saladin defaced, Richard King of England, while he made Warre in the Holy Land, gaue it a new wall and many build- ings. Eius muros cum Saladinus diruisset, Richardus Anglorum Rex instaurauit, saith Arichemus.

2 Sam. 1.

In Dauid time it was one of the most renowned Cities of the Philistims: for hee nameth Gath and Afalon onely, when he lamenteth the death of Saul and Ionathan: not speaking of the other three. Tell it not in Gath, nor publish it not in the streets of Afalon: It is now called Scalone. Gabinus restored it as he did Azotus and Gaza.

Vol. 1. 11.

Next to Afalon stood Gaza or Gazera, which the Hebrewes call Hazza, the Syrians Azan: of Azonus (as they say) the sonne of Heracles. Other prophane writers affirme, that it was build by Iupiter. Pomp. Met. giues the building thereof to Cambyses the Persian; because belike hee rebuilt it, and Gaza in the Persian tongue is as much to say as Treasure. This Gaza was the first of the five Satrapies of the Philistims: and the South bound of the Land of Canaan towards Egypt. But this Citie was farre more ancient than Cambyses, as it is prooued by many Scriptures. It was once taken by Caleb: but the strength of the Anakims put him from it. At such time as Alexander Macedon invaded the Empire of Persia, it receiued a Garrison for Darius: in despite whereof it was by the Macedonians after a long siege demolished, and was called Gaza of the Desert.

Alexander Iannus King of the Iewes surprized it: and flew five hundred Senators in the Temple of Apollo, which stood thither for Sanctuary: but this Gaza was not set vp in the same place againe, to wit, on the foundations which Alexander Macedon had ouerturned, but somewhat neerer the Sea side: though the way was but two mille off. It was a Towne of great account in the time of the Machabees, and gaue many woundes to the Iewes till it was fort by Simon: of which hee made so great account, as that hee purposed to reside therein himselfe, and in his absence left Iohn his sonne and Successor to bee Gouverneur. In Brochard his time it was still a goodly Citie, and knowne by the name of Gazara.

Within the Land and vpon the Riuer of Befor they place Gerar: which the Scripture placeth betwene Kadesb & Shur, Gen. 20. 1. That it was neerer to the Wilderness of Beer-sheba, it appeares Gen. 20. 3. 1. and therefore no maruell that as elsewhere Beer-sheba, so sometime Gerar, bee made the South bound of Canaan. It was of old a distinct Kingdome from the Philistim Satrapies, the Kings by one common name were called Amalechis; S. Hierome saith that afterward it was called Regio salutaris, the healthy Country: so that it was no maruell that Abraham and Isaac liued much in those parts. Of King Asa conquest of the Cities about Gerar, see 2. Chron. 14. 14.

More within the Land was Sieleg or Tsiglak, which was burnt by the Amalekites, when Dauid in his flying from Saul to the Philistims had left his carriages there, but Dauid followed them ouer the Riuer of Befor, and put them to the slaughter, and recovered the prey.

Next Dabir sometime Cariath-Sepher, the Citie of Letters, the Vniuersitie, as they say, or Academie of old Palestine. In Saint Hieromes time it seemes it had the name of

DAEMA:

Daema: Iofua 15. 49. it is called Urbs Sanna: from the name, as it seemes, of some of the Anakims, as Hebron was called Urbs Arbabi. For euen hence also were these Giants expelled. It was taken chiefly by Othniel, encouraged by *Caleb*s promise of his Daughter Iof. 11. v. 21. in marriage: but that Iofua and the Hoast of Israel were at the surprize, it appeares Iof. 10. 39. This Citie Iof. 2. 1. 15. is named among those which out of Simcon and Juda were giuen to the Leuites. And hence it seemes they attribute it to this Tribe.

Besides these, there are many others in the Tribe of Simcon, but of lesse fame, as Hajn, of which Iof. 19. 7. which also Iof. 1. 16. is reckoned for one of the Cities of the Leuites, giuen out of the portion of Juda and Simeon (for which Iunius thinkes Hajbam is named 1 Chron. 6. 59. though * in the place of Iofua these two are distinguished) also Tholad * 10 named 1 Chron. 4. 29. for which Iofua 19. 4. wee haue Eltholad. Chazar-Susa so named Iofua 19. 5. for which Iofua 15. wee haue Chazar-Gadda, both names agreeing in signification: for Gadda is Turma, and Susa Equitatus.

And also
1 Chron. 4. 32.

In the same places of Iofua and of the Chronicles Chorma is named, which they thinke to be the same with that of which Nuin. 14. 45. to which the Amalekites and Canaanites purified the Israelites: But that Chorma cannot be in Simcon, nor within the Mountaines of Edumaea. For Israel fled not that way: but backe againe to the Campe, which lay to the South of Edumaea, in the Desert.

Deut. 11.

The same places also name Beer-sheba in this Tribe: so called of the Oath betwene 10 Abraham and Abimelech: neere vnto which Hagar wandered with her sonne Ismael. It was also called the Citie of Isaac, because hee dwelt long there. While the Christians held the Holy Land, they laboured much to strengthen this place, standing on the border of the Arabian Desert, and in the South bound of Canaan. It hath now the name of Gibelin. The other Cities of Simcon which are named in the places of Iofua, and of the Chronicles aboue noted, because they helpe vs nothing in storie, I omit them. In the time of Ezekia King of Juda, certaine of this Tribe being strengthened in their owne Territories, passed to * Gedor, as it is, 1 Chron. 4. 39. (the same place which Iof. 15. 36. is called Gedera and Gederot-haima) which at that time was inhabited by the issue of Cham: where they feasted themselves: as also five hundred others of this Tribe, destroyed the Reliques 30 of Amale in the Mountaines of Edom, and dwelt in their places. The Mountaines within this Tribe are few, and that of Sampson the chiefeft: vnto which hee carried the Gate-post of Gaza. The Riuers are Befor, and the Torrent of Egypt called Shichar, as is noted in Affer.

§. III.

THE TRIBE OF IUDA.

In Iuda the fourth sonne of Jacob by Lea, there were multiplied in Egypt 74600. all which (Caleb excepted) perished in the Deserts. And of their sonnes there entered the Land of Canaan 76500. bearing armes: Agreeable to the greatnesse of this number was the greatest Territorie giuen, called afterward Iudaea: within the bounds whereof were the portions allotted to Dan and Simcon included. And many Cities named in those Tribes, did first, as they say, belong vnto the Children of Juda: who had a kinde of Soueraignie ouer them: as Succoth, Cariathiarim, Lachis, Bethseles, Tsiglak, Beer-sheba, and others. The multitude of people within this small Prouince (if it be meated by that ground giuen to this Tribe onely) were incredible, if the witness of the Scriptures had not warranted the report. For when Dauid numbred the people, they were found five hundred thousand fighting men.

30 The Cities of Juda were many. But I will remember the chiefeft of them: beginning with Arad, or Horma, which standeth in the entrance of Iudaea from Idumaea: whose King first surprized the Israelites as they passed by the border of Canaan towards Moab, and tooke from them some poybles, and many prisoners: who being afterward ouerthrowne by the Israelites, the sonnes of Keniz, the Kinsmen of Moses, obtained a possession in that Territorie: who before the coming of the Israelites, dwelt betwene Madian and Amalek.

Following this Frontier towards Idumaea and the South, Ascensu Scorpionis, or Acrabim is placed: the next to Arad: so called because of Scorpions, which are said to be in that that place: from which name of Acrabim, Hierome thinks that the name of the Toparchie called Acrabathena was denominated: of which we haue spoken in Manasses. On the South side also of Iuda they place the Cities of Jagar, Dimona, Adada, Cedes, Asbna, Iethanan, and Afor or Chafor, most of them Frontier Townes.

And then Ziph: of which there are two places to called: one besides this in the body of Iuda, of which the Desart and Forrest adioyning tooke name: where Dauid hid himselfe from Saul. After these are the Cities of Efrom, Adar, Karkah, and Afemona, or Hafmona, of no great fame.

Turning now from Idamasa towards the North, wee finde the Cities of Danna, Shemash, Anam, the other Afor, or Chafor, Behaloth, and the two Suchoes: of all which see Ios. 15. 15. also Carioth by Iofua, Gen. 15. 25. called Kerith: whence Iudas the Traitor was called Is-carith, as it were a man of Carioth. Then Hetham the abode of Sampson which Rehobam recedified. Beyond these towards the North border, and towards Eleutheropolis, is the Citie of Iethbar, or Iathir, belonging to the Leuites. In Saint Hieromes time it was called Iethira: and inhabited altogether with Christians: neere vnto this Citie was that remarkable battaile fought betweene Asa King of Iuda, and Zara King of the Arabians, who brought into the field a Million of fighting men: and was notwithstanding beaten and put to flight: Asa following the victory as farre as Cerar, which at the same time hee recovered.

Not farre from Iethbar, standeth Zarmuth, whose King was slaine by Iofua, and the City ouerturned. Next vnto it is Marefathe the natiue City of the Prophet Micha: betwene it and Odolla, Iudas Macchabeus ouerthrew Gorgias, and sent thence ten thousand Dracmas of silver to be offered for Sacrifice.

Odolla or Hadullan is selfe was an ancient and magnificent Citie, taken by Iofua, and the King thereof slaine. Ionathas Macchabeus beautified it greatly. Then Ceila or Keila afterward Echela, where Dauid sometime hid himselfe: and which afterward hee deliuered from the assaults of the Philistines: neere which the Prophet Abacuc was buried: whose monument remained, and was seene by S. Hierome.

Neere it is Hebron, sometime called the Citie of Arbah, for which the Vulgar hath Cariatharba: the reason of this name they giue, as if it signified the Citie of foure: because the foure Patriarchs, Adam, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, were therein buried, but of Adam it is but suppoled: and it is plaine by the places, Iofua 14. 14. and 15. 13. and 20. 11. that Arbah here doth not signifie foure, but that it was the name of the Father of the Giants called Anakim, whose sonne as it seemes Anak was: and Achimam, Shefbsai, and Talmi (whom Caleb expelled, Ios. 15.) were the sonnes of Anak, Numb. 13. 23. The name of Anak signifieth Torgnem, a chaine worn for ornament; and it seemes that this Anak enriched by the spoyle which himselfe and his Father got, wore a chaine of gold, and so got this name: and leaving the custome to his posteritie, left also the name: so that in Latine the name of Anakim may not amisse be expounded by Torgnem.

The Citie Hebron was one of the ancientest Cities of Canaan, built seuen yeeres before Tfoun or Tanis in Egypt: and it was the head and chiefe Citie of the Anakim, whom Caleb expelled: to whom it was in part giuen, to wit, the Villages adioyning, and the rest to the Leuites. It had a Bishop in the Christian times, and a magnificent Temple built by Helen the Mother of Constantine.

Not farre hence they finde Eleutheropolis, or the free Citie, remembered often by Saint Hierome. Then Ezion whose King Dabir associated with the other foure Kings of the Amorites, to wit, of Iherusalem, Hebron, Zarmuth, and Lachis, besieging the Gibeonites, were by Iofua utterly ouerthrowne. From hence the next Citie of fame was Emasa, afterward Neapolis, one of the Cities of Government or Presidencies of Iudaea. In fight of this Citie Iudas Macchabeus (after hee had formerly beaten both Apollonius and Seron) gaue a third ouerthrow to Gorgias Lieutenant to Antiochus.

In the yeere 1301. it was ouerturned by an earth-quake, saith Eusebius. In the Christian times it had a Bishops seate of the Diocesse of Casaria of Palestine.

From Emasa toward the West Sea there are the Cities of Nahama, Bethdagon, and Gader or Gedera, or Gederobaima, of which and of Gederob, * Ios. 15. v. 36. and 41. Then Azechi, to which Iofua followed the slaughter of the five Kings before named, a Citie of great strength in the Valley of * Terebintus, or Turpentine, as the Vulgar readeth, 1 Sam. 17. 2. whence (as it seemes) they seate it neere vnto Soco, and vnto Lebna of the Leuites.

Leuites. It resulted from the subiection of the Iewes, while Ioram the sonne of Iosaphat ruled in Iherusalem: And next vnto this standeth Macceda, which Iofua utterly dispeopled.

On the other side of Emasa towards the East standeth Bethsur, otherwise Bethsora, and Bethor: one of the strongest and most fought for places in all Iuda. It is seate on a high Hill; and therefore called Bethsur (the house on the rocke, or of strength). It was fortified by Roboam, and afterward by Iudas Macchabeus. Lyfist forc't it, and Antiochus Eupator 16. 13. ant. 9 by famine: Ionathas regained it: and it was by Simon exceedingly fortified against the Syrian Kings.

Bethleem is the next vnto it within sixe miles of Iherusalem, otherwise Lehem: sometime Ephrata, which name, they say, it had of Caleb wife, when as it is so called by Ma- ses before Caleb was famous in those parts, Gen. 38. 16. Of this Citie was Abeffan, or Ib- zan, Judge of Israel, after Iephthah, famous for the thirty sonnes and thirty daughters begotten by him. Elimelec was also a Bethlemit, who with his wife Naomi sojourned in Moab during the famine of Iuda in the time of the Iudges, with whom Ruth the daughter in law of Naomi returned to Bethleem, and married Booz, of whom Obed, of whom Ibsai, of whom Dauid. It had also the honour to bee the natiue City of our Sauour Iesus Christ, and therefore shall the memorie thereof neuer end.

In Zabulon of Galilee there was also a City of the same name: and therefore was this 20 of our Sauour called Bethleem Iuda.

From Bethleem some foure or five mile standeth Thecua, the City of Amos the Prophet: and to this place adioyning is the City of Bethzacaria, in the way betwene Beth- sura and Iherusalem on whose Hills adioyning, the glorious guilt shields of Antiochus shined like lamps of fire in the eyes of the Iewes. The City of * bezek was also neere vnto Bethleem, which Adoni-bezek commanded; who had during his raigne torrur'd 70 Kings, bycutting off the ioynts of their Fingers and Toes: and made them gather bread vnder his Table: but at length the same end befell himselfe by the sonnes of Iuda; after they had taken him prisoner.

The rest of the Cities in this part (most of them of no great estimation) we may passe by vntill wee come to the magnificent Castle of Herodius, which Herod erected on a Hill, mounting thence unto with 200 Marble steps, exceeding beautifull and strong. And towards the Dead Sea, and adioyning to the Desart of Iaruel, betwene it and Tekoa, is charithinus floridus, where, in the time of Iehosaphat, the Iewes stood and lookt on the Moabites, Ammonites, and Edomites, maffacing one another, when they had purposed to ioyne against Iuda: neere which place is the Valley of blessing, where the Iewes the fourth day after, solemnly came and blessed God for so strange a deliuerance.

Now the Cities of Iuda which border the Dead Sea, are these: Aduran beautified by Roboam; and Tfohar, which the Vulgar calleth * Segor: so called because Lot in his prayer solicited vrged that it was but a little one: whence it was called Tfohar, which signifieth a 40 little one: when as the old name was Belah, as it is Gen. 14. 2. In the Romanes times it had a Garrison; and was called (as they say) Pannier: in Hieromes time Balexona. Then En- gaddi or Heugaddi, first Asafonthamar: neere vnto which are the Gardens of Balfamum, the best that the world had called Opobalfamum: the most part of all which Trees Cleo- patria Queen of Egypt sent for out of Iudaea, and Herod who either feared or loued An- shay her husband, caused them to be rooted vp and presented vnto her: which shee replanted neere Heliopolis in Egypt. This City was first taken by Chedorloamer, and the Amorites thence expelled. It was one of the most remarkable Cities of Iudaea; and one of the Presidencies thereof.

The rest of the Cities are many in the In-land, and among them Iefrael: not that which 30 was the Citie of Naboth, of which already; but another of the same name, the Citie of Achimam, the wife of Dauid, the mother of that Amnon, whom Abfalom slew: also as some thinke the Citie of Abnaga, Abfaloms Lieutenant; and the commander of his Armie. But this seemeth to be an error grounded vpon the neceffesse of the words, Israhel and Iefrael: and because the 2 Sam. 17. 25. *Abnaga*es father is called a Israélite, who first of the Chitane race, is called an Ismaelite: indeed the Hebrew Orthographie sheweth that Amnagaes Father is no need to be of the Citie Iefrael, but an Israélite in Religion, though otherwise an Ismaelite.

Iofua the Tuberoer wete many high Hills and Mountaines, as those of Engaddi vpon the Dead Sea: and the Mountaines of Iuda, which begin to rise by Emam, and end neere Taphna, and these part Iuda from Dan and Simeon. Of others which stand single, there is that of Hebron, at the foot whereof was that Oake of Mambre, where the three Angels appeared to Abraham; which S. Hierome calleth a Fir-tree, and saith, that it stood till the time of Constantine the younger. There is also that Mountaine called Collis Achillaz, on the South of Ziph: on the top whereof the great Herod, inclosing the old Castle, erected by Ienathas Machabæus, and called Massada, garnished it with 27. high and strong Towers: and therein left Armour and furniture for an hundred thousand men; being as it seemeth a place vnaccessible, and of incomparable strength.

In the Valley afterward called the Dead Sea, or the lake Asphaltritis, this Countrie had foure Cities, Adama, Sodom, Seboim, and Gomorrah, destroyed with fire from Heauen for their vnnaturall finnes.

§. IIII.

THE TRIBE OF REUBEN
and his Borderers.

†. I.

The scates and bounds of Midian, Moab, and Ammon, part whereof the Reubenites wanne from Sehon King of Hesbon.

ON the other side of the Dead Sea, Reuben the eldest of Jacobs sonnes inhabited: of whose children there were numbred at Mount Sinai 46000. who dying with the rest in the Desarts, there remained to possesse the Land promised 43700. bearing armes. But before we speake of these or the rest that inhabited the East side of Iordan, something of their borderers: to wit, Midian, Moab, and Ammon, whose land in our writers are confusedly described, and not easily distinguished. And first wee are to remember, that out of Abrahams kindred came mighty Families: as by Isaac and Isach, the Nation called Israel, and afterward Iewes: by Ejau or Edom the Idumæans: by Ismael the eldest sonne of Abraham, the Ismaelites: and by Returah his last wife the Midianites. And againe by Lot, Abrahams brothers sonne, those two valiant Nations of the Moabites and Ammonites: all which being but strangers in the Land of Canaan (formerly posselt by the Canaanites; and by the Families of them descended) these issues and alliance of Abraham, all but Jacob, whose children were bred in Egypt, inhabited the frontier places adioyning.

Ejau and his sonnes held Idumæa, which bounded Canaan on the South, Ismael tooke from the South-east part of the Dead Sea; stretching his possession ouer all Arabia Petraea, and a part of Arabia the Desert, as farre as the Kiuer of Tigris, from Suzo to Hauilah.

Moab tooke the rest of the coast of the dead Sea, leauing a part to Midian, and passing ouer Arnon, inhabited the plaines betweene Iordan and the Hills of Abarim or Arnon, as farre North as Essebon, or Chesbon.

Ammon late downe on the North-east side of Arnon, and posselt the Tract from Rabba afterward Philadelphia, both within the Mountains of Gilhead, and without them as far forth as Aroer, though in Moses time he had nothing left him in all that Valley: for the Amorites had thrust him ouer the Riuer of Iaboc, as they had done Moab ouer Arnon. As these Nations compassed sundry parts of Canaan, so the border betweene the Riuer of Iaboc and Damascus was held by the Amorites themselves, with other mixt Nations: all which Territorie on the East side of Iordan, and on the East side of the Dead Sea, was granted by Moses to the Tribes of Reuben, Gad, and halfe Manasse; whereof that part which Moab had, was first posselt by the Emims a Nation of Giants weakened & broken by Chedorlabomer, after repuled by the Moabites, as before remembered. That which the Ammonites held, was the Territorie and ancient possession of the Zamzummins or Zurari, who were also beaten at the same time by Chedorlabomer, Amraphel, and the rest: and by them an easie way of conquest was prepared for the Ammonites.

Now where it is written that Arnon was the border of Moab, the same is to be vnderstood according to the time when Moses wrote. For then had Sehon or his Ancestor beaten beaten the Moabites out of the plaine Countries, betweene Abarim and Iordan, and driuen them from Hesbon ouer Arnon; and this happened not long before Moses arriual vp on that border, when Vaheb gouerned the Moabites. For hee that ruled Moab when Moses past Arnon, was not the sonne of Vaheb, but his name was Balac the sonne of Zippor. And it may be that those Kings were elctiue, as the Edumæans anciently were.

Now all that part of Moab, betweene Arnon and Iordan, as farre North as Essebon, was inhabited by Reuben. And when Israel arriued there out of Egypt, it was in the possession of Sehon, of the race of Canaan by Amorites: and therefore did Iephthah the Iudge of Israel iustly defend the regaining of those Countries against the claime of the Ammonites: because (as he alleged) Moses found them in the possession of the Amorites, and not in the hands of Moab or Ammon: who (saith Iephthah) had 300. yeares time to recouer them, and did not: whence he inferreth, that they ought not to claime them now.

And lest any should maruell why the Ammonites in Iephthahs time should make claime to these Countries: whereas Moses in the place Numb. 21. v. 26. rather accounts them to haue bene the ancient possession of the Moabites, than of the Ammonites: it is to be noted that Deut. 3. 11. when it is said that the Iron bed of Og was to be seene at Rabbath, the chiefe Citie of the Ammonites, it is also signified, that much of the Land of Og, which the Israelites posselt, was by him or his Ancestors got from the Ammonites, as much of Sehon was from the Moabites.

And as the Canaanite Nations were seate so confusedly together, that it was hard to distinguish them: so also were the sonnes of Moab and Ammon, Midian, Amalek, and Ismael. Yet the reason seemeth plaine enough why Ammon commanded in chiefe, in Iephthahs time; for sometime the one Nation, sometime the other of all those borderers acquired the Soueraigntie: and againe, that one part of the Land which Gad held, namely within the mountaines of Galaad, or Gilhead, and as farre South as Aroer, belonged to the Ammonites. And therefore taking advantage of the time, they then sought to recouer it againe. Yet at such time as Moses ouerthrew Sehon at Lahaz, the Ammonites had lost to the Amorites, all that part of their possession which lay about Aroer, and betweene it and Lahaz: Sehon and Og, two Kings of the Amorites hauing displaced both Moab & Ammon of all within the Mountaines. For it is written in the one and twentieth of Numb. v. 24. place Deut. 3. 11. that Israel conquered the Land of Sehon from Arnon vnto Iaboc, euen vnto the children of Ammon: so as at this time the Riuer of Iaboc was the South bound of Ammon, within the Mountaines, when as anciently they had also possessions ouer Iaboc, which at length the Gadites posselt, as in the 13. chapter of Iosue. vers. 25. it appeares.

†. II.

Of the memorable places of the Reubenites.

THE chiefe Cities belonging to Reuben were these, Kedemath, for which the Vulgar, without any shew of warrant, readeth Ieshon: The Vulgar or Hierome followed the Septuagint, those two verses 36. and 37. in Ios. 22. being wanting in the old Hebrew Copies, and the Septuagint read Kedaw for Kedemath, which Kedaw by writing slip into Ieshon.

This City which they gaue to the Leuites, imparts her name to the Desert adioyning, from whence Moses sent his Embassage to Sehon. In the same place of Iosue where this Kedemath is mentioned, the Vulgar for Basjer & villa eius, reads Bosor in solitudine Misor, without any ground from the Hebrew: whence Adrichemius makes a Towne called Misr, in the border betweene Reuben and Gad. Farther from Kedemath neere the Dead Sea, (for the Countrie betweene being Mountainous hath few Cities) they place two Townes of note, Lasa or Lesbalb, of which Genes. 10. vers. 29. The Greekes call it Cal-lirhoe: neere which there is a Hill, from whence there floweth Springs both of hot and cold, bitter and sweet water; all which soone after their rising, being ioyned in one streame, doe make a very wholesome Bath, especially for all contraction of sinewes: to which Herod the elden, when hee was desperate of all other helpe, repaired, but in vaine. Others say that these Springs arise out of the hills of Macharus, in this Tribe. The like fountaines are found in the Pyrenæes: and in Peru, called the Baths of the Inga's or Kings. The other towne is Macharus, the next betweene Lasa and Iordan: of all that part of the world the strongest In-land Citie and Castle, standing vpon a Mountaine every way vnaccessible. It was first fortified by Alexander Iannæus, who made it a frontier against the Arabians: but it was demolished by Gabinus, in the war with Arifobulus, saith Iosephus. It was thither (saith Iosephus) that Hierod sent Iohn Baptist, and wherein he was slaine: his armie soon after being vtterly ouerthrowne by Aretas King of Arabia, and himselfe after this murder neuer prospering. Not farre from Machærus was Bofor, or Bozra, a towne of refuge, and belonging to the Leuites, and neere it Liuias vpon Iordan, which Hierod built in honour of Liua the mother of Tiberius Cæsar.

To the North of Liuias is Setim, or Sittim: where the children of Israel embraced the daughters of Midian or Moab: and where Phineas pierced the body of Zimri and Cobi, with his speare, bringing due vengeance vpon them, when they were in the midst of their sinne: and from hence Iofua sent the Discouersers to view Ierico, staying here vntill he went ouer Iordan. As for the Torrent Setim, which in this place Adrichomius dreames of, reading Iocel 3. 18. irrigat it torrentem Setim: The vulgar hath torrentem spinarium: and Iunius, vallem Cedronum: expounding it not for any particular place in Canaan: but for the Church, in which the iust being placed, grow as the Cedars, Psalm 92. 13.

The plaine Countie hereabout, by Moses called The plaines of Moab, where he expounded the Book of Deuteronomie to the people a little before his death, is in the beginning of the same book precisely bounded by Moses. On the South it had the great Desert of Paran, where they had long wandered. On the East it had Chatteroth, & Dizabab (of which two the former is that Gazorus, of which Ptoleme in Palestina, the later was a Tract be- longing to the Nabathæi in Arabia Petrea, where was * Mezahab, of which, Gen. 36. 39.) by the Geographers called Medaua and Medaba. On the West it had Iordan, and on the North it had Laban (in Iunius Edition, by the fault of the Print, Lamban, Deuteron. 1. 1.) the same which the Geographers call Libias: and some confound it with Liuias, of which cuen now we speake.

Also on the same North side towards the confines of Coelesyria, it had Theophel: whereabout sometime Pella of Coelesyria stood: which was in the region of Decapolis, and as Stephanus saith, was sometime called Buris. It is also noted in Moses to bee ouergainst or neere vnto Suph, for which the Vulgar hath the Red Sea, as also Num. 2. 14. it translateth the word Suphah in like manner: whereas in this place of Deuteronomie there is no addition of any word in the Hebrew to signifie the Sea: and yet the Scripture, when this word is so to be taken, vseth the addition of Maræ, thereby to distinguish it from the region of Suph or Suphah: which doubtlesse was about these plaines of Moab towards the dead Sea: where the Countie being full of reedes, was therefore thus called: as also the red Sea was called Maræ Suph, for like reason.

The place in these large plaines of Moab, where Moses made those diuine exhortations, some say was Bethabara where Iohn baptized, which in the storie of Gideon is called Beth-baræ. Iosephus sayes it was where after the Citie Abila stood, neere Iordan, in a place set with Palme trees: which sure was the same as Abel-sittim in the Plaines of Moab, Num. 33. 49. (that some call Abel-fathaim and Bel-fathim) which is reckoned by Moses in that place of Numbers for the 42. and last place of the Israelites incamping in the time of Moses: This place is also called Sittim; which word if we should interpret, we should rather bring it from Cedars, than from Thornes, with Adrichomius and others. It was the wood of which the Arke of the Tabernacle was made.

Toward the East of these plaines of Moab, they place the Cities, Nebo, Baal-Meon, Sibma and Hesbon the chiefe City of Sehon, and Elhahel, & Kiriathaima the seate of the Giantes Emim. Of the two first of these Moses seemes to giue a note that the names were to be changed: because they tasted of the Moabites * Idolatry. For Nebo (in stead of which Iunius, Es. 46. 1. reads Deus variisimus) was the name of their Idoll-Oracle, and Baal-megon is the habitation of Baal. Of the same Idoll was the Hill Nebo in these parts so denominated: from whose top, which the common Translators call Phagah, Moses before his death saw all the Land of Canaan beyond Iordan. In which storie Iunius doth not take Phagah or Pisgah, for any proper name: but for an appellatiue, signifying a Hill: and so also Vatablus in some places, as Num. 21. 20. where hee noeth that some call Pisgah that top which looketh to Iericho, and Hair as it looketh to Moab, which opinion may be somewhat strengthened by the name of a Citie of Reuben mentioned Is. 63. 20. called Ashdod Pisga, which is as much as decursus Pisga: to wit, where the waters did runne downe from Pisga. In the same place of Iofua there is also named Beth-peor, as bebelon-

belonging to Reuben: so called from the Hill Peor: from whence also Baal the Idoll was called Baal-Peor, which they say was the same as Priapus: the chiefe place of whose worship seemes to haue beene Bamoth-Bahal, of which also Is. 13. in the Cities of Reuben: for which Num. 22. 4. 1. they read, the high places of Baal (for so the word signifieth) to which place Balaak first brought Balaam to curse the Israelites.

†. III.

Of diuers places bordering Reuben belonging to Midian, Moab or Edom.

10 T Here were besides these diuers places of note ouer Arnon, which adioyned to Reuben: amongst which they place Galim, the Citie of Phalti: to whom Saul gaue his Daughter Michol from Dauid: but Iunius thinks this Towne to be in Beniamin: gathering too much out of Esay 10. verse 29. where it is named among the Cities of Beniamin. With better reason perhaps out of Num. 21. v. 19. wee may say that Mathana and Nahaliel were in those confines of Reuben: through which places the Israelites past after they had left the Well called Beer: Then Deblathaim which the Prophet Hieremie threatneth with the rest of the Cities of Moab.

Madian also is found in these parts, the chiefe Citie of the Madianites in Moab: but not that Madian or Madian by the Red Sea; wherein Citic inhabited. For of the Madianites there were two Nations, of which these of Moab became Idolaters, and receiued an exceeding ouerthrow by a Regiment of twelue thousand Israelites, sent by Moses out of the plaines of Moab: at such time as Israel began to accompanie their Daughters: their five Kings with Balaam the Soothsayer were then slaine: and their Regall Citie with the rest destroyed. The other Madianites ouer whom Iethro was Prince, or Priest, forgot not the God of Abraham their Ancestor, but reliqued & assisted the Israelites in their painful traualles through the Deserts: and were in all that passage their guides. In the South border of Moab adioyning to Edom, and sometime reckoned as the chiefe Citie of Edom, there is that Petra which in the Scriptures is called Sebah, which is as much as rupes or petra. It was also called Isidheel, as appears by the place 2 Reg. 14. It was built (saith Iosephus) by Rekem, one of those five Kings of the Madianites, slaine as before is said: after whom it was called Rekem: Now they say it is called Cras and Mocera. The Soldans of Egypt, for the exceeding strength thereof, kept therein all their treasures of Egypt and Arabia: of which it is the first and strongest Citie: the same perhaps which Plinie and Strabo call Nabathe, whence also the Prouince adioyning tooke name: a name famous to haue beene taken at first from Nabath the sonne of Abraham by Kethura. For Nabathe is no where vnderstood for all Arabia Petrea, (at least where it is not mis-understood) but it is that Prouince which neighboureth Iudæa. For Pharan inhabited by Ismael, whose people Ptoleme calleth Pharanites, in stead of Ismaelites, and all those Territories of the Cusites, Madianites, Amalekites, Ismaelites, Edomites, or Idumæans, the Lands of Moab, Ammon, Hu, Sin, and of Og, King of Basan, were parts of Arabia Petrea: though it be also true, that some part of Arabia the Desert belonged to the Amalekites, and Ismaelites: all which Nations the Scriptures in the first of Chronicles the fit calls Hagarens of Magar.

This Citie Petra, Scamrus besieged with the Roman Army, & finding the place in shew impregnable, he was content by the perswasion of Antipater, to take a composition of monie, and to quit it. Yet Amasias king of Iudæa, after he had slaughtered 10000. of the Arabians in the valley called salinarum (wan also this Cky. S. Hierome findes Ruth the Moabite to be naturall of this City. In the meane time when the Christians held the Kingdom of Hierusalem, it had a Latine Bishop, hauing before been vnder the Greeke Church. It is seated not far from Hore where Aaron died, & on the other side towards the North is the riuer of Zared or Zered, by which Moses incamped in the 38. Station. Adrichomius describeth the waters of Memrim, or rather Nemrim, in his Map of Reuben, not far hence, and betweene Zared and Arnon: and so hee doth the Valley of Sane: but the waters of Nimra, or Beth-Nimra (for which it seemes Adrichomius writ Nemrim) refresh the plaines of Moab: and the confluence of those waters of Nimra are in the Tribe of Gad. Sane also canot be found in this place, that is, to the South of Arnon, and vnder Midian. For after Abraham returned from the pursuit of the Assyrian and Persian Princes, the King of Sodom met him in the Valley of Sane, or Saub, which is the Kings Dale, where Abraham set vp his Monument, as it seemes; not farre from Hierusalem. And at the same time Melchizedec King of Salem also also

also encountered him. But Abraham coming from the North, and Melchizedec inhabiting, either neere Bethsan or otherwise Scythopolis in the halfe Tribe of Manasse, or in Hiernusalem (both places lying to the West of Iordan) could not encounter each other in Arabia: and therefore Sauz, which was also called the Kings Dale, could not be in these parts.

†. IIII.
Of the Dead Sea.

Now because the Sea of Sodom or the Dead Sea, called also the Lake of Asphaltitis, and the salt Sea (in distinction from the Sea of Tyberias which was fresh water) also the Sea of the Wildernesse, or rather the Sea * of the plaines, is often remembered in the Scriptures, and in this storie also, therefore I thinke it not impertinent, to speake somewhat thereof. For it is like vnto the Caspian Sea, which hath no out-let or disburthening. The length of this Lake Josephus makes 180 furlongs (which make 22 miles and a halfe of ours) and about 150. in breadth, which makes 18. of our miles and somewhat more. Plinie makes it a great deale lesse. But thole that haue of late yeares seene this Sea, did account it (saith * Wesselsburg) eight Dutch miles (which is two and thirtie of ours) in length: and two and a halfe of theirs (which is ten of ours) in breadth. Of this Lake or Sea, Tacitus maketh this report: Lacus est in immenso ambitu, speciemaris, sapore corruptior, grauitate a loris accolis p. l. ster: neq. vento impellitur, neq. pisces aut suu. is aqua volucres patitur, incertum unde superiecta ut solidior erantur, periti imperipig. nandi perinde attolluntur, &c. That it is very great, and (as it were) a Sea of a corrupt taste: of smell infectious, and pestilent to the borders: it is neither moued nor raised by the winds, nor indureth fish to lye in it, or fowle to swimme in it. Those things that are cast into it, and the vnskilfull of swimming, as well as the skilfull, are borne up by this water. At one time of the yeare it catcheth vp bitumen: the Art of gathering which, Experience (the finder of other things) hath also taught. It is vied in the trimming of ships, and the like busineses.

And then of the Land, he speaketh in this sort: "The fields not farre from this Lake which were sometime fruitfull and adorned with great Cities, were burnt with lightning; of which the ruines remaine, the ground looking with a sad face, as hauing lost her fruitfulness; for whatsoeuer doth either grow or is set thereon, be it fruits or flowers, when they cometo ripeness, haue nothing within them, but moulder into ashes: Thus farre Tacitus. And it is found by experience, that those Pomegranates and other Apples or Oranges, which doe still grow on the bankes of this cursed Lake, doe looke faire, and are of good colour on the out-side, but being cut haue nothing but dust within. Of the Bitumen which this Lake catcheth vp, it was by the Greekes called Asphaltis. Vespasian desirous to be satisfied of these reports, went of purpose to see this Lake, and caused certaine Captiues to be cast into it, who were not onely vnskilfull in swimming, but had their hands also bound behinde them, yet notwithstanding they were carried on the face of the waters, and could not swimke."

†. V.

Of the Kings of Moab, much of whose Countrie within Arnon Reuben possesse.

Of the Kings of Moab, whose Countrie (within Arnon) Reuben possesse (though not taken from Moab but from Sobah the Amorite) few are known. Iustus in the 21. of Numbers, vers. 14. nameth Abel, which seemes to be the Ancestor or Predecessor of Balaam, the sonne of Ziporah: which Balaam sent for Balaam to curse Israel. Forbearing to contend with Moses by armes by the examples of Sehon and Og, hee hoped by the helpe of Balaams curlings or incantations, to take from them all strength and courage, and to cast on them some pestilent diseases. And though Balaam at the first, moued by the spirit of God, blest Israel contrary to the hope and desire of Moab: yet being desirous in some sort to satisfie him, and to doe him seruice, hee aduised Moab to send Medianish Women among the Israelites: hoping by them, as by fit instruments of mischief, to draw them to the Idolatry of the Heathen: but in the end hee receiued the reward of his falling from God, and of his cuill counsaile, and was slaine among the rest of the Princes of Midian.

After these times the Kings of the Moabites are not named: sauing that wee finde in the first of Chronicles the fourth, that Iokim, and the men of Choseba, and Isab, and Sareph, Sareph, all being of the issue of Iuda, sometime had the Dominion in Moab: but as it is written in the same Verse, These also are ancient things: to wit, as some expound it, the particulars of these mens Governments are no where extant or remaining: or as others, hee prius fuerit, these Families of Iuda were once thus famous: but now their posteritie choose rather to abide in Babylon, and be Clay-workers to the King there.

Then we finde Eglon King of Moab, who with the helpe of Ammon, and Amalec mastered Israel, and commanded them eighteen yeares: which Eglon, Ehud slew in his owne house, and afterward 1000. of his Nation. What name the King of Moab had vnto whom Dauid fled fearing Saul, it doth not appeare: or whether it were the same against whom Saul made Waire, it is not manifest, for neither are named. But in respect that this Moab was an enemy to Saul, he receiued Dauid, and relieved him; knowing that Saul fought his life.

After this, Dauid himselfe entred the Region of Moab, but not likely in the same Kings time: for hee slaughtered two parts of the people; and made the third part tributarie: whereupon it was said of Dauid, Moab is my wash-pot, ouer Edom will I cast my shoe: meaning that hee would reduce them to such an abiection, and appoint them for base seruices: And that he would tread downe the Idumaeans.

The next King after Dauids time, of the Moabites, whose name lieth, was Mesha: who falling from Iuda, (perhaps in remembrance of the feueritie of Dauid) fattened himselfe to the Kings of Israel, and paid tribute to Ahab 100000. Lambes, and 200000. Rams, with the wooll: for hee slaughtred againe from Israel after the death of Ahab, was invaded by Iehoram: with whom ioynd the Kings of Iuda and Idumaea: and being by these three kings prest and broken, hee fled to Kir-harefeth, as is else where shewed. There is also mention made of the Moabites without the Kings name: when that Nation, assisted by the Ammonites and Idumaeans, invaded Iehoshaphat: and by reason of some private quarrels among themicuels, the Moabites and Ammonites set vpon the Idumaeans, and slaughtered them: and then one against another; so as Iehoshaphat had a notorious victory ouer them all, without either blood or wound. Also in the time of Hieremie the Prophet, there was a King of Moab which is named, which was after Mesha of Hierem. Moab many descents: for Mesha liued with Iehoram, and this Moabite in Zedekias time, fourteene Kings of Iuda comming betwene, who wasted three hundred and odd yeares.

§. V.

Of the memorable places of the Gadites, and the bordering places of Ammon.

He Territory adioyning to Reuben, is that of Gad: whereof all that part which ioynd to the Mountaines, was sometime in the possession of the Ammonites, as farre to the South as Arzer. Of the children of Gad the seuenth son of Isaac by Rebecca, the hand maid of Lea, there parted out of Egypt, and died in the Deserts, 45550. and of their sonnes there entred the Land promised, 45000. bearing armes: from the halfe Tribe of Manasse the River of Iaboc diuided them: from Reuben the Cities of Heshon, Elbele, and Aphec.

The chiefe Citie of Gad was Arzer: which they make to be the same with Ar, or Rab-bath Moab, the great or commanding Moab. But the learned Iunius attending diligently to those words of Moses, Deut. 2. 36. Ab harahero, que est in ripa fluminis Arnon, & Civitate ipsa que est in flumine; where the Citie in the River is distinguished from the Citie upon the bankes of the River, (as also in like manner Iof. 6. 12. v. 2. and 6. 13. v. 9.) thinketh that Haraher which doubtlesse belonged to the Gadites (as Numb. 32. 34. it is said that they so built) was indeede seated neere Har of the Moabites, but diuers from it. For that Har was neuer possesse by Moses, it is plaine Deuteronomie 2. 9. where God forbidding Moses to touch it, saith, hee hath giuen Har for an inheritance to the sonnes of Lot. Now that this Citie, which in diuers places is said to be within and in the middle of the River of Arnon (and so distinguished from Haraher, which is said in the same places to bee on the bankes of Arnon) is Har of the Moabites, the same Iunius prooueth out of Numb. 21. 15. where Arnon is said to bee diuided into diuers streames, where or among which Har is seated: And the same is confirmed by the place of Iof. 13. 25. where Haraher is said to bee seated before Rabbah: which Rabbah as it seemes, cannot bee the Rabbah of the Ammonites (for they feare not Harober neere it; nor in fight of it) and therefore by Rabbath here we must understand Rabbah of Maab, which they maketo be Ar or Ihar: and so wee must needs distinguish it from Harober. And as for * Har (which also gaue the name to the coast adioyning) it seemes it continued in the possession of the Moabites after they had once expelled the Giant-like people called Emims, first weakened by Chedorlaomer and his Associates: but Harober by the interchange of times suffered many ancient changes, as being wonne from the Moabites by Schon, and from him by the Israelites, and from them, as it seemes in the story of Iephtha, by the Ammonites: and from the Ammonites againe by the Israelites vnder the conduct of Iephtha. In S. Hieromes time the greatest part of this Citie perished by an earthquake, as also Zeor, in which Zor saved himselfe, in the destruction of Sodom, seated not farre hence: which they say was therefore called Phala Constermann, because as a wanton tumbling Heifer, she was thrice overthrowne with earth-quake: for which cause also Hierome seemes to think that this Zeor was called Salissa, or Bal-salissa, as if Baal had bene a remainder of the old name Balah, or Belah, (of which Gen. 1. 2.) and Salissa, which hath a signification of the ternarie number, had alluded to the three earth-quake.

being built by Herod the Great, and named in honour of the adoption of Julia Augustus his wife, into the Julian family: by which adoption she was called Julia. Ano. ^{101st Ann.} 18: 3: ther Julia, her faith was built by Philip the brother of Herod, in the lower Gaulanitis, ^{and} her Ind. 2: 8: which, he faith, is the same as Beshaida.

ophisepi. Ofa noble woman of this Citie, which for safegard in the time of Warre with the Romanes, came with many others into Hiersalem, and was there besieged. Iosephus in the place noted, reports a lamentable History; how for hunger shee ate her owne childe; with other tragical accidents hereupon ensuing.

and, that these were put up with three hundred, and were in the paradise of Eden and Salmonah, hee requested reliefe of the men of Succoth: who denying him, and that with contempt, in Gidions returne were by him tortured, as it seemes vnder a threshing Carre of Tribulum, betwene which and their flesh he put Thornes to teare their flesh as they were prest and trod vnder the Tribulum, and after which sort also Dauid vied some of the Ammonites, though not with Thornes, but with Iron teeth of the Tribulum. As for the name of Succoth, which signifieth such Tabernacles as were made in halfe, either for Men or Cattell, Ayles, Gen. 33. 17. witnesseth that the originall of the name was from such harbours, which Iacob in his returne from Mesopotamia built in that place: as also the place beyond the Red Sea, where the children of Israel, as they came from Rameses in Egypt, had their first Station, was vpon like reason called Succoth: because there they set vp their first Tabernacles or Tents: which they vied after for forty yeares in the Wildernesse. In remembrance whereof, the Feast of Succoth, or Tabernacles was instituted.

led the Land of Iahzer. It was taken by Mofes, having first sent spies to view it. In the first of the Chronicles it is made part of Gilead. In later times (as it may be gathered by the prophetic of Efay, touching Moab) it was possessed by the Moabites : to which place of Efay, also Hieremie in a like prophetic alludes. It was at length regained (but as Hierem. 48.9. it seems from the Ammonites) by Idus Maccabaeus : as it is 1 Macc. 5.8. where Iunius out of Iosephus, reads Iahzer, though the Greeke hath Gazer. For Gazer or Gexer (as he gathereth out of Iofua 16.3. & 8. and Iudg. 1.29.) was farre from the Countries of Sehon, seated in the West border of Ephraim, not possessed by the Israelites, vntill Salomons time, for whom the King of Egypt wanne it from the Canaanite, and gaue it him as a Dowrie with his Daughter.

hemselfes with such scruples, finding Carbon, 1 Macc. 5. 36. among the Cities of Gilead, taken by Judas Maccabaeus, make two Cities of one : as if this Carbon had bene the Chesbon of Gad, and that of Reuben distinct from it : but the better reconciliation is, that it being a bordering Citie, betwene Gad and Reuben, was common to both, and that the Gadites gaue their part to the Leuites, for so also it seemes that in like reason Dibon is said in one place built by the Gadites, and in another giuen to Reuben, as before is noted. Of Machabaeism, which word signifieth a double Armie, wee reade Gen. 32. 2. that it was therefore so called, because the Angels of God in that place met Jacob in manner of another Host or company, to ioyne with his for his defence : as also Luke 21. 13. wee reade of a multitude of the Host of Heauen, which appeared to the sheepe-herds, at the time of our Saviours birth : and so vnto the godly King Oswald of Northumberland, when hee was foone after to ioyne bataile with the Pagan Penda of middle-England, Beda reports, that the like comfort appeared : whence the field where the tion. For besides other adventures, it was taken by L. Annius Lieutenant to Vespasian: and 1000. of the ablest young men put to the sword, and the Citie burnt. In theyear 1120. it was rebuilt by Baldwine King of Damascus: and in the same year recovered by Baldwine de Burgo King of Iherusalem: and by him utterly razed. Neere unto Gerafa is the village of Magedan, or after the Syriack Mageda, or after the Greeke Magdala, where the Pharisees and Sadducees desired of our Sauour a signe from heaven: the same place or some adioyning to it, which S. Marke calleth Dalmanatha. By the circumstances of which storie it appears that this coast lay betweene the Lake of Tiberias and the Countie of Decapolis. Brocard makes both these places to be one; and findes it to bee Phiale, the fountaine of Jordan according to Iosephus: but this Phiale is too farre from the Sea of Galilee, and from Bethsaida, to bee either Magda, or Dalmanatha. For as it appears by the storie, not farre hence towards the North was the Desert of Bethsaida, where Christ filled 5000. people with the five Barley loaves and two Fishes.

On the North of this Bethsaida they place Julias, not that which was built by Herod, but the other by Philip, which boundeth the Region Trachonitis towards the South. It was sometime a Village, and not long after the birth of Christ it was compaffed with a wall by Philip the Tetrarch of Turea and Trachonitis: and after the name of Julia, the wife of Tiberias, called Julias, as hath bene further spoken in the Tribe of Gad: where it was noted that Iosephus makes this Julias, to be the same as Bethsaida. Vpon the East side of the same Lake of Tiberias stands Corozaim, or Corasim, of which Christ in Matth. 23. saith: Woe be unto thee Corazim.

But the principall Citie of all these in ancient time was Asteroth: sometime peopled with the Giants Raphaim: and therefore the Countie adioyning called the Land of Giants, of whose race was Og, King of Nasam. In Genesis this Citie is called Asteroth of Carnaim, whence 1 Mac. 5. 26. it is called simply Carnaim, as Ios. 13. 21. it is called Asteroth without the addition of Carnaim. The word Carnaim significth a paire of Hornes, which agree well with the name of their Idoll Asteroth, which was the Image of a sheepe, as is likewise noted, that Asteroth in Deuteronomie significth sheepe. Others from the ambiguity of the Hebrew take Carnaim, to have bene the name of the people which inhabited this Citie: and expound it heroes * radiantes. For of old the Raphai which inhabited this Citie (Gen. 14. 5.) were Giant-like men, as appears by comparing the words Deut. 3. 1. Og ex residuo gigantum, with the words, Ios. 13. 12. Og ex reliquis Rapharum: but if the Carnaim (or Carnaim) were these Raphai, the word would not have bene in the duall number: neither would Moses in the place of Genesis haue said the Raphai in Asteroth of the Carnaim, but either the Raphai in Asteroth of the Raphai, or some other way fittell for perpicuitie: for this naming of both thus in the same clause, distinguishing both one from the other.

Not farre from Asteroth Adrichomius out of Brocard and Breidenbachius placeth Cedar, in the way out of Syria into Galilee, foure milcs from Corazim. This Citie (saith he) is remembered in the Canticles, and in the booke of Judith, and there are that of this Citie vnderstand David in his 120. Psalme: and here the Sepulchre of Iob is yet to bee seene, saith Breidenbach.

Now concerning the Texts which he citeth, it is so that the Greeke hath Galaad in stead of the word Cedar, which the Vulgar doth vse in that place of Judith, and ioyneth Carmel and Galilee. The Canticles and the 120. Psalme doe rather proue that Cedar was not increabout, than any way helpe Adrichomius. For that they speake of Scenite Cedar, it is apparant, and as euident by the place in the Canticles: that they were decoloris, much more than any vnder the Climates of the Land of Canaan: whence Iunius out of Lampridius and Plinie placeth them in Arabia Petraea, farre from these parts. Touching the Sepulchre of Iob, it is certaine that the Arabians and Saracens (holding those places) haue many things to abuse the Christians, and to get money. Further, it may well be affirmed, that many (if not all) the historically circumstances of Iob are so obscure, that we should rather by finding his Countie seeke to get some knowledge of him, than by any presumptions founded vpon him, inferre what his Countie was, and build vnto him a Citie by coniecture.

Of Iob himselfe, whether he was the same Iobab remembered in the 36. of Genesis, descended from Efa, and King alio of Idumaea, though Rupertus, Lyrannus, Oleaster, and Belarmine are of another opinion, yet Saint Ambrose, Augustine, Chrysostome, and Gregorie, with with Athanafius, Hippolitus, Irenaeus, Eusebius Emifens, Apollinaris, Eusebius, and other, cited by S. Hierome in his 126. Epistle to Euagrius, take him for the same.

The Land of Hus or Hus wherein Iob dwelt is from the Greeke ὅς, which the Septuagint vse for the word Hus, translated by the Vulgar sometime Hus, as Iob 1. v. 1. (some time Ausitis, as Hierem. 25. 20. This Land is placed by Iunius between Palestina and Celestria, besides Chamaia (or Hamath) vnder Balmirae in the Countie called by Plinie Trachonitis or Barhanes, the bounds of which Countie are confounded with Basana in this halfe Tribe of Manasses. And that this Land of Hus was thus seated, it may in part be gathered out of the place of Ieremie the 25. do. where he reckons the Hulites among the promiscuous borders of the Israelites, whom hee therefore calleth promiscuous or miscellaneum turban, because their bounds were not onely ioyned but confounded, and their Seignories mingled one with the other, but of this place the words of Ieremie, Lamentations 4. 21. speaking of the same Prophecie, of which he speaketh in the five and twentieth Chapter, must needs bee expounded: as Iunius reads them, distinguishing the Land of Hus from Edom: O filia Edom, o qua habitas in terra Hus, O Daughter of Edom, O thou which dwellest in the Land of Hus. Now because the Vulgar doth not so distinguish, but readeth, Filia Edom qua habitas in terra Hus; Daughter of Edom which dwellest in the Land of Hus: Hence, as it seemes, some of the learned haue thought that Iob was an Edomite, as wee haue said, and King of Edom, which if they vnderstand by Idumaea or Edom, so called in Moses time, they are greatly mistaken, making this Land of Hus to be in Idumaea. For it is very probable that Efa when hee first parted from Iacob, did not leaue himselfe in Edom or Seir, which lyeth on the South border of Iudea, but inhabited Seir farre to the East of Jordan, and held a part of those Mountaines, otherwise called Galaad, and Hermom, which by corruption the Sidonians call Shirion, and the Amorites Shevir, for Seir; and from this habitation did Efa encounter Iacob when he returned out of Mesopotamia, who passed by the very border of Efa his abiding. It is true that at such time as Moses wandered in the Deserts, that the posterity of Efa inhabited Seir to the South of Iudea: for it is like that the Amorites who had beaten both Ammon and Azobab, did also driue the Edomites out of those parts, who thence forward seated themselves to the South of Iudea, bordering the Desert Paran, and stretched their habitations ouer the Deserts as farre as Hor where Aaron died.

Now for this Hus which gaue the name to a part of the Land of Trachonitis, whether it were Hus the sonne of Aram, as Iunius thinke in his note vpon Gen. 10. 23. or rather Hus the sonne of Nachor, Abrahams brother, the question is doubtfull. For my part I rather incline to thinke, that it was Hus the sonne of Nachor: partly because these Families of Aram seeme long before to haue bene lost: and partly because in Iob 6. 32. 2. Elihu the fourth of Iob's friends, which seemes to be of Iob's owne Country, is called a Buzite, of Buz the brother of Hus, the son of Nachor: as also Hieremie 25. in the same continuation (though some other Nations named betwene) where Hus is spoken of, there Buz is also named. Neither doth it hinder our coniecture, that in the place of Iob 32. Elihu the Buzite is said to be of the Family of Ram: (which Iunius expounds to be as much as of the Familie of Aram) for that by this Aram we are not to vnderstand Aram the sonne of Sem, Iunius himselfe maketh it plaine, both in his annotation vpon the beginning of his booke, where he saith that one of Iob's friends (which must needs be this Elihu) was of the posterity of Nachor (as also in this place hee confesseth so much expressly,) and in as much as hee readeth not è familia Aram, or Ram, but è familia Syria, like as elsewhere Laban who sprung of Nachor is called a Syrian.

As for the other three of Iob's friends (of whom by this note of Elihu his being of the Syrian Family, or of the Familie of Nachor) it is simpely that they were of other kindred: as also by the Septuagints addition, that this Elihu was of the Land of Hus, or Ausitis, it is implyed that they thought onely Elihu to haue bene of Iob's owne Countie.

Franciscus Brocard the Monke, in his description of the holy Land in the iourney from Acon Barward, findeth Suebia, and Theman on the East of the Sea of Galilee: both very neere to the Land of Hus: whereof the one may seeme to haue denominated Bildad the Shuchite, the other Eliphaz the Themanite: two of the three friends of Iob, of the which Iob 2. 11. But Iunius thinke that the Shuchites were inhabitants of Arabia the Desert, descended of Shuch the sonne of Abraham and Rebecca: of whom Gen. 25. 2. perhaps, saith he, the same whom Plinie calls Sueci: So also he thinketh the Themanites of whom

For eu and eu are often changed one into the other: whence they vied Ausitis for Unstis, or Unstis, or Unstis, and so as it seems they read it in the Septuagint, Unstis, in Gen. 10. 23.

Deut. 3. 3.

Where the Septuagint call him Carazim, Ausitis.

See Sixtus mensis.

Eliphaz was, to haue beene of Arabia the Desert: and Eliphaz himselfe to haue beene of the posteritie of Theman the sonne of Eliphaz, which was the sonne of Esaú. And also Nahamab, whence Tisphar the third of Iabs friends (which in this place of Iob 2. v. 11, are mentioned) is by the same learned expositor, thought either to be named of Thimnah by transposition of letters (which Thimnah, Gen. 36. 40. is named among the sonnes of Esaú that gaue denomination to the places where they were seated) or else to be the same Nahamab, which Iof. 15. 4. 1. is reckoned for a Citie of Iuda in the border, as hee thinkes of Edom. And yet I deny not but that neere the Land of Hu, in Basam, as it seemes, in the Tribe of Manasse, there is a Region which (at least) in later times was called Smith, or of some like name. For this is euident by the Historie of Wilhelmus Tyrrius, which reports of a Fort in this Region of Suira or Suites (as he calls it diuersly) of exceeding great strength and vie for the retaining of the whole Countrey: which in the time of Baldwine the second King of Hierusalem, was with great digging through rocks recovered by the Christians; hauing not long before beene lost to the great disadvantage of the Countrey, while it was in the hands of the Saracens. The situation of this Fort is by Tyrrius described to be sixteene miles from the Citie Tiberias, on the East of Jordan: by Adrichomius foure miles North-ward from the place where Jordan enters the Lake Tiberias at Corazin.

Other Cities of this part of Manasse named in the Scripture are these: Golan, Behefthera, Mitspa of Gilead, and Kenath, which after the coming of the Israelites was called Nobach. Of Nobach or Kenath, and Mitspa of Gilead, we haue spoken by occasion among the Cities of Gad: The two other were giuen to the Leuites, and Golan made one of the Cities of refuge: from which Golan we haue both Gaulanitis superior and inferior, oft in Iosephus. Behefthera is accounted the chiefe Citie of Basam by some, but the writers corrupting the name into Bozra, it is confounded with Betser or Bozra of Reuben, and with Bozra of Edom. Argob is oft named for a Region in this Tract, and hence Hierome hath Arga, a name of a Citie placed by some about the waters of Merom (as they are called by Iosua) which make the Lake Samachonitis, as Iosephus calls it. This lake being as it were in the midst betweene Casaria Philippi and Tiberias, through which as through the Lake of Tiberias, Jordan runneth, boundeth part of this halfe Tribe on the West. When the snow of Libanus melteth, it is very large, saith Brochard: otherwise more contract, leasing the marshy ground on both sides, for Lyons and other wilde beasts, which harbour in the shrubs that plentifully grow there.

Adioyning to this Lake in this Countrey of Manasse, Iosephus names two places of strength, fortified by himselfe in the beginning of the Jews rebellion: Selucia the one and Sogane the other. In the North side of this halfe Tribe of Manasse, and in the North-east, the Scripture nameth diuers bordering places toward Damascus, as Tsedad, Chauran, and Chasfar-Henan, lying in a line drawne from the West, of which three Cities were Ezek. 47. 15. with which also agrees the place Numb. 34. 8. where for Chauran, betweene Tsedad, and Chasfar-Henan, Ziphran is named. From this Chauran is the name of Auranitis Regio, in Iosephus and Tyrrius, whose bounds (as also the bounds of Gessur and Machath or Macati, which were likewise borderers to Manasse toward the North-east) are vnkowne: onely that Gessur was of might, it appears in that Dauid married Mahua the Daughter of Thalmay King of Gessur: by whom he had the most beautifull, but wicked, and vnfurunate Abisalon.

CHAP. XI.

The Historie of the Syrians, the chiefe borderers of the Israelites that dwell on the East of Jordan.

§. I.

Of the Citie of Damascus, and the diuers fortunes thereof.

Damascus of all other in this border, and of that part of the world, was the most famous, excelling in Beautie, Antiquitie, and Riches, and was therefore called the Citie of ioy or gladnesse; and the House of pleasure; and is not onely remembered in many places of Scripture, but by the best Historians and Cosmographers. The Hebrewes, saith Iosephus, thinke it to haue beene built by Hu the sonne of Aram: of which opinion S. Hier.

Saint Hierome vpon Esay seemeth to bee: though in his Hebrew questions hee affirmeth that it was founded by Damascus, the sonne of Eliezer Abrahams Steward; a thing very unlikely, seeing the Citie was formerly knowne by that name, as appears by Abrahams calling this his Steward Eliezer of Damasco. Dauid was the first that subiected it to the Kingdome of Iuda, after the ouerthrow of Adadazer their King, but in Salomons time, Rezon recovered it againe, though hee adde no title at all or right to that principality: but Dauid hauing ouerthrowne Hadadazer king of Sophena (otherwise Syria Soba or Zobah) Rezon or Rezon with the remainder of that broken Armie, invaded Damascena, and possesse Damascus it selfe, and became anemie to Salomon all his life. Reg. 11. v. 40.

The next King of Damascus was Adad the Edomite, who flying into Egypt from Dauid and Iobab, when they slew all the males in Edom, was there entertained, and married Taphnes the King of *Egypt*s Wiues sister: of whom Taphnes in Egypt was so called. This Adad returning againe, became anemie to Salomon all his life, and (as some writers affirme) invaded Damascus, and thrust Rezon thence-out. In the line of Adad that Kingdome continued nine descents (as hereafter may be shewed in the catalogue of those Kings of Syria) to whom the Assyrians and then the Gracians succeeded. This Citie was exceeding strong, compassed with waters from the riuers of Abanah, and Parpar: whereof one of them prophane writers call Chrysothoas, the golden riuer. Iunius takes it for Adonis. The countrey adioyning is very fruitful of excellent Wines and Wheats, and all manner of excellent fruits. It had in it a very strong Castle, builts as it seems by the Florentines, after it became Christian: the Lillies being found cut in many Marbles in that Citadell. Against this Citie the Prophets, Amos, Esay, Hieremie, and Zacharias, prophesied that it should be taken, burnt, demolished, and made a heape of stones. In the time of the last Rezon, and tenth King of the Damascens, Teglatphalassar invited by Achaz King of Iuda, carried away the naturals of Damascus into the East: leaving of his owne Nation to inhabit it. After that it was vterly ruined by the Babylonians, saith Hierome vpon Esa: which thing was performed by Salmanser, according to Iunius in his note vpon that place, five yeares after the Prophecie. In time it was restored by the Macedonians, and the Ptolomies; but long after, when Syria fell into the hands of the Romans, it was taken by Metellus and Lollius. In the time of the Christians it had an Archbishop: Saint Hierome liuing, as hee affirmeth vpon the Acts, it was the Metropolis of the Saracens: being taken by Haomar their King from the Romans, in the yeare of our redemption 636. And in the yeare 1147. Conrad the third Emperour of Rome, Lewis King of France, Baldwine the third King of Hierusalem, Henry Duke of Austria, brother to Conrad, Frederick Barbarossa afterward Emperour, Theodorick Earle of Flanders, and other Princes assembled at Ptolomais Acon, on the sea coast, determined to recover Damascus: but being betrayed by the Syrians, they failed of the enterprize. Onaphrium in Chron. Ysaie 17. c. 46. Willelmus Tyr. Beil. Sac. 1. 17. c. 1. 2. 3. 4. 5.

In the yeare 1262. Halan the Tartar incompass it, and hauing formerly taken the King, brought him vnder the walls, and threatend extreame torture vnto him, except the Citizens rendred the place: but they refusing it, the King was torne asunder before them, and in fine the Citie taken, Agab the sonne of Halan was by his father made King thereof. In the yeare 1400. Tamberlaine Emperour of the Parthians, invaded that region, and besieged the Citie with an Armie of 1200000. (if the number be not mistaken.) He entered it, and put all to the sword, filling the ditch with his prisoners; those that retired into the Castle, which seemed a place impregnable, hee ouertopped with another Castle adioyning: hee forbore the demolishing of the Citie in respect of the beauty of the Church, garnished with 40. gates or sumptuous porches. It had within it 9000. Lanes of gold and siluer: but while hee invaded Egypt, they againe surprized Damascus. Lastly, in his return after three moneths siege, hee forc't it: the Mahometans prostrating themselves with their Priests, desired mercie: But Tamberlaine commanding them to enter the Church, hee burnt them and it, to the number of 30000. and did so demolish it, as those that came afterwards to see their houses, knew them not by the foundations. And as a Trophy of his victorie, hee raised three Towers with great Art, buildd with the heads of those whom hee had slaughtered. After this, it was restored and repossessed by the Soldane of Egypt; with a garriſon of Mammelukes: And in the yeare 1517. Selimus Emperour of the Turkes wrestled it out of the hands of the Egyptians: Herold. 1. 6. c. 41. Herold. 1. 6. c. 41.

in whose possession it now remaineth inhabited with Mahometans and Christians of all neighbouring nations.

§. II.

Of the first Kings of Damascus, and of the growing up of their power.

NOW be it that Damascus were founded by Hus the sonne of Aram, or by Damascus the sonne of Eliezer Abrahams steward, we finde no relation of their Kings, or Common-wealth till Dauids time. For it stood without the bounds of Canaan: and therefore neglected by Moses, Ishua, and the Judges, as impertinent to that Storie. But were it so that it had some regali, or petty Kings ouer it, as all the Cities of those parts had, yet none of them became famous for ought that is left to writing, till such time as Dauid ouerthrew Adadazer Prince of Sophena or Syria Zoba: the same Nation which Plinie calleth Nubai, inhabiting betwene Batania and Euphrates. Now the better to vnderstand the storie of those Syrian Princes, whom soone after the Kings of Damascus made their vassals, the reader may inform himselfe, That on the North-east parts of the holy Land, there were three chiefe principalities, whereof the Kings or Commanders greatly vexed or disturbed the State or Common-wealth of Israel, namely Damascus or Aram, Sophena or Syria Zoba, and Chamath, or Chamath-Zoba, of which these were the Princes in Dauids and Salomons times: Razon or Rezon of Damascus, Adadazer of Syria Zoba, and Tobu of Chamath. But it seemeth that Damascus was one of the Cities subiect to Adadazer when Dauid invaded him, though when Saul made warre against Zoba, Damascus was not named. And as Iosephus affirmeth, the leader of those sicours, which were leuiued and sent to Hadad-Hezer from Damascus, had the name of Adad: who was in that battaile slaine with 22000. Aramites of Damascus: whereof, as of the ouerthrow of Adadazer, Rezon, the Commander of his Armie, taking aduantage, made himselfe King of Damascus: Adadazer and Adad of Damascus being both slaine. About the same time Tobu King of Chamath or Iturae, hearing that his neighbour and enemy Adadazer was vterly ouerthrowne, sendeth for peace to Dauid, and presenteth him with rich gifts, but Dauid, faith Sallustius; it was craftily done of him. Now to the North of the Holy Land, and to the West of Damascus, the Tyrians and Zidonians inhabited: but they for the most part were in league and peace with the Iudeans and Israelites. But to returne to the Kings of Syria, I meane of Syria, as it is taken in the Scriptures, containing Damascena, Soba, or Zoba, and Chamath, or Iturae, to which I may adde Gethur, because it is so accounted in the second of Sam. 15. as ioyning in the Territorie to Damascus; for Syria at large is farre greater, of which Palestina it selfe is but a Prouince, as I haue noted in the beginning of this Tract: It is not agreed among the Historians of former times, nor of our later writers, who was the first of those Adads of Syria Zoba, and Damascus.

Some account Rezon, others Adad of Idumæa: of whom it is written in the first of Kings, that Dauid hauing invaded that Region, and left Isab there to destroy all the male children thereof: Adad of the Kings seed, fled into Egypt; and was there married to Taphnes the Queenes sister, as before; who hearing of Dauids death, and of the death of his Captaine Isab (whom indged all the bordering Nations feared) he turned againe, and as Hunting thinketh, this Adad did expell Rezon out of Damascus; and was the first of the Syrian Kings. To mee it seemeth otherwise. For as Isak it, Adadazer the sonne of Rehob, whom Saul invaded, was the founder of that Principallitie: and the first of Adads, who forsaking his Fathers name, as hee grew powerfull, tooke vpon him the stile of Adad, the great god of the Assyrians, faith Macrobius, which signified Oneness or Vnitie, also Isak a Que called Adada in the same part of Syria: of which, whether these Princes tooke the name, or gaue it, I am ignorant. For Adad-azer, Ben-Adad, Eli-Adad were the same in name, with the differences of Ezer, Ben, and Eli, adioyned. And that Adadazer was of greater power, it appeareth first, because it is against him, that Dauid yndertooke the warre: secondly, because hee leuiued 25000. Aramites out of the Territorie of Damascus: as out of his proper Dominions; for had the Damascens had a King apart, it is probable that the Scriptures would haue giuen vs his name; thirdly, because Syria Zoba, of the most of which Adadazer was King, was an exceeding large Territorie, and contained of Arabia Desert as Isak to Euphrates, according to Plinie: and and the greatest part of Arabia Petraea, according to Niger. Who soeuer it was the first, whether Adadazer, or Adad of Idumæa, Rezon was the second: who was an enemy to Israel all the dayes of Salomon. Besides the euill that Adad did, the euill that Hadad did, seemeth to be referred to Hadad of Idumæa, lately returned out of Egypt: to wit, 23. yeares after he was carried thither.

The third king of Damascus, and of Zobah both, was Hezion, to Hezion succeeded Ta- brimmon, or Tabremmon; to him Benhadad, as is proued in the first of Kings: For Asa King of Iuda the son of Abiam, the son of Reboam, the son of Salomon, being vexed & invaded by Basab, the successeur of Nadab, the son of Ieroboam, sent to Benhadad the son of Tabrimmon, the son of Hezion, King of Aram, that dwelt at Damascus, to invade Israel (while Basab fought to fortifie Rama against Asa thereby to block him vp, that he should not enter into any of the Territories of Israel) who according to the desire of Asa, hauing receiued his presents, willingly invaded the Countie of Nephthalim, and took diuers Cities, and spoyle thence: Asa in the meane while carrying away all the Materials, which Basab had brought to fortifie Rama withall, and conuerted them to his owne vse.

This Benhadad his Father Tabremmon was in league with Asa: and so was his Father Hezion: for Asa requieth the continuance of that friendship from Benhadad, his sonne: though it seemeth that the gold and siluer sent him out of the Temple, was the most forcible argument. And that this Tabremmon invaded Israel, before the enterprize of his sonne Benhadad, it is coniectured. For Benhadad when he was prisoner with Achab, spake as followeth: The Cities which my Father tooke from thy Father, I will restore: and thou shalt make streets or keepers of the borders, for thee in Damascus: as my father did in Samaria. And herein there ariseth a great doubt (if the argument it selfe were of much importance) because Tabremmon was Father indeed to Benhadad which invaded Basab, at the request of Asa: But this Benhadad that twice entred vpon Achab, and was the second time taken prisoner, was rather the sonne of Benhadad, the first of that name, the confederate of Asa and Abiam, as before, than the sonne of Tabremmon. For betwene the inuasion of Benhadad the first, in Basab's time, and the siege of Samaria, and the ouerthrow of Benhadad by Achab there past 49. yeares, as may be gathered out of the reignes of the Kings of Israel. So that if we allow 30. yeares of age to Benhadad, when he invaded Basab, and after that 49. yeares ere he was taken by Achab, which make eighty lacking one, it is vnkely that Benhadad at such an age should make warre. Besides all this, the first Benhadad came with no such pompe; but the second Benhadad vauntheth, that hee was folowed with 32. Kings: and therefore I resolute, that Benhadad the sonne of Tabremmon invaded Basab and Omri; and Benhadad the second invaded Achab, at whose hands this Benhadad receiued two notorious ouerthrowes: the first at Samaria, by a fallie of 700. Israelites: the second at Aphec, where, with the like number in effect the Israelites slaughtered 100000. of the Aramites, besides 27000. which were cruelt by the fall of the wall of Aphec. And this Benhadad, Achab againe stretcht liberty: to whom he rendreth those townes that his father had taken from the Predecessour of Achab, but being returned, he refused to render Ramoth Gilcad, a frontier Towne, and of great importance. Now three yeares after (for so long the league lasted) Ramoth nor being deliuered, Achab invaded Gilcad, and besieged the City, being assisted by Iosaphat. The Aramites came to succour and fight: in which Achab is wounded, and dyeth that night. After this, Benhadad sendeth the commander of his forces called Naaman, to Ioram the son of Achab to be healed of the leprosie, and though Elizeus had healed him, yet hee picketh quarrell against Ioram: and when Ioram by Elizeus his intelligence had escaped his plot, he sent men, and Chariots to take the Prophet, as is aforesaid. After, Benhadad besieged Samaria again, and being terrified thence from heauen, he departeth home, and sickneth, and sendeth Azael with great gifts to Elizeus, to know his estate if he might liue. Azael returning, smothereth him. Zonaras and Cedrenus call this Benhadad Adar, and the sonne of Adar: Amos and Hieremie mention the towres of Benhadad. Iosephus writeth that Benhadad and his successeur Azael were worshipped for gods by the Syrians to his time, for the sumptuous Temples which they built in Damascus. The Syrians also boasted much of their antiquity, ignorant, faith he, that scarce yet 1200. yeares are complete since their warres with the Israelites.

Hadad or Azael, the first King of the race of the Adads of Damascus, was annointed by Elzab, or Elizeus, when he was sent by Benhadad to the Prophet, to know whether Benhadad.

hadad should recover his present sickness: He waged warre with Ioram; who received diuers wounds at the encounter at Ramoth in Gilead: from whence returning to be cured at Isefrel, he and the King of Iuda, Abaziah or Ochoziah, are slain by Iehu, as before is said. After the death of Ioram, Azazel continued the warre against Iehu, and wasted Gilead, and all those portions of Gad, Reuben, and Manasse ouer Jordan. He then inuaded Iuda, and tooke Geth; but by gifts from Ias he was averted from attempting Hierusalem: for he presented him all the hallowed things which Iehosaphat, Iehoram, and Abaziah his fathers, Kings of Iuda had dedicated; and which hee himselfe had dedicated, and all the gold which was found in the treasures of the Lord, and in the Kings house. This was the second time that the Temple was spoiled to please the Adads of Damascus. For Asa did present Benhadad with those treasures, when hee inuited him to warre vpon Baasab King of Irael. And notwithstanding this composition between Ias and Azazel, yet a part of his Army spoiled the other Provinces of Iudaea, and slaughtered many principall persons. Lastly, Azazel vexed Ioshua the sonne of Iehu, and brought him to that extremitie, as he left him but fifty horsemen, ten Chariots, & ten thousand foot-men of all his people,

§. III.

Of the later Kings, and decay and overthrow of their power.

FTER Hazael, Benhadad the second, or rather the third of that name, the son of Hazael, reigned in Damascus: who fought against Irael, with ill success: for Ias King of Irael, the sonne of the vnhappy ioachaz, as he was foretold by Elisba the Prophet, beat Benhadad in three severall battels: and hec lost all those Cities to Irael, which his Father Hazael had taken violently from ioachaz.

After this Benhadad the sonne of Hazael, there succeeded three others by the same name, of whom the Stories are lost, onely Nicholus Damascenus cited by Iosephus, makes mention of them: and in one of these Kings times it was that Ieroboam the second, the sonne of Ias recovered Damascus it selfe, to Iudah, saith the Genua, but better in Iunius, utque recuperabat Damascus, & Chamatham Iehu pro Irael; that is, And how hee recovered for Irael, Damascus and Chamatha of Iudaea; for these Cities sometimes conquered by David, did of right belong to the Tribe of Iuda.

And it is likely that this conquest vpon the Adads was performed: the first of these three Adads then liuing, of whom there is no Story. For when as Iehou the King of the ten Tribes had thrice overcome the Syrians in the time of Benhadad the sonne of Hazael, and had recovered the Cities which Hazael had won from Irael; and so left his Kingdome to his sonne Ieroboam the second, it seemeth that this Ieroboam without delay, and having nothing else left for him to enterprize, instantly followed his fathers good fortune, and inuaded Damascus.

Razin, or Rezin, after Iosephus Kases, after Zonaras Raason, the 10. Adad, making league with Pekab, or Phazis King of Irael, against Achaz King of Iuda; both carry away a great number of prisoners. After this they both besiege Achaz in Hierusalem: but in vain. Then Adad alone inuadeth Elath, and bearing out the Iewes, maketh it a Colonie of Syrians: Wherefore Achaz brought Teglatphalassar against Razin, who tooke him, and beheaded him, and won Damascus: with whom ended the line of the Adads and the Kingdome of Damascus: the Assyrians becoming masters both of that and Irael. These Adads as they reigned in order are thus reckoned.

1. Adadzer the sonne of Rehab.
2. Rezin the sonne of Elisadad, or Razin.
3. Iezion.
4. Tibremon.
5. Benhadad, who inuaded Baasab.
6. Benhadad the second, taken prisoner by Achaz.

7. Hazael, whom Elisba foretold, with reuerence of his advancement; the same who overthrew Ioram King of Irael at Ramoth Gilead. And that there was a second Hazael which preceded benhadad the third is not improbable because that Hazael which tooke Geth, and compounded the warre with Ias, made the Expedition thirty yeeres, and perchance more, more, after the first Hazael which stifled his master Benhadad, and had slain Ioram the sonne of Achab King of Irael. For Ias began to raigne in the 7. yeare of Iehu King of Irael; and after he had reigned 23. yeares, the Temple was not yet repaired, after which (and how long we know not) it is said that Hazael took Geth, and turned his face towards Hierusalem. It is also some proofe that Hazael that tooke Geth, was not the same with Hazael that murdered Benhadad, because he could not at that time bee of good yeares, being as it seemeth, the second person in the kingdome, and Commander of Benhadad's men of warre. To this Hazael (be he the first or second) succeeded

8. Benhadad the third, whom Ias King of Irael thrice overthrew.
9. Rezin or Rezin the last, who ioyned with Pekab King of Irael, against Iuda, at which time Achaz King of Iuda waged for his defence Teglatphalassar.

Now between Benhadad the third, and Rezin the last, Nicholus Damascenus findes three other Kings of the Adads, which make twelue in all.

For the rest of the Princes of Syria, which were but reguli, as those of Emath, and Gethsur, we finde that Iohu was King of Emath or Camath in Dauids time, to whom hee sent his sonne Ioram with presents, after Dauids victory against Adadzer. Also Sennacherib speakeeth of a King of Emath, but names him not.

§. IIII.

Of other lesser Kingdomes of the Syrians, which being brought under the Assyrians, neuer recovered themselves againe.

F Geffur we finde two Kings named; to wit, Talmai, and his Father Ammihur, to Talmai, whose daughter David married, it was that Abalon fled, who was his maternall grandfather. Of the Kings of Sephen or Syria, Soba or Coelosyria there are two named, Rebub or Rechob the Father of Adadzer, and Adadzer himselfe, and it is plaime that after his death the seat of the Kings of Soba was transferred to Damascus, a Citie better fitting their greatnesse. After Rezin became Lord of both Principalities. And the race of these Kings of Syria, (which became so potent, and ioyned Soba, Damascus, Emath, and the Desert of Arabia with other Provinces into one, vnder Rezin the second of the Adads) as it began with David, so it ended at once with the Kingdome of Irael. For Achaz King of Iuda waged the Assyrian Teglatphalassar against Pekab King of Irael, and against Rezin the last King of Damascus: which Teglat first inuaded Damascus, and the region of Soba, and tooke Damascus it selfe, and did put to death Rezin the last, carrying the Inhabitants captiue. This was the second time that the Assyrians attempted Irael. For first, Phul Beluchus entred the borders thereof (Menabem governing Irael) who stopt the enterprise of Phul with a thousand talents of siluer: for this Phul Beluchus, whose pedigree wee will examine hereafter, being scarce warne as yet in his seat at Babylon, which hee, with the helpe of his companion Arbaces, had wrested from Sardanapalus: having besides this King of Syria in his way, who seemed to bee a great and strong Prince, was content to take the composition of a thousand talents of the King of Irael for that present time. But his sonne Teglat following the purpose of his father Beluchus, and finding so excellent an occasion, as the warre begun betwene Irael and Iudah, Pekab commanding in the one, and Achaz in the other, his neighbour Rezin being also wrapt in the warre, and waited in strength thereby, did willingly accept the offer of Achaz King of Iuda, his imprest and entertainment. So, first attempting Damascus, which lay in his path towards Irael, hee carried it (as is before remembred) and then with great ease possesse himselfe of the Cities of Nephtalim, leading with him a great part of the people captiue. And his sonne Salmanasser, whom Ptolome calleth Nabonasser, after the reuolt of Hofes, forced Samaria, and rent that Kingdome asunder.

So againe he and race of Ninus in Sardanapalus, whom Beluchus supplanted; the race and Monarchie of the Syrian Adads in Rezin, whom Teglat slaughtered, the Kingdome of Irael in Hofes, whom Salmanasser overturned; happened neere about a time: that of Ninus in the dayes of Beluchus; and the other two in the dayes of Teglatphalassar, and Salmanasser his son: For Sardanapalus perished, Ofis ruling Iuda; and the other two Kingdomes were dissolved, Achaz yet liuing.

Lastly the Kingdome of Iuda it selfe, being attempted by Sennacherib, the sonne of Salmanasser in vaine, and preserved for the time by Gods miraculously, was at length utterly utterly ouerturned. Hierusalem and the Temple burnt 132. years after the captiuitie of Israel and Samaria: the destruction of Israel being in the ninth yeare of Hofea: that of Juda in the eleuenth of Zedechia. Now the Emperours of Assyria and Babylon held also the Kingdome of Syria, from the eighth yeare of Salmannassar, to the last of Baltassar, whom Hierodotus calleth Labyrinthus: in all about 200. yeares. After these the Persians from Cyrus to Darius their last King, held Syria about 200. yeares.

Then Alexander Macedon tooke this among other Prouinces of the Persian Empire, and his successors the Seleucide reigned therein, till it became subiect vnto the power of the Romans, from whom it was wrested long after by the Saracens, and remaineth now in possession of the Turke, as shall be shewed in due place. Thus much of the Nations it bordering vpon the Israelites, with whom they had most to doe both in warre and peace, being the onely people, whose History in those ancient times carried an assured face of truth.

CHAP. XII.

OF THE TRIBE OF BENJAMIN,
and of Hierusalem.

S. I.

Of diuers memorable places in the Tribe of Benjamin, whereof Hiericho, Gilgal, Mitspa, Bethel, Rama, Gabbah and Gibba.

F the Tribe of Benjamin, the twelfth and youngest sonne of Isaac, whom hee had by Rachel, there were mustered at Mount Sinai 35000. able bodies: all which perishing in the Deserts, there entered the Holy Land of their iusses. 45600. fit to beare Armes: and these had their Territorie on this side Jordan, betwene Juda and Ephraim: The Cities within this Tribe neere Jordan, are Lod; Hadad; and Ono: of which, Lod and Ono were built by Shemur a Beniamite: they were all three re-inhabited by Beniamites, after the returne out of Captiuitie, as is mentioned, Nehem. 11. 35. and Esa. 35. where Adrichomius reading Lod, Hadid, Ono, makes besides Hadid in Nehemiah, a Citie called Lodhadid: This Hadid or Chadid was rebuilt by Simon Machabeus.

Samaria or Tsemaraim, named of Tsemari, one of the sons of Canaan, was another of their Cities: and further into the Land standeth Iericho, one of the Toparchies and the last of Juda, seated in a most fruitful valley, adorned with many palme trees: and there before elsewhere called the City of Palms. From the time of Iosua, who utterly destroyed it, it lay waste vntill the time of Achad: in whose dayes Chiel of Bethel laid the new foundation of it, in the losse of Abiram his eldest sonne, and built the gates of it in the losse of his youngest sonne Segub: according to the curse of Iosua: in which and other respects, Ios. 12. 14. calleth Iosua a Prophet. In after-times it was destroyed by Vesphasian, and rebuilt by Adrian.

To the Southeast of Iericho stood * Halmon of the Leuites, of which Ios. 21. 18. To the South Betharaba, of which Ios. 6. 15. and 6. 18. Then that Gilgal of which there is so much mention in the Scripture, where Iosua first ate of the fruites of the land, circumcised all those borne in the Deserts, and celebrated the Passeouer.

The reason of the name, or rather a memorable application of the Etymologie of this name (for it seemes by the place, Deut. 11. 30. that the name was knowne before the coming of the Israelites into Canaan) is noted Ios. 5. 2. Obdolationem probrii Egyptiaci, because their fore-skinnes (the people being there circumcised) were tumbled downe the Hill: which from thence was called, Collis prapriorum. This Gilgal was also called Geliloth, as appears by comparing the places, Ios. 15. 7. and 18. 17: for it was in the borders of Jordan, of which Ios. 22. 13 and Gilgaloth signifieth borders. It stood (though in some distance) directly Eastward, ouer against the two * Hills Gazazim and Habal: vpon the one of which the blessings, and on the other the cursings were to be read to the people, both being the mountaines of Ephraim. Further, for the situation of this Gilgal, it is to be noted, that both it, and Mitspa of Benjamin (of which also wee reade oft in the Scripture) were seated about the midle of the length of the Land of Canaan: for which reason * Sa. 2. 1. Sam. 7. 17. mel chose these two places, to either of which he came yearly to giue iudgement to the Israelites; of which two, Gilgal, (as is said) was neere Jordan on the East side of this Tribe; and Mitspa neere the West Sea, towards the land of the Philistims.

The third place, which is named with these two, whither also Samuel vied yearly to come, is * Bethel: which also was seated in this Tribe of Benjamin. But to returne to Gilgal, which was the first place where the Arke resided, after they past ouer Jordan (from whence it was carried to Silo, and thence to Kiriath-iehavim, and at length to Hierusalem) and interprets it, Kiriath-iehavim, where: here in Gilgal: was that Iosua pitched vp the twelue Stones, which were taken out of the channell of Jordan, when it was drie, that the Israelites might passe ouer it: by which the storie, as it is set downe Ios. 4. it appears, that the same day that they passed ouer Jordan, by the Law, they lodged at Gilgal. At the same Gilgal, to omit many other memorable things, it was that Samuel hewed Azzab the King of the Amalekites in peeces. And as for Mitspa, whither Samuel came yearly to giue iudgement, there also were often the greatest meetings held: as that for the reuenge of the Leuites wife against Gibba, and the Beniamites, Iud. 20. were to bee, 1. and another against the Philistims, 1 Sam. 7. 12. Thither also Iudas Maccabeus gathered the Lewes, (when Hierusalem was posselt by the Heathen) as it is 1 Macc. 3. 47. in place doth note which place this reason of their meeting is added, Quia locus Orationis fuerat Mitspa ante Israel. Touching this Mitspa, to auoid confusion, it is to be remembered, that the Scriptures mention foure places of this name: Mitspa of Juda, of which Ios. 15. 38. * Mitspa of Gilead, of which we haue spoken already in the Tribe of Gad. Mitspa of the Moabites, where Daniel for a while held himselfe, commending his Parents to the King of Moab, bring the Arke 1 Sam. 22. 3. and lastly, this chiefe Mitspa of the Beniamites. And as in this place the chiefe meetings were held both before Hierusalem was recovered from the Iebulites, and also in the time of the Maccabees (as we haue said) when Hierusalem was held by the wicked vnder Antiochus, so also in the time of Hieremie, after the destruction of the Temple by the Chaldees, Cedaliah whom Nabuchodonosor left in Ierusalem, as Gouverneur ouer those that were left in the land, held his abiding in this place: vntill (to the great hurt of the Lewes) hee was slaine by the treason of Ismael, one of the royall bloud of Juda, as it is Hierem. 41.

Neere vnto this Mitspa, the Scripture mentioneth Beth-car, after called Aben-Hezer, that is, the Stone of helpe: where Samuel pitched vp the Pillar or Stone, for a Trophy against the Philistims.

Touching Bethel (which as it seemes) was the third place where Samuel held his chiefe meetings for the ministring of Iustice, that it was anciently called Luz, and how it was taken by the issue of Ioseph (though it belonged to the portion of Benjamin, as it is Nehem. 11. 31. and Ios. 18. 22.) and how another Citie called Luz, neere adioyning to it, was built by the man of the Citie which shewed the entrance to the Spies, as it is Iud. 9. 1. and of the occasion of the name from Iacobs vision: and how Ieroboam, by erecting one of his calves here, of Bethel (which signifieth the house of God) made it * Beth-Auen, which is added that is, the house of Vanitie, Hos. 4. 15. and Ios. 5. as also other memorable things of this place, they are so well knowne, out of the Histories of the Scripture, that wee may well passe them ouer.

The Territorie of Bethel, which at the first belonged to the Kingdome of the tenne Tribes, from the time of the great victorie of Abia against Ieroboam (of which 2 Chron. followed the 23.) was taken from them, and adioyned to the Kingdome of Juda: and so it continued, so as appears by the storie of Iosias: which performed the Prophecies against the altar of Bethel, 2 Reg. 23. whencethose coasts 1 Macc. 11. 34. are called Apheramas, which Greeke word signifieth as much as, Aching taken away, to wit, from the tenne Tribes. It was one of the three Seigniories or Presidencies which Demetrius in his Epistle mentioneth, as added by him to the Dition of the Lewes, out of the Samarian Countrey. A part of it, as appears 1 Chron. 13. 19. was Ephraim, which Ios. 18. 23. is called Hophram, belonging to this Tribe of Benjamin.

Not farre from this Bethel in this Tribe, we finde three other Cities often mentioned the name of a neighbour town in the confines of the Kingdome of Juda and Israel betwene Iai and betel, Ios. 18. 12.

b See 19. 1. c Of this a. m. 1. 1. vnder- stand the place 1. Ma. 6. 14. 34. where it is named for one of the 3. Tribes which 1. Ma. 6. 14. 34. yields to the country of 34. 1. Ma. 6. 14. 34. lying toward the East to Jericho, and Tydd: toward the West, is most often mentioned, is Rama of Benjamin, seated as we said, neere Bethel the westernmost South-border of the Kingdome of the tenne Tribes: for which cause Baszba in the time of Asa King of Juda, fortified it, to hinder those that did flee from him to Asa. Of this Rama or Ramatha, I should rather thinke Ioseph was, that buried Christ: because it was neerer to Hierusalem, and after the captiuitie belonged to Iudaea, as it appeares, Esa. 2. 26. where in that it is ioyned with Gebah, it is plain that hee speake of that Rama with whose stones (after Baszba had ceased to build it) Asa (as it is 1. Reg. 25. 22.) built Gebah adioyning to it: both being in Benjamin. And as Rama was the South-border of the ten Tribes, so was Gebah the North-border of the Kingdome of Juda: whence 2. Reg. 23. 8. we read that Ioshab through all his Kingdome, euen from Gebah, which was the North-border, to Beer-sheba which was the South border, destroyed the places of Idolatry.

Of a fourth Rama we read 2. Reg. 8. 29. which is Ramath in Gilead. The first, which is most often mentioned, is Rama of Benjamin, seated as we said, neere Bethel the westernmost South-border of the Kingdome of the tenne Tribes: for which cause Baszba in the time of Asa King of Juda, fortified it, to hinder those that did flee from him to Asa. Of this Rama or Ramatha, I should rather thinke Ioseph was, that buried Christ: because it was neerer to Hierusalem, and after the captiuitie belonged to Iudaea, as it appeares, Esa. 2. 26. where in that it is ioyned with Gebah, it is plain that hee speake of that Rama with whose stones (after Baszba had ceased to build it) Asa (as it is 1. Reg. 25. 22.) built Gebah adioyning to it: both being in Benjamin. And as Rama was the South-border of the ten Tribes, so was Gebah the North-border of the Kingdome of Juda: whence 2. Reg. 23. 8. we read that Ioshab through all his Kingdome, euen from Gebah, which was the North-border, to Beer-sheba which was the South border, destroyed the places of Idolatry.

The third Citie Gibba, which was the Citie of Saul (the wickednesse of which Citie in the time of the Judges had almost viterly rooted out this Tribe) Adrichomius confounds with Gebah, making one of two (as they are evidently distinguished, Esa. 10. 27.) of which word Gibba, in another forme Gibbath, hee imagineth Gibbath another Citie in this Tribe, making two of one. The vicinitie of this Citie also to Rama of Benjamin, appeares Iud. 19. 13. where the Leuite with his wife, not able to reach to Rama, took vp his lodge, being at Gibba. By that place of 1. Sam. 22. 6. it seemes that there was in this Gibba some Tower or Citadell called Rama: where Iunius reades in excess, for in Rama: but it may be that the name of the Kings Palace in this City, was Ramas: as it seemes that in Rama of Samuel, the name of the chiefe place where Samuel with the College of Prophets abode, was Naioth. The great Citie of Hai ouerthrowne by Iof. which Iof. 7. 2. is placed neere Beth-anen vpon the East of Bethel, was in this Tribe, as is proued Nehe. 7. 10. 30. though it be not named by Iof. 18. 18. for it was burned by him and laid desolate, as it is Iof. 8. 28. In solitudine in samulim perpetuum. Another City of chiefe note is reckoned Iof. 18. 25. In this Tribe was Gibbom, the chiefe Citie of the Heuites: whose cunning to binde the Israelites by oath to save their liues, is set downe Iof. 9. whence they were reckoned among the * Nethinai or Proselites, and were bound to certaine publique seruices in the house of God: which oath of saving their Gibonites, broken in part after by Saul, was by God punished by a famine, 2. Sam. 21. 1. This Gibon or Gibbon with Almon and Itab (of both which wee haue spoken) and with Hanothoth the natall place of Hieremias the Prophet, were said Iof. 21. 28. to be giuen to the Leuites by the Beniamites. Neere to this Hanothoth was Noo, as appeares 1. Reg. 2. 26. where Abiathar the Priest, which was of Nob before it was destroyed by Saul, is sent to his grounds at Hanothoth: It is reckoned in the Tribe of Beniamin, Nehe. 9. 31. and though in the time of Saul the residing place of the Arke was at Kiriat-earim: yet by the lamentable tragidie of bloudshed, which Saul raised in this place (as it is let downe 1. Sam. 21. and 22.) in the iudgement of Iunius, it is proued that the Tabernacle was there for a time.

Micmas also in this Tribe Nehe. 9. 31. was a place of fame, of which Esa. 10. 28. where also he nameth Gallim, and Migrom in this Tribe. In Micmas Saul had his Campe, 1. Sam. 13. 2. (when he left Gibba to Jonathan) and there also was Jonathan Macchabeus his aboad, 1. Ma. 9. 73. Of Gisela in Galilee Iosephus makes often mention, but of any here in Beniamin, which they make the natall place of S. Paul, whence (they say) when it was taken by the Romans, he failed with his parents to Tharsis, of this I finde no good warrant. Other places of lesse importance I omit, and come to the Citie of Hierusalem, and the Princes Princes and Gouvernours of this City: A great part wherof was in the Tribe of Beniamin whence Iof. 18. 28. it is named among the Cities of Beniamin.

S. II.

Of diuers memorable things concerning Hierusalem.

At what time Hierusalem was built (which afterward became the Princeesse of all Cities) it doth not appeare. Some there are who imagine that Melchisedec was the founder thereof in Abrahams time. But * according to others, that Citie * See in the 10. out of which Melchisedec incountred Abraham (in his returne from the ouerthrow of the Assyrian and Persian Kings or Captaines, when Lot was made prisoner) flandeth by the riuer of Jordan, in the halfe Tribe of Manasse bordering Zabulon, which was also called Salem, and by the Greekes Solima.

Hierusalem (whensoever or by whomsoever built) was a principall Citie in Iof. 18. 28. time: yet not so renowned as Hazor the Metropolis (in those dayes and before) of all the Canaanites. Adonizedek (whom Iof. 18. 28. was then King of Hierusalem). That it was belonging to the Iebusites it is manifest: for how long soeuer they held it before Moses time, they were Masters and Lords thereof almost 400. yeares after him: euen till Dauid wanne it: and therefore in all likelihood, it was by the Iebusai (the children of Iebuseus the sonne of Canaan) built; after whom it was called Iebus. And so much did that Nation relye on the strength of the place, as when Dauid attempted it, they bragged that their lame, and blinde, and impotent people should defend it.

Dauid, after he had by Gods assistance possessed it, and turned out the Iebusites, gaue it an exceeding great increase of circuit: strengthened it with a Citadell or Castle: and beautified it with many Palaces, and other buildings: changing the name from Iebusalem, the City of the Iebusites, to Hierusalem, which the Greekes call Hierosolyma. After Dauids time Salomon amplified, beautified, and strengthened it exceedingly. For besides the worke of the Temple, which was no lesse admirable than renowned among all Nations, the Palaces, gates, and walls, could not any where in the world be exempld: and besides that it had 150000. Inhabitants, the women and children not accounted. The ditch had 60. foot depth, cut out of the very rocke: and 250. foot of breadth: whereof the like hath feldome beene heard of, either since or before.

After the death of Salomon, and that the Kingdome of the Iewes was cut asunder, Shishac King of Egypt, and his predecessor, hauing bred vp for that purpose, Adaad the Idumean, and Jeroboam, Salomons seruants; and both married to Egyptians: the State by the one disturbed, by the other broken: Shishac first invaded the Territory of Juda, entered Hierusalem, and sackt it, and became Master not onely of the riches of Salomon, but of all those spoiles which Dauid had gotten from Adadezer, Tohu, the Ammonites, and other Nations. It was againe sackt, and a part of the wall throwne downe by Ios. King of Israel: while Amasias the twelfth King thereof gouerned Juda.

Not long after, Achaz the fifteenth King of Juda impouerished the Temple, and presented Tegath-palaasar with the treasures thereof. And Manasses the sonne of Ezekiab, the sonne of Achaz, by the vaults made by Ezekiab, to the Embassadors of Mesopotamia, lost the remaine, and the very bottom of their treasures. It was againe spoiled by the Babylonians, Iakim then reigning. But this vngratefull, Idolatrous, and rebellious Nation, taking no warning by these Gods gentle corrections and afflictions, but persisting in all kinde of impietie, filling the City euen to the mouth with innocent blood, God raised vp that great Babylonian King Nabuchodonosor, as his scourge and reuenger, who making this glorious Citie and Temple with all the Palaces therein, and the 50 Walls and Towers which embraced them, euen and leuell with the dust, carried away the spoiles with the Princes and people, and crusht them with the heauie yoke of bondage and seruitude full seventy yeares, inso much as Sion was not onely become as a torne and plowed vp field, Hierusalem an heape of stones, and rubble, the mountaine of the Temple as a groue, or wood of thornes and briars, but (as Hierome speaketh) euen the birds of the ayre scorned to flie ouer it, or the beasts to tread on that defiled soyle.

Then 70. yeares being expired, according to the prophecie of Daniel, and the Iewes by the grace of Cyrus returned: the Temple was againe built, though with interruption and difficultie difficultie enough: and the Citie meanelly inhabited, and without walls or other defences, for some 60. and odd yeares, till Nehemia by the fauour of Artaxerxes rebuilt them. Then againe was the Temple and Citie spoyled by Bagofer, or Vagages, the Lieutenant of Artaxerxes after by * Ptolomaeus the first, then by Antiochus Epiphanes: and againe by Apollonius his Lieutenant. By Pompey it was taken long after, but not destroyed, nor robbed, though Craffus in his Parthian expedition tooke as much as hee could of that which Pompey spared.

But the damages which it sustained by the violence of sacrilegious Tyrants, were commonly recompensed by the industrie or bountie of good Princes, the voluntarie contribution of the people; and the liberalitie of strangers. Before the captiuitie, the people of the land through the exhortation of godly Kings, made many and large offerings to repaire the Temple of Salomon. The wrong done by Ptolomaeus Lagi to the second Temple, was requited by the bountie of his sonne Ptolomaeus Philadelphus. The mischiefe wrought by Antiochus Epiphanes and his followers, was amended partly by the great offerings which were sent to Hierusalem out of other Nations. Finally all the losses, which either the Citie or Temple had endured, might well seeme forgotten in the raigae of Herod that vsurping and wicked, but magnificent King, who amplified the Citie, new built the Temple, and with many sumptuous workes did so adorne them, that hee left them farre more stately and glorious than they had beene in the dayes of Salomon.

S. III.

Of the destruction of Ierusalem by the Romans.

IN this flourishing estate, it was at the comming of our Saviour Christ Iesus: and after his death and ascension, it so continued about 40. yeares. But then did Titus the Roman, being stirred vp by God, to be the reuenger of Christ his death, and to punish the Iewes sinfull ingratitude, incompasse it with a Roman armie, and became Lord thereof. He began the siege at such time as the Iewes, from all parts, were come vp to the celebration of the Pascheur: so as the Citie was then filled with many hundreds of thousands of all sorts; and no manner of prouision or store for any such multitudes. An extreame famine, with the ciuill dissension, oppressed them within the walls; a forcible enemy assailed them without. The Iudaeans also, who lay in waite for the destruction of the Iewes Kingdome, thrust themselves into the Citie, of purpose to betray it: who also burnt the Temple, when Nabuchodonosor tooke it. And to bee short, there perished of all sorts, from the first besieging to the consummation of the victory, eleven hundred thousand soules: and the City was so beaten downe and demolished, as those which came afterward to see the desolation thereof, could hardly beleuee that there had beene any such place or habitation. Onely the three Herodian towers (workes most magnificent, and ouer-topping the rest) were spared, as well for lodgings for the Roman garrisons, as that thereby their victorie might bee the more notorious and famous: for by those buildings of strength and State remaining, after-ages might iudge what the rest were; and their honour bee the greater and more shining, that there-ouer became victorious.

After this, such Iewes as were scattered here and there in Iudea, and other Prouinces, began againe to inhabit some part of the Citie; and by degrees to rebuild it, and strengthen it as they could, being then at peace, and tributaries to the Roman State: but after 65. yeares, when they againe offered to reuolt, and rebell, Alius Adrianus the Emperour slaughtered many thousands of them, and ouerturned those three Herodian Towers, with all the rest, making it good which Christ himselfe had foretold; That there should not stand one stone vpon another, of that vngodly Citie. Afterward, when his furie was appeased, and the Prophecie accomplished, he tooke one part without the wall, wherein stood Mount Caluarie, and the Sepulchre of Christ, and excluding of the rest the greatest portion, he againe made it a Citie of great capacite, and called it after his owne name, Aelia Capitolia. In the gate toward Bethel, hee caused a Sow to bee cut in Marble, and set in the front thereof, which hee did in despite of the Iewes Nation: making an Edict, that they should not from thence forth euer enter into the City, neither should they dare so much as to behold it from any other high place ouertopping it.

But

But the Christian Religion flourishing in Palestina, it was inhabited at length, by all Nations, and especially by Christians; and so it continued 500. yeares.

It was afterward in the 636. yeare after Christ, taken by the Egyptian Saracens, who held it 400. and odd yeares.

In the yeare 1099. it was regained by Godfrey of Buillon, by assault, with an exceeding slaughter of the Saracens; which Godfrey, when he was elected King thereof, refused to be crowned with a Crowne of gold, because Christ, for whom hee fought, was therein crowned with thornes. After this recouery, it remained vnder the successors of Godfrey foure score and eight yeares: till in the yeare 1197. it was regained by Saladine of Egypt and lastly, in the yeare 1517. in the time of Selim, the Turkes cast out the Egyptians, who now hold it, and call it Cuzumbarce, or the Holy Citie. Neither was it in Ierusalem alone that hath so oftentimes beene beaten downe and made desolate, but all the great Cities of the World haue with their Inhabitants, in severall times and ages, suffered the same shipwrecke. And it hath beene Gods iust will, to the end others might take warning, if they would, not onely to punish the impiety of men, by famine, by the sword, by fire, and by lauerie; but hee hath reuenged himselfe of the very places they possesse; of the walls and buildings, yea, of the soyle and the beasts that fedde thereon.

For, euen that land, sometime called holy, hath in effect lost all her fertilitie and fruitfulness; witness the many hundreds of thousands which it fed in the dayes of the Kings of Iuda and Israel: it being at this time all ouer, in effect, exceeding stony and barraine. It also pleased God, not onely to consume with fire from heauen, the Cities of the Sodomites; but the very soile it selfe hath felt, and doth feele the hand of God to this day. God would not spare the beasts that belonged to Amalek, no nor any small number of them to be sacrificed to himselfe: neither was it enogh that Achan himselfe was stoned, but that his moueables were also consumed and brought to ashes.

S. IIII.

Of the vaine and malicious reports of Heathen writers, touching the ancient Iewes.

OF the original of the Iewes, prophane writers haue conceiued diuersly and inuiously. Quintilian speaks insamously of them, and of their Leader, who (saith he) gathered together a pernicious Nation. Diodore and Strabo make them Egyptians. Others affirme that while Ihs gouerned Egypt, the people were so increased, as Ierofolymus and Iuda led thence a great multitude of that Nation, with whom they planted the neighbour Regions: which might be meant by Moses and Aaron: for the name of Moses was accidentall, because he was taken vp and saued out of the waters. But Iustine of all other most malicious, doth denie the Iewes from the Syrian Kings; of whom, Damasius, saith he, was the first: and to him succeeded Abraham, Moses, and Israel. He againe supposeth (somewhat contrary to himselfe) that Israel had ten sonnes, among whom hee diuided the land of Iuda; so called of Iudas his eldest; who had the greatest portion. The youngest of the sonnes of Israel he calleth Ioseph: who being brought vp in Egypt, became learned in magicall Arts, and in the interpretations of Dreames, and signes prodigious; and this Ioseph (saith he) was father to Moses: who with the rest, by reason of their soule diseases, and lest they should infect others, were banished Egypt. Further, he telleth how these men thus banished, when in the Desarts they suffered extreame thirst and famine, and therein found reliefe the seventh day, for this cause euer after obserued the seventh day, and kept it Holy; making it a Law among themselves, which afterward became a branch of their Religion. Hee addeth also, that they might not marrie out of their owne Tribes, lest discouering their vnclaneenesse, they might also be expelled by other Nations, as they were by the Egyptians. These and the like fables hath Iustine.

Cornelius Tacitus doth as grossly belie them, in affirming, that in the inmost Oratorie of their Temple, they had the golden head of an Asse, which they adored. But herein Tacitus forgetteth himselfe, hauing in the first booke of his owne Historie truly confessed of the Iewes, that they worshipped one only God, and thought it most prophane to represent the Hebrie by any materiall figure, by the shape of a man, or any other creature: and they had therefore in their Temples, no Image or representation, no not so much as in any City by them inhabited. Somewhat like this hath Alexander Polyhistor, in Stephanus, who also makes Judas with Tamus, the first parents of the Iewes.

Claudius Iulius drawes them from Judeus, whose parents were Spartan and Thebis, whence it came that the Spartans or Lacedemonians challenged kindred of the Hebrewes; but they did it as descended of Abraham, saith Iosephus. Some of these reports seemed haue beene gathered out of diuine letters; though wrested and peruerced; according to the custome of the Heathen. For so haue they obscured and altered the storie of the Creation, of Paradise, of the Flood; and giuen new names to the children of Adam in the first age: to Noah and his sonnes, in the second: and so to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, Moses, and the rest of the Fathers, and leaders of the Hebrewes: all which fainings, as touching the Iewes and their originalls, Iosephus against Appian, and Tertullian haue sufficiently answered. For that the Hebrewes were the children of Arphaxad and Heber, no man doubteth: and to Chaldeans originally, taking name either of Heber, the sonne of Sale, or else (saith Montanus) of wandering, as is before remembered. And therefore doth Stephanus, the Greeke Grammarian, deriue the Hebrewes or Iewes, from Arabe, hauing mistaken the name of Abraham; who was the sonne of Heber, in the sixth descent. Their ancient names were first changed by the two grand-children of Abram: for after Jacob, otherwise Israel, the chiefe part were called Israel, another part after E. 10 Sau or Edom, Edomites; at length the remnant of Jacob, being most of the Tribe of Juda, honoured the name of Judas, the sonne of Jacob, and became Judeans or Iewes: as also for a time in the name of Ephraim the sonne of Ioseph, the chiefe of the Patriarches of the ten Tribes; the rest of the ten Tribes were comprehended: but were first rooted out when the Kingdome of Israel fell. The Judeans continued their names, though they suffered the same seruitude not long after, vnder Nabuchodonosor.

The gouernement which this Nation vnder-went, was first paternall: which continued till they serued the Egyptians. They were secondly ruled by their Captaines and Leaders, Moses and Iosua, by a policie Diuine. Thirdly, they subiected themselves to Iudges. Fourthly, they desired a King, and had Saul for the first: Of whom and his successours, before we intreat, we are first to speake of their Gouernment vnder Iudges, after the death of Iosua: with somewhat of the things of Fame in other Nations about these times.

Of the memorable things that happened in the World, from the death of Iosua to the Warre of Troy: which was about the time of Iephtha.

§. I.

Of the inter-regnum after Iosua's death: and of Othoniel.

When Iosua was now dead, who with the aduice of the 70. Elders, and the high Priest, held authoritie ouer the people, and ordered that Common-weale: it pleased God to direct the Tribe of Juda (in whom the Kingdome was afterward established) to vndertake the Warre against the Canaanites, ouer whom (with Gods fauour, and the assistance of Simeon) they became victorious.

In the first attempt which they made, they not only slew tenne thousand, but made Adonibezek prisoner: the greatest and cruellest Commander, both of the Canaanites and Perizites. This tyrants cruelty, as elsewhere hath beene signified, they returned in the same kinde vpon his owne head: and so by the torments which hee now felt in his owne person (before no otherwise knowne vnto him but by his malicious other times wherein they wanted Gouvernors, were spent vnder such oppression of strangers, as would haue given them no leaue to haue attempted such a ciuill Warre; & their power had bene as great, as it was in the managing of this action; wherein they lo weakened the body of their estate, by effusion of blood, that in many ages they could not bring into the field such numbers as formerly they had mustered against their bordering enemies.

§. II.

Of the memorable things of this age in other Nations: and of the difficultie in the computation of times.

Here liued in this Age of Othoniel, Pandon or Pandarus, according to Homere, the fifth King of Athenes; who began to rule in the twentieth yeare of Othoniel, and gouerned fortie yeares. He was Father to Erichon: his Daughters were Progne and Philomela, so greatly mentioned in fables.

Cæmus also about this time obtained Thebes: of whose Daughter Semele was borne Dionysius, or Liber Pater: vnder whom Linus the Musician liued. In his time also the Cities of Melus, Napbus, and Tharsus were built.

Ida and Ischylus flourished in this age, who are said to haue found out the vse of Iron: but Genesis hath taught vs the contrary, and that Tubalcaim long before wrought cunning-ly both in Iron and Brasse, Not long after this time, Amphion & Zethus gouerned Thebes: whom diuers Chronologers finde in Ehuds time. But S. Augustine de Ciuitate Dei; and the eighteenth booke, hath gathered all the opinions of this mans progenie, where hee that desires his pedigree may finde it. Lactantius and Eusebius make him natie of Africa: and the sonne of Ephesus King of Elesina: which Elesus by carefull industrie had fed the people of that Territorie in the time of a great famine. This, when vpon the like occasion Triptolemus could not performe, fearing the furie of the people, he fled thence by Sea in a kinde of Galley or long Boar, which carried in her Prow a grauen or carued Serpent; who because hee made exceeding great speed to returne and to relieue his people with Corne, from some neighbour Nation: it was fained by the Poets, that his Coach was carried by Serpents through the ayre.

Whether the times of these Kings which liued together with Othoniel, and after him with the rest of the Iudges and Kings of Israel and Juda, be precisely set downe, I cannot auow; for the Chronologers, both of the former and latter times, differ in many particulars, to examine all which would require the whole time of a long life: and therefore I desire to be excused, if in these comparisons I erre with others of better iudgement. For whether Eusebius and all that follow him, or his opposites (who make themselves so conuersant with these ancient Kings, and with the very yeare when they began to rule) haue hit the marke of time, of all other the farthest off and most defaced, I cannot but greatly doubt. First, because the Authors themselves, from whom the ancientest Chronologers haue borrowed light, had nothing for the warrant of their owne workes, but coniecture: Secondly, because their owne disagreement and contention in those elder dayes, with that of our owne age among the labourers in times, is such, as no man among them hath yet so edified any mans vnderstanding, saue his owne; but that he is greatly distracted, after what patterne to erect his buildings.

This disagreement is found not onely in the raignes of Heathen Kings & Princes, but euen in the computation of those times which the indisputable authority of holy Scripture hath summed vp, as in that of Abrahams birth; and after in the times of the Iudges and the oppressions of Israel, in the times from the egression to the building of Salomons Temple, in the Persian Empire, the fewtie Weekes, and in what not? Wherefoer the account of times may suffer examination, the arguments are opposite, and contentions are such, as for ought that I see, men haue sought by so many waies to vncouer the Sunne, that the dayes thereby are made more darke, and the clouds more condensed than before: I can therefore giue no other warrant, than other men haue done in these computations: and therefore that such and such Kings and Kingdomes tooke beginning in this or that yeere; I auow it to otherwise than as a borrowed knowledge, or at least as a priuate opinion: which I submit to better iudgements. Nam in priuatis rebus veritas non ad vulgum querenda; in auiens things wee are not to require an exact narration of the truth, sayes Diode.

§. III.

Of Ehud time, and of Proserpina, Orithya, Tereus, Tantalus, Tityus, Admetus, and others that liued about those times.

After the death of Othoniel, when Israel fell backe to their former Idolatry, God encouraged Moab to invade and suppress them: to performe which he ioyned the forces of Ammon, and Amalec vnto his owne, and so (as all kinde of miserie readily findeth out those whom God hath abandoned, or for a time with-drawne his helpe from, thereby to make them feeble the difference betweene his grace and his displeasure) these Heathen neighbouring Nations had an easie conquest ouer Israel: whom God himselfe exposed to those perills: within which they were so speedilie folded vp. In this miserable estate they continued full eigheteen yeeres vnder Eglon King of the Moabites, and his confederates. Yet, as the mercies of God are infinite, hee turned not his cares from their crying repentance: but raised vp Ehud the sonne of Gera to deliuer them: by which weakeman, though maimed in his right hand, yet confident in the iustnesse of his quarrell, and fearing that the Israelites were too few in numbers to contend with the Head of those valiant Nations, hee resolved to attempt vpon the person of Eglon, whom if he could but extinguishe, hee assured himselfe of the following victory: especially giuing his Nation no time to reestablish their gouernment, or to chooe a King to command and direct them in the Warres. According to which resolution, Ehud went on as an Embassadour to Eglon, loaden with presents from the Israelites, as to appeale him; and obtaining priuate access vpon the pretence of some secret to be reuealed, he pierce his body with a Poniard, made of purpose with a double edge; and shutting the doores of his closet vpon him, escaped.

It may seeme that being confident of his good successe, hee had prepared the strength of Israel in readinesse. For suddenly after his returne, he did repasse Jordan, and inuading the Territory of Moab, ouerthrew their Army consisting of 10000 able and strong men: whereof not any one escaped. After which victorie, and that Samgar his Successour had miraculously slaine 600. Philistims with an Oxe goade: the Land and People of Israel liued in peace vnto the end of fourescore yeeres from the death of Othoniel, which terme expired in the Worlds yeere 2691.

In the dayes of Ehud, Naomi with Eliamelech her husband, and with her two sonnes, traiailed into Moab, and so the storie of Ruth is to be referred to this time. About the beginning of the fourescore yeeres which are giuen to Ehud, it was that Orum King of the Molossians, otherwise Pluto, stole Proserpina, as shee walked to gather flowers in the fields of Hippionium in Sicilia: or (according to Pausanias) by the Riuer Cephissus, which elsewhere he calleth Chemer, if hee meane not two distinct Riuers. This stealth being made knowne to Pyrithous, with whom Hercules and Theseus ioyned themselves, they agreed together to recover her: but Pluto or Orum (whom others call Aidonius) had (as they say) a very huge Dogge, which fastened on Pyrithous, and tare him in peeces, and had also worried Theseus, but that Hercules speedily rescued him: and by strength tooke, and mastered the Dogge Cerberus: whereof grew the fable of Hercules his deliuering Theseus out of Hell. But Zexes, as I take it, hath written this story somewhat more according to the truth. For Theseus and Pyrithous, saith hee, attempted to steale Proserpina Daughter to Aidonius, King of the Molossians, who had Ceres to Wife, the mother of Proserpina: Proserpina being a generall name also for all faire women. This purpose of theirs being knowne to Aidonius, Theseus and Pyrithous were both taken; and because Pyrithous was the principall in this conspiracie, and Theseus drawne on by a kinde of affection or inforcement, the one was giuen for food to Aidonius his great Dogge Cerberus, the other held prisoner, till Hercules by the instigation of Enrichus deliuered him by strong hand. The Molossians which Stephanus writes with a single (S) were a people of Epirus, inhabiting neere the Mountaines of Pinus: of which Mountaines

Oeta is one of the most famous, where Hercules burnt himselfe. The River of Acheron (which the Poets describe to bee in Hell) riseth out of the same Hills. There is another Nation of the Molossii in Thessaly: but these are neighbours to the Cassopai, saith Plutarch in his Greeke orations.

The rape of Orithya the Daughter of Eriolhem, King of Athens, taken away by Boreas of Thrace, is referred to the time of Ehud. The Poets ascribe this rape to the Northwinde, because Thrace is situate North from Athens. In his time also Terem rauished Philomela, of which the fable was deuised of her conuersion into a Nightingale. For Terem hauing married her sister Progne, conducting Philomela from Athens to see her sister, forced her in her passage, and withall cut out her tongue, that shee might not complaine; perswading Progne his Wife, that Philomela died in the mid-way: all which her brother in lawes merclesse behaviour towards her, Philomela expressed by her needle vpon cloth, and sent it to Progne. In reuenge whereof Progne cauled her onely sonne Irys to bee cut in peeces, and set before Terem her husband, so drest as it appeared to bee some other ordinary food: of which when hee had eaten his fill, shee cauled his head, hands and feet, to bee presented vnto him: and then fled away with such speed towards Athens where her Father Pandion yet liued, as the Poets fained, that shee was turned into a Swallow. The place where it was performed, Strabo findes to bee Daulis in Phocis: and the Tombe of Terem, Pausanias hath built neere the Rockes Mergi, in the Teritorie of Athens. By which, as also by the name Daulis, where these things are supposed to haue bene done (whence also Philomela is called Daulias ales) it appears that it is true, which Thucydides notes by way of digression in his Peloponnesian Warre, That this Terem was not King in that which is now called Thracia, or in Odryse, (as the Poets call him Odrysius) but that Phocis a Countrie in Greece not farre from Attica, a Citie whereof is called Daulia, was in Pandions time inhabited by Thracians: of which this Terem was King: whence Pandion, to haue amitie with his neighbours, made him his sonne in law: as it is good to beleue, saith Thucydides, that Pandion King of Athens made that alliance with a neighbour King, from whom hee might haue succour, rather than with any Terem, that should haue held the Kingdome of Odryse, which was greatly distant from thence. The occasion that the Poets chose a Swallow for Progne to be turned into, may seeme to haue bene partly because, as Pausanias sayes; Daulide nec nidificans, nec habitans in tota circum regione Hirundines; as if a Swallow, remembering the wrong that was there doneto her, and her sister, did for euer after haue that place.

Neere this time Melampus (who is said to haue vnderstood the voyces of Birds and Beasts) flourished, being also esteemed for an excellent Physician. Hee restored to their former health the Daughters of Prattus King of the Argiues, who (as the Poets please) were made mad by Iuno: and thinking themselves to be Kine, fled into the Woods, fearing to bee constrained to the Plough: for in those Countries where the ground was light, they did vse often to plough with Kine.

In the feuen and fortieth yeare of Ehud, Tros began to raigne in Dardania, and gaue it his owne name; about which time Phemone the chiefe Priest of Apollo in Delpes, deuised the Itterical Verse.

Of the same date was Tantalus, King of Lydia: whom Eusebius makes King of Phrygia; and also of that part of which the people were anciently Maones. Of Tantalus was deuised the fable that some Poets haue applied to the passion of Ioue: and some to the couetous that dare not inioy his riches. Eusebius calls this Tantalus the sonne of Iupiter, by the Nymph Pletos: Dionysius in Zezer, giue him another Mother. He was said to be the son of Iupiter: as some will haue it; because hee had that Planet in his ascendent, betokening wisdom and riches. It is said that when he made a feast to the Gods, hauing nothing more precious: he cauled his owne sonne to be slaine and drest to the banquet: of whom Ceres ate part of one of the shoulders: whereby was signified that those men which seek after Diuine knowledge, preferre nothing on earth before it: no not the care of their owne children, of all else the most dearest. And where it was deuised, that hee had alwayes Water and Fruit offered to his lips, and yet suffered the torment of hunger and thirst, it was meant thereby, that though he abounded (by reason of his riches) in all delicacie of the world, yet his minde being otherwise and to higher desires transported, he enioyed no pleasure at all by the rest. Of whom Onid:

Quarit

Quarit aquas in aquis, & poma fugacia captas
Tantalus, hoc illi garrula lingua dedit.

Here Tantalus in water seeks for water, and doth misse

The fleeing fruit he catcheth at: His long tongue brought him this.

This punishment, they say, was inflicted vpon him, for that he discovered the secrets of the gods: that is, because he taught wisdom and vertue to mortall men: which Storie Cornelius Gallus hath elegantly exprest in Verse. Others expound this fable otherwise, and say, That Tantalus, though hee excelled in riches, yet being thirstie of more abundance, was neuer satisfied. Of whom Homer against couetousnesse:

Tantalus à labijs sitiens fugientia captas Flumina; quid rides? mutato nomine de te Fabula narratur.

The thirsting Tantalus doth catch at streames that from him flee.
Why laughest thou? the name but chang'd, the tale is told of thee.

Others conceiue where it is fained of Tantalus, that he gaue the Nectar and Ambrosia of the gods to vaine and vnworthy men, that hee was therefore by them in that sort punished. Of which Natalis out of Pindarus:

Immortalitatem quod furatus,
Coetaneis conuiuiis Nectar Ambrosiamque dedit.

Because that stealing immortalitie,
He did both Nectar and Ambrosia giue
To guests of his owne age, to make them liue.

Whereby it was meant, that the secrets of Diuinitie ought not to be imparted to the vnpure Vulgar. For as the cleaneest meates in a foule stomacke, are therein corrupted, so the most high and reuerend mysteries are often peruered by an vnclane and defiled minde.

To you it is giuen (saith Christ in Marke) to know the mysterie of the Kingdome of God, but vnto them that are without, all things bee done in parables. So is it said of him, that hee expounded all things to his Disciples apart. And therefore doth Gregorie Nazianzene inferre vpon a place of S. Paul: Quod si Paulo licuisset asserere, quorum ipsi cognitionem celum secretum & usq. ad illud progressio suppeditauit, fortasse de Deo, nobis aliquid amplius de rebus conflare; si Paulus might haue uttered the things, the knowledge whereof the shirdeauen mens, and his going thither did bring vnto him, peraduenture wee might know somewhat more of God.

Pythagoras, saith Renelin, thought it not the part of a wise man, Asino lyram exponere, aut mysteria, quae ita recipies, ut sus subam, & fidem graculus, & vnguentum Scarabaeus: quare silentium indixit discipulis, ne vulgo dininorum arcana patefacerent, quae mcditando facilius, quam loquendo apprehenduntur. To set an Asse to a harpe, or to learne mysteries: which hee would handle as a Swine doth a Trumpet, or a lay a viall, or Scarabaeus and vnclane sues soueraigne oymments. wherefore hee commanded silence to his disciples, that they should not disclose diuine mysteries to the common sort, which are easier learnt by meditation than by babbling. And therefore did the Egyptians communicate their mysteries among their Priests in certaine Hieroglyphick letters, to the end that their secrets might bee hidden from the Vulgar: and that they might bestow the more time in the contemplation of so their couered meanings.

But to proceed with the contemporaries of Aod, or Ehud, with him it is also said, that Tityus liued whom Apollo slew, because hee sought to force his Mother Latoe. Emphorion hath it thus, that Tityus was the sonne of Elara, the Daughter of Orchomenus; which Elara being beloued of Iupiter, to auoid Iuno's reuenge, he hid Elara in the earth, where she was deliuered of Tityus: whose Mother dying, and himselfe therein nourished, he was therefore called the sonne of the earth. Pausanias speaking of the graue of this Gyant, affirms that his body occupied the third part of a furlong. But Tibullus hath a louder lip of his stature out of Homer:

Por-

Porcellusque novum Tityrus per ingera terre, Aldanus atque viscere possit amos.

Nine furlongs stretch lyes Tityrus, who for his wicked deeds,
The hungry birds with his renewing liver daily feeds.

This Strabo doth thus expound; that Apollo killing this cruell and wicked Tyrant of Panopea, a Citie in Phocia, it was fained by the Poets to the terrour of others, that he was still eaten in Hell by birds, and yet still liued, and had his flesh renewed.

Admetus King of Theffalie liued also in this Age, whom it is said that Apollo first serued as a Herd-man, and afterward for his excellent wit was by him advanced; but hauing flaine Hyacinthus, he crost the Hellefpont, and fled into Phrygia: where together with Neptune, he was entertained by Lamedon, and got his bread by working in bricke, for building of the walls of Troy, not by making the bricks leape into their places by playing on his Harpe: according to him in Ouid, which saith:

Iliou aspiciet, firmatque turribus altis, Mania, Apollinea structa canore lyre.

Strong Iliou thou shalt see with walls and towers high,
Built with the harpe of wife Apollon's Harmonic.

Thus the Poets: but others, that hee laboured with his hands, as hired in this worke. And that he also laboured at the building of the Labyrinth in Greece, all the Megariens witnesse, faith Pausanias.

In these daies also of Ehud, or (as some finde it) in the dayes of Deborah, liued Perseus, the sonne of Iupiter and Danae, by whose Souldiers (as they failed out of Peloponnesus, to seeke their aduenture on Africa side) Medusa, the Daughter and Successor of Phorcus, being weakly accompanied as he hunted, neere the Lake Triton, was surprisid and slaine: whose beauty, when Perseus beheld, he caned her head to be imbalmed, and carried into Greece: the beauty whereof was rich and so much admired, and the beholders so astonished which beheld it, as thereof grew the fiction, that all that looked on Medusa's head, were returned into stones.

Cecrops, the second of that name, and 7. King of Athens, and Acrisius the 13. or after Eusebius, the 14. King of the Argines, began also their reignes, as it is said, in the time of this Iudge: of which the first ruled 40. yeares, and the second 31. yeares. Also Bellerophon liued in this age, being the sonne of Glaucus, the sonne of Sisyphus: who inticed by Antea or Sthenobia, the wife of Praxus of the Argines, to accompany her, but refusing it, the accused him to her husband that he offered to force her: whereupon Praxus sent Bellerophon into Lycia, about some affaires of weight, betwene him and his sonne in law Iobates: giuing secret order to Iobates to dispatch him: but Iobates thinking it dishonourable to lay violent hands on him, employed him against Chimera, a Monster, vomiting or breathing fire. Now the gods (as the report is) pitying his innocency, sent him the winged Horse Pegasus, sprung vp of the blood of Medusa, formerly slaine by the souldiers of Perseus in Africa, to transport him; a horse that none other could master or bridle but Minerva: vpon which beast Bellerophon ouer-came Chimera: and performed the other seruices giuen him in charge: which done, as hee returned toward Lycia, the Lycians lay in ambush to haue slaine him: but being victorious all ouer all those, he arrived to Iobates in safety: whom Iobates for his eminent vertues honoured, first with one of his Daughters: and afterward with his Kingdome: after which hee grew so insolent, as hee attempted to flye vp to heauen vpon his Pegasus: whose pride Iupiter disdainig, caused one of his flaming flyes so to vex Pegasus, as he cast off Bellerophon from his back, into the Valley of Cilicia, where he died blied: of which burthen Pegasus being discharged (as the fable goeth) flew backe to heauen: and being fed in Iupiter's owne stable, Aurora beg'd him of Iupiter to ride on before the Sunne. This tale is diuersly expounded, as first by some, That it pleaseth God to relieue men in their innocent and vnderfered aduersitie, and to cast downe those which are too high minded: according to that which is said of Bellerophon: that when he was exposed to extreame hazzard, or rather certaine death, hee found both deliuerance and honour: but waxing ouer-proud and presumptuous in his glorious fortunes, hee was againe throwne downe into the extremitie of sorrow, and euen during miserie. Secondly by others, That vnder the name of Chimera, was meant a cruell Pyrat of the Lycians, whose ship had in her prow, a Lyon, a Goate in the mid-ship, and a Dragon in the stearne, of which three beasts this Monster Chimera was said to be compounded, whom Bellerophon pursued with a kinde of Galley, of such swiftnesse, that it was called the flying Horse: to whom the invention of styles the wings of a ship are also attributed. Many other expositions are made of this tale by other Authors: but it is not unlikely, that Chimera was the name of a ship, for so Virgil calleth one of the greatest ships of Aeneas.

Ien also, from whom the Athenians (being ignorant of the antiquitie of their parent Ianus) deriue their name of Iones; is said to haue bene about Ehuds time: Homer calls them Iones, which hath a neere resemblance to the word Ianus. Perhaps it might be so that Ien himselfe tooke name from Ianus: it being a custome obseruable in the Histories of all times, to renewe the ancient name of a fore-father, in some the principall of his issue.

The invasion of India by Liby-Pater, is by some reported as done in this age: but S. X. gullus makes him farre more ancient: placing him betwene the coming out of Egypt, and the death of Iofua.

About the end of the 86. yeares, ascribed to Ehud, and Samgar, Pelops flourished: who gaue name to Peloponnesus in Greece, now called Morea.

S. IIII. Of Deborah and her Contemporaries.

AFTER Israel had liued in peace and plenty to the end of these 86. yeares, they againe began to forget the giuer of all goodnesse, and many of those being women, which were witnesse of the former miserie, and of Gods deliuerance by Ehud; and after him by Samgar, the rest began to returne to their former neglect of Gods commendations. For as Plentie and Peace are the parents of idle securitie, so is security as fruitfull in begetting and bringing forth both danger and subuersion: of which all estates in the world haue tasted by interchange of times. Therefore when their finnes were againe ripe for punishment, Isaiah King of Haror, after the death of Ehud, invaded the Territarie of Israel; and hauing in his seruice 900. iron Chariots, besides the rest of his forces, he held them in subjection twenty yeares, till it pleased God to raise vp Deborah, the Prophetesse, who incouraged Barac to leade a force out of Nephthaim, and Zabulon, to incounter the Canaanites. That the men of Nephthaim were more forward than the rest in this action, it may seeme to haue proceeded partly from the authoritie that Barac had among them, being of the same Tribe; and partly from their feeling of the common grieuance; which in them was more sensible, than in others, because Haror and Haraseth the chiefe holds of Iabin, were in Nephthaim. So in the dayes of Iephtha the Gileadites took the greatest care, because the Ammonites with whom the Warre was pressed most vpon them, as being their borderers. Now as it pleased God by the left hand of Ehud to deliuer Israel from the Moabites: and by the counsaile and courage of a woman, to free them from the yoke of Canaan, and to kill the valiant Sisara by Iael the Kenites wife: so was it his will at other times, to worke the like great things by the weakest means. For the mighty Assyrian Nabuchodonosor, who was a King of Kings, and restless, hee ouerthrew by his owne imaginations, the causes of his brutish melancholy: and changed his marchlesse pride into the base humility of a Beast. And to approue that hee is the Lord of all power, hee sometime punisheth by inuisible strength, as when hee slaughtered the Armie of Senacherib by his Angell, or as hee did the Egyptians in Moser time: sometime by dead bodies, as when he drowned Pharo by the waues of the Sea; and the Canaanites by haile-stones in the time of Iofua: sometimes by the ministrerie of men, as when hee ouerthrew the foure Kings of the East, Chedorlamer, and his companions, by the household seruants of Abraham. Hee called the Moabites and Ammonites to set vpon their owne confederate the Army of the Edomites; and hauing slaine them to kill one another in the fight of Iehoshaphat: and of the like to these a volume of examples may be gathered. And to this effect did Deborah the Prophetesse speake vnto Barac in these words: But this journey that thou takest, shall not bee for thine honour, for the Lord hath set Sisters into the hands of a woman. In which victory she sheweth the strength of the Canaanite. Isabel fell to the ground, even to the last man in the end of which Wave it Remeth that Isabel himselfe also perished, as appeared by the last Verse of the Tenth of Judges.

After all which, Deborah giueth thanks to God, and after the acknowledgement of all his power, his mercies, she sheweth the weakness wherewith Israel was brought forth by their Idolatry by the Canaanites, and other neighbouring Nations, in these words: Was there a shield and spear seen among forty thousand of Israel? She also sheweth how the Israelites were secured and amazed, for none of them confined over Jabin, and durst not assigne themselves to the rescue of Kanhen in Gilead: that the Amorites kept the Sea coast, and forsooke their habitations towards the Land; and two children of Man who neighbored the Sea, cropt into their ships for safetie, shewing thereby that all were dispersed, and all in effect lost. She then curseth the Inhabitants of Merod, who dwelling neere the place of the battaile (belike fearing the success) came not out to assist Israel, and then blesteth Iael the wife of Heber the Kenite, who nailed Sisera in her Tent: shewing the sweet affection of that race to the Israelites. For though the Familie of Heber were inforced in that miserable time of subiection, to hold correspondence with Isabel the Canaanite, yet when occasion offered them means, they witnessed their love and faith to their ancient friends. Lastly, shee derideth the Mother of Sisera who promised her sonne the victory in her owne hopes: and fancied to her selfe, and described the spoiles both of Garments and Maidens in him gotten. For conclusion, shee directeth her praise and thanks to God onely victorious.

From the beginning of Isabel oppression to the end of that peace, which Deborah and Barac purchased vnto Israel, there passed 40. yeares. In which time the Kingdome of Argos, which had continued 544. yeares, was translated to Mycene: The translation of this Kingdome Strabo out of Pausanias writeth to this effect: After Danaus, Ephesus succeeded in Argos, after whom the children of Abas the sonne of Lyncus diuided the Kingdome: of which Acrisius being eldest, held Argos it selfe: Praxus his brother posselt Ephesus or Corinth, and Tyrnthus, and other Cities, with all the Territorie towards the Sea, there being many monuments in Tyrnthus, which witness Praxus possession, saith Pausanias.

Now Acrisius was fore-told by an Oracle, that hee should bee slaine by the sonne of his Daughter Danae: whereupon hee caused her to bee inclosed in a Tower, to the end that no man might accompanie her. But the Lady being exceeding faire, it is faired that Jupiter turned himselfe into a golden shower: which falling into her lap, begat her with childe: she meaning whereof was, that some Kings sonne, or other worthy man, corrupted her Keepers with gold, and enjoyed her, of whom Perseus was borne, who when hee grew to mans estate, either by chance (saith Cicero) or in shewing his grand-father the inuention of the discus, or leaden ball, slew him unwillingly. After this Perseus, to auoid the infamie of Parricide in Argos, changed Kingdome with his Vncle Praxus: and built Mycene. This imprisonment of Danae, Sophocles reporteth otherwise: and that shee was inclosed in a brazen vault, vnder the Kings Hall with her Nurses and Keepers. Vpon this close custodie Horace hath this poetic obseruation:

Inclusam Danaen, turris aenea,
Robustae, fures, et vigilum canuum
Tristes excubias, munerant facis
Nocturnis ab adulteris:

Si non Acrisium Virginis abdita
Castodem pandum, Iupiter & Venus
Resistent, fure anim sustinuerit & patris, Conuerso in pretium Deo.

Aurem per medias ire fessilibus,
Esper rumpere aenas fatis, potentibus
Idem fulmineo.

The brazen Tower with doores of brass
And watchfull bandes, frightfull guard Kept fast the maidenhead
Of Danae from secret love
Till smiling Venus, and wile Ioue Beguild her Fathers dread.

For chanced into a golden shower
The god into her lap did poure
Himselfe, and took his pleasure
Through guardes, and stonie walls to breake.
The shunder-bolts farre more weakke,
Then is a golden treasure.

The first Kings of the Argiues were these.

Isachur the first King, who began to raigne in the first yeare of Iacob, and the 61. of Isaac: from which time to the end of Schemus, Osifer misreckoneth 400. yeares. This Kingdome before the translation, Eusebius accounteth to haue stood 544. yeares, others but 417. It was the Daughter of this Isachur: whom the Egyptians called Ist.

The Contemporaries of Barac and Deborah, were Midas who reigned in Phrygia: and Ilius who built Ilium: with others mentioned in our Chronologicall table, as contemporaries with Deborah.

Of Gideon, and of Dædalus, Sphinx, Minos, and others that liued in this age.

DEborah and Barac being dead: the Midianites assisted by the Amalekites infested Israel. For when, vnder a Iudge who had held them in the feare of the Lord, they had enjoyed any quiet or prosperity: the Iudge was no sooner dead, than they turned to their former impious idolatry. Therefore now the neighbouring Nations did did to matter them in a short time, (the hand of God being with-held from their detence) as to save themselves, they crept into caves of the mountains, and other the like places of hardest access: their enemies possessing all the plains and fruitful vallies: and in harvest time by themselves, and the multitude of their cattell, destroying all that grew vp: covering the fields as thicke as grasse-hoppers: which multitude lasted seven years.

Jud. 6.

Jud. 6. v. 5.

Jud. c. 6. & 7.

Then the Lord by his Angell stirred vp Gideon, the sonne of Josheph, afterward called Terabbaal: whole feare and unwillingnesse, and how it pleased God to hearken him in his enterprise, it is both largely and precisely set downe in the holy Scriptures: as also how it pleased God by a few select persons, namely 300. out of 30000. men, to make them know that he onely was the Lord of Hosts: each of these 300. by Gideons appointment carried a trumpet, and light in a pitcher, instruments of more terror than force, with which hee gaue the great Armie of their enemies an alarm: who hearing so tooud a noyse, and seeing at the cracke off so many pitchers broken, so many lights about them, esteeming the Armie of Israel to be infinite, and stricken with a sodaine feare, they all fled without a stroke stricken: and were slaughtered in great numbers: two of their Princes being made prisoners and slaine. In his returne the Ephraimkes began to quarrell with Gideon, because he made warre without their assistance, being then greedy of glory, the victory being gotten: who (if Gideon had failed and fallen in the enterprise) would no doubt haue held them (slaves happy by being neglected. But Gideon appealing them with a milde answer, followed after the enemy, in which pursuit being tyred with traualle, and weary even with the slaughtering of his enemies, hee desired reliefe from the inhabitants of Succoth, to the end, that (his men being refreshed) he might ouer-take the other two Kings of the Midianites: which had saved themselves by flight. For they were foure Princes of the Nations, which had invaded and wasted Israel: to wit, Oreb and Seeb, which were taken already, and Zebah and Salmunna which fled.

Gideon being denied by them of Succoth, fought the like reliefe from the Inhabitants of Penuel, who in like sort refused to succour him. To both of these places he threatened therefore the reuenge, which in his returne from the prosecution of the other two Princes, he performed: to wit, that he would reare the flesh of those of Succoth with Thorns and Briars, and destroy the Inhabitants and Citie of Penuel: Now why the people of these two Cities should refuse reliefe to their brethren the Israelites, especially after so great a victory: if I may presume to make coniecture it seems likely, first that those Cities set ouer Jordan, and in the way of all inuasions, to be made by the Moabites, Ammonites and Midianites, into Israel, had either made their owne peace with those nations, and were not spoiled by them: or else they knowing that Zeha and Salmunna were escaped with a great part of their army, might feare their reuenge in the future. Secondly, it may be laid to the condition and dispositions of these men: as it is not rare to finde of the like humour in all ages. For there are multitudes of men, especially of those which follow the iuarre, that both enuie and maligne others, if they performe any praise-worthy actions, for the honour and safety of their owne Countrey, though themselves may be assured to beare a part of the fruit of contrary successe. And such malicious hearts cannot be contented that their Prince and Countrey should suffer hazzard and want, than that such men as they mill like, should bee the authors or actors of any glory or good to either.

A place in Mesopotamia, as it is thought. Jud. 8. 10.

Now Gideon, how or wherefoeuer it were that hee refreshed himselfe and his weary and hungry Souldiers, yet hee followed the opportunity, and pursued his former victory to the victu most: and finding Zebah and Salmunna in Karkor (suspecting no farther attempt vpon them) he againe surpris'd them, and slaughtered those 15000. remaining: having put to the sword in the former attempt 120000. and withall hee tooke Zebah and Salmunna prisoners: whom because themselves had exequuted Gideons brethren before at Tabor, he caused them both to be slaine: or (as it is written) at their owne request flew them with his owne hands: his Sonne whom he first commanded to doe it, refusing it; and in his returne from the consummation of this meruelous victory, hee tooke reuenge of the Elders of Succoth, and of the Citizens of Penuel: forgiving no offence committed against him: either by strangers or by his brethren the Israelites. But such mercy as he shewed to others, his owne children found soone after his death, according to that which hath beene said before. The debts of crueltie and mercy are neuer left vn-satisfied: for as he flew the 70. Elders of Succoth, with great and vnusuall tormentes, so were his owne 70. sonnes all, but one, murdered by his owne bastard Abimelec. The like Analogie is obserued by the Rabbines, in the greatest of the plagues which God brought vpon the Egyptians, who having caused the male children of the Hebrews to bee slaine, others of them to be cast into the River and drowned: God rewarded them even with the like measure, destroying their owne first borne by his Angell, and drowning Pharaoh and his Army in the read sea. And hereof a world of examples might be giuen both out of the Scriptures and other Histories.

In the end so much did the people reuerence Gideon in the present for this victorie, and their owne deliuerance, as they offered him the Soueraigntie ouer them, Jud. 8. 13. and to establish him in the Government; which hee refused, answering; I will not raigne ouer you, neither shall my childe raigne ouer you, but the Lord shall, &c. But hee desired the people that they would bestow on him the golden care-rings, which euery man had gotten. For the Ismaelites, neighbours, and mixt with the Midianites, vsed to weare them: the waight of all which was a thousand and seuen hundred Shekles of gold, which makes of ours 2380. li. if wee follow the account of the Shekle vulgar. And because hee conquered that gold into an Ephod, a garment of gold, blew silke, purple, scarlet and fine linnen, belonging to the High Priest onely, and set up the same in his owne Citie of Ophra or Ephra, which drew Israel to Idolatry, the same was the destruction of Gideon and his house. Exod. 28. Jud. 8. 25.

There was another kinde of Ephod besides this of the High Priests, which the Leuites vsed, and so did Danid when he danced before the Arke: and Samuel, while hee was yet young, which was made of linnen onely.

Now if any man demand how it was possible for Gideon with 300. men to destroy 100000. of their enemies, and afterward 15000. which remained; wee may remember, that although Gideon with 300. gaue the first alarme, and put the Midianites in rout and disorder: yet all the rest of the Armie came into the slaughter, and pursuit: for it is written; That the men of Israel being gathered together out of Nephtalic, and out of Alpher, and out of Manasse, pursued after the Midianites: for this armie Gideon left in tents behinde him, when he went downe to view the armie of his enemies, who with the noyse of his 300. trumpets came after him to the execution. Jud. c. 7. v. 13.

There liued with Gideon, Agamemnon, the sonne of Pandion, who reigned in Athenes: Eurystheus King of Myceua: Atreus and Thyestes the sonnes of Pelops, who bare dominion ouer a great part of Peloponnesus, and after the death of Eurystheus, the Kingdome of Myceua fell into the hand of Atreus. This is that Atreus, who holding his brother in lealousie, as an attempter, both of his wife and Crowne, slew the children of Thyestes, and causing their flesh to be drest, did therewith feast their father. But this cruelty was not reuenged. For both Atreus and his sonne Agamemnon were slaine by a base sonne of Thyestes, yea the grand children, and all the liuage of Atreus died by the same sword. 40

In Gideons time also those things were supposed to haue beene done, which are written of Dadalus and Icarus. Dadalus, they say, hauing slaine his Nephew Atalua, fled to Minos, King of Crete, for succour; where for his excellent workmanship he was greatly esteemed, hauing made for Minos a Labyrinth, like vnto that of Egypt: Afterward he was said to haue framed an artificiall Cowe for Pasiphae the Queene, that shee, being in loue with a faire Bull, might by putting her selfe into the Cowe, satisfie her lust; a thing no lesse vnnatural than incredible, had not that shamelesse Emperour Damian exhibited the like beasty spectacle, openly before the people of Rome, in his Amphitheater; so of purpose, as may seeme, to verifie the old fable. For so it appears by those verses of Marshall, wherein the flattering Poet magnifieth the abominable shew, as a goodly Pageant, in those vicious times.

*Iam illam Pasiphaem Dilectos credite Tauro Vidimus, accepit fabula prisca fidem.
Nec semiviratur Caesar, humana vestigia Quicquid fama canit, donat arena tibi.*

But concerning that which is reported of Pasiphae, Serulius makes a lesse vnhopest construction of it, thinking that Dadalus was of her counsaile, and her Pandar for the enticing of a Secretarie of Minos called Taurus, which signifieth a Bull, who begat her with childe; and that she being deliuered of two sonnes, the one resembling Taurus, the other her husband Minos, it was fained that she was deliuered of the Monster Minotaur, halfe a Man and halfe a Bull. But this practice being discouered, and Dadalus appointed to bee slaine, he fled out of Creteto Cocalus King of Sicil: in which passage he made such expedition, as it was fained that he fashioned wings for himselfe and his sonne to transport them. For whereas Minos pursued him with boates which had oares onely, Dadalus framed fildes both for his owne boate, and for his sonnes, by which hee ouerwent those that had him in chase. Vpon which new inuention, Icarus bearing himselfe ouerbold, was 30 ouerborne and drowned.

It is also written of Dadalus, that he made Images that could moue themselves, and goe, because he carued them with legs, armes, and hands; whereas those that preceded him, could onely present the body & head of those men, whom they cared to counterfai, and yet the workmanship was esteemed very rare. But Plutarch, who had scene some of those that were called the Images of Dadalus, found them exceeding rude.

Heind, Plut.
Paus. lib. 9.

With Gideon also flourished Linus the Theban, the son of Apollo, and Terpsichore, who instructed Thamiris, Orpheus, and Hercules. He wrote of the Creation, of the Sunne and Moones course, and of the generation of liuing Creatures, but in the end he was slaine by Hercules his scholler with his owne harpe.

Strab. 9.

Again, in thisage those things spoken of Sphinx and Oedipus, are thought to haue beene performed. This Sphinx being a great robber by sea and land, was by the Corinthians Armie, led by Oedipus, overcome. But that which was written of her propounding of riddles, to those whom shee mastered, was meant by the rockie and vnaccessible mountaine neere Thebes, which she defended; and by Oedipus disoluing her probleme, his victorie ouer her. She was painted with wings, because exceeding swift, and with the body of a Lyon for her cruelty. But that which Palaephatus reports of Sphinx, were more probable, did not the time disproue it, for he calls her an Amazonite, and the wife of Cadmus: who when by her helpe he had cast Draco out of Thebes (neglecting her) hee married the sister of Draco, which Sphinx taking in despightfull part, with her owne troope she held the mountaine by Thebes, from whence she continued a sharpe warre vpon the Thebans, till by Oedipus ouerthrowne. About this time did Minos thrust his brother out of Crete, and held sharpe warre with the Megarians, and Athenians, because his sonne Androgeus was slaine by them. Hee posselt himselfe of Megara, by the treason of Sylla, Daughter of Nisus the King. Hee was long Master of the sea, and brought the Athenians to the tribute of deliuering him euery yeare seuen of their sonnes: which tribute Theseus released, as shall be shewed, when I come to the time of the next Iudge Thola. In the end he was slaine at Camerinus or Camirus in Sicilia, by Cocalus the King, while he pursued Dadalus: and was esteemed by some to be the first law-giuer to those 40 Ilands.

Arif. 2. l. 1.

To this time are referred many deeds of Hercules, as the killing of Anteus the Gyant, who was said to haue 60. and odde cubits of length, which though Plutarch doth confirm, reporting that there was such a body found by Sertorius the Roman, in Lybia, where Hercules slew Anteus: yet for my selfe I thinke it but a lowd lye. That Anteus was of great strength, and a cunning wrestler, Eusebius affirmeth: and because hee cast so many open to the ground, he was fained to be the sonne of the earth. Plinie saith, that he inhabited neere the gardens Hesperides in Africitania. S. Augustine affirmes, that this Hercules was not of Greece, but of Lybia: and the Hydra also which he ouercame, Plato expoundeth to be a fable Sophist.

Of the expedition of the Argonautes.

ABout the eleuenth yeare of Gideon, was the famous expedition of the Argonautes: of which many fabulous discourses haue beene written, the summe of which is this.

Pelias the sonne of Neptune, brother by the mothers side to Aeson, who was Iasons father, reigning in Iolcus a town of Thessalie, was warned by the Oracle of Apollo to take heed 40 of of him that wore but one shoe. This Pelias afterward sacrificing to Neptune, inuited Iason to him, who coming hastily, lost one shoe in passing quer a brooke: whereupon Pelias demanded of him what course hee would take (supposing hee were able) against one of whom an Oracle should aduise him to take heed: to which question, when Iason had briefly answered, that he would send him to Cholcos, to fetch the golden Fleece, Pelias immediately commanded him to vndertake that seruice. Therefore Iason prepared for the voyage, having a ship built by Argus, the sonne of Phryxus, by the counsell of Pallas: wherein he procured all the brauest men of Greece to saile with him: as Typhus the Master of the ship, Orpheus the famous Poet, Caistor and Pollux the sonnes of Tyndarus, Meleager and Peleus, sonnes of Acacus, and fathers of Aias and Achilles, Hercules, Theseus, Zetes and Calais the two winged sonnes of Boreas, Amphiaras the great Soothsayer, Meleager of Calidon that slew the great wilde Boare: Ascalaphus and Alcmena or Almenus the sonnes of Mars, who were afterwards at the last warre of Troy, Laertes the father of Ulysses, Atalanta a warlike virgin, Idus and Lyncus the sonnes of Aphareus, who afterwards in fight with Caistor and Pollux slew Caistor, and wounded Pollux, but were slaine themselves: Lyncus by Pollux, Idus by Iupiter with lightning.

These and many other went with Iason in the ship Argo: in whose prow was a table of the Beech of Dadona, which could speake. They arriued first at Lamnos; the women of which Iland, hauing slaine all the males, purposing to lead an Amazonian life, were neuertheless contented to take their pleasure of the Argonautes. Hence they came to the Countrie about Cyzicus: where dwelt a people called Doliones: ouer whom then reigned one Cyzicus: who entertained them friendly: but it so fell out, that loosing thence by night they were driuen by contrary winde backe into his port, neither knowing that it was the same Hauen, nor being knowne by the Doliones, to bee the same men: but rather taken for some of their bordering enemies: by which means they fell to blowes, insumuch that the Argonautes slew the most part of the Doliones, together with their King Cyzicus: which when by day-light they perceiued, with many teares they solemnized his funerall. Then departed they againe and arriued shortly in Myfia, where 30 they left Hercules and Polyphemus the sonne of Elates, who went to seeke Hylin the darling of Hercules, that was rauished by the Nymphes.

Polyphemus built a towne in Myfia, called Cios, wherein hee reigned. Hercules returned to Argos. From Myfia the Argonautes sailed into Bythinia, which then was peopled by the Bebrices, the ancient Inhabitants of the Countrie, ouer whom Ameycus the sonne of Neptune was then King. Hee being a strong man, compelled all strangers to fight with him, at whorle bats, in which kinde of fight he had slaine many, and was now himselfe slaine by Pollux. The Bebrices in reuenge of his death flew all vpon Pollux, but his companions rescued him, with great slaughter of the people. They layled from hence to Salmidessus, a towne in Thrace (somewhat out of their way) wherein Phineus a Sooth- 40 fayer dwelt, who was blinde and vexed with the Harpyes. The Harpyes were said to bee a kinde of birds, which had the faces of women and foule long claws, very filthy creatures, which when the table was furnished for Phineus, came flying in, and deuouring or carrying away the greater part of the victuals, did so defile the rest, that they could not be endured. When therefore the Argonautes craued his aduice, and direction for their voyage: You shall doe well (quoth he) first of all to deliuer me from the Harpyes, and then afterwards to aske my counsaile. Whereupon they caused the table to be couered, and meat set on: which was no sooner set downe, than that presently in came the Harpyes, and played their accustomed pranks: when Zetes and Calais the winged young men saw this, they drew their swords, and pursued them through the ayre: some say that both the Harpyes and the young men died of wearinesse in the fight, & pursuit. But Apollonius saith that the Harpyes did couenant with the youths, to doe no more harme to Phineus, and were thereupon dismissed. For this good turn Phineus gaue them informations of the way, and aduertised them withall of the dangerous rocks, called Symplegades, which by force of winds running together, did shut vp the passage: wherefore he willed them to put a Pigeon before them in the passage: & if that passed safe, then to adventure after her: if not, then by no means to hazard themselves in vain. They did so, & perceiving that the Pigeon had onely lost a piece of her taile, they obserued the next opening of the rocks, and then rowing with all their might, passed through safe, onely the end of their poepe was bruised.

M m 2.

From

From thence forward, (as the tale goeth) the Symplegades haue stood still: for the gods, say they, had decreed that after the passage of a ship, they should be fixed. Thence the Argonauts came to the Marianadyne; a people inhabiting about the mouth of the river Parthenius, where Lycus the King entertained them courteously. Here Idmon a Sooth-sayer of their company was slaine by a wilde Boare; also here Typhis died: and Aræus undertooke to steere the ship. So they passed by the river Thermodon; and mount Caucasus, and came to the river Phasis, which runs through the land of Colchis. When they were entred the haue, Iason went to Æetes the King of Colchis, and told him the Commandement of Pelias, and cause of his comming, desiring him to deliuer the golden Fleece, which Æetes, as the Fable goeth, promised to doe, if hee alone would yoa ke together two brazen hooft Bulls, and plowing the ground with them, sowe Dragons teeth, which Minerva had giuen to him, being part of those which Cadmus did sowe at Thebes. These Bulls were great and fierce, and breathed out fire: Vulcan had giuen them to Æetes.

Whilest Iason was in a great perplexitie about this taske, Medea the daughter of Æetes fell into a most vehement loue of him, so farre forth, that being excellent in Magique, she came priuily to him, promising her helpe, if he would assure her of his marriage. To this Iason agreed, and confirmed his promise by oath. Then gaue she to him a medicine wherewith he bad him to annoynt both his body and his armour, which would preserue him from their violence: further shee told him, that armed men would rise out of the ground, from the teeth which he should sowe, and set vpon him. To remedy which inconvenience, she bad him throwe stones amongst them as soone as they came vp thicke, whereupon they would fall together to blowes, in such wise that hee might easily slay them. Iason followed her counsaile, whereto when the euent had answered, hee againe demanded the Fleece. But Æetes was so farre from approuing such his desire, that hee deuised how to destroy the Argonauts, and burne their ship; which Medea perceiving, went to Iason, and brought him by night to the Fleece, which hung on an Oake in the groue of Mars, where, they say, it was kept by a Dragon, that neuer slept. This Dragon was by the Magique of Medea cast into a sleepe: so taking away the golden Fleece, shee went with Iason into the ship Argo; hauing with her, her brother, Abysrtus.

Æetes vnderstanding the praetises of Medea, provided to pursue the ship, whom when Medea perceived to be at hand, she slew her brother, and cutting him in pieces, shee scattered his limbs in diuers places; of which Æetes finding some, was faine to seeke out the rest, and suffer his daughter to passe: the parts of his son he buried in a place, which thereupon he called Tomi; the Greeke word signifieth Diuision. Afterwards he sent many of his subiects to seeke the ship Argo, threatening that if they brought not backe Medea, they should suffer in her stead. In the meane while the Argonauts were driuen about the Seas, and were come to the Riuer Eridanus, which is Po in Italie.

Iupiter, offended with the slaughter of Abysrtus, vexed them with a great tempest, and carried them they knew not whither; when they came to the Ilands Abysrtides, there the ship Argo (that there might want no incredible thing in this Fable) spake to them and said, that the anger of Iupiter should not cease, till they came to Ausonia, and were cleansed by Circe, from the murder of Abysrtus. Now they thereupon sayling betwene the coasts of Lybia and Gallia, and passing through the Sea of Sardinia and alongst the coast of Hetruria, came to the Ile of Æoa, wherein Circe dwelt, who cleansed them. Thence they sayled by the coast of the Syrens, who sang to allure them into danger: but Orpheus on the other side sang so well that he slayed them. One ly Butes (swamme out vnto them, whom Venus rauished, and carried to Lylibenum in Sicilie to dwell.

Hauing past the Syrens, they came betwene Scylla and Charybdis, and the stragling rocks which seemed to cast out great store of flames and smoake. But Thetis and the Nereides, conueyed them safe through at the appointment of Iuno. So they coasted Sicilie where the beeces of the Sunne were, and touched at Coreyra, the Iland of the Phæaces, where King Aleinous reigned. Meane while, the men of Colchis, that had bene sent by Æetes in quest of the ship Argo, hearing no newes of it, and fearing his anger, if they fulfilled not his will, betooke themselves to new habitations: some of them dwelt in the mountaines of Coreyre, others in the Ilands Abysrtides, and some comming to the Phæaces, there found the ship Argo, and demanded Medea of Aleinous: whereto Aleinous made answer, that if shee were not Iasons wife, they should haue her; but if shee were already married, he would not take her from her husband. Arete, the wife of Aleinous, hearing this, married them: wherfore they of Colchis not daring to iourne home, stayed with the Phæaces; so the Argonauts departed thence, and after a while came to Crete. In this Iland, Adnos reigned, who had a man of brasie giuen to him (as some of the Fable say) by Vulcan. This man had one veine in his body reaching from the necke to the heele, the end whereof was closed up with a brazen naile, his name was Talus: his custome was to runne thrice aday about the Iland for the defence of it. When hee saw the ship Argo passe by, hee threw stones at it, but Medea with her Magique destroyed him. Some say that she slew him by potions, which made him mad; others, that promising to make him immortall, shee drew out the naile that stoppt his veine, by which meanes all his blood ranne out, and he died; others there are that say he was slaine by Pan, who wounded him with an arrow in the heele. From hence the Argonauts sailed to Aegina, where they were faine to fight for fresh water. And lastly, from Aegina they sailed by Buboe and Loeris hometo Solos, where they arrived, hauing spent foure whole moneths in the expedition.

Some there are that by this journey of Iason, vnderstand the myserie of the Philosophers stone, called the golden Fleece, to which also, other super-fine Chymists drawe otherwelke labours of Hercules. Suidas thinketh that by the golden Fleece was meant a golden booke of Parchment, which is of sheepe-skin, and therefore called golden, because it was taught therein how other metalls might be transmutated. Others would signifye by Iason, wisdome, and moderation, which ouercommeth all perils: but that which is most probable, is the opinion of Dercilus, that the story of such a passage was true, and that Iason with the rest went indeed to rob Colchis, to which they might arriue by boate. For not farre from Caucasus there are certaine steepe falling torrents which wash downe many graines of gold, as in many other parts of the world; and the people there inhabiting vnto set many fleeces of wooll in those descents of waters, in which the graines of gold remaine, and the water passeth thorow, which Strabo witnesseth to be true. The many rocks, straits, sands, and currents, in the passage betwene Greece and the bottome of Pontus, are Poetically conuerred into those fiery bulls, the armed men rising out of the ground, the Dragon cast asleepe, and the like. The man of brasie, the Syrens, Scylla and Charybdis, were other hazards and aduentures which they fell into in the Mediterran sea, disguised, as the rest, by Orpheus, vnder Poeticall moralls: all which Hommer afterward vied (the man of brasie excepted) in the description of Ulysses his traualles, on the same Inland-seas.

§. VII.

Of Abimelech, Tholan, and Tair, and of the Lapytha, and of Theseus, Hippolytus, &c.

After the death of Gideon, Abimelech his base sonne begotten on a Concubine of the Schemites, remembreing what offers had bene made to his father by the people, who desired to make him and his heir perpetuall Princes; and as it seemeth, supposing (notwithstanding his fathers religious modesty) that some of his brethren might take on them the Soueraignty, practised with the Inhabitants of Schem (of which his mother was native) to make election of himselfe, who being easily moued with the glory, to haue a King of their owne, readily condescended: and the better to enable Abimelech, they borrowed 70. pieces of siluer of their Idoll Baalberith, with which treasure he hyred a company of loose and desperate vagabonds, to assist his first detestable enterprise, to wile, the slaughter of his 70. brethren, the sonnes of Gideon, begotten on his wiues, of which he had many; of all which none escaped but Jatham the youngest, who hid himselfe from his present furie: all which he executed on one stone, a cruelty exceeding all that hath bene written of in any age. Such is humane ambition, a monster that neither feareth God (though all-powerfull, and whose reuenges are without date and for euerlasting) neither hath it respect to nature, which laboureth the preservation of every being: but it rageth also against her, though garnished with beautie which neuer dieth, and with loue that hath no end. All other passions passions and affections, by which the soules of men are tormented, are by their contraries often-times resisted or qualified. But ambition, which begetteth euery vice, and is it selfe the childe and darling of Satan, looketh onely towards the ends by it selfe set downe, forgetting nothing (how fearefull and inhumane fouer) which may serue: remembring nothing, what fouer iustice, pietie, right or religion can offer and alledge on the contrary. It ascribeth the lamentable effects of like attempts, to the error or weaknesse of the vnder takers, and rather praiseth the aduventure than feareth the like successe. It was the first sinne that the world had, and began in Angels: for which they were cast into hell, without hope of redemption. It was more ancient than man, and therefore no part of his naturall corruption. The punishment also preceded his creation, yet hath the Duell which felt the smart thereof, taught him to forget the one as out of date, and to practise the other, as befitting euery age, and mans condition.

Isham, the youngest of G'dions sonnes, hauing escaped the present perill, fought by his best perswasions to alienate the Sechemites, from the assisting of this mercilesse tyrant, letting them know, that those which were vertuous, and whom reason and religion had taught the safe and happy estate of moderate subiection, had refused to receiue as vnlawfull, what others had no power to giue, without direction from the King of Kings: who from the beginning (as to his owne peculiar people) had appointed them by whom and how to be gouerned. This hee taught them by the Oliue, which contented it selfe with its fatnesse, the Figge tree with its sweetnesse, and the Vine with the good iuyce it had: the Bramble onely, who was most base, cut downe all the rest, and accepted the Soueraignty. Hee also foretold them by a Prophetical spirit, what should befall them in the end, and how a fire should come out of the Bramble, and consume the Cedars of Libanon.

Now (as it is an easie matter to call those men backe whom rage without right led on) Gaul the sonne of Ebed withdrew the Citizens of Sechem, from the seruice of Abimelech who therefore after some assaults entred the place, and mastered it; and in conclusion fired the towne, wherein their Idoll Baalberith was worshipped, and put all the people of all sorts to the slaughter. Lastly, in the assault of the Caste or Tower of Teber, himselfe was wounded in the head with a stone throwne ouer the wall by a woman; and finding himselfe mortally bruiſed, he commanded his owne Page to pierce his body, thereby to auoid the dishonour of being slaine by so feeble a hand.

While Abimelech vsurped the Gouernment, the Lapithes and Centaures made warre against the Thebanes. These Nations were descended of Apollo, and were the first in those parts that deuised to manage horses, to bridle and to fit them: insomuch as when they first came downe from the mountaines of Pindus, into the plaines, those which had neuer seene horsemen before, thought them creatures compounded of men and horses; so did the Mexicans when Ferdinando Cortes the Spaniard first inuaded that Empire.

After the death of Abimelech, Tholo of Issachar gouerned Israel 23. yeares, and after him Iair the Gileadite 22. yeares, who seemes to be descended of Iair the sonne of Manasse, who in Moses time conquered a great part of Gilead, and called the same after his owne name, Iaithab Iair. For to this Iair there remained thirte of those Cities, which his ancestors had recouered from the Amorites. Of these Iudges, because there is nothing else written, it is an argument that during all their times, Israel liued without disturbance and in peace.

When Iair iudged Israel, Priamus began to raigne in Troy, who at such time as Hercules sacked Ilium, was carried away captiue with his sister Hesione into Greece, and being afterward redeemed for ranſome, he rebuilt and greatly strengthened, and adorned Troy, and so farre enlarged his Dominions, as hee became the supreme Lord in effect of all Asia the lesse. He married Hecuba the daughter of Cisseus King of Thrace, and had in all (with Geerob) thirte sonnes, whereof seuentene by Hecuba, of whom Paris was one; who attempted to recouer his aunt Hesione, tooke Helen the wife of Menelaus, the cause of the warre which followed.

Theseus the tenth King of Athens began likewise to raigne in the beginning of Iair: some writers call him the sonne of Neptune and Ethra: but Plutark in the storie of his life, finds him begotten by Agewus, of whom the Grecian sea betweene it and Asia the lesse tooke name. For when Minos had mastered the Athenians, so far as hee forced them to pay him bin seuen of their sonnes euery yeare for tribute, whom he inclosed within a Labyrinth, to be deuoured by the monster Minotaur: because belike the sonnes of Taurus, which hee began on Pasiphae the Queene, had the charge of them: among these seuen Theseus thrust himselfe, not doubting by his valour to deliuer the rest, and to free the Countrie of that slaueerie occasioned for the death of Androgeus, Minos his sonne.

And hauing possesst himselfe of Arriadnes affection, who was Minos daughter, he receiued from her a boucme of thred, by which he conducted himselfe through all the crooked and inextricable turnings of the Labyrinth, made in all like that of the Clit of Crocodiles in Egypt; by meane whereof hauing slaine Minotaur, he found a ready way to returne. But whereas his father Agewus had giuen order, that if hee came backe with victorie and in safetie, he should vie a white saile in signe thereof, and not that mournfull blacke saile, vnder which they left the port of Athens. This instruction being either forgotten or neglected, Agewus deserying the Shippe of Theseus with a blacke saile, did cast himselfe ouer the rockes downe into the Sea, afterward called of his name Agewus.

One of the first famous acts of Theseus, was the killing of Sciron, who kept a passage betweene Mezara and the Peloponnesian Isthmos, and threw all whom hee mastered into the Sea, from the high rockes. Afterward hee did the like to Cercyon, by wrestling, who vied by that Art to kill others. Hee also ridde the Countrie of Procrustes, who vsed to bend downe the strong limbes of two trees, and fastened by cordes such as hee tooke, part of them to one, and part to the other bough, and by the springing vp tare them asunder. So did hee root out Periphetes and other mischieuous theeves and murderers. Hee ouerthrew the Armie of the Amazons, who after many victories and vastations, entred the Territorie of Athens. Theseus hauing taken their Queene Hippolita prisoner, began on her Hippolytus; with whom afterward his mother in law Phedra, falling in loue, and hee refusing to abuse his fathers bed, Phedra perswaded Theseus that his sonne offered to force her: after which it is faigned, that Theseus besought Neptune to reuenge this wrong of his sonnes, by some violent death. Neptune taking a time of aduantage, sent out his Sea Calues, as Hippolytus passed by the sea shore, and so affrighted his horses, as casting the Coach ouer, hee was (by being intangled therein) torne in pieces. Which miserable and vnderfused destinie, when Phedra had heard of, she strangled her selfe. After which it is faigned, that Diana entreated Asclepius to let Hippolytus his pieces together, and to restore him to life: which done, because he was chaste, she led him with her into Italie, to accompany her in her hunting, and field sports.

It is probable that Hippolytus, when his Father sought his life, thinking to escape by Sea, was affronted thereat, and did receiue many wounds in forcing his passage and escape, which wounds Asclepius, to wit, some skillfull Physitian, or Chirurgion healed againe; after which hee passed into Italie, where hee liued with Diana, that is, the life of a hunter, in which hee most delighted. But of those ancient prophane Stories, Plutarch saith well, that as Cosmographers in their descriptions of the world, where they finde many vast places whereof they know nothing, fill the same with strange Beasts, Birds, and Fishes; and with Mathematicall lines; so doe the Grecian Historians and Poets imbroder and intermixe therewithales of ancient times, with a world of fictions and fabulous discourses. True it is, that Theseus did many great things in imitation of Hercules, whom hee made his patterne, and was the first that gathered the Athenians, from being dispersed in thinne and ragged Villages: in recompence whereof, and for desuising them Lawes to liue vnder, and in order, hee was by the beggerly, mutable, and vngratefull multitude, in the end banished. Some say, per Ostracismum, by the Law of Loures, or names written on shells, which was a deuice of his owne.

He stole Helen (as they say) when she was fiftie yeares old, from Aphidna, which City Castor and Pollux ouerturned, when they followed after Theseus to recouer their sister. Erasistratus and Pausanias write that Theseus begot her with childe at Argos, where hee erected a Temple to Lacina: but her age makes that tale vnlively to bee true, and so doth Ouid, Nontamen ex his Astrum subtile peritum, &c. The rape Eusebius findes in the first of Iair, who gouerned Israel 22. yeares, to whom succeeded Iephia or Iephie six yeares, to whom Iezeg who ruled seuen yeares, and then Halidon eight yeares: in whose time was the fall of Troy. So, as if Theseus had a childe by her in the first of Iair, (at which which time wee must count her no lesse than fifteene yeares old, for the women did not commonly begin so young as they doe now: shee was then at least two and fiftie yeares old at the destruction of Troy: and when shee was stollen by Paris, eight and thirtie: but herein the Chronologers doe not agree. Yet Eusebius and Bunting with Halicarnassus doe in effect consent, that the City was entred, and burnt in the first yeare of Demophon King of Athens, the successor of Mnestheus, the successor of Theseus, seuentene dayes before the Summer Tropiques; and that about the eleventh of September following, the Troians crost the Hellspont into Thrace, and wintered there, and in the next spring that they migrated into Sicilia, where wintering the second yeare, the next summer they arrived at Laurentum, and builded Lavinium. But Saint Augustine hath otherwise, That when Polyphides gouerned Sicyon, Mnestheus, Athens, Tantanes, Assyria, Hadon, Israel then Aeneas arrived in Italie, transporting with him in twentie ships the remainder of the Troians: but the difference is not great: and hereof more at large in the storie of Troy at hand.

In Sicyonia Phelus the two and twentieth King, reigned eight yeares, beginning by the common account in the time of Thola. His successours, Adrastus, who reigned foure yeares, and Polyphides who reigned thirteene, are accounted to the time of Iair, so is also Mnestheus King of Athens, and Atreus, who held a great part of Poloponnesus. In Assyria, during the gouernment of these two peaceable Iudges, Mitrens, and after him Tantanes, reigned. In Egypt Amenophis, the sonne of Ramfes, and afterwards Annenenes.

§. VII.

Of the warre of Thebes which was in this age.

IN this age was the warre of Thebes, the most ancient that euer Greeke Poet or Historian wrote of: Wherefore the Roman Poet Lucretius, affirming (as the Epicures in this point held truly against the Peripateticks) that the world had a beginning, vigeth them with this obiection.

*Si nulla fuit genialis origo Rerumq; & mundi, semperque aeterna fuere,
Cur supra bellum Thebanum, & funera Troie,
Non aliam alij quoque res cecidere poeta?*

If all this world had no originall,
But things haue euer beene as now they are:
Before the siege of Thebes or Troyes last fall,
Why did no Poem'ng some elder warre?

It is true that in these times Greece was very saluage, the inhabitants being often chased from place to place, by the Captains of greater Tribes: and no man thinking the ground whereon hee dwelt his owne longer than he could hold it by strong hand. Wherefore merchandize and other intercourese they vsed little, neither did they plant many trees, or sowe more corne than was necessary for their sustenance. Money they had little or none, for it is thought that the name of money was not heard in Greece, when Homier did write who measures the valew of gold and brasse by the worth in cattell; saying that the golden armour of Glaucom was worth an hundred Beecues, and the copper armour of Diomedes worth nine.

Robberies by land and sea were common and without shame, and to steale horses or kine was the vsuall exercise of their great men. Their townes were not many, whereof those that were walled were very few, and not great. For Mycena the principall Citie in Poloponnesus was a very little thing, and it may well be thought that the rest were proportionable: briefly, Greece was then in her infancie, and though in some small townes of that halfe Ile of Poloponnesus, the inhabitants might haue enioyed quietnesse within their narrow bounds, as likewise did the Athenians because their Countie was so barren, that none did care to take it from them: yet that the land in generall was very rude, it will easly appeare to such as consider, what Thucydides the greatest of their Historians hath written to this effect, in the Preface to his Historie. Wherefore, as in these later times times, idle Chroniellers vsd when they want good matter, to fill whole books with reports of great frosts, or dry summers, and other such things which no man cares to read; so did they who spake of Greece in her beginnings, remember onely the great floods which were in the times of Ogyges, and Deucalion: or else rehearse fables of men changed into birds, of strange monsters; of adulterie committed by their gods, and the mighty men which they begat, without writing ought that fauoured of humanitie before the time of the warre of Thebes: the brieft whereof is this.

Oedipus the sonne of Laius King of Thebes, hauing beene cast forth when he was an infant, because an Oracle foretold what euill should come to passe by him, did afterwards in a narrow passage contending for the way, slay his owne father, not knowing either then or long after, who he was. Afterward hee became King of Thebes, by marriage of the Queene Iocasta, called by Homier Epicaste: on whom, not knowing her to beq his mother, hee begat two sonnes, Eteocles and Polynices. But when in proccesse of time, finding out by good circumstances, who were his parents, hee vnderstood the grieuous murder and incest hee had committed, hee tore out his owne eyes for griefe, and left the Citie. His wife and mother did hang themselves. Some say that Oedipus, hauing his eyes pulled out, was expelled Thebes, bitterly cursing his sonnes, because they suffered their father to be cast out of the Towne, and ayded him not. Howsoever it were, his two Sonnes made this agreement; that the one of them should reigne one yeare, and the other another yeare; and so by course rule interchangeably. But this appointment was ill obserued. For when Polynices had after a yeares gouernment resigned the Kingdome to his brother: or (according to others) when Eteocles had reigned the first yeare, hee refused to giue ouer the rule to Polynices. Hereupon Polynices fledde vnto Argos, where Adrastus the sonne of Talaus then reigned, vnto whose palace comming by night, he was driuen to seeke lodging in an out-house, on the backside.

There he met with Tydeus the sonne of Orneus, who was fled from Calydon: with whom striuing about their lodging, hee fell to blowes. Adrastus hearing the noyle, came forth and tooke vp the quarrell. At which time perceiuing in the shield of Tydeus a Bore, in that of Polynices a Lyon, hee remembered an olde Oracle, by which hee was aduised to giue his two daughters in marriage, to a Lyon and a Bore: and accordingly hee did bestow his daughter Argia vpon Tydeus, and Deipyle vpon Polynices, promising to restore them both to their Countries. To this purpose leuying an Armie, and assembling as many valiant Captaines as hee could draw to follow him, he was desirous among others to carrie Amphiarus the sonne of Oicleus a great Soothsayer, and a valiant man, along with him. But Amphiarus, who is said to haue foreseene all things, knowing well that none of the Captaines should escape, saue onely Adrastus, did both utterly refuse to bee one in that expedition, and perswaded others to stay at home. Polynices therefore dealt with Eriphyle the Wife of Amphiarus, offering vnto her a very faire bracelet, vpon condition that shee should cause her Husband to assist him. The Soothsayer knowing what should worke his destinie, forbade his Wife to take any gift of Polynices. But the bracelet was in her eye so precious a Iewell, that shee could not refuse it. Therefore whereas a great controuersie, betwene Amphiarus and Adrastus, was by way of compromise put vnto the decision of Eriphyle, either of them being bound by solemne oath to stand to her appointment: shee ordered the matter so, as a Woman should that did loue a bracelet better than her Husband. Hee now finding that it was farre more easie to foresee than auoide destinie, sought for such comfort as reuenge might afford him, giuing in charge vnto his sonnes, that when they came to full age, they should kill their mother, and make strong warre vpon the Thebanes.

Now had Adrastus assembled all his forces, of which, the seuen chiefe leaders were, himselfe, Amphiarus, Capaneus, and Hippomedon (in stead of whom some name Melesseus) all Argiues, with Polynices the Theban, Tydeus the Etolian, and Parthenopus the Arcadian, sonne of Meleager and Atalanta. When the Armie came to the Nemean Wood, they met a woman whom they desired to helpe them to some water; shee hauing a childe in her armes, laid it downe, and led the Argiues to a spring: but ere shee returned, a Serpent had slaine the childe. This woman was Hyppisyle the daughter of Thoas the Lemnian, whom shee would haue saued when the women of the Ile slew all the the males by conspiracie, intending to lead an Amazonian life. For such her pietie, the Lemnian wifes did sell her to Pyrates, and the Pyrates to Lyceus Lord of the Countrie about Nemæa, whose young sonne Opheltes or Archemorus, she did nurse, and lost, as is shewed before. When vpon the childes death shee hid her selfe for feare of her master, Amphiaras told her sonnes where they should finde her: and the Argiues did both kill the Serpent which had slaine the child, and in memorie of the chance, did institute solemne funerall games called Nemæan, wherein Adrastus wanne the prize with his swift horse Arion, Tydeus with the wordbeats, Amphiaras at running and quoying, Polynices at wrestling, Parthenopaus at shooting, and one Laodocus in daiting. This was the first institution of the Nemæan games, which continued after famous in Greece for very many ages. There are, who thinke that they were ordained in honour of one Opheltes a Lacedæmonian. Some say by Hercules, when he had slaine the Nemæan Lyon: but the common opinion agrees with that which is here set downe.

From Nemæa the Argiues marching onwards, arrived at Citheron, whence Tydeus was by them sent Embassadour to Thebes, to require of Eteocles the performance of Covenants betwene him and Polynices. This message was nothing agreeable to Eteocles, who was throughly resolute to hold what he had, as long as he could: which Tydeus perceiving, and intending partly to get honour, partly to trie what mettle was in the Thebans, he made many challenges, and obtained victorie in all of them; not without much enuie and malice of the people, who laid fiftie men in ambush to intercept him at his returne to the Armie; of which fiftie he slew all but one, whom hee sent backe to the Citie as a reporter and witness of his valour. When the Argiues vnderstood how resolute Eteocles was, they presented themselves before the Citie, and incamped round about it. Thebes is said to haue had at that time seuen gates, which belike stood not far asunder, seeing that the Argiues (who afterward when they were very farre stronger, could scarce muster vpon more thousands than Thebes had gates) did compass the Towne, Adrastus quartered before the gate Homoloides, Capaneus before the Ogygian, Tydeus before Cremis, Amphiaras at Proctis, Hippomedon at Anchais, Parthenopaus at Elella, and Polynices at Thysista. In the meane season, Eteocles hauing armed his men, and appointed Commanders vnto them, took aduise of Tiresias the Soothsayer, who promised victorie to the Thebans, if Menæcius the sonne of Creon a principall man of the Citie, would vow himselfe to be slaine in honour of Mars the god of warre. So full of malice and pride is the Diuell, and so enuious at his Creators glory, that hee not onely challengeth honour due to God alone, as oblations and sacrifice with all Diuine worship, but commandeth vs to offer our selues, and our children vnto him, when hee hath sufficiently clouded mens vnderstanding, and bewitched their wils with ignorance and blinde deuotion. And such abominable sacrifice of men, maidens, and children hath he exacted of the Syrians, Carthaginians, Galles, Germans, Cyprians, Egyptians, and of many other, if not of all Nations, when through ignorance or feare they were most filled with superstition. But as they grew more wise, so did he waxe lesse impudent in cunning, though not lesse malicious in designing the continuance of such barbarous inhumanitie. For King Diphilus in Cyprus without aduise of any Oracle, made the Idoll of that Countrie rest contented with an Oxe in stead of a man. Tiberius forbade humane sacrifices in Africke, and crucified the Priests in the groues where they had practised them. Hercules taught the Italians to drowne men of hay in stead of the liuing; yet among the saluages in the West Indies these cruell offerings haue bene practised of late ages: which as it is a sufficient argument that Satans malice is onely couered and hidden by this subtiltie among ciuill people: so may it serue as a probable Coniecture of the barbarismes then reigning in Greece. For Menæcius, as soone as he vnderstood that his death might purchase victorie to his people, bestowed himselfe (as hee thought) vpon Mars, killing himselfe before the gates of the Citie. Then was a battaile fought, wherein the Argiues preuailed so farre at the first, that Capaneus aduancing ladders to the walls, got vpon the rampart: whence, when he fell or was cast downe, or (as Writers haue it) was stricken down by Iupiter with a thunder-bolt, the Argiues fled. Many on each part were slaine in this battaile, which caused both sides to desire that Eteocles and Polynices might trie out the quarrell in single fight: whereto the two brethren according, flew each other.

Another battell was fought after their death, wherein the sonnes of Asacus behaued themselves very valiantly: Isinarnus one of the sonnes slew Hippomedon, which was one of the seuen Princes: Parthenopaus being another of the seuen (who was said to haue beene so faire, that none would hurt him when his face was bare) was slaine by Amphidicus, or as some say, by Periclymenus the sonne of Nepheus: and the valiant Tydeus by Megalippus: yet ere Tydeus died, the head of Menalippus was brought vnto him by Amphiaras, which he cruelly tore open, and swallowed vp the braines. Vpon which fact, it is said, that Pallus, who had brought from Iupiter such remedie for his wounds, as should haue made him immortall, refused to bestow it vpon him: whereby perhaps was meant that his honour which might haue continued immortall, did perish through the beastly rage that he shewed at his death.

The host of the Argiues being wholly discomfited, Adrastus and Amphiaras fled, of whom Amphiaras is said to haue bene swallowed quicke into the earth, neere to the riuer Ismenus, together with his Chariot, and so lost out of mens sight, being peraduenture ouerwhelmed with dead carcases, or drowned in the riuer: and his body neuer found, nor greatly sought for. Adrastus escaped on his good horse Arion, and came to Athens: where sitting at an Altar, called the Altar of Mercie, hee made supplication for their aide to recouer their bodies. For Creon hauing obtained the Government of Thebes after the death of Eteocles, would not suffer the bodies of the Argiues to be buried: but caused Antigone, the onely daughter then liuing of Oedipus, to be buried quicke, because shee had sought out and buried the body of her brother Polynices, contrary to Creons Edict. The Athenians condescending to the request of Adrastus, did lend forthan an Armie vnder the conduct of Thebes, which tooke Thebes, and restored the bodies of the Argiues to Sepulture: at which time Enadine the Wife of Capaneus, threw her selfe into the funerall fire, and was burnt willingly with her Husband. But it little contented the sonnes of those Capraines which were slaine at Thebes, that any lesse reuenge should be taken of their fathers death, than the ruine of the Citie: wherfore tenne years after hauing leuied forces, Aegialeus the sonne of Adrastus, Diomedes of Tyden, Præmachus of Parthenopaus, Sthenelus of Capaneus, Thersander of Polynices, and Enryllus of Macis, marched thither vnder the conduct of Alcmaon, the son of Amphiaras: with whom also went his brother Amphilochus. Apollo promised victorie if Alcmaon, were their Captaine, whom afterward by another Oracle hee commanded to kill his owne mother.

When they came to the Citie, they were incountried by Laodamas the son of Eteocles then King of the Thebans, (for Creon was onely Tutor to Laodamas) who though he did valiantly in the battaile, and slue Aegialeus, yet was hee pur to the worst, and diuined to flie, or according to Apollodorus slaine by Alcmaon. After this disaster the citizens began to desire composition; but in the meane time they conuayed themselves with their wifes & children away from thence by night, and so began to wander vp and downe, till at length they built the Town called Eteia. The Argiues, when they perceiued that their enemies had quitted the Town, entering into it, sacked it, threw downe the walls, and layd it waste; howbeit it is reported by some, that the Towne was saved by Thersander, the sonne of Polynices, who causing the Citizens to retire, did there raigine over them. That hee saved the City from vtter destruction, it is very likely, for he reigned there, and led the Thebans to the Warre of Troy, which very shortly after ensued.

§. VIII.

Of Iephtha, and how the three hundred yeares which he speaketh of, Iud. 11. v. 28. are to be reconciled with the places, Act. 13. 20. 1 Reg. 6. 1. together with some other things touching Chronologie about these times.

After the death of Sair (neere about whose times these things hapned in Greece, and during whose gouernment, & that of Thola, Israel liued in peace and in order) they reuolted again from the law & seruice of God, and became more wicked and idolatrous than euer. For whereas in the former times they worshipped Baal, & Asteroth, they now became followers of all the Heathen nations adioyning, and embraced the idolls of the Amorites, of the Zidonians, Moabites & Ammonites: with those of the Philistims. And as before it pleased God to correct them by the Amorites, by the Auakites, and Midianites: so now he scourged them by the Ammonites, and afterward by the Philistims. Now among the Israelites, those of Gilead being most oppress, because they bordered upon the Ammonites, they were enforced to lette Iephthā, whom they had formerly despised and cast from them, because he was base borne; but he (notwithstanding those former injuries) participating more of godly compassion, than of diuellish hatred and reuenge, was content to lead the Gileadites to the Warre; vpon condition that they should establish him their Governour after victory. And when hee had disputed with Ammon for the Land, disproued Ammons right, and fortified the title of Israel by many arguments, the same prevailing nothing, he began the warre; and being strengthened by God, ouerthrew them: and did not only beate them out of the plaines, but forc't them ouer the mountaines of Arabia, euen to Minnish, and Abel of the vineyards, Cities exprest here, tofore in the description of the holy Land. After which victory it is said, that he performed the valne vow which he made, to sacrifice the first living creature hee encountered, conning out of his house to meet him; which happened to be his owne daughter, and onely child, who with all patience submitted her selfe, and onely desired two months time to bewaile her Virginitie on the mountaines of Gilead; because in her the issues of her Father ended: but the other opinion, that shee was not offered, is more probable, which Bartheus and others proue sufficiently.

After these things the children of Israel, of the Tribe of Ephraim, either enuious of Iephthā's victorie, or otherwise making way to their future calamitie, and to the most grievous slavery that euer Israel suffered, quarrelled with Iephthā, that they were not called to the Warre; as before time they had contested with Gideon. Iephthā hereupon enforced to defend himselfe against their fury, in the encounter slew of them two and forty thousand, which he weakened the body of the Land, as the Philistims had an easie conquest of them all not long after. Iephthā, after hee had iudged Israel fixe yeeres, died: to whom succeeded Ishazā, who ruled seuen yeeres: after him Elon was their Iudge tenne yeeres: in all which time Israel had peace. Eusebius findes not Elon, whom hee calleth Adon, for in the Septuagint, approved in his time, this Iudge was omitted.

Now before I goe on with the rest, it shall be necessary vpon the occasion of Iephthā's account of the times, Iud. 11. 28. (where he says that Israel had then posselt the East side of Jordan 300. yeeres) to speake somewhat of the times of the Iudges, and of the differing opinions among the Diuines & Chronologers: there being found three places of Scriptures touching this point, seeming repugnant, or disagreeing: the first is in this dispute betweene Iephthā and Ammon, for the right and possession of Gilead: the second is that of Saint Paul, Acts 13. the third is that which is in the first of Kings. Iephthā here challengeth the possession of Gilead for 300. yeeres: Saint Paul giueth to the Judges, as it seemes, from the end of Iofua, to the last of Heli, 450. yeeres. In the first of Kings it is taught, that from the departing of Israel out of Egypt, to the foundation of Salomons Temple, there were consumed 480. yeeres. To the first Berosaldus findeth Iephthā's 300. yeeres to be but 266. yeeres, to wit, 18. of Iofua, 40. of Othniel, 80. of Aod and Sampar, 40. of Debora, 40. of Gideon, 3. of Abimelech, 23. of Thola, and 22. of Iair: But Iephthā (saith Berosaldus) putteth or propoeth a certaine number, for an vncertaine: Sic ut dicat annum aqi prope trecentessimum, ex quo nullus litera eade re monerit Israeli, so hee speaketh (saith he) as meaning, that then it was about or well-nigh the three hundredth yeere, since Israel possessed those Countries, no man making question of their right. Codoman on the contrary findes more yeeres than Iephthā named by 65. to wit, 365. whereof 71. were spent in Israels captiuitie, at severall times, of which (as Codoman thinketh) Iephthā forbore to repeat the whole summe or any great part, lest the Ammonite should haue iustly objected, that 71. of those yeeres, the Israelites were in captiuitie and vassals to their neighbour Princes, and therefore knowing that to name three hundred yeeres, it was enough for prescription, hee omitted the rest.

To iustifie this account of 365. yeeres, besides the 71. yeeres of captiuitie or affliction, to be added to Berosaldus his 266. hee addeth also 28. yeeres more, and so maketh vp the summe of 365. These 28. yeeres hee findeth out thus: twenty yeeres hee giues to the Seniors betweene Iofua and Othniel: and where Berosaldus alloweth eightene yeeres to Iofua his gouernment, Codoman accounts that his rule lasted 26. according to Iosephus; whereas Saint Augustine and Eusebius giue him 27. melancthon 32. The truth is, that this addition of 28. yeeres is farre more doubtful than the other of 71. But though we admit not of this addition, yet by accounting of some part of the yeeres of affliction (to wit, 34. yeeres of the 71.) if wee addeth them to the 266. yeeres

of Berosaldus, which reckoneth none of these, we haue the iust number of 300. yeeres. Neither is it strange that Iephthā should leaue out more than halfe of these yeeres of affliction: seeing, as it is already said, the Ammonites might except against these 71. yeeres, & say, that during these yeeres, or at least a good part of them, the Israelites had no quiet possession of the countries in question. Martin Luther is the author of a third opinion, making those 300. yeeres remembered by Iephthā, to be 306. which odde yeeres, saith he, Iephthā omitteth. But because the yeeres of euerie Iudge as they reigned, cannot make vp the number of 306, but do only compound 266. therefore doth Luther adde to this number the whole time which Moses spent in the Desarts of Arabia Petraea; which forty yeeres of Moses added to the number which Berosaldus findeth of 266. make indeed 306.

But I see nothing in the Text to warrant Luthers iudgement herein: for in the dispute between Iephthā & Ammon for the land of Gilead, it is written in the person of Ammon, in these words: Because Israel tooke my Land, when they came up from Egypt, from Arnon unto Iaboc &c. now therefore restore those lands quietly, or in peace. So by this place it is plain, that the time is not to be accounted from Moses departure out of Egypt: but from the time that the land was posselt. For it is said, Quia cepit Israel terram meam, Behold Israel tooke my land: and therefore the beginning of this account is to be referred to the time of the taking: which Iephthā's answer also confirmeth in these words: when Israel dwelt in Hebban, and in her Townes, and in Arcer, and in her Townes, and in all the Cities that are by the coast of Arnon 300 yeeres: why did ye not then reconner them in that space? so as this place speaks it directly, that Israel had inhabited and dwelt in the Cities of Gilead 300. yeeres: and therefore to account the times from the hopes or intents, that Israel had to posselt it, it seemeth somewhat strained to me; for we do not vse to reckon the time of our conquests in France, from our Princes intents or purposes, but from their victories and possessions.

Iunius neuertheless likes the opinion of Luther, & says, that this time of 300. yeeres hath reference, and is to take beginning from the first of Iephthā's narration: when he makes a brieue repetition of Moses whole iourney: to wit, at the sixteenth Verse of the eleventh Chapter of Judges, in our translation in these words: But when Israel came up from Egypt, &c. and therefore Moses his 40. yeeres (as he thinks) are to be accounted, which make the number of 305. yeeres: and not only the time in which Israel posselt Gilead, according to the Text & Iephthā's own words: of which I leaue the iudgement to others; to whom also I leaue to iudge, whether we may not begin the 480. yeeres, from the deliuerance out of Egypt to the Temple, euen from the first departure out of Egypt; and yet finde a more probable reconciliation of Saint Pauls and Iephthā's account with this reckoning, than any of those that as yet haue bene signified. For first, touching Iephthā's three hundred yeeres of possession of the East side of Jordan, it is to be remembered, that for a good while before the Israelites posselt it, Sehon and Og had possessed Moab and Ammon thereof: so that when the Israelites had conquered Sehon and Og, the right of possession which they had, passed to Israel; and so Iephthā might say that they had posselt those Countries 300. yeeres, reckoning 266. yeeres of their own possession, and the rest of the possession of the two Kings Sehon and Og, whose right the Israelites had by the law of conquest.

The second place disputed is this of S. Paul, Acts 13. that from the end of Iofua to the beginning of Samuel, there past 450. yeeres. And this place Luther vnderstandeth also besides the letter (as I find his opinion cited by Funditus Krentzheimius, and Berza) for I haue not read his Commentaries. For he accounteth from the death of Moses, to the last yeere of Heli, but 357. yeeres: and this he doth the better to approve the one upon the 50 times from the egression out of Egypt to the building of the Temple, which in the first of Kings 6. is said to be 480. yeeres.

Now forasmuch as S. Paul (as it seemes) findes 450. yeeres from the death of Iofua, to the last of Heli, & leaues but thirty yeeres for Saul and Samuel, who gouerned 40. for Dauid who ruled 40. and for Salomon who wore the Crowne three whole yeeres ere the foundation of the Temple was laid; therefore Luther takes it, that there was error in the Scribe, who wrote out this piece of Scripture of S. Paul: to wit, Then afterward hee gaue vnto them Iudges about 450. yeeres; vnto the time of Samuel the Prophet: the words then afterward, being cleerly referred to the death or after the death of Iofua, as shall be hereafter proued. But where Saint Luke rehearsing the words of Saint Paul, wrote 350. yeeres (saith Luther) the Scribe in the transcription being deceived by the affinitye of those two Greeke words, whereof the one signifith 300. & the other 400. wrote Tetracosiois, for Triacosiois; 400. yeeres, for 300. yeeres; and 450. for 350. This he seeketh to strengthen by many arguments; to which opinion Beza in his great annotations adhereth. A contrary iudgement to this hath Codoman; where Luther and Beza begin at Moses death, he takes his account from the death of Iofua, and from thence to the beginning of Samuel he makes 430. yeeres: to wit of the Judges (not reckoning Sampsons yeeres) 319. and of yeeres of seruitude and affliction vnder strangers, 111. The reason why he doth not reckon Sampsons twenty yeeres, is because he thinks that they were part of the 40. yeeres, in which the Philistims are said to haue oppressed Israel. For it is plaine, that during all Sampsons time they were Lords ouer Israel. So then of the Judges, besides the 111. yeeres of seruitude, Codoman reckoneth (as I haue said) 319. yeeres, which two summes put together make 430. yeeres. And, whereas Saint Paul nameth 450. yeeres, he findes 20. yeeres to make vp Saint Pauls number, to haue bene spent after the death of Iofua by the Seniors, before the Captiuitie of Cusban, or the election of Orthoniel: which 20. yeeres added to 430. make 450. according to Saint Paul. To approue this time of the Elders, he citeth two places of Scriptures, namely the 24. of Iofua, and the second of Judges, in each of which places it is written, that Israel served the Lord all the dayes of Iofua, and all the daies of the Elders that ouer-lined Iofua: so as to these times of the Elders, Codoman giueth 20. yeeres, which make as before 450. according to S. Paul. Neither would it breed any great difficultie in this opinion, if here also the 20. yeeres of the Seniors between Iofua and Orthoniel, should be denied. For they which denie these yeeres, and make Orthoniels 40. to begin presently vpon the death of Iofua, as in the beginning of this reckoning, they haue 20. yeeres lesse than Codoman, so toward the end of it (when they reckon the yeeres of affliction apart from the yeeres of the Judges) in the number of Sampsons yeeres, and of the 40. yeeres of the Philistims oppressing the Israelites, they haue 20. yeeres more than Codoman. For they reckon these 40. yeeres of oppression all of them a-part from Sampsons 20. but Codoman, as is said, makes Sampsons 20. to be the one halfe of the 40. of the Philistims oppressions; so that if the 20. yeeres of the Seniors, be not allowed to Codoman, then he may reckon (as the letter of the Text seemes to inforce) that the Philistims in any Inter-regnum, before Sampson iudged Israel, vexed the Israelites 40. yeeres besides the 20. while Sampson was their Iudge; & so the reckoning will come to 450. yeeres between the end of Iofua, and the beginning of Samuel, though we admit not of an Inter-regnum of the Seniors betwene Iofua and Orthoniel: For, if the times of their affliction be summed, they make 111. yeeres, to which if we adde the yeeres of the Judges, which are 339. wee haue the iust summe of 450. And this computation either one way or other, may seeme to be much more probable, than theirs that correct the Text, although we should admit of their correction thereof, & read with them 350. for 450. For whereas they conceiue that this time of 350. yeeres, is to begin immediately, or soone after the death of Moses: certainly the place of S. Paul doth evidently teach the contrary, though it be receiued for true that there was vitium scriptoris in the rest. For these be Saint Pauls words: And about the time of fortie yeeres, God suffered their manners in the wilderness: And he destroyed seven Nations in the Land of Canaan, and diuided their Land to them by lot. Then afterward he gaue vnto them Iudges about 450. yeeres, vnto the time of Samuel the Prophet. So as first in the eighteenth verse he speaketh of Moses and of his yeeres spent in the wilderness; then in the nineteenth verse he commeth vnto the acts of Iofua; which were, that he destroyed seven Nations in the land of Canaan, and diuided their Land to them by lot. In the twentieth verse it followeth, then afterward he gaue them Judges about 450. yeeres, &c. and therefore to reckon from the death of Moses, is wide of S. Pauls meaning, so farre as my weake vnderstanding can pierce it. The onely inconuenience of any vaight in opinion of Codoman touching this place in the Acts, is, that it seemes irreconcilable with the account, 1. Reg. 6. 11. For if indeed there were spent 450. yeeres between the end of Iofua and the beginning of Samuel, certainly there must needs be much more than 480. yeeres between the beginning of the Israelites iourneying from Egypt, & the foundation of the Temple by Salomon. To this difficultie

Codoman

Codoman answereth, that these 480. yeeres, 1. Reg. 6. 1. must begin to be reckoned, not in the beginning, but in the ending of their iourneying from Egypt, which he makes to be 25. yeeres after the beginning of Orthoniels gouernment; from whence if wee cast the yeeres of the Judges, with the yeeres of seruitude (which summes according to his account, of which we haue already spoken, make 397. yeeres) and so to these yeeres adde the 40. of Samuel, and Saul, and the 40. of Dauid, and the 3. of Salomon, wee shall haue the iust summe of 480. yeeres. Neither is it hard (saith hee) that the annus egressionis, 1. Reg. 6. 1. should be vnderstood egressionis non incipientis sed finitis, the yeere of their coming out of Egypt (for so it is in the originall) or the yeere after they came out of Egypt, may well be vnderstood for the yeere after they were come out thence; that is, after they had ended their wandering from thence. For so wee finde that things which were done 40. yeeres after they had set foot out of Egypt, are said to haue bene done in their going out of Egypt, as Psal. 114. When Israel came out of Egypt, Iordan was dried vnto the sea, &c. These are the testimonies which Moses spake when they came out of Egypt. And thus farre it seemes wee may very well agree with Codoman, for the interpretation of the ab exitu, to be as much as quum exiissent, or ab exitu finitis: for if Iunius, Deut. 4. 45. doe well reade quum exiissent, for in exitu, as it seemes that herein hee doth well, why may not wee also, to auoid contradiction in the Scripture, expound ab exitu to be, postquam exiissent?

The next point to be cleared, is how their iourneying should be said not to haue had end vntill the 25. yeere after the victory of Orthoniel. To this Codoman answereth, that then it had no end til when all the Tribes had obtained their portions, which happened not vntill this time: at which time the Danites at length seated themselves, as it is declared, Iud. 18. For doubtlesse to this time the expedition may most conueniently be referred. And thus without any great inconuenience to him appearing, doth Codoman reconcile the account of Iephtha, and S. Paul, with that in the first of Kings, c. 6. Now whereas it is said that the expedition of the Danites was when there was no King in Israel: to this Codoman answereth, that it is not necessary that wee should suppose that Orthoniel liued all those 40. yeeres of rest, of which Iud. 3. 11. so that by the 25. yeere after his victory, either hee might haue bene dead, or at least, as Gideon did, he might haue refused all souerainty, and so either way it might truly be said that at this time (to wit, the 25. yeere after Orthoniels victorie) there was no King in Israel. This opinion of Codoman, if it were as consonant to other Chronologers grounding their opinions on the plaine Text, where it is indisputable, as it is in it selfe round enough and coherent, might perhaps be receiued as good: especially considering, that the speeches of S. Paul haue not otherwise found any interpretation, maintaining them as absolutely true, in such manner as they found, and are set downe. But seeing that he wanteth all helpe of authority, we may iustly suspect the supposition wherupon his opinion is grounded; it being such as the consent of many Authors would hardly suffice to make very probable. For who hath told Codoman, that the conquest of Laish, by the Tribe of Dan, was performed in the five and twentieth yeere of Orthoniel? Or what other probability hath hee than his owne coniecture, to shew that Orthoniel did so renounce the office of a Iudge after five and twenty yeeres, that it might then be truly said there was no King in Israel, but euery man did that which was good in his owne eyes?

Now concerning the rehearfall of the Law by Moses, and the stopping of Jordan, they might indeed be properly said to haue bene, when Israel came out of Egypt; like as we say that King Edward the first was crowned when hee came out of the holy Land, for so all iournies with their accidents commonly take name from the place either whence or whither they tend. But I think that hee can finde no such phrase of speech in Scripture as limiteth a iourney by an accident, or saith by conuerting the proposition, when Jordan was turning back, Israel came out of Egypt. Indeed most vnproper it were to giue date vnto actions comenced long after, from an expedition finished long before, namely to say, that King Edward at his arriuall out of Palestina, did winne Scotland, or died at Carlisle. How may we then beleue that enterprize performed so many yeeres after the diuision of the Land (which followed the conquest at the iournies end) should be said to haue been at the time of the departure out of Egypt? Or who will not think it most strange, that the most notable account of time, seruing as the onely guide for certaine ages in sacred Chronologic, should not take name and beginning from that illustrious deliuerance out of Egypt, rehearsed often by God himselfe among the principall of his benefits to Israel, whereof the very day and moneth are recorded in Scripture (as likewise are the yeere and moneth wherein it expired) & the forme of the yeere vpon that occasion changed; but should haue reference to the surprizing of a Town by sixe hundred men, that robbed a Chappell by the way, and stole from thence Idols to be their guides, as not going to worke in Gods name? For this accident whereupon Codoman buildeth, hath either no time given to it, or a time far different from that which he supposeth, and is indeed rather by him placed in such a yeere, because it best stood with his interpretation fo to haue it, than for any certainty or likelihood of the thing it selfe.

Wherefore we may best agree with such as affirme that the Apostle S. Paul did not herein labour to set downe the course of time exactly (a thing no way concerning his purpose) but onely to shew that God, who had chosen Israel to be his people, deliuered them out of bondage, and ruled them by Iudges and Prophets, vnto the time of Saul, did raise vp out Lord Iesus Christ out of the seede of Dauid the King, in whose succession the Crowne was established, and promise made of a Kingdome that should haue no end. Now in rehearsing briefly thus which tended as a Preface to the declaration following (wherein hee sheweth Christ to haue bin the true Messias) the Apostle was fo farre from labouring to make an exact calculation of times (the History being so well knowne & beleued of the Iewes to whom he preached) that he spake as it were at large, of the 40. yeeres consumed in the wildernesse, whereof no man doubted, saying, that God suffered their manners in the wildernesse about 40. yeeres. In like manner he proceeded, saying, that from the diuision of the Land vnto the daies of Samuel the Prophet, in whose time they required to haue a King, there passed about 450. yeeres. Neither did he stand to tell them, that an hundred and eluen yeeres of bondage mentioned in this middle while, were by exact computation to be included within the 339. yeeres of the Iudges; for this had beene an impertinent digression from the argument which hee had in hand. Wherefore it is not a worke so needfull as laborious, to search out of this place that which the Apostle did not here intend to teach, when the summe of 480. yeeres is so expressly and purposely set downe.

Now that the words of S. Paul if there be no fault in the Copie through error of some Scribe are not so curiously to be examined in matter of Chronologie, but must be taken, as hauing reference to the memory & apprehension of the vulgar, it is euident by his ascribing in the same place 40. yeeres to the reigne of Saul: whereas it is manifest that those yeeres were diuided between Saul and Samuel, yea, that farre the greater part of them were spent vnder the gouernment of the Prophet, howsoeuer they are here included in the reigne of the King. As for those that with so much cunning forsake the general opinion, when it fauoureth not such exposition as they bring out of a good minde, to suppose where the need is not ouer-great, I had rather commend their diligence, than follow their example. The words of S. Paul were sufficiently iustified by Bernardus, as hauing reference to a common opinion among the Scribes in those dayes, that the 111. yeeres of seruitude were to be reckoned apart from the 339. yeeres ascribed to the Iudges, which account, the Apostle would not in this place stand to contradict, but rather chose to speake as the vulgar, qualifying it with a quasi, where he saith, quasi quadringentes & quinquaginta annis; As it were four hundred and fifty yeeres. But Codoman being not thus contented, would needs haue it be so indeed, and therefore dil-ioynes the members to make the account euen. In so doing he disiecteth himselfe against a notable Text, whereupon all Authors haue builded (as well they might and ought) that purposely and precisely doth cast vp the yeeres from the departure out of Egypt, vnto the building of Solomons Temple, not omitting the very Moneth it selfe.

Now (as commonly the first apprehensions are strongest) hauing already given faith to his owne interpretation of Saint Paul, he thinketh it more needfull to find some new exposition for that which is of it selfe most plaine, and to examine his owne coniecture vpon a place that is full of controuersie. Thus by expounding, after a strange method, that which is manifest by that which is obscure, he loseth himself in those waies wherein before him neuer man walked. Surely if one should vrge him to giue reason of these new opinions, he must needs answer, That Othontel could not gouerne about 25. yeeres, because there was the taking of Laish, at which time there was no King in Israel; That the

Danites

Danites must needs haue taken Laish at that time, because else we could not reckon backwards from the foundation of the Temple to any action that might bee termed the coming of Israel out of Egypt, without excluding the yeeres of seruitude; And that the yeeres of seruitude must needs be included, for that otherwise hee himselfe should haue spent his time vainly, in seeking to pleasure S. Paul with an exposition. Whether this ground be strong enough to vphold a Paradoxe, I leaue it to the decision of the iudicial Reader.

And now to proceed in our storie. To the time of Iephtha are referred the death of Hercules, the rape of Helen by Paris, and the prostitution which her husband Menelaus, reigning then in Sparta, and his brother Agamemnon King of Mycenae, made for her recovery. Others refer this rape of Helen to the fourth yeere of Ithacan: from which time, if the warre of Troy (as they suppose) did not begin till the third of Ailon or Elon, yet the Greeks had sixe yeeres to prepare themselves: the rule holding not true in this War, longa preparatio bellum celerem affert victoriam; That a long preparation begets a speedy victory: for the Greekes consumed tenne yeeres in the attempt; and Troy, as it seemes, was entred, sackt and burnt in the third yeere of Ithacan.

Three yeeres after Troy taken, which was in the sixt yeere of Ithacan, Enoch arrived in Italie. Ithacan in the eighth yeere of his rule, died, after hee had bene the Father of 40. sonnes and 30. grand-children. And whereas it is supposed, that the 40. yeeres of *Israel*s oppression by the Philistims (of which Iud. 13. v. 1.) tooke beginning from the ninth yeere of Tair, and ended with the last of Ithacan: I see no reason for that opinion. For Ephraim had had little cause of quarrell against Iephtha, for not calling them to War ouer Jordan, if the Philistims had held them in seruitude in their own Territories: and if Ephraim could haue brought 42000. armed men into the field, it is not likely that they werethen oppressed: and had it bene true that they were, who will doubt but that they would rather haue fought against the Philistims with so powerfull an Armie for their owne deliuerance, than against their owne brethren the Israelites? But Ammon being ouerthrowne, it seemed at that time, that they feared no other enimie. And therefore these 40. yeeres must either bee supplied elsewhere, as in the time of Samson, and afterwards: or else they must be referred to the inter-regnum betweene the death of Ithacan, and the deliuerance of Israel by Samson, such as it was.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the Warre of Troy.

§. I.

Of the Genealogie of the Kings of Troy, with a note touching the ancient Poets how they haue obserued Historically truth.

THE Warre at Troy with other stories hereupon depending (because the ruine of this Citie, by most Chronologers is found in the time of Ithacan, Iudge of Israel, whom in the last place I haue mentioned) I rather choose here to intreat of in one entire narration, beginning with the lineall descent of their Princes, than to break the story into pieces by rehearsing a-part in diuers yeeres, the diuersity of occurrents.

The Historie of the ancient Kings of Troy is vncertaine, in regard both of their originall, and of their continuance. It is commonly held that Tencer and Dardanus were the two founders of that Kingdome. This is the opinion of Virgil: which if hee (as Reineccius thinks) tooke from Herosus, it is the more probable: if Annius borrowed it of him, then it rests vpon the authority of Virgil, who saith thus:

Cressa Louis magni medio iacet insula Ponto
Alas Idæus ubi, & gentis cunabula nostræ.

Nn 3

Gentium

*Centum Vrbes habitant magnas, uberrima regna:
Maximus unde Pater (si rite audita recordor)
Teucrus Rhœteas primum est aducllus ad aras:
Optauitque locum regno. Nondum Ilum & arces Pergameæ steterant: habitabant vallibus imis.
Hinc Mater cultrix Cybele, Corybantique æra, Idæumque nemus.*

In the maine Sea the Ile of Crete doth lie:
Whence Ioue was borne, thence is our progenie.
There is mount Ida: there in fruitfull Land
An hundred great and goodly Cities stand.
Thence (if I follow not mistaken fame)
Tencer the eldest of our grand-fires came To the Rhœtean shores: and reigned there Ere yet faire Ilion was built, and ere
The Towers of Troy: their dwelling place they fought
In lowest vales. Hence Cybel's rites were bought:
Hence Corybantian Cymbals did remoue:
And hence the name of our Idæan groue.

Thus it seemeth by Virgil, who followed surely good authority, that Tencer first gaue name to that Countrey, wherein he reigned ere Troy was built by Dardanus: of which Dardanus in the same booke he speaks thus:

*Est locus, Hesperiam Græci cognomine dicunt:
Terra antiqua, potens armis atque ubere gleba,
OEnotrii coluere viri; nunc fama minores
Italiam dixisse, ducis de nomine gentem.
Hæ nobis propriæ sedes: hinc Dardanus ortus: Iasusque Pater, genus a quo principe nostrum.*

Hesperia the Græcians call the place:
An ancient fruitfull Land, a warlike race,
OEnotrians held it; now the later progenie
Giues it their Captaines name, and calls it Italie;
This seate belongs to vs, hence Dardanus,
Hence came the Author of our stock, Iasius.

Alto Amid. 1.

*Atque equidem memini (fama est obscurior annis) Aruncos ita ferre senes, hic ortus viæ agris
Dardanus Idæas Phrygiæ penetravit ad vrbes, Threiciæque Sinum, quæ nunc Samothracia fertur.
Hinc illum Coryti Tyrrhæna ab sede profectum, Auræa nunc folio stellantis regia cæli Accipit, &c.*

Some old Aruncans, I remember well,
(Though time haue made the same obscure) would tell
Of Dardanus, how borne in Italie:
From hence he into Phrygia did flie.
And leauing Tuscaine (where he earst had place)
With Corytus did faile to Samothrace,
But now inthronized he sits on high,
In golden Palace of the starrie skie.

But contrary to this, and so many Authors, approuing and confirming it, Reineccius thinks that these names, Troes, Teucris, and Thracæ, are deriued from Tiras or Thiras the son of Iaphet: and that the Dardaniæns, Myrsæns, & Ascanians, mixt with the Troians, were were Germane Nations, descended from Askenaz, the sonne of Gomer: of whom the Countrie, Lake, and river of Ascanius in Asia tooke name. That Askenaz gaue name to those places and people, it is not vnlikely: neither is it vnlikely, that the Ascanii, Dardani, and many others, did in after-times passe into Europe: that the name of Teucer came of Tiras, the coniecture is somewhat hard. Concerning Teucer, whereas Halicarnassens makes him an Athenian, I finde none that follow him in the same opinion. Virgil (as is before shewed) reporteth him to be of Crete, whose authoritie is the more to be regarded, because hee had good meanes to finde the truth, which it is probable that hee carefully sought, and in this did follow, seeing it no way concerned Augustus (whom other-whiles hee did flatter) whether Teucer were of Crete or no. Reineccius doth rather embrace the opinion of Diodorus, and others that thinke him a Phrygian, by which report he was the Sonne of Scamander and Ida, Lord of the Countrey, not founder of the Citie; and his Daughter or Neece hatia was the second wife of Dardanus, founder of Troy. Reineccius further thinks that Atlas reigned in Samothracia, and gaue his daughter Electra to Corytus, or Coritus: and that these were Parents to Chryse, first wife to Dardanus. Virgil holds otherwise, and the common Tradition of Poets makes Dardanus the sonne of Electra by Jupiter, which Electra was the daughter of Atlas, and wife to Coritus King of Hetruria, to whom she bare Iasius. Annus out of his Herodotus findes the name of Cambolaſcon, to whom he giues the addition of Corytus, as a Title of dignitie, making him Father of Dardanus and Iasius; and further telling vs very particularly of the faction betweene these Brethren, which grew to such heate, that finally Dardanus killed his Brother, and thereupon fled into Samothrace. The obscurity of the historie giues leaue to Annus of saying what he list. I, that loue not to vse such libertie, will forbear to determine any thing herein. But if Dardanus were the Sonne of Jupiter, it must haue beene of some elder Jupiter than the Father of those that liued about the Warre of Troy. So it is likewise probable that Atlas the Father of Electra was rather an Italian than an African, which also is the opinion of Boccace. For (as hath often been said) there were many Jupiters, and many of almost euery name of Gods; but it was the custome to ascribe to some one the aqs of the rest, with all belonging to them. Therefore I will not greatly trouble my self with making any narrow search into these fabulous antiquities, but set down the Pedigree according to the generall fame; allowing to Teucer such Parents as Diodorus giues, because others giue him none, and carrying the line of Dardanus in manner following.

Many by valour haue deseru'd renowne
 Ere Agamemnon: yet lie all opprest
 Vnder long night, vnwept for, and vnknowne:
 For with no sacred Poet were they blest.

Yet so it is, that whilest these writters haue with strange fables, or (to speake the best of them) with Allegories farre strained, gone about to enlarge the commendations of those noble vndertakers: they haue both drawne into suspicion that great vertue which they sought to adorne, & filled after-ages with almost as much ignorance of the Historie, as admiration of the persons. Wherefore it is expedient that we seeke for the knowledge of such actions, in Histories; learning their qualities who did manage them, of Poets, in whose workes are both profit and delight: yet small profit to those which are delighted otherwise; but such as can interpret their fables, or separate them from the naked truth, shall finde matter in Poems, not vnworthy to be regarded of Historians. For those things excepted which are gathered out of Homer, there is very little, and not without much disagreement of Authors, written of this great war. All writers consent with Homer, that the rape of Helen by Paris the son of Priamus, was the cause of taking arms: but how he was hereunto emboldned, it is doubtfull.

§. II.

Of the Rape of Helen: and strength of both sides for the warre.

Erodotos fetcheth the cause of this rape from very farre; saying, That whereas the Phœnicians had rauished Io, and carried her into Egypt, the Greekes to be reuenged on the Barbarians, did first rauish Europa, whom they brought out of Phœnicia into Creta, and afterward Medea, whom they fetcht from Calchos, denying to restore her to her father, till such time as they might be satisfied for the rape of Io. By these deedes of the Greekes, Paris (as the same Herodotus affirmes) was emboldened to doe the like, not fearing such reuenge as ensued. But all this narration seemes frivolous. For what had the King of Calchos to doe with the iniurie of the Phœnicians? Or how could the Greekes, as in reuenge of Io, pleade any quarrell against him, that neuer had heard the name of Phœnicians: Thucydides a writer of vnquestionable sinceritie, maketh it plain, that the name of Barbarians was not vled at all in Homers time, which was long after the warre of Troy; and that the Greekes themselves were not then called all by one name, Hellenes, as afterwards. So that it were vnreasonable to thinke, that they should haue sought reuenge vpon all Nations, as barbarous, for the iniurie received by one: or that all people else should haue esteemed of the Greekes, as of a people opposed to all the world; and that euen then when as the Greekes had not yet one common name among themselves. Others with more probabilitie say, that the rape of Helen was to procure the redeliuery of Hesione, King Priamus his sister, taken formerly by Hercules, and giuen to Telamon. This may haue bene true. For Telamon (as it seemes) was a cruel man, seeing his owne sonne Tener durst not come in his sight, after the warre of Troy, but fled into Cyprus, onely because his brother Aiax (which Tener could not remedie) had slaine himselfe. Yet, were it so, that Hesione was ill intreated by Telamon, it was not therefore likely, that Priamus her brother would seeke to take her from her husband, with whom she had liued about thirtie yeeres, and to whom shee had borne children which were to succeed in his Dominion. Whereupon I thinke that Paris had no regard either to the rape of Europa, Medea, or Hesione: but was merely incited by Venus, that is, by his lust, to doe that which in those dayes was very common. For not onely Greeks from Barbarians, and Barbarians from Greeks, as Herodotus discourseth, but all people were accustomed to steale women and cattell, if they could by strong hand or power get them; and hauing stollen them, either to sell them away in some farre Countrey, or keepe them to their owne vse. So did Theseus, and Pirithous attempt Proserpina; and so did Theseus (long before Paris) rauish Helen. And these practices, as it appears in Thucydides, were so common, that none durst inhabite neere vnto the Sea, for feare of pyracie, which was accounted a trade of life no lesse lawfull than merchandise: wherefore Tyndareus the father of Helen, considering the beauty of his daughter, and the rape which Theseus had made, caused all her wooers, who were most of the principall men in Greece, to binde themselves by solemne oath, that if she were taken from her husband, they should with all their might helpe to recouer her. This done, he gaue free choyce of a husband to his daughter, who chose Menelaus, brother to Agamemnon. So the cause which drew the Greekes vnto Troy in reuenge of Helen's rape, was partly the oath which so many Princes had made vnto her father Tyndareus. Hereunto the great power of Agamemnon was not a little helping; for Agamemnon, besides his great Dominions in Peloponnesus, was Lord of many Ilands: he was also rich in money; and therefore the Arcadians were well contented to follow his pay, whom hee embarked for Troy in his owne ships, which were more than any other of the Greeke Princes brought to that expedition.

Thus did all Greece, either as bound by oath, or led by reputation and power of the two brethren, Agamemnon and Menelaus; or desirous to partake of the profit and honour in that great enterprise; take armes against the Troians. The Greekes Fleet was (by Homers account) 1200. sayle, or thereabouts; but the vessels were not great: for it was not then the manner to build ships with deckes; onely they vled, as Thucydides saith) small ships, meet for robbing on the Sea; the least of which carried fiftie men, the greatest 120. euery man (except the Captaines) being both a Marriner and a Souldier. By this proportion it appeares that the Grecian army consisted of 100000 men, or thereabout. This was the greatest armie that euer was raised out of Greece: and the greatnes of this armie doth well declare the strength and power of Troy, which then whole yeeres did stand out against such forces: yet were the Troians which inhabited the Citie, not the tenth part of this number, as Agamemnon said in the second of Homers Iliads; but their followers and aydes were very many and strong. For all Phrygia, Lycia, Mysia, and the greatest part of Asia the lesse, tooke part with the Troians. The Amazons also brought them succour. And Rhesus out of Thrace, and Memnon out of Assyria (though some thinke, out of Ethiopia) came to their defence.

§. III.

Of the Grecians journey, and Embassage to Troy, and of Helenas being detained in Egypt; and of the Sacrificing of Iphigenia.

Herefore the Greekes vnwilling to come to triall of armes, if things might be compounded by treaty, sent Menelaus and Vlysses Embassadors to Troy, who demanded Helen & the goods were taken with her out of Menelaus his house. What answer the Troians made hereunto it is vncertaine. Herodotus from the report of the Egyptian Priests, makes it very probable, that Helen was taken from Paris before his returne to Troy. The summe of his discourse is this.

Paris in his returne with Helen, being driuen by foule weather vnto the coast of Egypt, was accused for the rape of Helen by some bondmen of his, that had taken Sanctuary. Proteus then King of Egypt, finding the accusation true by examination, detained Helen, and the goods taken with her; till her husband should require them: dismissing Paris without further punishment, because he was a stranger. When therefore the Greekes demanding Helen had answer, that she was in Egypt, they thought themselves deluded, and thereupon made the warre, which ended with the ruine of Troy. But when after the Citie taken, they perceiued indeed she had not bene there, they returned home, sending Menelaus to aske his wife of Proteus. Homer and the whole Nation of Poets (except Enripides) vary from this Historie, thinking it a matter more magnificent and more graceful to their Poems, for the retaining of a faire Lady, than that they endured all by force, because it lay not in their power to redeliuer her. Yet in the fourth of his Odysseys, Homer speakes of Menelaus his being in Egypt, before he returned home to Sparta; which voyage it were not easily beleued, that he made for pleasure: and if he were driuen thither by contrary windes, much more may wee thinke that Paris was likely to haue bene driuen thither by foule weather. For Paris immediately vpon the rape committed, was enforced to flye, taking such windes as he could get, and rather enduring any storme, than to commit himselfe to any Haue in the Greekes seas: whereas Menelaus might haue put into any Port in Greece, and there haue remained with good entertainment, vntill such time as the winde had come about, and serued for his Navigation.

One great argument Hierodotus brings to confirme the saying of the Egyptian Priests, which is, that if Helen had bene at Troy, it had bene vter madnesse for Triamus to see so many miseries befall him, during the warre, and so many of his sonnes slaine for the pleasure of one, who neither was heire to the Kingdome (for Heclor was elder) nor equall in vertue to many of the rest. Besides, it may seeme that Lucian spake not more pleasantly than truly, when he said that Helen, at the war of Troy, was almost as old as Queene Heclor, considering that she had beene ransomed by Theseus the companion of Hercules, who took Troy when Priamus was very young, and considering further, that she was sister to Castor and Pollux (she and Pollux being said by some to haue bene twins) who sailed with the Argonautes, hauing Telamon the father of Ajax in their company before the time that Hecione was taken, on whom Telamon begat Ajax, that was a principall Commander in the Troian warre. But whether it were so that the Troians could not, or would not restore Helen, so it was that the Embassadors returned ill contented, and not very well intreated; for there wanted not some that aduised to haue them slaine. The Greekes hereupon incensed, made all haste towards Troy; at which time Calchas (whom some say to haue bin a runnagate Troian, though no such thing be found in Homer) filled the Captaines & all the Hoaste with many troublesome answers & diuinations. For he would haue *Agamemnon*s daughter sacrificed to appease Diana, whose anger, he said, withstood their passage. Whether the young Lady were sacrificed, or whether (as some write) the goddess was contented with a Hinde, it is not needfull here to be disputed of. Sure it is, that the malice of the diuell, which awaits for all opportunities, is neuer more importunate, than where mens ignorance is most. Calchas also told the Greekes, that the taking of Troy was impossible, till some fatall impediments were remoued: and that till ten yeeres were past, the towne should hold out against them. All which notwithstanding, the Greekes proceeded in their enterprise, vnder the command of Agamemnon, who was accompanied with his brother Menelaus; Achilles the most valiant of all the Greekes, his friend Patroclus, and his Tutor Phonix; Ajax and Teucer, the sons of Telamon; Idomeneus, and his companion Meriones; Nestor and his sonnes Antilechus, and Thrasymedes; Vlysses, Aeneas the sonne of Petereus, Captaine of the Athenians; Diomedes the son of Tydeus, a man of singular courage; the wife and learned Palamedes; Ascalaphus and Ialmenus, the sons of Mars, who had sailed with the Argonautes; Philoctetes also the sonne of Peon, who had the arrowes of Hercules, without which Calchas said, that the Citie could not be taken; Ajax the sonne of Oileus; Peneleus, Tboas, Eumelus, Tysandrus, Euripilus, Athamas, Sthenelus, Tlepolemus the son of Hercules; Podalirius, and Maechon, the sonnes of Asclepius; Epheus, who is said to haue made the wooden horse, by which the towne was taken; and Protesilans, who first leapt on shore, neglecting the Oracle that threatned death to him that landed first.

§. IV.

Of the Acts of the Grecians at the siege.

These, and many other of lesse note, arriuing at Troy, found such sharpe entertainment, as might easily perswade them to thinke that the warre would be more than one yeeres worke. For in the first encounter, they lost Protesilans, whom Heclor slew, & many other, without any great harme done to the Troians: save only that by their numbers of men, they won ground enough to incampe themselves in, as appeareth in Theydides. The principall impediment which the Greekes found, was want of victuals, which grew vpon them by reason of their multitude, and the finalnesse of their vessels, wherein they could not carry necessaries for such an armie. Hereupon they were compelled to send some part of their men; to labour the grounds in Cherroneesse: others to rob vpon the Sea for the reliefe of the Campe. Thus was the war protracted nine whole yeeres, & either nothing done, or if any skirmishes were, yet could the towne recieve little losse by them, hauing equall numbers to maintaine the field against such Greekes as continued the siege, and a more safe retreat if the enimie got the better.

Wherefore Onid saith, That from the first yeere, till the tenth, there was no fighting at all; & Heraclides commendes as very credible, the report of Hierodotus; That the Greekes did not lye before Troy the first nine yeeres: but onely did beare vp & down the seas

exercising their men, and enriching themselves; and so by wasting the enemies Countrey did block up the towne, vntill the fatal time drew nere when it should be subuerb'd.

This is confirmed by the lequition which Priamus made, when the Greeke Princes came into the field, the tenth yeere; for he knew none of them; and therefore sitting vpon an high tower (as Homer tels) hee learned their names of Helen; which though it is like to be a fiction, yet could it not at all haue been supposed that hee should be ignorant of them, if they had shewed themselves before the towne so many yeeres together. Betweene these relations of Theydides and Hierodotus, the difference is not much; the one saying, that a few of the Greekes remained in the Camp before Troy, whilst the rest made purveyance by land and by sea: the other, that the whole armie did spend the time in wasting the sea-coasts. Neither doe the Poets greatly disagree from these authors: for they make report of many townes and Ilands wasted, and the people carried into Captiuitie; in which actions Achilles was employed, whom the armie could not well, nor would haue spared, if any seruice of importance had bene to be performed before the Citie. Howsoever it was, this is agreed by generall consent, that in the beginning of that Summer, in which Troy was taken, great booties were brought into the Campe, and a great pestilence arose among the Greekes: which Homer saith, that Apollo sent in reuenge of his Priests daughter, whom Agamemnon had refused to let goe, for any rancome: but Heraclides interpreting the place, saith, that by Apollo was meant the Sunne, who rayed pestilence Fogs, by which the armie was infected, being lodged in a moorish piece of ground, And it might well be that the campe was ouer-pestered with those, who had been abroad, and now were lodged all close together: hauing also grounded their ships within the fortifications.

About the same time arose much contention betwene Agamemnon and Achilles about the bootie, whereof Agamemnon, as Generall, hauing first chosen for his part a captiue woman, and Achilles in the second place chosen for himselfe another, then Ajax, Vlysses, and so the rest of the chiefe Captaines in order: When the Soothsayer Calchas had willed that *Agamemnon*s woman should be restored to her father *Apollo*s Priest, that so the Pestilence might cease, then did Agamemnon greatly rage, and say, that hee alone would not lose his part of the spoyle, but would either take that which had bene giuen to Achilles, or that which had fallen to Ajax, or to Vlysses. Hereupon Achilles desired him, but was faine to suffer all patiently, as not able to hold his Concubine by strong hand, nor to reuenge her losse otherwise than by refusing to fight, or to send forth his Captaines. But the Greekes, encouraged by their Captaines, presented themselves before the Citie without him and his troups.

The Troians were now relieued with great succours, all the neighbour Countries hauing sent them aide: partly drawne to that warre by their Commanders, who assisted Priamus for money, wherewith hee abounded when the warre began (as appeares by his words in Homer), or for loue of himselfe and his sonnes, or hope of marriage with some of his many and faire daughters, partly also (as we may well ghesse) incited by the wrongs receiued of the Greekes, when they wasted the Countries adioyning vnto Troy. So that when Heclor issued out of the towne, hee was little inferior to his enemies in numbers of men, or qualitie of their Leaders. The principall Captaines in the Troian armie, were Heclor, Paris, Deiphobus, Helenus, and the other sonnes of Priamus: Aeneas, Antenor, and his sonnes, Polydamas, Sarpedon, Glaukus, Asius, and the sonnes of Panthus, besides Rhesus, who was slaine the first night of his arriuall; Memnon, Queene Penthesilea, and others who came towards the end of the warre. Betweene these and the Greekes were many battels fought: the greatest of which were, that at the tombe of King Ilus vpon the Plaine: and another at the very trenches of the Campe, wherein Heclor brake through the fortifications of the Greekes, and began to fire their ships; at which time Ajax, the sonne of Telamon with his brother Teucer, were in a manner the onely men of note that remaining vnwounded, made head against Heclor, when the state of the Greekes was almost desperate.

Another battell (for so antiquitie calls it) or rather the same renewed, was fought by Patroclus, who hauing obtained leaue, drew forth Achilles troups, relieuing the weary Greekes with a fresh supply. Agamemnon, Diomedes, Vlysses, and the rest of the Princes, though sore wounded, yet were driuen to put on armour, and with helpe of Patroclus, repelled

One great argument Herodotus brings to confirme the saying of the Egyptian Priests, which is, that if Helen had bene at Troy, it had bene vntill madnesse for Priamus to see so many miseries befall him, during the warre, and so many of his sonnes slaine for the pleasure of one, who neither was heire to the Kingdome (for Hektor was elder) nor equall in vertue to many of the rest. Besides, it may seeme that Lucian spake not more pleasantly than truly, when he said that Helen, at the war of Troy, was almost as old as Queene Hecuba, considering that she had been rauished by Theſeus, the companion of Hercules, who tooke Troy when Priamus was very young; and considering further, that she was sister to Caſtor and Pollux (she and Pollux being said by some to haue bene twins) who sailed with the Argonautes, hauing Telamon the father of Aiax in their company before the time that Hecione was taken; on whom Telamon begat Aiax, that was a principall Commander in the Troian warre. But whether it were so that the Troians could not, or would not restore Helen, so it was that the Emballadors returned ill contented, and not very well intreated; for there wanted not some that aduised to haue them slaine. The Greekes hereupon incensed, made all haste towards Troy; at which time Calchas (whom some say to haue bin a runnagate Troian, though no such thing be found in Homer) filled the Captaines & all the Hoaste with many troublesome answers & diuinations. For he would haue *Agamemnon*s daughter sacrificed to appease Diana, whose anger, he said, withstood their passage. Whether the young Lady were sacrificed, or whether (as some write) the gods esse was contented with a Hinde, is not needfull here to be disputed of. Sure it is, that the malice of the diuell, which awaits for all opportunities, is neuer more importunate, than where mens ignorance is most. Calchas also told the Greekes, that the taking of Troy was impossible, till some fatal impediments were remoued: and that till ten yeeres were past, the towne should hold out against them. All which notwithstanding, the Greekes proceeded in their enterprise, vnder the command of Agamemnon, who was accompanied with his brother Menelaus; Achilles the most valiant of all the Greekes, his friend Patroclus, and his Tutor Phonix; Aiax and Teucer, the sons of Telamon; Iamonus, and his companion Meriones; Nestor, and his sonnes Antilochus, and Thrasymedes; Phyltes; Meneſtheus the sonne of Petreus, Captaine of the Athenians; Dionedes the son of Tydeus, a man of singular courage; the wife and learned Palamedes; Ascalaphus and Ialmenus, the sons of Mars, who had sailed with the Argonautes; Philoctetes also the sonne of Paan, who had the arrowes of Hercules, without which Calchas said, that the Citie could not be taken; Aiax the sonne of Oileus; Penelopeus; Thoas; Ennelus; Tyſandrus; Euripilus; Athamas; Sthenelus; Tlepolemus the son of Hercules; Podalyrius, and Maſon, the sonnes of Ascalapins; Epens, who is said to haue made the wooden horse, by which the towne was taken; and Protesilans, who first leapt on shore, neglecting the Oracle that threatned death to him that landed first.

§. IV.

Of the Ails of the Grecians at the siege.

THESE, and many other of lesse note, arriuing at Troy, found such sharpe entertainment, as might easily perswade them to thinke that the warre would be more than one yeeres worke. For in the first encounter, they lost Protesilans, whom Hektor slew, & many other, without any great harme done to the Troians: save only that by their numbers of men, they won ground enough to incampe themselves in, as appeareth in Thucydides. The principall impediment which the Greekes found, was want of victuals, which grew vpon them by reason of their multitude, and the smallnesse of their vessels, wherein they could not carry necessaries for such an armie. Hereupon they were compelled to send some part of their men, to labour the grounds in Cherroneſſe: others to rob vpon the Sea for the reliefe of the Campe. Thus was the war protracted nine whole yeeres, & either nothing done, or if any skirmishes were, yet could the towne receive little losse by them, hauing equall numbers to maintaine the field against such Greekes as continued the siege, and a more safe retreat if the enemy got the better.

Wherefore Onid saith, That from the first yeere, till the tenth, there was no fighting at all: & Heraclide commendes as very credible, the report of Herodotus; That the Greekes did not lye before Troy the first nine yeeres: but onely did beare vp & down the seas

exerciſing their men, and enriching themselves; and so by waſting the enemies Countrey did blocke up the towne, vntill the fatal time drew neere when it should be subuerbed.

This is confirmed by the enquitie which Priamus made, when the Greeke Princes came into the field, that tenth yeere; for he knew none of them; and therefore sitting vpon an high tower (as Homer tels) hee learned their names of Helen; which though it is like to be a fiction, yet could it not at all haue been supposed that hee should bee ignorant of them, if they had shewed themselves before the towne so many yeeres together. Betwene these relations of Thucydides and Herodotus, the difference is not much; the one saying, that a few of the Greekes remained in the Campe before Troy, whilst the rest made purveyance by land and by sea: the other, that the whole armie did spend the time in waſting the sea-coasts. Neither doe the Poets greatly disagree from these authors: for they make report of many townes and Ilands waſted, and the people carried into Captiuitie; in which actions Achilles was employed, whom the armie could not well, nor would haue spared, if any seruice of importance had bene to be performed before the Citie. Howsoever it was, this is agreed by generall consent, that in the beginning of that Summer, in which Troy was taken, great booties were brought into the Campe, and a great pestilence arose among the Greekes: which Homer saith, that Apollo sent in reuenge of his Priests daughter, whom Agamemnon had refused to let goe, for any ranſome: but Heraclides interpreting the place, saith, that by Apollo was meant the Sunne, who rayed pestilence fogs, by which the armie was infected, being lodged in a moorish piece of ground. And it might well bee that the campe was ouer-peſtered with those, who had bene abroad, and now were lodged all cloſe together: hauing also grounded their ships within the fortifications.

About the same time arose much contention betwene Agamemnon and Achilles about the bootie, whereof Agamemnon, as Generall, hauing first chosen for his part a captiue woman, and Achilles in the second place chosen for himselfe another, then Aiax, Phyltes, and so the rest of the chiefe Captaines in order: When the Soothlayer Calchas had willed that *Agamemnon*s woman should be restored to her father *Apollo*s Priest, that so the Pestilence might cease, then did Agamemnon greatly rage, and say, that hee alone would not lose his part of the spoyle, but would either take that which had bene given to Achilles, or that which had fallen to Aiax, or to Phyltes. Hereupon Achilles deſied him, but was faine to suffer all patiently, as not able to hold his Concubine by strong hand, nor to reuenge her losse otherwise than by refusing to fight, or to send forth his Capitaines. But the Greekes, encouraged by their Captaines, presented themselves before the Citie without him and his troups.

The Troians were now relieued with great succours, all the neighbour Countries hauing sent them aide: partly drawne to that warre by their Commanders, who assisted Priamus for money, wherewith hee abounded when the warre began (as appeares 40 by his words in Homer), or for loue of himselfe and his sonnes, or hope of marriage with some of his many and faire daughters; partly also (as we may well ghesse) incited by the wrongs receiued of the Greekes, when they waſted the Countries adioyning vnto Troy. So that when Hektor issued out of the towne, hee was little inferiour to his enemies in numbers of men, or qualitie of their Leaders. The principall Captaines in the Troian armie, were Hektor, Paris, Deiphobus, Helenus, and the other sonnes of Priamus: Aeneas, Antenor, and his sonnes, Polydamas, Sarpedom, Glaucus, Asius, and the sonnes of Panthus, besides Rhesus, who was slaine the first night of his arriual; Memnon; Queene Penthesilea, and others who came towards the end of the warre. Betwene these and the Greekes were many batels fought: the greatest of which were, that at the tombe of King Ilus vpon 50 the Plaine: and another at the very trenches of the Campe, wherein Hektor brake through the fortifications of the Greekes, and began to fire their ships; at which time Aiax, the sonne of Telamon with his brother Teucer, were in a manner the onely men of note that remaining vnwounded, made head against Hektor, when the state of the Greekes was almost desperate.

Another battell (for so antiquitie calls it) or rather the same renewed, was fought by Patroclus, who hauing obtained leave, drew forth Achilles troups, relieuing the weary Greekes with a fresh supply. Agamemnon, Dionedes, Phyltes, and the rest of the Princes, though sore wounded, yet were driuen to put on armour, and with helpe of Patroclus, 00 repelled repelled the Troians very hardly. For in that fight Patroclus was lost, and his body, with much contention recovered by his friends, was brought backe into the Campe: their mour of Achilles which he had put on, being torne from him by Hector. It was the manner of those warres, hauing slaine a man, to strip him and hale away his body, nor restoring it without ranfome, if hee were one of make. Of the vulgar, little reckoning was made: for they fought all on foot, slightly armed, and commonly followed the successe of their Capitaines; who rode not vpon horses, but in Chariots, drawne by two or three horses, which were guided by some trustie followers of theirs, which draue vp and downe the field, as they were directed by the Capitaines, who by the swiftnesse of their horses presenting themselves where neede required, threw first their Iauelins, and then alighting, fought on foot, with swords and batel-axes, retiring into the ranks of footmen, or else returning to their Chariots when they found cause, and so began againe with a new dart as they could get it, if their old were lost, or broken. Their armes defensive were helmets, breast-plates, bootes of brasse, or other metall, and shields commonly of leather placed ouer. The offensive were swords and batel-axes at hand; and stones, arrowes or darts when they fought at any distance. The vse of their Chariots (besides the swiftnesse) was to keepe them from wearinesse, whereto the leaders were much subiect, because of their armour, which the strongest and stoutest ware heauiest: also that from them they might throw their Iauelins downewards, with the more violence. Of which weapon I find not that any carried more than one or two into the field: wherefore they were often driuen to returne to their tents for a new one when the old was gone. Likewise of armours they had little change or none; euery man (speaking of the chiefe) carried his owne compleat, of which if any piece were lost or broken, he was driuen to repaire it with the like, if he had any fitting, taken from some Capitaine whom he had slaine, and stripped: or else to borrow of them that had by such meanes gotten some to spare. Whereas therefore Achilles had lost his armour which Hector (as is laid before) had taken from the body of Patroclus, he was faine to await the making of new, ere hee could enter the fight: whereof he became very desirous, that he might reuenge the death of Patroclus his deare friend.

At this time Agamemnon reconciled himselfe vnto Achilles, not onely restoring his concubine Briseis, but giuing him very great gifts, and excusing former matters as well as he might. In the next battell Achilles did so behaue himselfe, that hee did not onely put the Troians to the worst, but also slew the valiant Hector, whom (if Homer may beleeued) he chased three times about the wals of Troy. But great question may be made of Homer's truth in this narration. For it is not likely that Hector would stay alone without the Citie (as Homer doth report of him) when all the Troians, were fled into it: nor that he could leape ouer the ruers of Xanthus and Simois, as hee must haue done in that fight: nor that the Troians perceiving Hector in such an extremitie, would haue forborne to open some of their gates and let him in. But this is reported onely to grace Achilles, who hauing (by what meanes soeuer) slaine the noble Hector, did not onely carrie away his dead body, as the custome then was, but boring holes in his feet, and thrusting leatherne thongs into them, tyed him to his Chariot, and dragging him shamefully about the field, selling the dead body to his father Priamus for a very great ranfome. But his cruelty and couetousnesse were not long vnreunged; for he was shortly after slaine with an arrow by Paris, as Homer sayes, in the Scæan Gate; or as others, in the Temple of Apollo, whither he came to haue married Polyxena the daughter of Priamus, with whom he was too farre in loue, hauing slaine so many of her brethren; and his body was ranfomed (as Eucrophon saith) at the selfe same rate that Hectors was by him sold for. Not long after this, Penthesilea Queene of the Amazons arrived at Troy, who after some proofe giuen of her valour, was slaine by Pyrhus the sonne of Achilles.

§. V.

Of the taking of Troy, the wooden Horse, the Booke of Dares and Dyctis, the Colonies of the reliques of Troy.

nally, after the death of many worthy persons on each side, the Citie was taken by night, as all Writers agree: but whether by the treason of Aeneas and Antenor; or by a wooden Horse, as the Poets, and common fame (which

(which followed the Poets) haue deliuered, it is vncertaine. Some writeth that vpon one of the gates of Troy, called Scæa, was the image of a horse, and that the Greekes entring by that gate, gaue occasion to the report, that the Citie was taken by an artificall horse. It may well be that with some wooden engine, which they called an Horse, they either did batter the wals, as the Romanes in after-times vsed to do with the Rammes; or scaled the wals vpon the sudden, and so tooke the Citie. As for the hiding of men in the hollow body of a wooden horse, it had been a desperate aduenture, and serving to no purpose. For either the Troians might haue perceiued the deceit, and slaine all those Princes of Greece, that were inclosed in it (which also by such as maintaine this report they are said to haue thought vpon); or they might haue left it a few dayes without the Citie (for it was likely, that they should the very first day both conclude vpon the bringing it into the towne, and breake downe their wals vpon the sudden to doe it:) by which meanes they who were shut into it, must haue perished for hunger, if they had not by lying forth vnseasonably discovered the inuention. Whereas further it is said, that this horse was so high and great, that it could not bee brought into the towne through any of the gates, and that therefore the Troians were faine to pull downe a part of their wall to make way for it, through which breache the Greekes did afterwards enter: it is beere-by manifest, that the inclosing of so many principall men was altogether needlesse, considering that without their helpe there was way sufficient for the armie, so that the surprising of any gate by them was now to no purpose.

Iohn Baptista Gramay in his Historie of Asia, discoursing of this warre, saith that the Greekes did both batter the wals with a wooden engine, and were also let into the Citie by Antenor, at the Scæan gate: the rownemen sleeping and drinking without feare or care, because the fleet of the Grecians had hoisted saile, and was gone the day before to the Ile of Tenedos, thereby to bring the Troians into security. That the City was betrayed, the books of Dares & Dyctis mult proue, which whether we now haue the same that were by them written, it may be suspected; for surely they who haue made mention of these writers in ancient times, would not as they did, haue followed the reports of Homer and others quite contradictorie in most points to these two authors, without once taking notice of the opposition, which they hauing serued in that warre made against the common report: had it not bene that either those bookes were euen in those times thought frivoulous; or else contained no such repugnancie to the other authors as now is found in them.

Also concerning the number of men slaine in this warre, which Dares and Dyctis say to haue bene about 600000. on the Trojan side, and more than 800000. of the Greekes, it is a report meetely fabulous; for as much as the whole Fleet of the Greekes was reckoned by Homer, who extolled their armie and decedes as much as hee could, to be somewhat lesse than 1200. saile, and the armie therein transported ouer the Greeke seas, not much about 100000. men, according to the rate formerly mentioned. But it is the common fashion of men to extoll the deeds of their Ancients: for which cause both Homer magnified the Capitaines of the Greekes that serued in the warre, and Virgil with others were as diligent in commending and extolling the Troians and their Citie, from which the Romanes descended. Yea, the Athenians long after in the warre which Xerxes the Persian King made against all Greece, did not forbear to vaunt of the great cunning which Menellus the son of Peleus had shewed, in marshalling the Grecian army before Troy: wherupon, as if it had bin a matter of much consequence, they were so proud, that they refused to yeeld vnto Gelon King of almost all Sicily, the Admirallie of their Seas, notwithstanding that hee promised to bring 200. good fighting ships, and 30000. men for their defence.

The like vanitie possessed many other Cities of Greece, and many Nations in these parts of the world, which haue striven to bring their descent from some of the Princes, that warred at Troy: all difficulties or vnlikelihoods in such their Pedigree notwithstanding. But those Nations which indeede, or in most probabilitie came of the Troians, were the Albanes in Italy; and from them the Romans, brought into that Countrey by Aeneas: the Venetians first seated in Padua, and the Countrey adioyning by Antenor: the Chaonians planted in Epirus by Helanus, the sonne of King Priamus. To which Helanicus addeth, that the posteritie of Hector did resemble such of the Troians as were left, and reigned ouer them about Troy.

§. VI.

Of the distresses and dispersions of the Greekes returning from Troy.

Concerning the Greekes, they tasted as much miserie as they had brought vpon the Troians. For Thucydides notes, that by reason of their long abode at the siege, they found many alterations when they returned: so that many were driven by their borderers from their ancient sears: many were expelled their Countries by faction: some were slaine anon after their arriual: others were debarred from the So- ueraigntie among the people, by such as had stayed at home. The cause of all which may seeme to haue bene the dispersion of the Armie, which, weakened much by the calamities of that long warre, was of little force to repell iniuries, being diuided into so many pieces vnder seuerall Commanders, nor very well agreeing. For (besides other quarrels arising vpon the diuision of the bootie, and the like occasions) at the time when they should haue set saile, Agamemnon and his brother fell out, the one being desirous to depart immediately, the other to stay and performe some sacrifices to Minerua. Hereupon they fell to hot words, halfe the fleet remaining with Agamemnon, the rest of them sailed to the Ile of Tenedos; where when they arriued, they could not agree among themselves, but some returned backe to Agamemnon; others were dispersed, each holding his owne course. But the whole fleet was sore vexed with tempests: for Pallas (as Homer saith) would not be perswaded in haste.

They who returned safe were Nestor and Pyrrhus, whom Orestes afterwards slew: also Idomeneus and Philoctetes, who neuertheless, as Virgil tells, were driven soone after to seek new seats: Idomeneus among the Salentines, and Philoctetes at Petilia in Italic. Agamemnon likewise returned home, but was forthwith slaine by his wife, and by the adulterer Aegisthus, who for a while after vsurped his Kingdome. Menelaus wandring long vpon the Seas, came into Egypt, either with Helen, or (as may rather seeme) to fetch her. Ulysses, after ten yeares, hauing lost all his company, got home in poore estate, with much adoe recovering the mastership of his own house. All the rest either perished by the way, or were driven into exile, and faine to seek new habitations.

Ajax the sonne of Oileus was drowned; Tener fled into Cyprus; Diomedes to King Danmus, who was Lord of the Iapyges in Apulia; some of the Locrians were driven into Africke, others into Italic, all the last part whereof was called Magna Græcia, by reason of so many Townes which the Greekes were driven to erect vpon that coast. Finally, it appears in Homer, that the Græcian Ladyes, whose husbands had bene at the warre of Troy, were wont to call it, The place where the Greekes suffered miserie, and the vnluckie Citie not to be mentioned. And thus much for Troy, and those that warred there: the ouerthrow of which Citie, as hath bene said, happened in the time of Habdon Iudge of Israel, whom Samson after a variance or Inter regnum for certaine yeares succeeded.

Of Samson, Eli, and Samuel.

§. I.

Of Samson.

2970.

HE birth and acts of Samson are written at large in the 13. 14. 15. and 16. of Judges; and therefore I shall not need to make a repetition thereof. But these things I gather out of that Storie. First, that the Angell of God forbade the wife of Mantab the mother of Samson, to drinke Wine or strong drinke, or to eat any vncleane meate, after she was conceived with childe; because those strong liquors hinder the strength, and as it were wither and shrinke the childe in the mothers wombe. Though this were euen the counsell of God himselfe, and delivered by his Angell, yet it seemeth that many women of this age haue not read, that least will not beleue this precept: the most part forbearing nor drinckes, nor meats, how strong or vncleane fouer, filling themselues with all sorts of wines, and with artificiall drinckes farre more forcible: by reason whereof, so many wretched feeble bodyes are borne into the world, and the races of the able and strong men in effect decayed.

Secondly, it is to be noted, that the Angel of God refused the sacrifice which Manah would haue offered him, commanding him to present it vnto the Lord: and therefore those that professe diuination by the helpe of Angels, to whom also they sacrifice, may assuredly know that they are Diuels who accept thereof, and not good Angels, who receiue no worship that is proper to God.

Thirdly, this Samson was twice betrayed by his wiues, to wit, by their importunitie and deceitfull teares: by the first he lost but a part of his goods: by the second his life. Quem nulla vis superare potuit, voluptas euerit; whom no force could overcome, Voluptas inuasse euerit.

Fourthly, we may note, that he did not in all deliuer Israel from the oppression of the Philistims; though in some sort he reuenged, and defended them: for notwithstanding that he had slaine 30. of them in his first attempt, burnt their Corne in haruett time, and giuen them a great ouerthrow instantly vpon it: yet so much did Israel feare the Philistims, as they assembled 3000. men out of Iuda, to besiege Samson in the rocke or mountaine of Etam, vsing these words: Knowest not thou that the Philistims are Rulers ouer vs, &c. After which they bound him, and deliuered him vnto the Philistims, for feare of their reuenge; though he was no fouer loosened, but hee gaue them another ouerthrow, and slew 1000. with the iawbone of an Asse.

Lastly, being made blinde, and a prisoner by the treason of his wife, hee was content to end his owne life, to bee auenged of his enemies, when hee pulled downe the pillars of the house at the feast whereto they sent for Samson, to deride him; till which time hee bare his affliction with patience: but it was truly said of Seneca: Patientia sepe lesa vertitur in furorē: Patience often wounded is conuerst into furie: neither is it any time so much wounded by paine and losse, as by derision and contumelie.

6. II.

Of Eli, and of the Arke taken; and of Dragons fall, and the sending backe of the Arke.

He storie of Eli the Priest, who succeeded Samson, is written in the beginning of Samuel; who foretold him of the destruction of his house, for the wickednesse of his sonnes, which he suppressed not, neither did he punish them according to their deserts: whole sins were horrible, both in abusing the Sacrifice, and prophaneing and polluting the holy places: though Leui Ben Gerson, to extenuate this filthy offence of forcing the women by the sons of Eli, hath a contrary opinion. In this time therefore it pleased God to cast the Israelites vnder the swords of the Philistims; 40 of whom there perished in the first encounter 4000. and in the second battell 30000. footmen; among whom the sonnes of Eli being slaine, their father (hearing the lamentable successe) by falling from his chaire, brake his necke. Hee was the first that obtained the High Priesthood of the stocke of Ithamar the sonne of Aaron, before whose time it continued successufully in the race of Eleazar the eldest brother of Ithamar: for Eleazar was the first, Eleazer the second, Phineas the sonne of Eleazer the third, Abisai the sonne of Phineas the fourth, his sonne Bacai the fifth, Ozi the sonne of Bacai the sixth, and then Eli, as Iosephus and Lycanus out of diuers Hebrew authors haue conceiued. In the race of Ithamar the Priesthood continued after Eli to the time of Salomon, who cast out Abiathar, and established Sadock and Achimam and their successors. The Arke of God which Israel brought into the field, was in this battell taken by the Philistims. For as David witnesseth, God greatly abhorred Israel, so that hee forsooke the habitation of Shilo: even the Tabernacle where he dwelt among men, and deliuered his power into captiuitie. &c.

Now as it pleased God at this time, that the Arke whereby himselfe was represented, should fall into the hands of the Heathen, for the offences of the Priests and people: so did hee permit the Chaldeans to destroy the Temple built by Salomon; the Romans to ouerthrow the second Temple; and the Turkes to ouerthrow the Christian Churches in Asia and Europe. And had not the Israelites put more confidence in the answer of God, thus he spake; Come and let us go to the Seer: for hee that is now called a Prophet, was in old time called a Seer. And although it pleased God to appeare by his Angels to Moses, as before to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob; yet in the time of Eli, there was no manifest vision; nor that God had altogether with-drawne his grace from Israel: but as the Chaldaean Paraphrast hath it, those revelations before Samuels time, were more clouded and obscure. The places wherein Samuel iudged were Matspa or Mitpa, seated on a hill in Benjamin neere Iuda: also Gilgal, and Bethel, of which wee haue spoken elsewhere.

1 Sam. 12.
See in this booke. 12. S. 1.

The Philistims taking knowledge of the assembly and preparation of Warre at Mitspa in the beginning of Samuels government, gathered their Armie, and marched towards the Citie: at whose approach the Israelites stricken with feare, and with the memorie of their former slaughters and seruitude, besought Samuel to pray to God for them; who was then performing his sacrifice when the Philistims were in view. But God being moued with Samuels prayers (as he was by those of Moses, when Israel fought against the Amalekites at their first entrance into Arabia:) it pleased him with thunder and tempest to disperse and beate downe the Armie of the Philistims, according to the prophetic of Hanna, Samuels Mother, The Lords aduersaries shall be destroyed, and out of heauen shall he thunder upon them, &c. Iosephus affirms, that a part of the Philistims were swallowed with an earthquake: and that Samuel himselfe led the Israelites in the prosecution of their victorie. After which, Samuel erected a Monument in memorie of this happy success, obtained by the miraculous hand of God, which Iosephus called, Lapidem sortis: Samuel, Ebenezer, or the stone of assistance: and then following the opportunitie and advantage of the victorie, the Israelites recovered diuers Cities of their owne formerly lost, and held long in possession of the Philistims, who for a long time after did not offer any inuasion or reuenge. And the better to attend their purposes, and to withstand any of their attempts, the Israelites made peace with the Amorites, or Canaanites, which lay on their backs, and to the North of them, that they might not bee assailed from diuers parts at once; hauing the Philistims towards the West and Sea-coast, the Canaanite, toward the North and East, and the Idumite on the South. The estate being thus settled, Samuel for the ease of the people gaue audience and iudgement in diuers places by turnes, as hath beene elsewhere said.

Of the deliberation to change the government into a Kingdome.

BV T when age now began to ouer-take Samuel, and that hee was not able to vnder-see the burthen of so careful a gouernment, hee put off from himselfe the weight of the affaires on his sonnes, Ishai and Abijah, who iudged the people at Beersheba, a Citie; the very vmoost towards the South of Iudza. And as the place was inconuenient and farre away, so were themselves no lesse removed from the iustice and vertue of their Father: For the thirst of concupiscence, the more it swalloweth, the more it drieth, and desireth, finding taste in nothing but gaine, to recover which, they set the Law at a price, and sold Iustice and Iudgement to the best Chapmen. Which when the Elders of Israel obserued, and saw that Samuel as a naturall man (though a Prophet) could not so well discern the errors of his owne, they prayed him to consent to their change of government, and to make them a King, by whom they might bee iudged as other Nations were, who might also leade them to the Warre and defend them against their enemies. For after the ill and lamentable success which followed the rule of Eli his sonnes, when those of Samuel by their first blossomes promised to yeeld fruite no lesse bitter, they saw no way to put the government from out his race, whom they so much reuerenced, but by the choyce of a King.

1. Platsreb reports of Numa the second King of Rome, that when as hee was sacrificing it was told him that the enemies approached, he nothing dismayed, answered, I go autem sacrificare. 1. Sam. 1. 10.

In anse of so great consequence and alteration, Samuel sought counsaile of him God: which surely hee did not for the establishing of his owne Sonnes; who being as they were, God would not haue approoued his election. Now as it appeares by the Text, this speech or motion displeasing him, hee vied his best arguments to dissuade them; which when hee perceived to be ouer-feeble, hee deliuered vnto them from Gods revelations, the inconueniences and miseries which should befall them. And yet, all which those fore-shewed was not intolerably, but such as hath beene borne, and is still borne by free consent of the Subjects towards their Princes. For first hee maketh them know, that the King will vse their sonnes in his owne seruice to make them his Horse-riery, Chariot-men, and Foot-men; which is not onely not grieuous, but by the Vassalls of all Kingdomes, according to their birth and condition, desired: it being very agreeable to Subjects to see their children to command for the King in his Warres, and to till the ground no lesse properly and profitably, as to those that are thereto bred and brought vp: so are like wise the offices of women seruants to dresse meate, to bake bread, and the like. But whereas immediately it is threatened, Hee will take your fields, and your vineyards, and your best Olinnyards, and giue them to his seruants; with other oppressions; this hath giuen, and giues daily occasion to such as would be ruled by their owne discretion, to affirme that Samuel describeth here vnto them the power of a King, gouerned by his owne affections, and not a King that feareth God. But others vpon further examination confesse this Text false: others so wise, as teaching vs what Subjects ought with patience to beare at their Soueraigns hand. The former opinion is grounded first vpon that place of Deuteronomio, where God fore-sheweth this change of gouernment from Iudges to Kings; and after hee had forbidden many things vnto the Kings, as many wiues, couetousnesse, and the like: hee commaundeth that the Kings which were to raigne ouer Israel, should write the Law in a booke, and cause it to be written: and to shew how greatly the King should honour the Law, he addeth, It shall be with him, and he shall reade therein all the dayes of his life: that he may learne to feare the Lord his God; and so keepe all the words of this Law, and shall do as is written in the Law: that he may prolong his daies in his Kingdome, hee and his Sonnes: But to take away any other mans field, say they, is contrary to the Lawes of God, in the same booke written. For it is said, That which is iust and right shalt thou follow, that thou mayest prosper. Now if it be not permitted to carry away grapes more than thou canst eat out of another mans vineyard, but forbidden by God: it is much lesse lawful to take the vineyard it selfe from the owner, and giue it to another. Neither are the words of the Text (say they) such as doe warrant the Kings of Israel, or make it proper vnto them, to take at will any thing from their vassalls. For it is not said that it shall be lawful for the King, or the King may doe this or that: but it is written, that the King will take your sonnes: and againe; This shall be the manner of the King that shall raigne ouer you. God thereby fore-shewing what power, secured from piety (because it is accountable to God onely) will doe in the future. And hereof we finde the first example in Achab, who took from Naboth both his Vineyard and his life, contrary to the trust which God had put in him, of gouerning well his people. For God commaunded, That his people should bee iudged with righte iudgement. Wherefore, though the King had offered vnto Naboth composition, as a Vineyard of better value, or the worth in money, which hee refused: yet because hee was falsely accused, and vniuilly condemned (though by colour of law,) how grieuously Achab was punished by God, the Scriptures tell vs. Neither was it a plea sufficient for Achab against the all-righteous God, to say that it was done without his consent, and by the Elders of Israel. For God had not then left his people to the Elders, but to the King, who is called a liuing Law, euen as Dauid testifieth of himselfe; Posui me in caput gentium: For this of S. Augustine is very true: Simulata innocentia, non est innocentia: simulata aequitas, non est aequitas: sed dupliciter peccatum in quo est iniquitas & simulatio: Fained innocencie, and fained equitie, are neither the one nor the other: but the faults or offences is shew doubled, in which there is both iniquitie and dissimulation. Such in effect is their disposition, who thinke this place to containe the description of a Tyrant. But the arguments on the contrary side, as they are many and forcible, so are they well knowne to all, being excellently handled in that Princely discourse of The true Law of free Monarchies: which Treatise I may not presume to abridge; much lesse here to insert. Onely thus much I will say, that if practice doe shew the greatness of authority, euen the best Kings of Iuda and Israel were not so tied by any lawes, but that they did whatsoever they pleased in the

the greatest things; and commanded some of their owne Princes, and of their own brethren to be slaine without any triall of law, being sometimes by Prophets reprehended, sometimes not. For though David confessed his offence for the death of Nabab, yet Saul was not killing his elder brother and others, the same was not imputed unto him as my offence.

That the State of Israel should receive this change of government, it was not onely foretold by Moses in Deuteronomy, but percutied by Isaiah in this Scripture: The Scorpions shall not depart from Acha, &c. It was also promised by God to Abraham for a blessing: For it was not onely assured that his issues should innumerable the stars in heaven; but that Kings should proceed of him. Which state seeing it is framed from the pattern of his sole rule, who is Lord of the Uniuersall; and the excellency thereof in respect of all other governments, hath beene by many iudicious men handled and proued, I shall not need to over-paint that which is garnished with better colours already, than I can lay on.

In the time of the Judges every man hath obserued what ciuill Warre Israel had: what outrageous slaughters they committed vpon each other: in what miserable seruitude they liued for many yeares: and when it fared best with them, they did but defend their owne Territories, or recover some parts thereof formerly lost. The Canaanites dwelt in the best valles of the Countrey. The Ammonites held much of Gilead ouer Iordan; the Philistines the Sea-coasts; and the Iebusites Hierusalem it selfe, till Dauids time: all which that King did not onely conquer and establish, but hee mastered and subiected all the neighbour Nations; and Kings, and made them his tributaries and vassals. But whether it were for that the Israelites were moued by those reasons, which allure the most of all Nations to liue vnder a Monarch, or whether by this means they fought to be cleared from the losses of Samuel, they became deafe to all the persuasions and threats which Samuel vsed, insisting vpon this point, that they would haue a king, both to iudge them and defend them: whereunto when Samuel had warrant from God to consent, hee sent every man to his owne Citie and abiding.

§. II. Of the election of Saul.

For that Samuel had dismissed the assembly at Mizpeh, hee forbore the election of a king, till such time as hee was thereto directed by God: who foretold him the day before, that he would present vnto him a man of the Land of Benjamin, whom hee commanded Samuel to anoint. So Samuel went vnto Ramath Sophim, to make a feast for the entertainment of Saul (whom yet he knew not, but knew the truth of Gods promises) and Saul also hauing wandred diuers daies to seeke his fathers Asses, length, by the aduice of his seruant, trauelled towards Ramath, to find a Seer or Prophet, hoping from him to be told what way to take, to finde his beasts. In which journey hee pleased God (who doth many times order the greatest things by the simplest passages, and performe to elect Saul who sought an Ass, and not a kingdom: like as formerly it had pleased him to call Moses while he fed the sheepe of Iethro; and after to make choise of Dauid the youngest of eight sons, and by the Scriptures called a little one, who was then keeping of beasts; and changed his sheeppooke into a Scepter, making him of all other the most victorious king of Iuda and Israel. So John and James were taken from casting their nets, to become Fishers of men, and honoured with the titles of Apostles: a dignitie that died not in the graue, as all worldly Honours doe; but permanent and euermlasting in Gods cuerlasting kingdom.

When Samuel was entered into Ramath, hee prepared a banquet for the king, whom hee expected, and stayed his arriuall at the gate. Not long after came Saul, whom God shewed to Samuel, and made him know that it was the same whom hee had foretold him of, that hee should rule the people of God. Saul finding Samuel in the gate, but knowing him not, though a Prophet and Iudge of Israel, much lesse knowing the Honour which attended him, asked Samuel in what part of the Citie the Seer dwelt. Samuel answered, that himselfe was the man hee sought, and prayed Saul to goe before him to the high place, where Samuel setting him according to his degree, about all that were inuited, conferred with him afterwards of the affaires of the kingdom, and of Gods graces to bee bestowed on him, and the morning following annointed him King of Israel.

After this he told him all that should happen him in the way homeward, that two men should encounter him by Rahels Sepulchre, who should tell him that his Asses were found, and that his Fathers cares were changed from the feare of losing his beasts, to doubt the losse of his Sonne: that he should then meet three other men in the plaine of Tabor; then a company of Prophets: and that hee should be paraker of Gods Spirit, and prophetic with them: and that thereby his condition and disposition should be changed from the vulgar, into that which became a King elected and fauoured by God.

But the Prophets here spoken of, men indued with spirituall gifts, were not of the first and most reuerenced number, who by diuine reuelation foretold things to come, reprehended without feare the errors of their Kings, and wrought miracles; of which number were Moses, Ishai, Samuel, and after them Gad, Nathan, Ahiah, Elias, Elisha, Esaie, Ieremie, and the rest; for these Prophets, saith S. Chrysostome, Omnia tempora percurrunt, praeferita, praesentia, & futura: but they were of those of whom S. Paul speaketh of, 1. Cor. 14. 14. who enriched with spirituall gifts, expounded the Scriptures and the Law.

At Mizpeh Samuel assembled the people, that he might present Saul to them, who as yet knew nothing of his election: neither did Saul acquaint his owne Vncle therewith, when he asked him what had past betwene him and Samuel: for either hee thought his estate not yet assured, or else that it might be dangerous for him to reueale it, till he were confirmed by generall consent. When the Tribes were assembled at Mizpeh, the generall opinion is, that he was chosen by lot. Chimbi thinks by the answer of * Vrim and * Thammim: that is, by the answer of the Priests, wearing that mysticere vpon his breast when he asked counsaile of the Lord. But the casting of lots was not onely much vsed among the Iewes, but by many others, if not by all nations. The Land of promise was divided by lot: God commanded lots to be cast on the two Goates, which should be sacrificed, and which turned off: a figure of Christs suffering, and our deliuerance, for whose garments the Iewes also cast lots. Cicero, Plautus, Pausanias, and others haue remembered diuers sorts of lots, vsed by the Romanes, Grecians, and other Nations: as in the diuision of grounds or honours; and in things to be vnder taken: the two first kinds were called Diuisory; the third, Diuinatory; and vnto one of these three all may be reduced: all which kinds howsoeuer they may seeme chancefull, are yet ordered and directed by God: as in the Proverbs: The lot is cast into the lap, but the whole disposition is of the Lord. And in like sort fell the kingdom of Israel on Saul, not by chance, but by Gods ordinance, who gaue Samuel former knowledge of his election: from which election Saul withdrew himselfe in modestie, as both Iosephus confests it, and as it may be gathered by his former answers to Samuel, when hee acknowledged himselfe the least of the least Tribe. But Samuel enlightened by God, found where Saul was hidden, and brought him among the people, and hee was taller than all the rest by the shoulders. And Samuel made them know that hee was the chosen king of Israel, whereupon all the multitude saluted him King, and prayed for him; yet some there were that enuied his glorie (as in all estates there are such) who did not acknowledge him by offering him presents, as the manner was: of whom Saul, to auoide sedition, took no notice.

§. III. Of the establishing of Saul by his first victorie.

Sooner was Saul placed in the kingdom, but that he receiued knowledge that Nabab king of the Ammonites prepared to besiege Iabes Gilead: which nation since the great ouerthrow giuen them by Iephtha, neuer durst attempt any thing vpon the Israelites, till the beginning of Saul his rule. And although the Ammonites did alwaies attend vpon the aduantage of time, to recouer those Territories which first the Amorites, & then Israel dispossest them of, which they made the ground of their inuasion in Iephtha's time; yet they neuer perfwaded themselves of more aduantage, than at this present. For first, they knew that there were many of the Israelites that did not willingly submit themselves to this new King: secondly, they were remembered that the Philistines had not long before slaine 34000. of their men of Warre: and besides had vsed great care and policie that they should haue no Smithes to make them swords or speares: neither was it long before that of the Bethlemites, and places adioyning, there perished by the hand of God more than 50000. and therefore in these respects, euen occasion it self inuited them to enlarge their Dominions vpon their borderers: Iabes Gilead being one of the neerest. Besides, it may further be coniectured, that the Ammonites were inboldened against Iabes Gilead, in respect of their weaknesse: since the Israelites destroyed a great part of them, for not ioyning with them against the Beniamites; at which time they did not onely slaughter the men and male-children, but tooke from them their young women, and gaue them to the Beniamites: and therefore they were not likely to haue bene increased to any great numbers: and if they had recouered themselves of this great calamitie, yet the Ammonite might flatter himselfe with the opinion, that Israel hauing for long time beene disarmed by the Philistims, was not apt to succour those whom they had so deeply wounded and destroyed. But contrariwise, when the tidings came to Saul of their danger, and that the Ammonites would giue them no other condition to ransom themselves, but by pulling out their right eyes, by which they should be vtterly disabled for the Warre, as elsewhere hath beene spoken: Saul, both to value himselfe in his first yeeres reigne, and because perchance hee was descended of one of those 400. Maids taken from the Gileadites, and giuen to the Beniamites, gaue order to assemble the forces of Israel, hewing a yoke of Oxen into pieces, and sending them by messengers ouer all the coasts, protesting thus: That whosoever came not forth after Saul and after Samuel, so should his Oxen be serued: threatening the people by their goods, and not by their liues at the first. Seuen dayes had Saul to assemble an Armie, by reason that the Gileadites had obtained the respite of these seuen daies to giue Nabab the Ammonite an answer: who, could they haue obtained any reasonable condition, were contented to haue serued themselves from Israel, and to become Vassals and Tributaries to the Heathen. In the meane while Saul assembled the forces which repaired vnto him at Bezer, neere Jordan, that he might readily passe the river, which done, he might in one day with a speedie march arrive at Iabes, vnder the Hills of Gilead.

The armie by Saul led, consisting of three hundred and thirty thousand, hee returned an answer to those of Iabes, that they should assure themselves of succour by the next day at noone. For, as it seemeth, Saul marched away in the latter part of the day, and went on all night; for in the morning watch he surprized the armie of Nabab the Ammonite. And to the end that hee might set on them on all sides, hee diuided his forces into three parts, putting them to the sword vntill the heate of the day, and the wearinesse of Sauls troope inforced them to giue ouer the pursuit. Now the Ammonites were become the more carelesse and secure, in that those of Iabes promised the next morning to render themselves and their Citie to their mercie. After this happie successe, the people were so farre in loue with their new king, that they would haue slaine all those Israelites that murmured against his election, had not himselfe forbidden and resisted their resolutions. Such is the condition of worldly men, as they are violent louers of the prosperous, and base Vassals of the time that flourisheth; and as despitifull and cruell without cause against those, whom any misadventure, or other worldly accident hath throwne downe.

After the armie remoued, Samuel summoned the people to meet at Gilgal, where Saul was now a third time acknowledged, and as some Commenters affirme, anointed king: and here Samuel vsed an exhortation to all the Assembly, containing precepts, and a rehearsal of his owne Iustice, during the beginning of his gouernment to that day. After Saul had now reigned one yeere before he was established in Gilgal, or Gulgala, he strengthened himselfe with a good garn of 3000. chosen men, of which he assigned 1000. to attend on Jonathan his sonne at Gibeah, the Citie of his natiuitie: the rest he kept about his owne person in Micmas, and in the Hill of Bethel.

§. IIII.

Of Sauls disobedience in his proceedings in the warres with the Philistims and Amalekites, which caused his final reiection.

In Jonathan with his small Armie or Regiment that attended him, taking a time of aduantage, surprized a Garrison of Philistims: the same, as some thinke, which Saul past by, when he came from Rama, where hee was first anointed by Samuel, which which they thinke to haue bene Cariah-earim: because a place where the Philistims had a Garrison, 1. Sam. 10. is called the Hill of God, which they vnderstand of Cariah-earim: but Iunius vnderstands this Garrison to haue bene at Gibeah in Benjamin neere Gibba, where Jonathan abode with his thousand followers. Howsoeuer, by this it appeareth that the Philistims held some strong places, both in the times of Samuel, and of Saul, within the Territorie of Israel: and now being greatly enraged by this surprize, they assembled thirty thousand armed Chariots, and fixe thousand Horse, wherewith they inuaded Iudaa, and incamped at Machmas or Mibmas, a Citie of Benjamin, in the direct way from Samaria to Hierusalem, and in the midst of the Land betwene the Sea and Jordan. With this sudden inuasion the Israelites were stricken in so great a feare, as some of them hid themselves in the caues of the mountains; other fledde ouer Jordan into Gad and Gilead: Saul himselfe with some 2000. men of ordinarie, and many other people, staid at Gulgala in Benjamin, not farre from the passage of Iosua when he led Israel ouer Jordan. Heere Saul by Samuels appointment was to attend the coming of Samuel seuen daies: but when the last day was in part spent, and that Saul perceived his forces to diminish greatly, he presumed (as some expound the place 1. Sam. 13. 9.) to exercise the office which appertained not vnto him, and to offer a burnt offering and a peace offering vnto God, contrary to the Ecclesiasticall lawes of the Hebrewes, and Gods Commandements: others expound the word, obtulis, in this place, by obtulis per Sacerdotem, and so make the sinne of Saul not to haue bene any intrusion into the Priests office, but a disobedience to Gods Commandement, in not staying according to the appointment, 1. Sam. 10. 8. secondly a diffidence or mistrust in Gods helpe, and too great relying vpon the strength of the people, whose departing from him he could not beare patiently; and lastly a Contempt of the holy Prophet Samuel, and of the helpe which the prayers of so godly a man might procure him. But whatsoeuer was his sinne, notwithstanding his excuses, he was by Samuel reprehended most sharply, in termes visitting his estate, had not extraordinary warrant bene giuen to Samuel so to doe, from God himselfe; at which time also Samuel feared not to let him know, that the Kingdome should be conferred to another (a man after Gods owne heart) both from Saul and his posteritie.

After this, Samuel and Saul returned to Gibeah, where Saul, when hee had taken view of his armie, found it to consist of 600. men: for the most were fled from him and scattered yea and among those that staid, there was not any that had either sword or speare, but Saul and his sonne Jonathan onely. For the Philistims had not left them any Smith in all Israel, that made weapons; besides, they that came to Saul came hastily, and left such weapons and armour as they had, behind them in their garrisons: for if they had had none at all, it might be much doubted how Saul should be able the yeere before, or in some part of this very yeere, to succour Iabes Gilead with 300. and thirty thousand men, if there had not now bene any yron weapon to defend themselves withall, saue onely in the hand of Saul and Jonathan his sonne. But howsoeuer, all the rest of the people were formerly disarmed by the Philistims, and all those craftsmen carried out of the land that made weapons: there being left vnto the Israelites onely files to sharpen and amend such stuffe as serued for the Plough, and for nought else: yet that they had some kind of armes it is manifest, or else they durst not haue attempted vpon the Philistims as they did. And it is not said in the Text that there was not any sword in all Israel, but onely that there was not any found among those 600. souldiers which stayed with Saul after Samuels departure: and it seemeth that when Samuel had sharply reprehended Saul, that his owne guards forooke him, hauing but 600. remaining of his 3000. ordinarie souldiers, and of all the rest that repaired vnto him, of which many were fledde from him before Samuel arrived.

With this small troope he held himselfe to his owne Citie of Gibeah, as a place of more strength, and better assured vnto him, than Gilgal was. Neither is it obscure how it should come to passe that the Philistims should thus disarm the most part of the Israelites, howsoeuer in the time of Samuel much had bene done against them. For the victories of Samuel were not got by sword or speare, but by thunder from heauen: and when these craftsmen were once rooted out of the Cities of Israel, no maruell if they could not in a short peace vnder Samuel be replanted againe. For this tyrannic of the Philistims is to bee vnderstood, rather of the precedent times, than vnder Samuel: and yet vnder him it is to be thought that by their crafts they proceeded in the policie, not suffering their artificers to teach the Israelites, and so even to the times of Saul kept them from having any store of armour. The same policie did Nabuchodonosor vsce after his Conquest in India: Dionysius in Sicilie; and many other Princes else-where in all ages. But these lost weapons in part the Israelites might repaire in Gilead, for ouer Jordan the Philistims had not invaded. The rest of their defences were such as antiquitie vsed and their present necessity ministred vnto them; to wit, clubs, bowes, and slings. For the Beniamites excelled in casting stones in slings; and that these were the naturall weapons, and the first of all nations, it is manifest; and so in the first of Chronicles the 12. Chapter, it is written of those that came to succour Dauid against Saul, while he lurked at Siklag, That they were 10 weponed with bowes, and could vse the right and the left hand with stones; and with a sling it was that Dauid himselfe slew the Gyant Goliath.

1 SAM. 14. 12.

While the State of Israel stood in these hard termes, the Philistims hauing parted their armie into three troupes, that they might spoile and destroy many parts at once; Jonathan strengthened by God, and followed with his Esquire onely, scaled a mountaine, whereon a companie of Philistims were lodged: the rest of their armie (as may bee gathered by the successe) being incamped in the plaine adioyning. And though he was discouered before he came to the hill top, and in a kinde of derision called vp by his enemies: yet he so behaued himselfe, as with the assistance of God he slew 20. of the first Philistims that he encountered. Whereupon the next companies taking the alarme, and being ignorant of the cause, fled away amazed together. In which confusion, feare, and ialousie, they slaughtered one another in stead of enemies: whereupon those Hebrewes which became of their partie, because they feared to be spoiled by them, tooke the aduantage of their destruction, and slew of them in great numbers. And lastly, Saul himselfe taking knowledge of the rout and disorder, together with those Israelites that shrouded themselves in mount Ephraim, set vpon them and obtained (contrary to all hope and expectation) a most happie and glorious victory ouer them. Heere was that prophesie in Deuteronomie fulfilled by Jonathan, That one of those which feared God, should kill a thousand, and two of them ten thousand.

1 SAM. 14.

This done, the small armie of Israel made reitrait from the pursuit. And although Saul 30 had bound the people by an oath not to take food till the euening, yet his sonne Jonathan being in feeble with extreame labour and emptinesse, tasted a droppe of hony in his passage: for which Saul his father would haue put him to death, had not the people deliuered him from his crueltie.

1 SAM. 14.

The late miraculous victorie of Saul and Jonathan, seemes to haue reduced vnto the Philistims remembrance their former ouerthrow likewise miraculous in the daies of Samuel; so that for some space of time they held themselves quiet. In the meane while Saul being now greatly encouraged, vnderooke by turnes all his bordering enemies; namely, the Mozabites, Ammonites, Edomites, and the Arabians of Zobah, against all which he preuailed. He then assembled all the forces he could make, to wit, 210000. men, and 40 receiving the commandement of God by Samuel, hee invaded Amalec, waisting and destroying all that part of Arabia Petraea, and the Desart belonging to the Amalekites, from Hamilab towards Tigris vnto Shur, which bordereth Egypt; in which waire hee tooke Agag their King prisoner. But whereas he was instructed by Samuel to follow this Nation without compassion, because they first of all attempted Israel, when they left Egypt in Abel time: hee notwithstanding did not onely spare the life of Agag, but reserved the best of the beasts and spoyle of the Countrey, with pretence to offer them in sacrifice to the liuing God. Therefore did Samuel now a second time make him know that God would cast him from his royall estate, to which he was raised when he was of base condition, and as the Text hath it, little in his owne eyes. And though the offence was 50 great in Saul for not obeying the voyce of God by Samuel, had there beene no former precept to that effect: yet seeing Saul could not bee ignorant how severely it pleased God to inioyne the Israelites to reuenge themselves vpon that Nation, he was in all vncexcusable. For God had commanded that the Israelites should put out the remembrance of Amalec from vnder heauen. For the cruelty which the predecessors of this Agag vsed against the Israelites, especially on those which were ouer-wearied, faint, sicke, and aged people, was now to be reuenged on him, and his Nation about 400. yeeres afterward; and now hee was to pay the debt of blood, which his forefathers borrowed from the

the innocent: himselfe hauing also sinned in the same kinde, as these words of Samuel witness: As thy sword hath made other women childlesse, so shall thy mother be childlesse among other women; at which time Samuel himselfe (after he had beene by many bootlesse intreacies perswaded to stay a while with Saul) did cut Agag in pieces before the Lord in Gilead, and soone after he departed to Ramath, and came no more to see Saul, until the day of his death.

§. V.

Of the occurrents betwene the reuelion of Saul and his death.

10 NOW while Samuel mourned for Saul, God commanded him to choose a King for Israel, among the sonnes of Isbaï: which Samuel (doubting the violent hand of Saul) feared in a sort to performe, till it pleased God to direct him, how he might auoid both the suspicion, and the danger. And if Samuel knew that it was no way derogating from the prouidence of God, that by his cautious care and wisdom, he fought to auoid the inconuenience or dangers of this life, then doe these men mistake the nature of his diuine ordinance, who neglecting the reason that God hath giuen them, doe no otherwise auoid the perils and dangers thereof, than as men stupified in the opinion of fate or destinie, neglecting either to beg counsaile at Gods hands by prayer, or to exercise that wisdom or foresight, wherewith God hath enriched the minde of man, for his preservation. Neither did the all-powerfull God (who made and could destroy the world in an instant) disdaine here to instruct Samuel, to auoid the furie of Saul, by the accustomed cautious waies of the world.

Of the sonnes of Isbaï, Samuel, by God directed, made choise of Dauid, the youngest, hauing refused Eliab, the first borne: who though he were a man of a comely person and great strength; yet vnto such outward appearance, the Lord had no respect. For as it is written, God (eth not as man seeth, &c. but the Lord beholdeth the heart. He also refusing the other fixe brethren, made choise of one whom his Father had altogether neglected, & left in the field to attend his flocke; for of him the Lord said to Samuel, Arise and anoint him, for this is he: which done, Samuel departed and went to Ramath. Neither was it 30 long after this that Saul began to seeke the life of Dauid: in which bloody minde he continued till he died, ouercome in battell by the Philistims.

The Philistims hauing well considered (as it seemes) the increase of Saul his power through many victories by him obtained, whilst they had sitten still & forborne to giue impediment to his prosperous courses, thought it good to make new triall of their fortune, as iustly fearing that the wrongs which they had done to Israel, might bee repayed with aduantage, if euery opportunity should serue their often injured neighbours against them, as lately it had done against Mozab, Ammon, and the rest of their ancient enemies. Now for the qualitie of their Souldiers, and all warlike prouisions, the Philistims had reason to thinke themselves equall, if not superiours to Israel. The successe of their former war had for the most part beene agreeable to their own wishes: as for late disasters, they might, according to humane wisdom, impute them to second causes; as to a tempest happening by chance, and to a mistaken alarme, wherby their Armie possessed with a needlesse feare had fallen to rout. Hauing therefore mustered their forces, and taken the field, encamping so neere to the Armie which King Saul drew forth against them, that they could not easily depart without the triall of a battell, each part kept their ground of aduantage for a while, not ioyning in grosse, but maintaining some skirmishes, as refusing both of them to passe the Valley that lay betwene their Camps. Iust causes of feare they had on both sides, especially the Philistims, whose late attempts had beene confounded by the angry hand of God. Vpon this occasion perhaps it was, that they sought 50 to decide the matter by single combat, as willing to try in one mans person, whether any stroke from heauen were to bee feared. Goliath of Gath a strong Giant, fearing neither God nor Man, vnderooke to defie the whole hoste of Israel, prouoking them with despitfull words, to appoint a Champion that might fight with him hand to hand; offering condition, that the partie vanquished in Champion, should hold it selfe as ouertonic in grosse, and become vassall to the other. This gaue occasion to young Dauid, whom Samuel by Gods appointment had annointed, to make a famous entrance into publike notice of the people. For no man durst expose himselfe

to encounter the great strength of Goliath, vntill Dauid (sent by his father on an errand to the campe) accepted the combat, and obtained the victorie, without other armes offensive or defensive than a sling, wherewith he ouerthrew that haughtie Gyant, and after with his owne sword strooke off his head. Hereupon the Philistims, who should haue yielded themselves as subiects to the Conquerour, according to the couenent on their owne side propounded, fled without stay; and were pursued and slaughtered euen to their owne gates. By this victorie the Philistims were not so broken, that either any of their townes were lost, or their people discouraged from infesting the Territories of Israel. But Dauid, by whom God had wrought this victorie, fell into the grieuous indignation of his Master Saul, through the honour purchased by his well-deseruing. For after such time as the spirit of God departed from Saul and came vpon Dauid, hee then became a cruell Tyrant, faithlesse, and irreligious. Because the high Priest Abimelech fedde Dauid in his necessitie with hallowed bread, and armed him with a sword of his owne conquest taken from Goliath; Saul not onely by his wicked Edomite Doeg murdered this Abimelech and 85. Priests of Nob, but also hee destroyed the Citie, and smote with the edge of the sword both man and woman, both childe and suckling, both Oxe, and Asse, and Sheepe. And hee that had compassion on Agag the Amalekite, who was an enemy to God and his people, and also spared and preferred the best of his Cattell, contrary to the Commandement and Ordinance of God, both by Moses and Samuel; had not now any mercie in store, for the innocent, for the Lords seruants the Priests of Israel. Yea hee would haue slaine his owne sonne Jonathan, for pitying; and pleading Dauid's innocencie, as also once before for tasting the hony, when his fainting for hunger made him forget his fathers vnreasonable commination. The companions of cruelty are breach of faith towards men, and impietie towards God. The former he shewed in denying Dauid his daughter, whom he had promised him; and againe in taking her away from him, to whom he had giuen her; also in that when as Dauid had twice spared his life in the Territorie of Ziph, and Saul twice sworne to do him no hurt, and confessed his errours, yet hee fought still to destroy him, by all the meanes he could. His impiety towards God he shewed, in that he sought counsell of the Witch of Endor, which was the last preparative for his destruction. For whereas when he sought counsell from God he had bin alwaies victorious: from the Oracle of the Diuell this successe followed, that both himselfe, and his three sons, with his neereft & faithfull seruants, were all slaughtered by the Philistims: his bodie with the bodies of his sons (as a spectacle of shame and dishonour) were hung ouer the walls of Bethsan: and there had remained till they had found buriall in the bowels of rauenous birds, had not the gratefull Gileadites of Iabes stolne their carcases thence, and interred them. This was the end of Saul, after he had gouerned Israel, together with Samuel, 40. yeeres, & by himselfe after Samuel 20. yeeres according to Cedrenus, Theophilus, and Iosephus. But yet it seemeth to me, that after the death of Samuel, Saul did not rule very long: For in the beginning of the 25. chapter, it is written that Samuel died: and in the rest of the same chapter the passages are written of Dauid, Nabal, and Abigail, after which the death of Saul quickly ensued.

An exceeding valiant man he was, and gaue a faire entrance to all those victories which Dauid afterward obtained; for hee had beaten the Ammonites with their neighbouring Nations; cruelt the Syrians, and their adherents; broken the strength of the Amalekites; and greatly wasted the power and pride of the Philistims.

§. VI.

Of such as liued with Samuel and Saul; of Hellen and Hercules, and of their issues: vpon occasion of the Dorcs, with the Heraclidae, entering Peloponnesus about this time.

IN the second yeere of Samuel, according to Eusebius, was Dauid borne: after Cedrenus later, and in the ninth yeere: after Bunting in the tenth. For Dauid, faith he, was thirtie yeeres old when hee began to reigne: whence it followeth, that he was borne in the tenth of the fortie yeeres, which are giuen to Samuel and Saul. About the eleuenth yeere of Samuel, Aeneas Silvius the sonne of Posthumus beganne his reigne ouer the Latines in Alba, who gouerned that State one and thirtie yeeres. There are who place before him Latinus Sylvius, as brother to Posthumus, calling him the fifth from from Aeneas, and fourth King of Alba, whereof I will not stand to dispute. In the cleuenth of Samuel, Dercilar late in the Throne of Assyria, being the one and thirtieth King; he ruled that Empire fortie yeeres. In this age of Samuel the Dorcs obtained Peloponnesus, and at once with the Heraclidae, who then led and commanded the Nation, possesse a great part thereof 328. yeeres before the first Olympiad, according to Diondorus and Erasisthenes. For all Greece was anciently possessed by three Tribes or Kindreds, viz. the Ionians, Dorians, and Aeolians: at length it was called Hellas, and the people Hellenes of Hellen, the sonne of Deucalion, Lord of the Countrie of Phiotis in Thessalie. But before the time of this Hellen, yea and long after, Greece had no name common to all the inhabitants, neither were the people called Hellenes, till such time as partly by trading in all parts of the Land, partly by the plantation of many Colonies, and sundrie great victories obtained, the issues of Hellen had reduced much of the Countrie vnder their obedience, calling themselves generally by one name, and yet euery seuerall Nation after some one of the posteritie of Hellen, who had reigned ouer it. And because this is the furehest antiquitie of Greece, it will not be amisse to recount the Pedigree of her first planters.

Lapetus (as the Poets fable) was the sonne of Heauen and Earth, so accounted, either because the names of his Parents, had in the Greeke tongue such signification: or perhaps for his knowledge in Astronomie and Philosophie.

Lapetus begat Prometheus, and Ephimetheus: of whom all men haue read that haue read Poets. Prometheus begat Deucalion: and Ephimetheus, Pyrrha, Deucalion & his wife Pyrrha reigned in Thessalie, which was then called Pyrrha (as Cretensis Rhianus affirmeth) of Pyrrha the Queene. In Deucalions time was that great flood, of which we haue spoken elsse where. Deucalion begat Hellen: whose sonnes were Xuthus, Dorus, and Aeolus: of Dorus and Aeolus, the Dorcs and Aeolians had name. The Aeoles inhabited Boetia. The Dorcs hauing first inhabited sundry parts of Thessalie, did afterward seek themselves about Parmanus, and finally became Lords of the Countries about Lacedaemon: Xuthus the eldest sonne of Hellen, being banished by his brethren, for hauing diuerted from them to his owne vse some part of their Fathers goods, came to Aethiops: where marrying the Daughter of King Eriothus, hee begat on her two sonnes, Achaeus and Ion. Of these two, Achaeus, for a slaughter by him committed, fledde into Peloponnesus: and seating himselfe in Laconia, gaue name to that region: from whence (as some write) he afterwards departed; and leuying an Armie, recouered the Kingdome of his Grandfather in Thessalie.

Ion being Generall for the Athenians, when Eumolpus the Thracian invaded Attica, did obtaine a great victorie, and thereby such loue and honour of the people, that they committed the ordering of their State into his hands. He diuided the Citizens into Tribes, appointing euery one to some occupation, or good course of life. When the people multiplied, hee planted Colonies in Sycionia, then called Aegialos, or Aegialia: In which Countrie Solinus then reigning, thought it safer to giue his Daughter Helice in marriage to Ion, and make him his Heire, than to contend with him. So Ion married Helice, and built a Towne called by his Wiues name in Aegialia, where he and his posterity reigned long, and (though not obliterating the old name) gaue to that Land denomination. But in after-times the Dorcs assisting the Nephewes of Hercules, invaded Peloponnesus, and ouercomming the Achaeanes, possessed Laconia, and all those parts which the Achai had formerly occupied. Hereupon the Achai driuen to seek a new seat, came vnto the Ioncs, desiring to inhabit Aegialia with them, and alleading in vaine, that Ion and Achaeus had bene brethren. When this request could not be obtained, they fought by force to expell the Ionians, which they performed; but they lost their King Tisamenus, the sonne of Orestes in that Warre.

Thus were the Ioncs driuen out of Peloponnesus, and compelled to remooue into Attica, from whence after a while they sailed into Asia, and peopled the Westerne coast thereof; on which they built twelue Cities, inhabited by them, euen to this day, at the least without any vniuersall or memorable transmigration. This expedition of the Ioncs into Asia hath bene mentioned of all which haue written of that Age, and is commonly placed 140. yeeres after the warre of Troy, and 60. yeeres after the descent of the Heraclidae into Peloponnesus. These Heraclidae were they of whom the Kings of Sparta issued; which race held that Kingdome about 700. yeeres. Of their Father

Hercules many strange things are deliuered vnto vs by the Poets, of which some are like to haue beene true, others perhaps must bee allegorically vnderstood. But the most approved Writers thinke that there were many called Hercules, all whose exploits were by the Greekes ascribed to the sonne of Alcmena, who is said to haue performed these 12. great labours.

First, he flew the Nemean Lyon: secondly, he flew the Serpent Hydra, which had nine heads, whereof one being cut off, two grew in the place: The third was the ouer-taking a very swift Hare: The fourth was the taking of a wilde Bore aliue, which haunted mount Erymanthus in Arcadie: The fifth was the cleaving of Augias his Oxe-stall in one day, which he performed by turning the River Alpheus into it: The sixth was the chasing away to of the Birds from the Lake Stymphalus: The seventh was the fetching a Bull from Crete: The eight was the taking of the Mares which Diomedes King of Thrace fed with humane flesh: The ninth was to fetch a Girdle of the Queen of the Amazons: The three last were, to fetch Geryons Beeces from Gades; the golden Apples of the Hesperides; and Cerberus from hell, The Mythological interpretation of these I purposely omit, as both ouer-long to be here set downe, and no lesse perplexed than the labours themselves. For some by Hercules vnderstand Fortitude, Prudence, and Constancie, interpreting the Monsters, Vices. Others make Hercules the Sunne, and his traualles to bee the twelve signes of the Zodiac. There are others who apply his workes historically to their owne conceits, as well assured, that the exposition cannot haue more vnlikelihood, than the fables: That hee tooke Elis, Pylus, Oechalia, and other Townes, being assisted by such as eyther admired his vertues, or were beholding vnto him. Also that hee slew many Thebes, and Tyrants, I take to be truly written, without addition of Poeticall vanitie. His traualles through most parts of the world are, or may seeme, borrowed from Hercules Libyus. But sure it is that many Cities of Greece were greatly bound to him: for that hee (bending all his indues to the common good) deliuered the Land from much oppression. But after his death no Citie of Greece (Athens excepted) required the vertue and defects of Hercules, with constant protection of his children, persecuted by the King Eurytheus. This Eurytheus was sonne of Stenobolus, and grand-child of Perseus; hee reigned in Mycene, the mightiest Citie then in Greece. He it was that imposed those hard taskes vpon Hercules, who was bound to obey him as Poets report for expiation of that Murder, which in his madness he had committed vpon his owne children; but as others say, because he was his Subiect and Seruant: wherefore there are who commend Eurytheus for imploying the strength of Hercules to loo good a purpose. But it is so generally agreed by the best writers, that Hercules was also of the stocke of Perseus, and holden in great ieaousie by Eurytheus because of his vertue, which appeared more and more in the dangerous seruices, wherein hee was imployed, so that he grew great in reputation and power through all Greece; and had by many wiues and Concubines about three score children. These children Eurytheus would faine haue got into his power, when Hercules was dead: but they fled vnto Cory King of Thracina, and from him (for he durst not withstand Eurytheus) to Athens. The Athenians not onely gaue them entertainment, but lent them ayde, wherewith they encountered Eurytheus. Iolaus the brothers son of Hercules, who had assisted him in many of his trauels, was captaine of the Heraclidae. It is said of him, that being dead, hee obtained leaue of Pluto to liue againe till hee might reuenge the iniuries done by Eurytheus: whom when he had slaine in battell, hee died againe. It seemes to me, that whereas he had led colonies into Sicilie, and abode there a long time forgotten: hee came againe into Greece to assist his cousins, and afterwards returned backe. When the Peloponnesians vnderstood that Eurytheus was slaine, they tooke Atricus the sonne of Pelops to their King: for he was rich, mighty, and fauoured of the people. Against him the Heraclidae marched vnder Hyllus the sonne of Hercules. But to auoide effusion of blood, it was agreed, that Hyllus should fight with Echeneus King of the Tegata a people of Arcadia, who assisted Atricus; with condition, that if Hyllus were victor, he should peaceably enjoy what hee challenged as his right: otherwise the Heraclidae should not enter Peloponnesus in an hundred yeeres. In that combat Hyllus was slaine, and the Heraclidae compelled to forebare their Country, till the third generation: at which time they returned vnder Arilodemos (as the best authoritie doth shew, though some haue said) that they came vnder the conduct of his children) and brought with them the Doris whom whom they planted in that countrey, as is before shewed, hauing expelled the Achaes, ouer whom the issue of Pelops had reigned after the death of Eurytheus four generations.

§. VII.

Of Homer and Hesiod, and many changes in the world, that happened, about this age.

About this time that excellent learned Poet Homer liued, as many of the best Chronologers affirme. He was by race of the Aeones, descended (as Fanclius imagineth) of Berosus his Anamian, who gaue name to that people. But this Fanclius imagineth Homer the Poet to haue beene long after these times, rashly framing his Ara according to Archilochus in the tract, or rather fragment de temporibus; and makes it out with seven more of this name to haue flourished in diuers Cities in Greece. Whence; perhaps; hee frameth the diuersitie of opinions, both of the time and of the native Citie of Homer. According to this, Archilochus, Fanclius finds Homer about the time of Manasse King of Ida, and Numa of Rome. He was called Aclefogenes from the place of his birth, and at length Homer, because blinde men follow a guide, which signification among others, is in the verbe ἡγήμην: for this Homer in his latter time was blinde. Clemens Alexandrinus recites many different opinions touching the question of the time when Homer liued. So also Aulus Gellius, and Tatianus Affyrus in his Oration ad gentes. Paterculus reckons that Homer flourished 950. yeeres before the Consulship of Marcus Vinnius: which Marcus casteth vp in the worlds yeere 3046. and after Troy taken, about 260 yeeres: about the time of Iehosaphat King of Iuda. But Clemens Alexandrinus and Tatianus booke named, mention authors that make him much ancients, The difference of which authors in this point is not vnworthy the readers consideration, that by this one instance he may guesse of the difficultie, and so pardon the errors in the computations of ancient time: seeing in such diuersitie of opinions a man may hardly finde out what to follow. For Crates the Grammarian (as Clemens Alexandrinus reports) gaue being to Homer about 80. yeeres after Troy taken, neere the time that the Heraclidae returned into Peloponnesus: and Eratostratus after Troy 100. yeeres. Theopompus 500. yeeres after the arme of Greece, failed into Phrygia for the warre of Troy. Euphorion makes him contemporarie with Gyges, who began to reigne in the 18. Olympiad (which was 45. yeeres after Rome was built) and Sosibius saith, that he was 90. yeeres before the first Olympiad: which hee seeks to proue by the times of Charillus and his sonne Nicander: Philochorus placeth him 180. after Troy: Aristarchus 140. in the time of the feating of the Colonies in Ionia. Apollodorus affirmes that he liued while Agessilaus gouerned Lacedaemon; and that Lycurgus in his yong yeeres, about 100. yeeres after the Ionian plantations, came to visite him, neere 240. yeeres after Troy taken. Herodotus findes Homer flourishing 622. yeeres before Xerxes enterprised against the Gracians: which Berosus accounteth at 168. yeeres after the Troian warre. Ensebius seemes to make him to haue beene about the time of Ius King of Iuda, 124. yeeres before Rome built: though elsewhere in his Chronologie hee notes that some place him in the time of Samuel, and others in the end of Dauid, and others in other ages. In his Euangelicall Preparation, where out of Tatianus Affyrus he citch sundry opinions touching the time when Homer liued, hee reckoneth many other Greece writers more ancient than Homer; as Linus, Phalamus, Epimenides, Pheonius, Ariflaus, Orpheus, Museus, Thamyris, Amphion, and others.

Now whether Homer or Hesiodus were the elder, it is also much disputed. Aulus Gellius reports that Philochorus and Xenophanes affirme, that Homer preceded Hesiod: and on the contrary, that Luc. Accius the Poet, and Ephorus the Historian, make Hesiod of an elder time than Homer. Varro leaves it vncertaine which of these learned fablers was first borne: but he findes that they liued together some certaine yeeres, where hee confirms himselfe by an Epigram, written vpon a Treuit, and left by Hesiod in a Thunus Helicon.

Cornelius Nepos reports that they both liued 160. yeeres before Rome built: while the Siluius reigned in Alba, about 140. yeeres after the fall of Troy. Euthymenes findes them both 200. yeeres after Troy taken; in the time of Acisus the sonne of Pelias, King of Thissaly. For my selfe, I am not much troubled when this Poet liued; neither would I offend the Reader with these opinions, but onely to shew the vncertainty and disagreement of Historians, as well in this particular, as in all other questions and dispute of time. For the curiositie of this mans age is no lesse ridiculous, than the inquisition why he began his Iliades with the word Menin, as perhaps containing some great mysterie. In definition whereof Lucian faining himselfe to haue bene in hell, and to haue spoken with Homer, there asked him the cause why he began his booke with that word: who answered, That he began in that sort, because it came in his head so to doe.

It seemeth that Senyes, or after Macrobisus, Senemires, ruled Egypt at this time: for Tanepherisobris was his succellour, who preceded Vaphres, father in law to Salomon.

About the end of Sauls gouernment, or in the beginning of Dauids time according to Cassiodorus, the Amazones with the Cymmerians invaded Asia, Latinus Syluius then ruling in Italie. And besides the ouerthrow of that famous State of Troy (which fell 103. yeeres before Dauids time) there were many other changes in the middle part of the world, not onely by reason of those Northerne Nations: but there sprung vp somewhat neerely together, fixe Kindgomes into greatnesse not before erected. In Italie, that of the Latines: in the South part of Greece, those of Lacedemon, Corinth, and the Achei. In Arabia, Syria, Saba, and Damascus; the Adads made themselves Princes, of which there were ten Kinges, which began and ended with the Kinges of Israel in effect: and somewhat before these, the State of the Israelites hauing now altered the forme of Gouernment, began to flourish vnder Kinges, of which Dauid, in a few yeeres, became master of all those neighbouring Nations, who by interchange of times had subiected the Iudeans, corrupted their religion, and held them vnder in a most abiect and grievous slauerie; to wit, the Edomians, Mosabites, Ammonites, Midianites, Ituraens, and the rest of the Arabians, with the Philistims, Iebusites, Geshurites, Machabites; all which acknowledged Dauid for their Soueraigne Lord, and paid him tribute.

CHAP. XVII.

Of Dauid.

§. I.

Of Dauids estate in the time of Saul.

HE hazards which Dauid ran into while he was yet onely designed King, and liued as a priuate man, expecting the Empire, were very many. The first personall act of fame, was his killing of Goliath in the view of both armies, whereby hee became knowne to Saul, and so highly affected of Jonathan the son of Saul, that he loued him as his owne soule: In so much as when Saul sought to perswade his sonne, that Dauid would assuredly bee the ruine of his house, and estate, and offered him violence when hee pleaded his cause; Jonathan could neuer be perswaded, neuer foret, nor euer wearied from the care of Dauids life, & well doing. It was not long after this signall act of Dauid, but that Saul became exceeding iealous of him, though he were become as his household seruant, and his Equire, or armor-bearer. Saul being vexed with an euill spirit, was aduised to procure some cunning Musician to play before him vpon the Harpe; whereby it was thought that he might find ease, which came to passe accordingly. He entertained Dauid for this purpose, and began to fauour him, giuing him a place of Command among the men of warre. But the iealous tyrant soone waxed wearie of his good affection, and sought to kill Dauid, being thereunto moued onely through enuie of his vertue. This passion first brake forth in the midst of his rauiing fit, at which time he threw a speare at Dauid that was then playing on his Harpe to doe him ease.

Censorinus remembereth one Aclepius a Physician, who practised the cure of the Frenzie, by the like Musicke: and tempered thereby those diseases which grew from passion. That Pythagoras did also the like by such a kind of harmonie, Seneca in his third booke of anger witnesseth. But the madnesse of Saul came from the cause of causes, and and was thereby incurable, howsoever it sometimes left him, and yeelded vnto that Musicke, which God had ordained to be a meane of more good to the Musician than to the King.

Saul hauing failed in such open attempts, gaue vnto Dauid the Command ouer 2000. souldiers, to confront the Philistims withall. For hee durst not trust him as before, about his person, fearing his reuenge. Now the better to couer his hatred towards him, he promised him his daughter Merab to wife: but hauing married her to Adriel, he gaue to Dauid his younger daughter Michol, but with a condition, to present him with an hundred foreskins of the Philistims: hoping rather (in respect of the valour of that Nation,) that the Philistims would take Dauids head, than hee their foreskins. This hope failing, when as now Dauids victories begat new feares and iealousies in Saul, hee practised with Jonathan, and after wards with his owne hands attempted his life; but his purposes were still frustrated. After all this he sought to murder him in his owne house, but Michol his wife deliuered him. So Dauid sought Samuel at Ramah, and being pursued by Saul, fled thence vnto Nob in Beniamin, to Abimelech, then to Achis the Philistim, Prince of Geth: where to obscure himselfe, he was foret to counterfeit both simplicitie and distraction. But being ill assured among the Philistims, hee couered himselfe in the Case of Adullam: and after conueying such of his kinsfolkes as were not fit to follow him, into Mosab, he hid himselfe in the deserts of Ziph, Maon and the hills of Engaddi, where he cut off the lap of Sauls garment, and spared his life: as he did a second time in the deserts of Ziph, after his passage with Nabal and Abigail. After which he repaired to Achis of Geth the second time, and was kindly entertained, in regard of the hatred with which his master Saul was knowne to persecute him.

Of Achis Dauid obtained * Siklag in Simcon, pretending to inuade Iudea: but he bent his forces another way and strooke the Amalekites, with other enemies of Israel, letting none liue to complaine vpon him. Achis supposing that Dauid had drawne blood of his owne Nation, thought himselfe assured of him: and therefore preparing to inuade Israel, summoneth Dauid to asist him, who dissembling his intent, seemeth very willing thereto. But the rest of the Philistim Princes knowing his valour, and doubting his disposition, liked not his company, and therefore he withdrew himselfe to Siklag. At his returne he found the town burnt, his two wiues, with the wiues and children of his people, taken by the Amalekites: Hereupon his followers mutined, but God gaue him comfort and assistance to recover all againe: which he did.

This armie of the Philistims commanded by Achis, encountred Saul at Gilboa, in which he and his three sonnes were slaine. The newes, with Sauls Crowne and bracelets, were brought to Dauid at Siklag, in his returne from being victorious ouer Amalech, by a man of the same Nation, who auowed (though falsely) that himselfe at Sauls request had slaine him. Dauid, because he had accused himselfe, made no scruple to cause him to be slaine at the instant: and the sooner, because the probabilities gaue strong euidence withall. Otherwise it followeth not that euery man ought to be beleued of himselfe to his owne prejudice. For it is held in the law; Confessio cognoscens. The prisoners confession must not be taken for an euidence of the crime, vntill some other prooffe informe the conscience of the Iudge. For a man may confesse those things of himselfe, that the Iudge by examination may know to be impossible. But because it is otherwise determined in the title de custodia reorum l. si confessus, & in cap. de penis l. qui sententiam, therefore doth the Gloss reconcile these two places in this sort: Si quis in iudicio sponte de seipso confitetur, & postea maneat in confessione, id est satis. If any man in iudgements doe confesse of himselfe, of his owne accord, and after doth perseuere in his confession, it is enough. That Dauid greatly bewailed Saul, it is not improbable; for death cutteth asunder all competition: and the lamentable end that befell him, being a King, with whom in effect the strength of Israel all fell, could not but stirre vp sorrow, and moue compasison in the heart of Dauid.

The victorie which the Philistims had gotten, was so great, that some townes of the Israelites, euen beyond the riuer of Iordan, were abandoned by the inhabitants, and left vnto the enemy, who tooke possession of them without any resistance made. Wherefore it may seeme strange, that a Nation so warlike and ambitious as were the Philistims, did not follow their fortune with all diligence; and seeke to make the Conquest entire.

Most

Most like it seemes, that the Ciuill warre immediately breaking out betwene Dauid and the house of Saul, wherein Iuda was diuided from the rest of Israel, gaue them hope of an easie victory ouer both; and thereby caused them to attempt nothing at the present, lett by so doing they should inforce their disagreeing enemies to a necessarie reconciliation; but rather to permit that the one part should consume the other, by which means, both the victors, and the vanquished, would become a prey to the violence of such as had beaten them, when their forces were vnited.

§. II.

Of the beginning of Dauids reigne, and the warre made by Abner for Isboseth.

After the death of Saul, Abner, who commanded for Saul in the warre, sought to aduance Isboseth (or Isephus, according to Iosephus) though hee had no right to the Kingdome of Israel: for Mephisboeth the first son of Jonathan liued. Against this Abner, and Isboseth, Dauid made a defensive warre, till Abner past Jordan, and entered the border of Iuda; at which time he sent Joab with such forces as he had, to resist Abner: Isboseth remaining in Gilead, and Dauid in Hebron. The armies encountered each other neere Gibeon, where it seemeth, that Abner made the offer to trie the quarrell by the hands of a few; like to that Combat betwene the Lacedemonians, and the Argives, remembered by Hierodotus, 300. being chosen of each Nation, of which number three persons were onely left vnslaine. The like triall by a farre lesse number was performed by the Horaty and Curiaty for the Romanes and Latines. The same challenge Goliath the Philistim made, whom Dauid slew: a custome very ancient. Edward the third offered the like triall in his own person to the French King; and Francis the French King to Charles the Emperour. There were twelue chosen of each part, in this warre of Dauid with the house of Saul, to wit, so many of Beniamin, and as many of Iuda: whose force and valor was so equally, as there furnished not any one to challenge the victorie. But the quarrell staid not here: for the Armie of Iuda prest Abner in grosse, and brake him. Three hundred and sixtie men of Abners companions were slaine, and but twentie of Iuda; whereof Asahel the brother of Joab was one: who when hee would needes pursue Abner, and by Abners perswasions could not bee moued to quit him, hee was forced to turne vpon him, wounded him to death, with the stroke of his speare. For though Asahel were an excellent footman, and as it is written in the Text, as light as a wilde doe, and as Iosephus reporteth, contended not onely with men, but with horses; and hoped to haue gotten great fame, if he could haue mastered Abner (who, as Asahel perswaded himselfe, had by being overthrowne and flying away lost his courage) yet here it fell out true, That the race is not to the swift.

That this ciuill warre lasted two yeeres, wee finde it written in the second of Samuel, the second Chapter; though in the beginning of the third it is againe made probable, that this contention dured longer; and therefore the matter resteth still in dispute, and some of the Rabbins conceiue that Isboseth had then reigned two yeeres, when this was written, the warre as yet continuing a longer time. For Abner held for the partie of Isboseth after this, and till such time as there grew ialousie betwene him and Isboseth for Sauls concubine: neither did the death of Isboseth instantly follow; but how long after the murder of Abner it happened, the same doth not certainly appeare.

§. III.

Of the death of Abner slaine by Joab, and of Isboseth by Rechab and Baanah.

A*fter*, reconciled to Dauid, was anon by Joab murdered; for Joab could not endure a companion in Dauids Favour, and in the commendement of his forces; by which he was growne so powerfull, as Dauid forbore to call him to account: for thus much he confesseth of himselfe; I am this day weake, and these men of the houses of Zeniah be too hard for me. In this sort Dauid complained after Abners death; and to make it cleare that he hated this fact of Joab, he followed him with this publicke imprecation; Let the blood fall on the head of Joab, and on all his fathers house: and let them be subiect to plagues, to the leprosie, to lumencie, to the sword, and to penurie, &c. For could any thing haue withstood the ordinance of God, this murder committed by Joab might greatly haue endangered Dauids estate, Abner being the mouth and trust of all the rest of the Tribes, not yet reconciled. This mischance therefore Dauid openly bewailed, so that all Israel perceiued him to be innocent of that fact. The place which Abner held, being General of the men of warre, was of such importance, that the Kings themselves were faine to giue them great respect, as hath beene already shewed more at large. This office Joab held in the armie of Iuda, and thought himselfe worthy to hold the place entire, if once his Lord might obtaine the whole Kingdome. For he was neere to Dauid in kindred, and had beene partaker of all his aduersitie; wherefore he did not thinke it meete, that an old enemy should in reward of new benefits, be made his partner. In deede he was by nature so ialous of his dignitie and place; that he afterward slew Amasa his owne kinsman and the Kings, vpon the same quarrell, taking it in high disdain to see him ioyned with himselfe as captain of the hoste of Iuda; much lesse could hee brooke a superiour, and such a one as had slaine his brother, and beene beaten himselfe in battell. But howsoeuer Joab did hate or despise Abner, Dauid esteemed highly of him as of a Prince, and a great man in Israel, excusing the oversight by which he might seeme to haue perished, by affirming that he died not like a foole, nor a man vanquished, but as a man falleth before wicked men, so (said he) diddest thou fall. And certainly it is no error of wit, nor want of valour and vertue in him whom a stronger hand destroyed vnawares, or whom subtiltie in free trust bringeth to confusion. For all vnder the Sunne are subiect to worldly miseries and misaduentures. Howsoeuer Isboseth meant to haue dealt with Abner, yet when he heard of his death, he despaired greatly of his estate, and with him all Israel were possit with great feare: in so much as two of Isboseths owne Captaines, Rechab and Baanah, murdered Isboseth, and presenting his head to Dauid, received the same reward that the Amalekite lately did, for pretending to haue slaine Saul. Isboseth being dead, all the Elders of Israel repaired to Dauid at Hebron, where he was the third and last time anointed by general consent.

§. IIII.

Of the flourishing time of Dauids Kingdome, the taking of Ierusalem, with two overthrowes giuen to the Philistims, and the conduction of the Arke to the Citie of Dauid.

When Dauid was now established in the Kingdome, his first enterprise was vpon the Iebusites, who in derision of his force, and confident in the strength of the place (as is thought) manned their walls with the blinde and lame of their Citie; which Dauid soone after entered: all their other forces notwithstanding. For hauing mastered the fort of Zion (which was afterward the Citie of Dauid) hee became Lord of Ierusalem, without any great danger, expelling thence the Iebusites, who had held it from the foundation, to the times of Moses and Iosua, and after them almost 400. yeeres. There are who expound this place otherwise: Except thou take away the blinde and the lame, thou shalt not come in hither. For some thinke that it was meant by the Idols of the Iebusites: others, that it had reference to the Couenant made long before with Isaac, and Isaac the one blinde by nature and age, the other made lame by wrestling with the Angell, and that therefore till those (that is, till that Couenant) be broken, Dauid ought not to molest them. But for my selfe, I take it with Iosephus, that they armed their walls with certaine impotent people at first, in scorn of Dauids attempt. For they that had held their Citie about 400. yeeres against all the children of Israel, Iosua, the Judges, and Saul, did not doubt but to defend it also against Dauid.

When he had now possit himself of the very heart and Center of the Kingdome, and received congratulatory Embassadors and presents from Hiram King of Tyre; he entertained diuers other concubines and married moe wiues, by whom he had ten sons in Ierusalem, and by his former wiues he had fixe in Hebron where he reigned 7. yeeres.

The Philistims hearing that Dauid was now anointed King, as wel of Iuda as of Israel, they thought to try him in the beginning, before he was fully warme in his seat. And being encountered by Dauid at two severall times in the Valley of Rephaim, or of the Giantes, they were at both times overthrowne. After which he called the place Baalperazim.

Then Dauid assembled 30000. choice Israelites to conduct the Arke of God from the house house of Abinadab in Gibea to the City of David; which business was interrupted by the death of Uzzah the sonne of Abinadab, whom the Lord slew for presuming to touch the Arke, though it were with intent to stay it from taking harm, when it was shaken. But after three yeeres it was with great solemnity brought into the City with sacrifices, musick, dances, and all signes of ioyfulness, in which David himselfe gladly bare a part. Hereupon Michol derided him for dancing before the Arke, and afterward told him in scorn, I had he was uncovered as a foole in the eyes of the maidens his seruants; namely that he forgot his regal dignity both in apparel and behaviour; and mixed himselfe among the base multitude, dancing as fooles doe in the wayes and streetes: not that she disliked David's behaviour (as I take it) though she made it the colour of her derision; but rather the abundant griefe, which this spectacle stirred vp, beholding the glory of her husband to whom she was deliuered lastly by force, and remembering the miserable end of her father and brethren, out of whose ruines she conceiued that the sonne of Isai had built this his greatness: together with the many new wiues and concubines embraced since his possession of Ierusalem, made her breake out in those despitfull tearmes, for which she remained barren to her death.

1 Chron. 13.

This done, David consulted with the Prophet Nathan for the building of the Temple or house of God: out was forbidden it, because he was a man of warre, and had shed blood. So greatly doth the Lord and King of all detest homicide; hauing threatened, not in vaine, that he would require the blood of man, at the hand of man and beast. The wars, which David had made were iust, and the blood therein shed was of the enemies of God, and his Church: yet for this cause it was not permitted that his hands should lay the foundation of that holy Temple. Herby it appears how greatly those Princes deceiue themselves, who thinke by blood-shed & terror of their warres, to make themselves in greatness like to the Almighty, which is a damnable pride; not caring to imitate his mercie and goodness, or seeke the blessednesse promised by our Saviour vnto the peace-makers.

Now although it was not pleasing to the Lord to accept a Temple of David's founding, yet was his religious intent so well accepted, that hereupon he receiued both a confirmation of the Kingdome to him and his heires, and that happie promise of the everlasting Throne, that should be established in his seede.

§. V.

The ouerthrow of the Philistims and Moabites.

2 Sam. 8. v. 1.

Soone after this, David ouerthrew the Philistims, which made them altogether powerlesse, and vnable to make any inuasion vpon Israel in haste. For it is written, Acceptit frantum Amgaris manu Philistheorum; which place our English Genoa conuers in these words, And David tooke the bridle of bondage out of the hand of the Philistims. The Latine of Iunius giueth another and a better sense; for by that bridle of Amgar was meant the strong Citie of Gath, or Geth, and so the Genoa hath it in the marginal note. This Citie of Gath was the same which was afterward Dio-Cesarea, set on the frontier of Palestina at the entrance into Iudea and Ephraim. From thence they made their incursions, and thereinto their retreat in all their inuasions; which being taken by David and demolished, there was left no such frontier towne of equall strength to the Philistims on that part. The hill wheron Geth or Gath stood, the Hebrews call Anime, wherof and of the word Gar is made Amgar, of which Plinie in his first book, and Chap. 13. This exposition is made plaine and confirmed in the first of Chro. 18.

Iunius in 2. of the second of Sam.

2 Sam. 13.

There was no nation bordering the Iewes that so greatly afflicted them as the Philistims did, who before the time of Saul, (to the end they might not sharpen any weapon against them) did not leave one Smith in all their Cities and Villages of that kinde, but infort them to come downe into their territorie, for all iron worke whatsoever they needed; so as the Israelites till this time of David were seldome free, from paying tribute to the Philistims.

After this he gaue them foure other ouerthrowes: but the war of the Moabites and Arauians came betwene. In the first of which he was indangered by Ishbi-benob, the head of whose speare weighed 300. sheekles of brasle, which make nine pound three quarters of our poizes: at which time Abisai succoured David and slew the Philistim; whercupon the the Counsellors and Captaines of David (lest the light of Israel might by his losse be quenched) vowed that he should not thenceforth hazzard himselfe in any battail. The second and third encounter and ouerthrow of the Philistims was at Gob, a place neere Gesar, and the last at Gath or Geth. And being now better assured of the Philistims by the taking of Geth, he invaded Moab, from whom notwithstanding in his aduersitie hee sought succour, and left his parents with him in trust. But whether it were the same King or no, it is not knowne.

2 Sam. 21. v. 17.

The Rabbins saie that Moab slew those kinsfolkes of David, which liued vnder his protection in Saul's time; but questionlesse David well knew how that Nation had bin alwayes enemies to Israel, & tooke all the occasions to vex them that were offered. And he also remembred that in the 23. of Deut. God commanded Israel not to seek the peace or prosperity of the Moabites, which David well obserued, for hee destroyed two parts of the people, leauing a third to till the ground. This victory obtained, he led his army by the border of Ammon towards Syria Zobah, the region of Adadezer the son of Rehob King thereof. The place is set downe in the description of the holy Land: to which I referre the Reader.

§. VI.

The warre which David made vpon the Syrians.

It is written in the Text: David smote also Hadadezer, &c. as he went to recover his border at the river Euphrates. Now whether the words (as he went to recover his border) bee referred to David or Hadadezer, it is not agreed vpon. Iunius thinks that the article (hee) hath relation to David, who finding Tobu opprest by Hadadezer, ouerthrew the one, and succoured the other. But the ancient and most receiued opinion, that this recovery hath reference to the Syrian, is more probable. For if David had intended any such enterprize towards Euphrates, he was in farre better case to haue proceeded after his victory than before: seeing that (Adadezer being taken) he had now left no enemy on his back, either to pursue him, to take victuals and supplies from him, or to stop the passages of the mountaines vpon him at his returne.

Againe, seeing David was either to passe through a part of Arabia the desert, or by the plaines of Palmyrena, his army consisting of footmen, for the most, if not all: He had now both horse and chariots good store to carry his provisions through those vnclutted places, by which hee was to haue marched before he could haue reached Euphrates or any part thereof. But wee finde that David returned to Ierusalem, after he had twice ouerthrowne the Syrian army, not bending his course towards the river Euphrates, but seeking to establish his purchases already made. Whereby it may appeare, that it was the Syrian, and not King David, that was going to enlarge his border, as afore is said.

The king of Syria, Damascena, & of Damascus, whereof that region is so called, hearing that Adadezer was ouerthrown by the Israelites, fearing his own estate, & the losse of his own country which adioined to Syria Zoba of Hadadezer, sent for an army of Aramites or Syrians to his succour: but these, as it appeareth, came too late for Adadezer and too soone for themselves: for there perished of those supplies 22000. This king of Damascus, Iosephus (out of Nicholans an ancient Historian) calleth Adad, who was also of the same name and family as all those other Adads were: which now began to grow vp in greatness, and so continued for ten descents, till they were extinguished by the Assyrians, as is shewed heretofore. David hauing now reduced Damascus vnder his obedience, left a garrison therein, as he did in Edom: hauing also sackt the adioyning Cities of Betah, & Berath, belonging to Adadezer, of which Cities Ptolmie calleth Betah, Taubah: and Berath he nameth Barathena. Tobu or Thoi, whose country of Hamath ioyned to Adadezer (as in the description of the Holy Land the reader may perceiue) sent his son Toram to congratulate this successe of David: partly because he had war with Adadezer, & partly because he feared David now victorious. He also presented David with vessels of gold, siluer, and brasle; all which together with the golden shields of the Aramites, and people from all places, he proclaimed himself King, & was by the people (whose hearts God had turned from their lawfull Prince) accepted so readily, that David doubting to be set vpon on the suddaine, durst not trust himselfe in his owne Citie of Ierusalem, nor in any other walled towne for feare of surpris: but incamped in the fields and deserts with some 600. of his guard, and fewe else. The Priests hee left in Ierusalem with the Ark of God, from whom hee desired to be aduertised of those things that chanced; to whom he directed Isai his trustie friend, & seruant, praying him to make himselfe in all his outward actions and counsels of Abisalom party and confederacy, thereby the better to discouer vnto him the purposes of Achitophel, a reuolting Counsailler, whose practices he greatly doubted. And now when treason was in fashion, Ziba also sought to betray his master Mephiboseth the sonne of Jonathan: And Shimei of the house of Saul (the sire of whose hatred David prosperitie had smothered, but his aduersitie illightned) holding himselfe vpon the aduantage of a mountaine side, cast stones at David, and most despitfully cursed him to his face: but David attending no priuate reuenges, forbade Abisai to pursue him for the present, yet left him among others in the roll of his reuengers, to his sonne Salomon. Abisalom being now possesse of Ierusalem, was aduised by Achitophel to vse his fathers concubines in some such publique place, as all Israel might assure themselves, that he was irreconcilable to his father: whereof being perswaded, they would then rebludely adhere to Abisalom and his cause, without feare of being giuen vp vpon a reconciliation betwene them. This saluage and impious (though craftie counsaile) Achitophel intended: vrged for his owne respect, as fearing that this rebellion might take end to his destruction; who most of all other inflamed Abisalom against his father. And now was it fulfilled that Nathan had directly foretold David: I will raise vp euill against thee out of thine owne house, and will take thy wives before thine eyes, and give them vnto thy neighbour, and bee shall lie with thy wives in the sight of the Sunne: for thou diddest it secretly, but I will do this thing before all Israel, and before the Sunne. Hee also gaue aduice to Abisalom, that him selfe with an armie of 12000. men might bee employed at the instant for the surprizing of David; which had willingly become embraced by Abisalom, had not Hushai Dauid's faithfull seruant giuen counter-aduice, and swayed it: perswading Abisalom that it was fitter and more safe for him with all the strength of Israel, to ouertake his father, than by such a troope, which Dauid's valour and those of his attendants might easily rindanger or resist. This delay in Abisalom, and aduantage of time gaue by David, was indeede after God, the losse of the one, and deliuey of the other. Whereupon Achitophel rightly fearing (by the occasion fore-shewed) the successe which followed, disposed of his owne estate, and then forooke both the party and the care of Abisalom, and of his owne life.

David being aduertised of this enterprize against him, marched away all night, and past Iordan, possesseing himselfe of Mahanaim in the tribe of Gad: the same wherein Isai himselfe in the war against David after Saul's death seated himselfe. To which place there repaired vnto him Shobi the sonne of Nahab the Ammonite, whom David loued, the same which Iosephus calleth Shiphar. And though it bee greatly disputed, what this Shobi was, yet the most generall and probable opinion makes him a second brother to Hannum, whom David for his fathers sake established in the kingdome, after Hannum's ouerthrow: in thankfulness whereof he relieved David in this his extremity. There came also to Dauid's assistance Machir of Ladabar, Guardian in former times to Mephiboseth, and among others Barzillai the Gileadite, who willingly fed David and all his company.

In the meane time both the king and Abisalom prepared to fight; Abisalom made Amasa Commander of the armie of Israel, the same place which Isai held with David; an officer next the king himselfe, like vnto that of the Maiors of the Palace anciently in France. David, perswaded by his company, stayed in Mahanaim, & disposed the forces he had to Isai, Abisai, and Itai, giuing them charge in the hearing of all that issued out of the porte of Mahanaim, that they should spare the life of Abisalom. But Isai, besides that hee was very cruell by nature, remembered that Abisalom had lately disposed of his government to Amasa, and therefore the victory being obtained, & newes brought him that Abisalom hung by the haire of his head on a tree, when hee could not perswade the messenger to returne and kill him, hee himselfe with his owne seruants dispatch him.

It appeared also by the sequell that Isai affected Adonijah whom he afterward acknowledged, David yet liuing; and fearing the disposition of Abisalom, hee embraced the present aduantage offered.

Hereof, together with newes of the victorie, when knowledge was brought to David, hee mourned and sorrowed, not only as a man that had lost a sonne, but as one that had outliued all his worldly ioyes, and sene euery delight of life interred. For hee so hid himselfe from his people, as those which hoped for honour and reward after so great a victorie, couered themselves also in the citie, as if they had committed the greatest offences, and had rather desired death than recompence. Whereupon Isai presenting himselfe before David, perswaded him to dissemble his sorrow for the present, and to shew himselfe to the armie. For first, hee told him that hee had discountenanced his faithfull seruants, who had that day preferred his life; inferring that nothing could bee more dangerous to a King, than not onely not to acknowledge so great a loue and constancie in his people, who being but few in number, did yet resolutely expose themselves to great perils for his sake: but on the contrarie, grieve and lament at their good successe. For, no doubt, they might all haue bought their peace of Abisalom at an easie rate. Secondly, hee vrged that it was generally beleued, that hee loued his enemies & hated his friends; and that hee witnessed by this his mourning, that hee had not anie respect of his Princes, and others his faithfull seruants, but would more haue ioyed if they had all perished, and Abisalom liued, than in the victorie by their faithfulness and approved valour gotten.

Lastly, hee vsed this preualent argument, That if the King came not out and shewed himselfe publickly to his men of warre, that they would all that verie night abandon him, and returne: concluding with this fearefull threatening, And that will be worse vnto thee than all the euill that fell on thee from thy youth hitherto. By these ouer-bold and arrogant speeches (though perchance vttered with a good intent) Isai raised David from his bed of sorrow, and brought him to the gates of the citie among the people, whom he assured of his loue and affection, especially Amasa, who commanded the armie of Abisalom, to whom he promised the office of Lieutenantship; the same which Abisalom had giuen him, and which Isai now enioyed. For David doubted, that if Amasa were not satisfied, hee might draw from him a great part of the strength of Israel, now vnder his commandement.

This done, the King marched towards Iordan homeward, where in his passage hee pardoned Shimei, who had lately reuiled him to his face: but this remission was but externall, as appeared afterward. Hee also accepted of Mephiboseth his excuse, whom Ziba had falsely accused and betrayed.

Hee also intreated Barzillai the Gileadite, his late liberall Oast, to follow him to Ierusalem, that hee might reward his seruice done him; who excusing himselfe by his age, appointed his sonne Chimham to attend the King.

At Gilegal on this side Iordan, all the Tribes assembled, and after some contention which of them ought to haue most interest in David, the Armie brake, & David returned to Ierusalem. But Sheba the son of Bichri, a Beniamite, of the faction of the house of Saul, finding some discontent among the Israelites, withdrew them from David, as from a stranger in whom they had no interest, and it seemeth that manie of the people of the out Tribes, and in effect of all but Iuda, bare still a good affection to the issues of their first King. David employed his reconciled Captaine Amasa, to giue him contentment, and to witnesse his trust, as also because hee conceiued that Amasa had interest in those reuolts of Israel more than Isai had. Hee receiued commandement from David to assemble the Armie within three dayes, which hee foreflowed: but being onward on his way, Abisai, Isai's brother, was sent after him, with Dauid's guard and best Souldiers, whom also Isai accompanied: and ouertaking Amasa neere Gibeon, pretending to embrace him, gaue him a wound, whereof hee fell dead, being no lesse zealous of Amasa than he was of Abner, whom he murdered in the same manner, and out of the same impatient ambition. This done, hee pursued Sheba; and finding him inclosed in Abel, assaulted the citie with that furie, that the citizens by the perswasions of a wife woman there inhabiting, cut off Sheba his head, and flung it to Isai ouer the walls: which done, hee retrained his Armie to Ierusalem, and commanded, as before, all the Host of Israel.

The next act of Dauid, was the deliuey of Sauls sons or kinsmen to the Gibeonites, whom those citizens hung vp in reuenge of their fathers crueltie. Dauid had knowledge from the Oracle of God, that a famine which had continued on the land three yeeres, came by reason of Saul and his house, to wit, for the slaughter of the Gibeonites: and therefore he willingly yielded to giue them this satisfaction, both because he had warrant from God himselfe, as also, if wee may iudge humanely, to rid himselfe of Sauls line, by whom he and his might, as well in the present as in the future, be greatly molested and endangered; only he spared Mephibosheth the sonne of Ionathan, both for the loue he bare to his father, as for his oath and vow to God.

2 Sam. 21.

Now whereas it is written in the Text, The King took the two sonnes of Rishai, whom he bare vnto Saul, and the five sonnes of Michol the daughter of Saul, whom she bare to Adriel, and deliuered them to the Gibeonites: Iunius calls this Michol the sister of her that was Dauids wife, since whom Saul married to Phaltiel: but Michol here named, had Adriel to her husband; the same which is named Merab in the first of Samuel the eighteenth, who was first promised to Dauid when he slew Goliath in the valley of Raphaim: and because it is written that Michol loued Dauid, which perchance Merab did not, whether Dauid had anie humane respect in the deliuey of her children, it is onely knowne to God.

Now where the Geneua nameth Michol for Merab the wife of Adriel: the better translation were out of the Hebrew word here vsed, hauing an eclipsis or defect, & signifieth, as I am informed, one of the same kinred, as in the 19. verse of the same one and twentieth chapter it is said of Goliath, whose speare was weightie as a Weauers beame, when as by the same eclipsis it must be vnderstood by the brother of Goliath; Goliath himselfe being formerly slaine.

As by the death of Sauls children God secured the house of Dauid, leauing no head vnto rebellion; so did hee strengthen both the King and Nation against forreine enemies, by the valour of many braue Commanders, the like of whom, for number & quality, that people of Israel is not knowne to haue had at any time before or after. Thirty Captaines of thousands there were, all men of marke, and great reputation in warre. Ouer these were fixe Coronels, whose valour was so extraordinary, that it might be well held as miraculous. These Coronels had some difference of place and honour, which seemeth to haue beene giuen vpon mere consideration of their vertue. For Abishai the brother of Ioab, who in the warre against the Ammonites & Aramites was Lieutenant, and commanded halfe the armie, could not attaine to the honour of the first ranke, but was faine to rest contented with being principall of the three Coronels of the second order, notwithstanding his neerhess of blood vnto the King, the flourishing estate of his owne house, and his well approued seruices. All these Coronels and Captains, with the Companies belonging to them, may seeme to haue beene such as were continually retained, or at the least kept in readines for anie occasion, considering that the numbers which were mustered and drawne out, if need required, into the field, verie farre exceeded thirtie thousand, yea, or thirtie times as manie. They were most of them such as had followed the King in Sauls time, and beene hardened with his aduersities. Others there were verie manie, and principall men in their severall Tribes, that repaired vnto him after the death of Saul; but these Captaines and Coronels; (who with Ioab, that was General of all the Kings forces, make vp the number of 37.) were the speciall men of warre, and reckoned as Dauids Worthies. The long reigne of Dauid, as it is knowne to haue consumed many of these excellent men of warre, so may it probably be guessed to haue wasted the most of those whose deaths we find no where mentioned. For the sonnes of Zeruja, who had beene too hard for Dauid, were worne away, and only Ioab left in the beginning of Salomon, who wanted his brother Abishai to stand by his side in his last extremitee.

2 Sam. 23.

By the actions forepassed in the time of Dauid, it is gathered that he had reigned now 33. yeares or thereabouts, when the posterity of Saul was rooted out, so that he enjoyed about seuen yeeres of entire quiet and securitie, wherein it pleased God to remouall impediments that might haue troubled the succession of Salomon in his fathers throne. In this time also Dauid hauing established all things in Iuda and Israel, and the borders thereof, he againe displeased God by numbring the people, as in ostentation of his power: in which he employed Ioab, with other Captaines of his Armie, who after nine moneths and twentie dayes trauell, returned with the account & register of all the people, able and fit to beare Armes, and they amounted to the number of thirtie hundred thousand, besides Leui and Benjamin, whereof in Iuda and the cities thereof five hundred thousand, and in Israel eight hundred thousand.

2 Sam. 24. 1. Chr. 21.

For this, when by the Prophet Gad he was offered from God the choice of three punishments, whereof he might submit himselfe to which he pleased; to wit, seuen yeeres famine; three moneths warre, wherein he should be vnprosperous in all attempts, and be chased by his enemies; or a generall pestilence to last three dayes: Dauid made choise to bow himselfe vnder the hand of God only, and left himselfe subiect to that cruell disease, which hath no compassion or respect of persons, of which there perished 70. thousand. And hereby hee hath taught all that liue, that it is better to fall into the hands of God than of men; whereof he giueth this diuine reason, For his mercies are great. 2 Sam. 24.

S. VIII.

Of the last acts of Dauid; Adonijahs faction; the reuenge vpon Ioab and Shimci.

Aslly, when he grew weake and feeble, and past the acts and knowledge of women, he was yet aduised to lie in the armes of a young and well complexioned maiden, to keepe him warme. In this his weake estate of bodie, when hee was in a manner bed-ridden, Adonijah his eldest sonne (Ammon & Absalom being now dead) hauing drawn vnto his partie that inuincible, renowned and feared Ioab, with Abiathar the Priest, began manifestly to prepare for his establishment in the Kingdome after his father. For being the eldest now liuing of Dauids sonnes, and a man of goodly personage, Salomon yet young, and borne of a mother formerly attainted with adulterie, for which her name was omitted by S. Matthew (as Beda, Hugo, Thomas, and others suppose) he presumed to carrie the matter without resistance. Hereof when Dauid had knowledge by Bersabe the mother of Salomon, who did put him in mind of his faithfull promise, that Salomon her son should reigne after him (Nathan the Prophet affirming the same thing vnto the King, & seconding her report of Adonijah his presumption) the King calling vnto him Zadoc the Priest, Nathan the Prophet, & Benaiah the Captain of his guard, gaue charge and commission to anoint Salomon, and to set him on the Mule whereon himselfe vsed to ride in his greatest state: which done, Salomon attended, and strongly guarded by the ordinarie and choyce men of warre, the Cherethites and Pelishtites, shewed himselfe to the people. These tidings being reported to Adonijah, he presently abandoned his assistants, and for the safety of his life, he held by the horns of the Altar, whom for the present Salomon pardoned. After this, Dauid had remaining two especiall cares, whereof he was desirous to discharge his thoughts; the one concerning the peace of the land, which might be disturbed by some rebellion against Salomon; the other concerning the building of the Temple, which he sought by all means to aduance, and make the businesse publicke. To bring these intentions to good effect, he summoned a Parliament, consisting of all the Princes of Israel, the Princes of the severall Tribes, all the Captaines and Officers, with all the mightie, and men of power; who did repaire vnto Ierusalem.

1 Reg. 1.

2 Chron. 28. 1.

In this assembly the King stood vp, & signified his purpose of building the Temple; shewing how the Lord had approued the motion. Herein he took occasion to lay open his owne title to the Crowne, shewing that the Kingdome was by Gods ordinance due to the Tribe of Iuda (as Iacob in his blessing prophetically bequeathed it) and that God himselfe was pleased to make choise of him among all his fathers sonnes. In like manner he said that God himselfe had appointed Salomon by name to be his successor: whereupon he earnestly charged both the people and his sonne to conformance themselves vnto all that God had commanded, and particularly to goe forward in this worke of the Lords house, which Salomon was chosen to build. Then produced he the patterne of the worke, according to the forme which God himselfe had appointed; and so laying open his owne preparations, he exhorted all others to a voluntarie contribution.

1 Chr. 29. 2.

The Kings proposition was so well approued by the Princes & people, that where as hee himselfe had giuen three thousand talents of gold, and seuen thousand of silver, they added vnto it seuen thousand of gold, & ten thousand of silver, besides brasse, iron, and and Jewels, heartily reioicing in the aduancement of so religious a worke. This businesse being so well dispatched, a solemne feast with great sacrifice was made, at which time Salomon was againe anointed King, & receiued fealtie of all the Princes & people of the Land, & of all the Princes his brethren, the sonnes of King Dauid. Salomon being thus established King, his Father Dauid finding himselfe euen in the hands of death, first exhorted his sonne to exercise the same courage and strength of minde, which himselfe had done in all his attempts: and to the end that a happy end might follow the beginning of all his enterprizes, he vttered these mighty words; Take heed to the charge of the Lord thy God, to walke in his wayes, and keepe his statutes, and his commandments, and his iudgements, and his testimonies, as it is written in the Law of Moses, &c. to the performance of which, G O D fastened the succession, and prosperitie of his issues. For this done (saith G O D himselfe) Thou shalt not want one of thy posteritie to sit upon the Throne of Israel.
